PREFACE

'GIVE heed to . . . teaching.' Perhaps the Church of Christ has never given sufficient heed to teaching since the earliest and happiest days. In our own day the importance of teaching, or, as we sometimes call it, expository preaching, has been pressed home through causes that are various yet never accidental; and it is probable that in the near future more heed will be given by the Church to teaching than has ever been given before.

As a contribution towards the furnishing of the Church for that great work, this DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE is published. It is a Dictionary of the Old and New Testaments, together with the Old Testament Apocrypha, according to the Authorized and Revised English Versions, and with constant reference to the original tongues. Every effort has been used to make the information it contains reasonably full, reliable, and accessible.

As to fulness. In a Dictionary of the Bible one expects that the words occurring in the Bible, which do not explain themselves, will receive some explanation. The present Dictionary more nearly meets that expectation than any Dictionary that has hitherto been published. Articles have been written on the names of all Persons and Places, on the Antiquities and Archæology of the Bible, on its Ethnology, Geology, and Natural History, on Biblical Theology and Ethic, and even on the obsolete or archaic words occurring in the English Versions. The greater number of the articles are of small compass, for care has been exercised to exclude vague generalities as well as unaccepted idiosyncrasies; but there are many articles which deal with important and difficult subjects, and extend to considerable length. Such, for example, is the article in the first volume on the Chronology of the New Testament, and the article in the present volume on Jesus Christ.

As to reliability. The names of the authors are appended to their articles, except where the article is very brief or of minor importance; and these names are the best guarantee that the work may be relied on. So far as could be ascertained, those authors were chosen for each particular subject who had made a special study of that subject, and might be able to speak with authority upon it. Then, in addition to the work of the Editor and his Assistant, every sheet has passed through the hands of the three distinguished scholars whose names are found on the title-page. Those scholars are not responsible for errors of any kind, if such should be discovered in the Dictionary, but the time and care they have spent upon it may be taken as a good assurance that the work as a whole is reliable and authoritative.

As to accessibility. While all the articles have been written expressly for this work, so they have been arranged under the headings one would most naturally turn to. In a very few cases it has been found necessary to group allied subjects together. But even then, the careful system of black-lettering and cross-reference adopted should enable the reader to find the subject wanted without delay. And so important has it seemed to the Editor that each subject should be found under its own natural title, that he has allowed a little repetition here and there (though not in identical terms) rather than distress the reader by sending him from one article to another in search of the information he desires. The Proper Names will be found under the spelling adopted in the Revised Version, and in a few very familiar instances the spelling of the Authorized Version is also given, with a cross-reference to the other. On the Proper Names generally, and particularly on the very difficult and unsettled questions of their derivation, reference may be made to the article NAMES (PROPER), which will be found in the third volume. The Hebrew, and (where it seemed to be of consequence for the identification of the name) the Greek of the Septuagint, have been given for all proper and many common names. It was found impracticable to record all the variety of spelling discovered in different manuscripts of the Septuagint; and it was considered unnecessary, in view of the great Edition now in preparation in Cambridge, and the Concordance of Proper Names about to be published at the Clarendon Press. The Abbreviations, considering the size and scope of the work, will be seen to be few and easily mastered. A list of them, together with a simple and uniform scheme of transliterating Hebrew and Arabic words, will be found on the following pages.

The Editor has pleasure in recording his thanks to many friends and willing fellow-workers, including the authors of the various articles. In especial, after those whose names are given on the title-page, he desires to thank the Rev. W. SANDAY, D.D., LL.D., Lady Margaret Professor of Divinity in the University of Oxford, who has again read many of the articles and given valuable assistance in other ways; next, the Rev. G. M. MACKIE, M.A., of Beyrout, whose knowledge of modern Syrian life is both intimate and sympathetic; also Professor MAHAFFY of Dublin, who kindly read some articles in proof; Professor RYLE of Cambridge; Principal SALMOND of Aberdeen; Principal STEWART of St. Andrews; and Principal FAIRBAIRN and Mr. J. VERNON BARTLET, M.A., of Mansfield College, Oxford. The Editor regrets to have to record the death, since the issue of the first volume, of Dr. D. Shearer and the Rev. H. A. White, M.A., New College, Oxford.

 Messrs. Charles Scribner's Sons, New York, have the sole right of publication of this DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE in the United States and Canada.

DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE

FEIGN (Lat. fingĕre, to mould, invent; Old Fr. feindre, ptcp. feignant).—1. To devise, invent: Neh 6[8] 'There are no such things done as thou sayest, but thou feignest them out of thine own heart' (בָּדָא, only here and 1 K 12[33] EV 'devise'); 2 P 2[3] 'And through covetousness shall they with feigned words make merchandise of you' (πλαστοῖς λόγοις, only here in NT; Salmond 'made up or craftly constructed speeches'). Cf. Lk 24[11] Tind. 'their wordes seemed vnto them fayned thinges'; and Knox, Hist. p. 177, 'Which reports are all (God knoweth) most vain, fained, and untrue.' 2. To put on an appearance, pretend: 1 K 14[5] 'she shall feign herself to be another woman' (מִתְנַכֶּרֶת); so 14[6]; 1 S 21[13] 'he changed his behaviour before them, and feigned himself mad in their hands' (יִתְהֹלֵל); 2 S 14[2] 'feign thyself to be a mourner' (הִתְאַבֶּל־נָא); Ps 17[1] 'give ear unto my prayer, that goeth not out of feigned lips' (שִׂפְתֵי מִרְמָה, lit. 'lips of guile'). Cf. Knox, Hist. 101, 'yet was every head so fully answered, and especially one. . . . To wit, That Paul at the commandment of James, and of the Elders of Jerusalem, passed to the Temple, and fained himself to pay his vow with others'; and Elyot, The Governour, ii. 432, 'Unto euery man disclose nat thy harte, leest perauenture he wyl gyue to the a fained thanke, and after reporte rebukefully of the'; Barlowe, Dialogue, ed. 1897, p. 48, 'Then beganne he [Luther] stoutly to fortefy his fayned fayth voyde of good workes'; Tindale, Works, i. 94, 'For where right faith is, there bringeth she forth good works; if there follow not good works, it is (no doubt) but a dream and an opinion or feigned faith'; also Tind. Expositions, 163, 'And for them that would not receive such pardons feigned they purgatory, and for them that received them feigned they pardon, turning binding and loosing, with preaching God's word, unto buying and selling sin for money.'

Feignedly=with pretence, deceitfully: Jer 3[10] 'Judah hath not turned unto me with her whole heart, but feignedly' (בְּשֶׁקֶר 'in falsehood,' as AVm); 2 Es 8[28] 'Think not upon those that have walked feignedly before thee' (false conversati sunt). So Tindale, Works, i. 177, 'the children of the devil, in time of adversity, fly from Christ, whom they followed feignedly.'

FELIX, Antonius, procurator of Judæa (Ac 23[25f.]–24[27]) at the time of St. Paul's last visit to Jerusalem and arrest there. The military tribune Claudius Lysias sends Paul under escort to Cæsarea, with a letter to Felix reciting, in a light favourable to his own conduct, the circumstances of the arrest. Arrived at Cæsarea, the apostle, after a purely formal interview, is remanded by Felix for trial, and detained in the government house (prætorium), originally a palace of Herod the Great, until the arrival of his accusers. On the fifth day the proceedings begin. The case against the prisoner is opened by an advocate (see TERTULLUS). Evidence is given by the Jews, and, upon a sign from the procurator, Paul makes a speech in defence. Felix, perhaps interested in the matter by his Jewish wife (Ac 24[22]), then adjourns the trial till the arrival of Lysias, and Paul is again remanded as a prisoner, but under lenient conditions. We hear nothing of any resumption of the trial. But after some days Felix, accompanied by Drusilla (and, according to some authorities for the Western text, at her special request), sends for Paul and gives him audience concerning the belief 'in Christ' (or 'Jesus as Christ'). The apostle (taking, as usual, common ground with his hearer) addresses him upon broad moral truths, and the judgment (looked for by heathens as well as Jews) after death. Felix becomes alarmed, and sends him away till a future occasion. He sends for him ('secretly,' Gig.) 'somewhat often' for further conversation, excited mainly by the hope of a bribe (cf. Ramsay, St. Paul the Trav. p. 310 ff.). Two years after St. Paul's arrest Felix is recalled, and, to ingratiate himself with the Jews (or, according to some Western sources, for the sake of Drusilla), leaves Paul a prisoner.

The dubious light in which the character of Felix appears in the NT narrative is bright compared with that shed upon it by the other histories of the time. Felix was the (apparently) younger brother of Pallas, the well-known and all-powerful favourite of Claudius. That Antonius, not Claudius, was the nomen borne by Felix (Tac. Hist. v. 9; the nomen Claudius for Felix is based on a probably corrupt reading in Suidas, s.v.) suggests that Felix was a freedman of Antonia, mother of Claudius (so also probably Pallas; see Jos. Ant. XVIII. vi. 6; cf. Schürer, HJP I. ii. 175). The brothers claimed descent, as Tacitus ironically mentions, from ancient kings of Arcadia (Ann. xii. 53).

We first hear of Felix in connexion with the disorders in Samaria under his predecessor Ventidius Cumanus. The latter refusing to punish the Samaritans for the murder of some Galilæan pilgrims, the Zealots massacred many Samaritans, and were in turn massacred by Cumanus. Both sides appealed to Ummidius Quadratus, legate of Syria, who intervened with great severity and sent Cumanus to Rome (Jos. BJ II. xii. 3 ff.; Ant. XX. vi. 1–3). According to Josephus, Felix was now, at the request of the high priest Jonathan, who had been sent to Rome with Cumanus, sent as successor to the latter; and Jos. proceeds to relate how, upon completing his twelfth year (Jan. 24, A.D. 53), Claudius gave certain territories to Agrippa. Coupled with the fact that Tacitus places the deposition of Cumanus in the year 52, this fairly fixes Felix' appointment to the latter year. A difficulty arises, however, from the fact that Tacitus, in his account (Ann. xii. 54) of what led to the deposition of Cumanus, speaks of Felix as 'iam pridem Iudaeae impositus . . . ut [Cumano] Galilaeorum natio, Felici Samaritae parerent.' It has been attempted to combine the latter statement with the 'many years' of Ac 24[10] by the hypothesis that before his appointment as procurator Felix had held some subordinate appointment in Samaria. But Josephus clearly intimates that Felix was first appointed to the province on this occasion; and on the whole, in spite of the authority of Mommsen and the arguments of Blass (Act. Apost. p. 21), we join Schürer in following Josephus here, as likely to be the better informed.

Felix received from his patron the (for a freedman) unprecedented honour of military command as well as civil jurisdiction ('cohortibus et alis prouinciaeque' . . . Suet. Claud. 28). His character as governor was that of a man raised from a low origin to unfitting eminence—'per omnem saeuitiam et libidinem ius regium seruili ingenio exercuit' (Tac. Hist. v. 9). The general results of his rule are aptly summed up by the same writer, 'intempestiuis remediis delicta accendebat' (Ann. xii. 54, and see TERTULLUS). His ferocity against the 'Zealots' and their supposed partisans gave birth, or new strength, to the Sicarii,—a more numerous and extreme class of fanatics,—who were in turn used by fanatical rebels (cf. Ac 21[38]) until half the nation was in the wildest disaffection. St. Paul probably came into contact with Felix as stated above from two to four years after the accession of Nero (54), by whom Felix must have been confirmed in office. The πολλὰ ἔτη of Ac 24[10] are hardly, therefore (as Harnack, Chron. 253, contends), compatible with a date earlier than the last named. During the last two years of Felix' tenure of office, and therefore during Paul's imprisonment at Cæsarea, fall the serious riots between the Jewish and Syrian inhabitants of the latter town about ἰσοπολιτεία. Felix, whose customary methods had failed to quell the disturbances, sent the heads of both parties to Rome for the emperor to decide the case. But before any final decision Felix was recalled. The violence with which he had interfered in this matter partly explains his anxiety to do the Jews a parting favour (Ac 24[27]; see Jos BJ II. xiii. 7; Ant. XX. viii. 7). The Jews, however (Jos. Ant. XX. viii. 9), lodged an indictment against him, which failed only through the influence of Pallas. Of Felix' later history nothing is known (see Schürer, HJP I. ii. 174 ff., and the authorities cited by him. For the chronological questions involved, see FESTUS, and art. CHRONOLOGY OF NT, p. 417 f.). A. ROBERTSON.

FELLOW (from fé=property, money, and lag to lay; hence 'one who lays down money in a joint undertaking with others'). In AV two easily separated meanings are found.

1. Partner, companion. The Heb words are (a) רֵעַ rêa', Ex 2[13], Jg 7[13. 14. 22], 1 S 14[20], 2 S 2[16*bis*], Is 34[14], Jon 1[7], Zec 3[8]; RV adds 1 K 20[35] for AV 'neighbour,' as the word is generally tr[d] elsewhere in AV and RV. Once the fem. of this word (רֵעָה rê'âh) is tr[d] 'fellow,' Jg 11[37], though in the next verse it is 'companion' as in Ps 45[14], its only remaining occurrence. RV has 'companion' in all three places. (b) חָבֵר ḥâbhêr, Ps 45[7], Ec 4[10], Is 44[11], Ezk 37[19]; RV in Ezk 'companion,' as the word is elsewhere tr[d] in AV and RV, except Jg 20[11] (אִישׁ אֶחָד חֲבֵרִים, EV 'knit together as one man'); and Aram. forms חֲבַר ḥâbhar, Dn 2[13. 18] (in v.[17] 'companion' as RV in all), and חַבְרָה ḥabhrâh, Dn 7[20]. (c) עָמִית 'âmîth, Zec 13[7] (גֶּבֶר עֲמִיתִי, EV 'the man that is my fellow'). The word is in form abstract, hence lit. 'the man of my fellowship'; but elsewhere it occurs only in Lv and in the concrete sense of 'neighbour.'

The Gr. words are (a) ἡ πλησίον, only once and fem., Bar 6[43] 'she reproacheth her fellow' (cf. Jg 11[37] above, where, however, the LXX is συνεταιρίς). The commonest word for 'neighbour' in NT is ὁ πλησίον. (b) ἑταῖρος, Mt 11[16]. (c) μέτοχος, He 1[9], a quotation from Ps 45[7], where LXX has μ. (d) οἱ περί, Three [26].

This meaning of 'fellow' may be illustrated by the foll. paragraph from T. Adams, II Peter (Sherman's ed. p. 42):—'As fellows, in due measure, with God himself: "Truly our fellowship is with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ," 1 Jn 1[3]. We may have a society with man, this is requisite, for we are all of one mould; but to God, what, all fellows? Yes, we have a fellowship with God; such is his mercy, not our merits. The proud gallant scorns the poor mechanic: What, are you my fellow? Yet, mors sceptra ligonibus æquat, Death takes away difference between king and beggar, tumbles both the knight and the pawn into one bag. Well, let the world despise us, it is enough the Lord doth not disdain our fellowship.' Again (on p. 43) Adams says, 'Thus we partake of the Divine nature (with all reverence be it spoken) as fellows. But, not to deny the King his supremacy, we are fellows with Christ in his joy, reserving the throne to himself.' Cf. also Ac 4[23] Wyc. (1388), 'thei camen to her felowis, and telden to hem, hou grete thingis the princis of preestis and the eldre men hadden seid to hem'; He 10[33] Wyc. (1388), 'ye weren maad felowis of men lyuynge so.' Shaks. Tempest, III. i. 84—

> 'To be your fellow
> You may deny me; but I'll be your servant.'

2. Person, first without and then with contempt; for the word has a history. Melvill (Diary, Wod. p. 78), can say of John Dury, 'He was a verie guid fallow, and tuk delyt, as his speciall comfort, to haiff his table and houss filled with the best men,' and thereby express reverence for him. But Adams (II Peter, p. 43) says, 'There is a generation of men that lavish their estates,—as we say, fling the house out at the windows,—that call themselves good fellows,' where the meaning is still 'companion,' but the glory is departing. The word was used to express easy familiarity, then by a superior in condescension to an inferior, and finally as the utterance of contempt. In Gn 39[2] Tindale has, 'And the LORDE was with Ioseph, and he was a luckie fellowe,' where 'fellow' is simply 'man'; nor is contempt expressed in Mk 4[41] 'what felowe is this? For booth winde and see obey him' (=Lk 8[25]); and even in Mk 2[7] 'how doeth this felowe so blaspheme?' (οὗτος), or Jn 6[52] 'How can this felowe geve us his flesshe to eate?' (οὗτος) the sense is probably no more than 'this man,' or at least than we should express by 'this person.'

The Heb. words so translated in AV are (a) אִישׁ 'îsh, 1 S 29[4] 'Make this fellow return' (RV 'the man'); in plu. 'fellows,' Jg 18[25] (אֲנָשִׁים מָרֵי נָפֶשׁ, lit. 'men, bitter of soul,' as RVm; Moore, 'men of acrid temper'). RV adds Jg 9[4] (AV 'persons') 11[3] (AV 'men'). In these places neither the Heb. nor probably the Eng. means more than 'person.' And even when 'this fellow' is the tr[n] of (b) זֶה zeh, 'this' (1 S 21[15 bis] 25[21], 1 K 22[27]=2 Ch 18[26], 2 K 9[11]; to which RV adds 1 S 29[4]), there is at least less contempt expressed than the words now carry. The Greek words correspond to the Hebrew. (a) ἀνήρ, 1 Mac 10[61] 'certain pestilent fellows' (ἄνδρες λοιμοί); Ac 17[5] 'took unto them certain lewd fellows' (τινὰς ἄνδρας πονηρούς). (b) οὗτος, Sir 13[23],

* For the reading see Moore, in loc.

1 Mac 4^5, Mt 12^{24} $26^{61.71}$, Lk 22^{59} 23^2, Jn 9^{29}, Ac 18^{13}. RV prefers 'man' except in Sir, where 'fellow' is simply omitted. (c) ὁ τοιοῦτος, Ac 22^{22}.

Perhaps the strongest expression of contempt is given when 'fellow' is added to an adj. The examples are (a) רֵקִים rêḳîm, 2 S 6^{20} 'vain fellows'; (b) τολμηρός, Sir 8^{15} 'bold fellow'; and (c) λοιμός, Ac 24^5 'pestilent fellow' (cf. ἄνδρες λοιμοί, 'pestilent fellows,' 1 Mac 10^{61} above).

The Amer. RV prefers 'base fellow' to AV 'son (man) of Belial,' and 'base fellows' to sons (men, children) of Belial.' See BELIAL.

In composition 'fellow' always means partner or companion. The foll. compounds occur in AV: (1) Fellowcitizen (συνπολίτης), Eph 2^{19}, RV adds He 8^{11}, reading ὁ πολίτης with edd. for ὁ πλησίον of TR which gave AV 'neighbour.' (2) Fellowdisciple (συνμαθητής), Jn 11^{16}. (3) Fellowheir (συνκληρονομός), Eph 3^6. (4) Fellowhelper (συνεργός, see 'fellow-worker'), 2 Co 8^{23}, 3 Jn ^{8}. (5) Fellowlabourer (συνεργός, see 'fellow-worker), Ph 4^3, 1 Th 3^2, Philem $^{1.24}$. (6) Fellowprisoner (συναιχμάλωτος), Ro 16^7, Col 4^{10}, Philem ^{23}. (7) Fellowservant (σύνδουλος), Mt $18^{28.29.31.33}$ 24^{49}, Col 1^7 4^7 (='fellow-worker' in Col), Rev 6^{11} 19^{10} 22^9. (8) Fellowsoldier (TR συστρατιώτης, edd. συνστ.), Ph 2^{25}, Philem ^{2}. (9) Fellow worker (so 1611, συνεργός), Col 4^{11}. RV adds 'fellow-worker,' Ro $16^{3.9}$ (AV 'helper'), 1 Co 3^9 'we are God's fellow-workers' (AV 'labourers together with God'), 2 Co 8^{23} (AV 'fellowhelper'), Ph 2^{25} (AV 'companion in labour') 4^3, Philem $^{1.24}$ (AV 'fellowlabourer'), 3 Jn ^{8} (AV 'fellowhelper'). (10) Workfellow (συνεργός), Ro 16^{21}. (11) Yokefellow (TR σύζυγος, edd. σύνζυγος), Ph 4^3. To those RV adds (12) Fellow-elder (συμπρεσβύτερος, T. WH, συνπρ.), 1 P 5^1 (AV 'also an elder'). (13) Fellowmember of the body (TR, σύσσωμος, edd. σύνσωμος), Eph 3^6 (AV 'of the same body'). (14) Fellowpartaker (συμμέτοχος, T. WH, συνμ.), Eph 3^6 (AV 'partaker').

FENCE.—This Eng. word is not used in NT. In AV of OT it translates various Hebrew words. In the case of three of these, the tr. is a mistake, and is changed in RV (Is 5^2, 2 S 23^7, Job 10^{11}). The words from the stems gûr and bâzar, גּוּר and בָּצַר, denote fortifications or fortified places (e.g. 2 Ch 8^5 11^{23}, Dt 3^5 etc.) Those from the stem gâdar, גָּדַר, denote a stone wall (Ps 62^3, Job 19^8). RV tr. the words of this stem by 'fence' in many places where we find 'wall' or 'hedge' in AV. A fence is properly that which fends or defends. The fence described in the Heb. words of this group is ordinarily the enclosure defending a field or vineyard or sheepfold. See HEDGE.

W. J. BEECHER.

FENCED CITIES (עָרֵי מִבְצָר, properly 'cut off' from outside, and hence inaccessible; RV generally substitutes 'fortified' for 'fenced').—Collections of houses in ancient times may be classed under three heads: (1) Cities, walled or fenced. (2) Unwalled towns and villages, with towers for resort of villagers in times of danger. (3) Unwalled towns and villages.

The number or size of the houses did not affect the question. A city might be of very small extent. Gn 19^{20} 'Behold now, this city is near to flee unto, and it is a little one: Oh! let me escape thither (is it not a little one?) and my soul shall live.' On the other hand, the suburbs of a city might become so extensive that it became equivalent to a town without walls. Zec 2^4 'Jerusalem shall be inhabited as villages without walls, for the multitude of men and cattle therein.'

Towns and villages that were without walls were a prey to any hostile foraging party, and were considered of no account. Lv $25^{29.31}$ 'If a man sell a dwelling-house in a walled city, then he may redeem it. . . . But the houses of the villages, which have no wall round about them, shall be reckoned with the fields of the country.' As a village or town prospered and more solid houses were built, they would for purposes of defence be joined together, and the town would thus become a walled city. Towns and villages appear to have been dependent upon fenced cities both for administrative purposes and for protection of the inhabitants. Jos 15^{47} 'Ashdod with her towns and her villages; Gaza with her towns and her villages.' As an indication of absolute security, a land of safety is pictured as 'a land of unwalled villages . . . dwelling without walls, and having neither bars nor gates' (Ezk 38^{11}). The suburbs of the cities were occupied by cattle (Jos 14^4 21^2). The villages, however, were not wholly without protection. The Israelites could not drive out the inhabitants of the valley or low country because they had chariots of iron (Jg 1^{19}, Jos 17^{16}). Both at Jericho and Damascus houses were built on the city walls (Jos 2^{15}, 2 Co 11^{33}).

Sufficient still exists of the remains of the ancient cities of Palestine, together with the historical accounts, to give us a clear idea of the positions and the general configuration of their walls. They were built in commanding positions both in the hill-country and the plains, and on the seashore they were generally on promontories. In many cases most inaccessible positions were taken advantage of, so that the battering-ram might be of no avail. Dt 1^{28} 'The cities are great, and fenced up to heaven.' Cisterns were cut in the rock for the supply of rain-water, so as to be independent of water from without (2 Ch 26^{10}, Neh 9^{25}, Jos. BJ v. iv. 3, VII. viii. 3).

There are many remains of ancient cities still exposed to view in various parts of Palestine, inhabited by nomadic tribes, where the system of defence can yet be observed: as an example, Masada, built by Jonathan Maccabæus, and strengthened by Herod the Great, may be mentioned. None of the remains, however, can be accurately ascribed to the time of Joshua, though the sites may not have changed, and it is doubtful whether at that early date the walls of fenced cities were of the same solid type as that which necessarily obtained when the battering-ram came into use. Some of the fenced cities mentioned in the Book of Joshua were taken by stratagem, but others were taken by assault by a nation which did not possess the mechanical contrivances required for the capture of cities with strong walls. From what remains of the ruins of Jericho (assumed to be near 'Ain es-Sultân), it may be inferred that these walls were built from the earliest date of sun-burnt bricks; and from the knowledge we now possess of the walls about Jerusalem, it may be considered that at the time of the capture of the city by Joab the walls were built of small stones.

The stones of the ancient towers and walls of Jerusalem still existing are of considerable size, some of those in the wall of the temple enclosure weighing nearly 90 tons. At Baalbek the great temple stands on a massive wall, with courses of stone averaging 3 ft. 9 in. in height. Thirty feet in advance of this, N., S., and W., is a protecting wall, 10 ft. thick, of monoliths weighing 600 to 800 tons each, three of them being estimated to weigh over 1000 tons each.

The bulwarks of the fenced cities of Palestine, so far back as the time of the Jewish kings, appear to have consisted of a solid masonry wall of cut stone, with parapets and battlements, and with towers at intervals from which the foot of the wall could be seen (2 Ch 32^5, Jer 31^{38}). In the walls were watchmen (2 K 9^{17}, 2 S 18^{26}, Is 62^{6}). Within the city was usually a citadel or acropolis (Jg 9^{51}), and without were walls, outworks, and towers (2 Ch 14^{7} 'Let us build these cities, and make about them walls and towers, gates and bars'; 2 S 20^{15}, Is 26^{1}, Nah 3^{8}, 2 Ch 26^{6}).

The protracted resistance offered by many of the fenced cities of Palestine may have been due as much to the strength of their position as to their walls; Samaria resisted the king of Assyria for three years, and Jerusalem successfully resisted the power of Rome, and only fell before Titus owing to the internal dissensions of the Jewish leaders.

The whole subject connected with the attack and defence of cities and fortified places is treated of under WAR, and special cases for reference will be found under JERUSALEM, SAMARIA, JERICHO, GATH, GAZA, and other strongholds of Philistia. See also GATE. C. WARREN.

FERRET (אֲנָקָה 'ănâḳah, Lv 11^{30} AV).—The ferret is not found in Palestine or Syria, and cannot be the animal intended. It is probably, as in RV, the gecko. See GECKO. G. E. POST.

FERVENCY, FERVENT. — Fervency is found only in Jth 4^{9} 'every man of Israel cried to God with great fervency' (ἐκτένεια [B -ία], which in the same verse is tr^{d} 'vehemency,' as it is tr^{d} in 2 Mac 14^{38}; RV always 'earnestness.' The Gr. word occurs also 3 Mac 6^{41}, and in NT Ac 26^{7} ἐν ἐκτενείᾳ, AV 'instantly,' RV 'earnestly'). Knox (Hist. 132) says that after the martyrdom of Walter Mill 'began a new fervency among the whole people'; and Works (ed. Laing, iii. 289), 'Peter, in a fervencie, firste left his bote, and yet after feared.' The adj. fervent is twice applied literally in the sense of 'intense,' 2 P 3^{10} 'the elements shall melt with fervent heat' (καυσούμενα λυθήσεται), and 3^{12} (καυσούμενα τήκεται). 'With fervent heat' (lit. 'being burned up') is the Bishops' tr^{n}, and is retained in RV; most of the other VSS have simply 'shall melt with heat.' Cf. Elyot, The Governour, ii. 322, 'beynge sore chaufed with fervent heate and the lengthe of his iournay'; and Dt 28^{22} Gen. 'The Lord shall smite thee with a consumption, and with the feauer, and with a burning ague, and with feruent heat.' The word is also applied to cold, as R. Fox, Chron. 116, 'Hit was a fervent coolde weder'; Stewart, Cron. Scot. ii. 337, 'The fervent frost so bitter wes.' J. HASTINGS.

FESTIVAL.—See FEASTS AND FASTS.

FESTUS, Porcius, succeeded Felix as procurator of Judæa. On his arrival he visited Jerusalem, whither the priests endeavoured unsuccessfully to induce him to send for Paul. His reply (Ac 25^{16}), that to hand over a man unheard was 'not customary with Romans' (whatever it might be for Jews), has a touch of disdainful dignity. Endeavouring to induce Paul to consent to a trial at Jerusalem, he provokes and allows the appeal to Cæsar. Then follows the hearing before Festus and Agrippa, the latter of whom is there as an expert assessor. The attitude of Festus is throughout (25^{19} $26^{24.\ 31}$) one of official impartiality, touched with good-natured indifference to the technicalities of Jewish controversies.

The gens Porcia is not otherwise known to have comprised a family of Festi, nor is this Festus known to us apart from the NT and Josephus. According to the latter, the first important event of Festus' governorship was the decision of the emperor in favour of the Syrians at Cæsarea (FELIX, sub fin.). This was effected by Beryllus (so all MSS in Jos. Ant. XX. viii. 9; vulgo 'Burrus'), Greek secretary to the emperor, whom the Syrians had won by corruption. This decision provoked the Jews to riots, in which Josephus sees the first simmerings of the war of 66. This point must not be forgotten when we come to the question of dates. The other principal occurrences of Festus' tenure of office mentioned by Josephus were, firstly, the putting down of the Sicarii, and especially of one dangerous rebel, similar to the one of Ac 21^{38} (Ant. XX. viii. 10; cf. BJ II. xiv. 1); secondly, the disturbances at Jerusalem in consequence of the wall erected at the temple to intercept the view from the new wing of Agrippa's palace. Festus took the side of Agrippa, but allowed the priests to appeal to Rome. Before the result of this appeal was known Festus died.

The important question connected with the name of Festus is that of chronology (see art. CHRONOLOGY of NT, p. 417 ff.). According to Eusebius and Jerome (Eus. Chron., Schöne ii. 148 f.; Hier. de vir. illustr.), Felix became procurator in the eleventh year of Claudius (51), Festus in the second year of Nero (56), Albinus succeeded Festus in the sixth or seventh year of Nero (60 or 61), and the Acts bring us (so Euthal. Praef. in epp. Pauli) to the fourth year of Nero (58). There has been a tendency lately, e.g. on the part of Blass and Harnack, to revert to this chronology. But apart from the fact that had Festus governed Judæa for four or five years, Josephus would surely have had more to tell us in connexion with his procuratorship, the authority of Eusebius in this matter is more than precarious. Eusebius, doubtless, made use of Julius Africanus, who in turn used Justus of Tiberias, who stated the death-year of Agrippa II. But that Justus stated the years of the procuratorships there is not a word of evidence to prove. Eusebius may be as far from the truth here as when he places the outbreak of the Neronian persecution in 67–68. At the same time the question is worth reconsidering, and the recent discussion of Harnack (Chronol. d. altchr. Lit. p. 233 ff.) deserves more minute discussion than the limits of this article allow. The chronology of Eusebius has the merit, be it what it may, of fitting in with Clemen's date for St. Paul's arrest, namely, A.D. 54 (1 CORINTHIANS, § 6). But that the rule of Festus was a short one, everything goes to prove; and, as we saw above, the disturbances which then began were viewed by Josephus as the first mutterings of the great storm of the year 66. But it would help us much if we could fix the date of the arrival of Albinus, which was separated by only a few stormy months from the death of Festus. Unfortunately, we have only the terminus ad quem firmly fixed, namely, the summer of 62 (Schürer, HJP I. ii. 183, note 47). That his successor Gessius Florus was procurator only from 64–66 may be taken as proved (ib. note 58). But we have only inferential evidence, though it amounts to high probability, that the rule of Albinus was short. Perhaps the date furnished by ARETAS, with which Harnack fails to deal satisfactorily, coupled with the general data of St. Paul's life (1 CORINTHIANS, § 6, small print), may suffice to make us pause before putting the arrival of Festus anything like as early as 56. On the other hand, as Albinus cannot have arrived later than 62, and the events of Festus' procuratorship, together with those which follow his death and precede the arrival of Albinus, though insufficient to fill five years, are yet too many for one year, it is hardly possible to place the arrival of Festus later than 60. The system adopted s.v. CHRONOLOGY may be right in going back two years further (60 to 58). On the whole this variation may be taken, upon a full review of all our materials, as the most probable limit of doubt as regards this important date. It may be remarked that if Festus arrived in 60, the διετία ὅλη of Ac 28[30] ends about February 63; between this and the Neronian persecution of midsummer 64, to which Harnack would again bring back St. Paul's death, there is sufficient though hardly ample time for the events presupposed in the Epp. to Timothy and Titus (see Schürer, as quoted above, esp. note 38; Harnack, as quoted above; Blass, Acta Apost. Ed. Philol. p. 23, and the authorities for CHRONOLOGY OF NT).

A. ROBERTSON.

FETCH.—To fetch is to cause to come, as Fuller, Holy Warre, 230, 'If they should say the Templars were burned wrongfully, they may be fetched over the coals themselves for charging his Holinesse so deeply'; and this meaning is easily seen in most of its phrases.

1. Fetch up, 1 S 6[21] 7[1]. So Shaks. Ant. and Cleop. IV. xv. 35—

> 'Had I great Juno's power,
> The strong-wing'd Mercury should fetch thee up,
> And set thee by Jove's side.'

2. Fetch again, i.e. cause to come back (see AGAIN): 1 Es 4[34] 'Swift is the sun in his course, for he compasseth the heavens round about, and fetcheth his course again to his own place in one day' (πάλιν ἀποτρέχει). Cf. Bunyan, Holy Citie, 252, 'Revivings that (like Aquavitæ) do fetch again, and chear up the soul'; and Tindale, Expositions, 165, 'He will return again unto his mercy, and fetch his power home again, which he lent to vex thee.' 3. Fetch about: 2 S 14[20] 'To fetch about this form of speech hath thy servant Joab done this thing' (לְסֹבֵב אֶת־פְּנֵי הַדָּבָר הַזֶּה), lit. 'for the purpose of bringing round the face of the business,' or as RV 'to change the face of the matter'). See ABOUT, and cf. Shaks. K. John, IV. ii. 24—

> 'Like a shifted wind unto a sail,
> It makes the course of thoughts to fetch about.'

Bacon, Essays, 'Of Cunning' (Gold. Treas. ed. p. 95, l. 5), 'It is strange, how long some men will lie in wait, to speake somewhat they desire to say: and how farre about they will fetch; and how many other Matters they will beat over to come near it.' 4. Fetch a compass, i.e. 'make a circuit,' instead of going in a straight line. Thus Fuller, Pisgah Sight, IV. ii. 43, 'Wicked men may for a time retard, not finally obstruct our access to happiness. It is but fetching a compass, making two steps for one; a little more pains and patience will do the deed.' The Heb. is simply the verb סָבַב ṣâbhabh, which means to make a turning or a circuit. RV gives 'turn about' in Nu 34[5], Jos 15[3], and 'make a circuit' in 2 S 5[23], 2 K 3[9]. The Gr. is περιέρχομαι, go round about, Ac 28[13] (RV 'make a circuit').* In 'fetch a compass' as in 'fetch about' the idea of the circuitous route is not in the verb, but in its complement.† See COMPASS. Similar phrases are found, as T. Adams, II Peter, 54, 'Merchants would give much to know a short cut to those remote places of traffic, without passing straits or fetching bouts'; Fuller, Holy Warre, p. 29, 'As if sensible of his sad fate, and desirous to deferre what he cannot avoid, he [the Jordan] fetcheth many turnings and windings, but all will not excuse him from falling into the Dead sea.' 5. Fetch a stroke, Dt 19[5] 'his hand fetcheth a stroke with the axe.' So Fuller, Holy Warre, 219, 'Being about to fetch another stroke, the Prince with his foot gaue him such a blow that he felled him to the ground'; and Bunyan, Holy War (Clar. Press ed. p. 47, l. 20), 'If I fetch my blow, Mansoul, down you go.' 6. Fetch one's breath, Sir 31[19] 'he fetcheth not his wind short upon his bed' (οὐκ ἀσθμαίνει, RV 'he doth not breathe hard'). Cf. Shaks. 1 Henry IV. II. iv. 579, 'Hark, how hard he fetches breath. Search his pockets'; and Troilus, III. ii. 23, 'She does so blush, and fetches her wind so short, as if she were frayed with a sprite: I'll fetch her. It is the prettiest villain: she fetches her breath so short as a new-ta'en sparrow.'

In Old English there were two distinct verbs, fet and fetch. Fet seems to have been the older of the two. Indeed, Bradley (Oxf. Eng. Dict. s.v. 'Fetch') believes that Platt and Sievers are right in deriving fetch from fet by a singular series of changes. The i of the oldest form feti-an became a consonantal y, then this ty being sounded as cc became written so, and cc easily passed into the spelling ch. Cf. ort-yeard, in Old Eng. orceard, now orchard.

Fet and Fetch were synonymous in meaning, as we may see from Tindale, whose tr[n] (1534) of Mt 24[17. 18] is, 'And let him which is on the housse toppe not come downe to fet (ἆραι) eny thinge out of his housse. Nether let him which is in the felde returne backe to fetche (ἆραι) his clothes.' Fet gradually gave way to fetch. In the Geneva version of 1560 it is found in the imperat., 1 S 20[31] 'wherefore now send and fet him vnto me, for he shal surely dye,' and in the indic., Dt 19[12] 'Then the Elders of his citie shal send and fet him thence.' And even in AV of 1611 the infin. is once employed, Jer 36[21] 'So the king sent Iehudi to fet the roule.' But after the Old Eng. period the word was used chiefly in the past tense and past ptcp., as an alternative with 'fetcht' or 'fetched,' and that is its use elsewhere in AV.

In the 1611 ed. of AV 'fet' occurs 9 times (2 S 9[5] 11[27], 1 K 7[13] 9[28], 2 K 11[4], 2 Ch 12[11], Jer 26[23] 36[21], Ac 28[13]); 'fetcht' 5 times (Gn 18[7], 1 S 7[1], 2 S 14[2], 2 K 3[9], 2 Ch 11[7]); and 'fetched' 6 times (Gn 18[4] 27[14], Jos 15[3], Jg 18[13], 1 S 10[22], 2 S 4[6]). In course of time, chiefly through the influence of Dr. Paris (1762) and Dr. Blayney (1769), 'fet' was banished from AV. In his Camb. Paragraph Bible of 1873, Scrivener restored it to all its original places, and Scrivener's text is used in the Camb. Bible for Schools and Colleges. But the Camb. and Oxf. Parallel Bibles do not use it once. They use even 'fetcht' only once, Gn 18[7]; elsewhere always 'fetched.'

FETTER.—Three Heb. words are translated fetter. 1. נְחֹשֶׁת, Arab. nahâs, copper. In La 3[7] this word is rendered chain, in Jer 39[7] 52[11] (RV) fetters, also in Jg 16[21], 2 S 3[34], 2 K 25[7], 2 Ch 33[11] 36[6]. In the Arab. tr. by Van Dyck, נְחֻשָּׁתַיִם is rendered silâsil nahâs, copper chains, or silsilatain min nahâs, two chains of copper. It is still the custom in Syria to attach a chain to each of the rings put round a prisoner's ankles, the middle of the chain being fastened to his girdle. A prisoner is thus, according to the Arabic way of speaking, bound with two chains. 2. כֶּבֶל, Syr. kĕbēl (a late word borrowed from Aramaic. The Arab. kabal is probably a loan-word from the Aramaic). There are two passages in which this word is used, both referring to fetters of iron, Ps 105[18] and Ps 149[8]. 3. זִקִּים (Is 45[14], Nah 3[10] fetters of captives, Job 36[8] fig.). Horses and other animals are usually tethered by ropes fastened to the fore foot and the hind foot on one side.

FIGS (תְּאֵנִים tĕ'ênîm, the fruit of the fig tree, which is תְּאֵנָה tĕ'ênâh; in NT συκῆ is the fig tree, and σῦκον the fig).—The fig tree, Ficus Carica, L., is cultivated everywhere in the Holy Land, and also grows spontaneously in many places. It is a tree of moderate size, seldom attaining a height of 15 ft., but its spreading branches often cover a circle with a diameter of 25 to 30 ft. Fig trees are habitually planted near houses, and the people sit in their shade, and that of the vines which grow over the trellises. This familiar sight did not fail to be noted in OT and Apocr. as an emblem of peace and prosperity (1 K 4[25], Mic 4[4], Zec 3[10],

* Lightfoot (Fresh Revision[2] 193) says, 'We have heard how the inquiring schoolboy has been perplexed at reading that St. Paul and his companions "fetched a compass" when they set sail from Syracuse (Ac 28[13]), not being able to reconcile this statement with the date given for the invention of this instrument.'

† Fuller, Holy Warre, p. 119, says, 'His navie he sent about by Spain'; then on p. 120, 'behold his navie there safely arriving, which with much difficultie and danger had fetched a compass about Spain.'

1 Mac 14[12]). There are numerous varieties of figs cultivated, some of which bear a tart, blackish fruit, others a sweet, greenish or whitish one. The branches are straggling and naked in winter, but when the rains are nearly or quite over, small green knobs appear at the ends of the twigs. They are the young fruits, פַּג pag, 'green figs' (Ca 2[13]). The leaf-bud now expands, and the new pale green leaves soon more or less overshadow the little figs. This is a familiar sign of early summer (Mt 24[32]). Hence a fig tree with leaves must already have young fruits, or it will be barren for the season. The first figs ripen late in May or early in June. They are called in Heb. בִּכּוּרָה bikkûrâh, in Arab. bâkûrah, that is, first ripe, Is 28[4] (AV hasty fruit), Jer 24[2], Hos 9[10], Mic 7[1].

When our Lord came to the fig tree near Bethany (Mk 11[13]), just before the passover, i.e. from late in March to the middle of April, 'the time of figs was not yet,' that is, the season for ripe figs had not come. Among the various explanations of Christ's action which may be given, the only ones which seem to us worthy of consideration are the following: (1) That being hungry, and seeing from a distance that the tree had leaves, and therefore was not dead, he came, not to find new figs, but to find and eat any figs of the last season which might have remained over on the tree. The expression 'if haply he might find anything thereon' implies that he did not expect to find much. One or two figs will often stay an empty stomach marvellously. According to this opinion, the offence of the fig tree was the fact of not having what must have been a very exceptional relic of a former harvest. (2) That, finding leaves, he knew that there should be young fruit, and hoped that there might, even at that early period, be 'the first ripe figs,' bikkûrâh. According to this interpretation, the fault of the fig tree was in not having a precocious fig or two before the time, 'for the time of figs was not yet.' We will not dispute the possibility of finding a winter fig or two on a tree (although during a residence of thirty-three years in Syria we have searched and inquired in vain for them), or of the exceptionally early maturing of some variety of figs, perhaps not now cultivated. Neither of these theories, however, accords with our conception of Christ's justice. In neither case would the fig tree be blameworthy. We are not held accountable for extraordinary attainments in religion. (3) Christ was at the moment hungry. Orientals do not eat early in the morning. Labourers and artificers come fasting to their work, and often toil an hour or two before eating. So it is presumable that our Saviour, in his morning walk of two miles from Bethany to Jerus., had not broken his fast. The physical sensation of hunger as a basis gave direction to his thoughts, as he happened to see a most familiar spectacle, a fig tree, at a distance, with fresh, young foliage. The fact that it is mentioned that 'the time of figs was not yet' (AV), or 'it was not the season of figs' (RV), would seem to prove that Christ would not have thought it strange had he not found winter figs or precocious first fruits. It is hardly conceivable that he could have condemned the tree for that. But, when he arrived, he found no fruit at all. Immediately the disappointment of unsatisfied hunger was lost in the moral lesson which flashed across his mind. A fig tree with leaves should have at least green fruit. This one had none. There was pretension, which, in the moral sphere, is hypocrisy. Having leaves and no fruit, it was a deceiver. The ripeness of the fruit is not the point. If it had had unripe fruit, it would not have been condemned. It was condemned because it had nothing but leaves.

The failure of the fig and vine was a sign of great distress (Jer 5[17] 8[13], Jl 1[7. 12], Hab 3[17. 18]). Figs were dried and pressed into cakes for food (1 S 25[18]). These were used as poultices (2 K 20[7], Is 38[21]). Fig leaves are thick, palmately lobed, and often a span or more across. There is no good reason to doubt the identity of the leaves which Adam and Eve used to make aprons (Gn 3[7]).

FIGURE.—1. Dt 4[16] 'Lest ye corrupt yourselves, and make you a graven image, the similitude of any figure' (סֶמֶל ṣêmel, Driver 'statue.' The word is found also 2 Ch 33[7. 15] EV 'idol,' and Ezk 8[3. 5] EV 'image.' The meaning 'statue' is confirmed by the Phœn. inscriptions. See Driver on Dt 4[16] and Davidson on Ezk 8[3]). The Eng. word seems to be used in the obsolete sense of the distinctive shape or appearance of a person or thing. The Gen. version has 'a graven image or representacion of anie figure'; the Bishops', 'a graven image and picture of any maner of figure.' Cf. Chaucer, Monk's Tale, 232—

> 'And thanne had god of him [Nebuchadnezzar] compassioun, > And him restored his regne and his figure'—

i.e. his proper shape as a man. So Shaks. Hamlet, I. i. 41—

> 'In the same figure, like the king that's dead.'

2. 1 K 6[29] 'he carved all the walls of the house round about with carved figures of cherubims' (מְקֻלָּעוֹת miklā'ôth occurs only in this ch. and the next: 6[18] EV 'was carved,' i.e. 'was carving of'; 6[32] EV 'carvings'; 7[31] EV 'gravings'). These 'carved figures' (as the single Heb. word is here tr[d]) were representations of cherubim cut in relief on the wood of the doors. See Carving. For this use of the Eng. word, cf. Caxton, Cato, A iii. b, 'to adoure the ymages and other fygures humayn'; and Milton, Lycidas, 105—

> 'Next Camus, reverend sire, went footing slow,
> His mantle hairy, and his bonnet sedge,
> Inwrought with figures dim.'

3. Is 44[13] 'The carpenter . . . maketh it [the image] after the figure of a man' (תַּבְנִית tabhnîth). The Heb. is frequent for the outward appearance of a person or thing. It occurs along with ṣêmel (above) in Dt 4[16] and is tr[d] 'likeness.' The Eng. word is used in the same sense as 1 above. Cf. He 1[3] Wyc. 'he is the schynynge of glorie, and figure of his substaunce'; and Mk 16[12] Tind. 'After that, he appered unto two of them in a straunge figure.' 4. Ac 7[43] 'figures which ye made to worship them'; and Ro 5[14] 'who is the figure of him that was to come' (τύπος). Sanday-Headlam's note on the Greek word is as follows—

> τύπος (τύπτω): (1) the 'impression' left by a sharp blow (τὸν τύπον τῶν ἥλων, 'the print of the nails,' Jn 20[25]), in particular the 'stamp' struck by a die; (2) inasmuch as such a stamp bears the figure on the face of the die, 'copy,' 'figure,' or 'representation'; (3) by a common transition from effect to cause, 'mould,' 'pattern,' 'exemplar'; (4) hence in the special sense of the word type which we have adopted from the Greek of NT, 'an event or person in history corresponding in certain characteristic features to another event or person.'

In Ac 7[43] the meaning is 'representations' or 'images of gods' (the second meaning above); in Ro 5[14] it is 'type' (the fourth meaning above). 5. He 9[24] 'Christ is not entered into the holy places made with hands, which are the figures of the true; but into heaven itself' (ἀντίτυπα τῶν ἀληθινῶν, RV 'like in pattern to the true'); and 1 P 3[21] 'The like figure whereunto even baptism doth also now save us' (ὃ καὶ ἡμᾶς ἀντίτυπον νῦν σώζει βάπτισμα, RV 'which also after a true likeness doth now save you [reading ὑμᾶς with edd.], even baptism,' RVm 'in the antitype'). The antitype (τὸ ἀντίτυπον) is the event or person in history that corresponds with the type (ὁ τύπος)—see Sanday-Headlam above. The one that occurs first in history is the type, the second the antitype. Hence in He 9^{24} heaven is the type, the holy place in the tabernacle the antitype; but in 1 P 3^{21} the water of the deluge is the type, of which baptism is the antitype. See TYPE, and cf. Cartwright, Cert. Relig. (1651) i. 222, 'The Rock . . . was a Type and a Figure of Christ.' 6. He 9^{9} 'a figure for the time then present,' and 11^{19} 'Accounting that God was able to raise him up, even from the dead; from whence also he received him in a figure' (παραβολή, RV 'parable,' in both). The meaning of 9^{9} is clear, but 11^{19} is much disputed.

There are two favourite interpretations: (1) 'As a parable,' sc. of the resurrection. Wyclif ('in to a parable') and the Rhemish ('for a parable') decline to commit themselves.* Tind. in ed. of 1534 translates 'for an ensample,' and is followed by Coverdale; but in 1526 ed. he had boldly 'as an ensample of the resurrection,' and this was adopted by Cranmer, and very nearly by the Bishops ('in a certaine similitude of the resurrection'). This tr^{n} gives a well-recognized sense to παραβολή. The objection felt against it is that Isaac was actually not raised from the dead. Hence the favourite interpretation at present is that of AV 'in a figure,' i.e. figuratively; Isaac was not really dead, but he was as good as dead, and so figuratively was raised from the dead (see Westcott, ad loc.). Cf. Geneva 'in a sort.' The objection is that παραβολή has not elsewhere this meaning.

7. 1 Co 4^{6} 'And these things, brethren, I have in a figure transferred to myself and to Apollos' (μετεσχημάτισα). The Gr. verb tr^{d} 'in a figure transferred' elsewhere means to change one's form or appearance (σχῆμα) into some other form, 2 Co $11^{13.\ 14.\ 15}$ (AV 'transform,' RV 'fashion into' or 'fashion as') and Ph 3^{21} (AV 'change,' RV 'fashion anew'). Here it is the truth stated that is to change its application: applied by the apostle to himself and Apollos, it really applies to the Corinthians.† 8. Sir 49^{9} 'he made mention of the enemies under the figure of the rain' (ἐν ὄμβρῳ, RV 'he remembered the enemies in storm,' RVm 'in rain').

RV gives 'figure' for AV 'interpretation' in Pr 1^{6}, but with 'interpretation' in marg. (מְלִיצָה), elsewhere only Hab 2^{6} (EV 'proverb,' RVm 'riddle'); and for AV 'fashion,' Ac 7^{44} τύπος (see FASHION). RV also introduces the verb 'to figure,' not in AV text, Lv 26^{1} ('figured stone' as AVm, Heb. אֶבֶן מַשְׂכִּית, AV 'image of stone'); and Nu 33^{52} ('figured stones,' Heb. מַשְׂכִּיֹת, AV 'pictures'). See IDOLATRY and STONE. This meaning of the verb (evidently 'adorned with figures or designs') may be illustrated from Shaks. Rich. II. III. iii. 150—

> 'I'll give my jewels for a set of beads, . . .
> My figured goblets for a dish of wood.'

J. HASTINGS.

FILL.—As a subst., meaning a full supply, fill is used of food, Lv 25^{19}, Dt 23^{24}; of drink, 2 Es 1^{20}, Jth 7^{21}; and metaphorically of love, Pr 7^{18} 'Come, let us take our fill of love until the morning.' Cf. S. Rutherford, Letters, xxxv., 'those who live long, and get a heavy fill of this life'; and Shaks. Troil. and Cress. V. viii. 4—

> 'Rest, sword; thou hast thy fill of blood and death.'

The verb to fill is frequently used by Wyclif (and other early writers) in the sense of execute, accomplish, modern fulfil. Thus Gn 27^{5} (1388) 'he hadde go in to the feeld to fille the comaundment of the fadir' (1382 'that he fulfille the heest of the fader'); Lk 9^{31} (1380) 'forsothe Moyses and Elye weren seyn in mageste; and thei seyden his goynge out, which he was to fillinge in Jerusalem' (1388 'which he should fulfille'). So once in AV, 2 Es 4^{36} 'when the number of seeds is filled in you' (impletus fuerit; RV 'fulfilled').

* But the Rhem. NT has a marginal note, 'That is, in figure and mysterie of Christ dead, and aliue againe.' This margin probably gave AV the word 'figure.'

† Field (ON, ad loc.) suggests 'by a fiction' for EV 'in a figure.' In illustration of the Gr. verb he quotes 1 S 28^{8} 'Saul disguised himself' (Sym. μετεσχημάτισεν ἑαυτόν); and 1 K 14^{2} 'Arise, I pray thee, and disguise thyself' (Theod. μεταμορφωσχημάτισον σεαυτόν).

To 'fill up' is to fill to the full, the prep. up, like Gr. κατά, intensifying the verb: as Mt 23^{32} 'Fill ye up then the measure of your fathers' (πληρώσατε);* 1 Th 2^{16} 'to fill up their sins alway' (εἰς τὸ ἀναπληρῶσαι); Col 1^{24} 'Who now rejoice in my sufferings for you, and fill up that which is behind of the afflictions of Christ in my flesh for his body's sake, which is the church' (ἀνταναπληρῶ, RV 'fill up on my part,' which is Lightfoot's tr.) †; Mt 9^{16} 'No man putteth a piece of new cloth unto an old garment, for that which is put in to fill it up taketh from the garment, and the rent is made worse' (τὸ πλήρωμα αὐτοῦ, lit. 'its filling'; RV 'that which should fill it up'); so Mk 2^{21}; Rev 15^{1} 'in them is filled up the wrath of God' (ἐτελέσθη, RV 'is finished'). Cf. Shaks. 1 Henry IV. III. ii. 116—

> 'To fill the mouth of deep defiance up
> And shake the peace and safety of our throne.'

J. HASTINGS.

FILLET.—Two words are tr^{d} so: (1) חוּט ḥûṭ, Jer 52^{21} of that which would 'compass' the pillars which king Solomon had made in the house of the LORD, and which the Chaldæans brake to carry the brass away; AVm 'thread'; RV 'line,' which is the translation in 1 K 7^{15} of both AV and RV. See PILLAR and TEMPLE. The same word is used for the scarlet 'thread' which Rahab placed in her window (Jos 2^{18}), and for the threefold 'cord' which cannot be broken of Ec 4^{12}. (2) [חָשׁוּק] ḥâshûḳ, only found in plu. and with suffixes, Ex $27^{10.\ 11}$ 36^{38} $38^{10.\ 11.\ 12.\ 17.\ 19}$, of that which clasped the pillars in the tabernacle, those of the pillars of the court being overlaid with silver, those of the pillars at the door with gold. See PILLAR and TABERNACLE. The verb חָשַׁק ḥishshaḳ, to furnish with fillets, is tr^{d} 'fillet' where it occurs, Ex 27^{17} 'the pillars . . . shall be filleted with silver,' 38^{18} 'the pillars . . . were filleted with silver,' 38^{28} '[Bezalel] filleted them' (RV 'made fillets for them').

A fillet is a little thread (Lat. fīlum, a thread, Fr. fil, dim. filet). Its oldest and commonest application is to a ribbon for binding the hair. Thus Spenser, FQ I. iii. 4—and Fuller, Holy Warre, 125, 'They pleaded that the Crown was tied on Guy's head with a woman's fillet.' But it came to be used early, and is still in use, for any narrow strip of binding material.

> 'From her faire head her fillet she undight';

J. HASTINGS.

FINE.—For the subst. Fine see CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS. The adj. 'fine' is of frequent occurrence, but only in a few cases does it represent a Heb. or Gr. word. These are: (1) טוֹב ṭôbh, 2 Ch $3^{5.\ 8}$ 'fine gold,' Ezr 8^{27} 'fine copper,' La 4^{1} 'most fine gold' (in Gn 2^{12} it is tr^{d} 'good,' its usual tr^{n}, 'the gold of that land is good'). Aram. טָב ṭâbh, Dn 2^{32} 'fine gold.' (2) שָׂרִיק śârîḳ, Is 19^{9} 'fine flax,' lit. 'combed flax,' as RV. (3) פָּז pâz, Ca 5^{11} 'most fine gold,' Ges. 'refined gold.' (4) חָלָב

* Cf. Shaks. K. John, II. i. 556—

> 'I trust we shall,
> If not fill up the measure of her will,
> Yet in some measure satisfy her.'

† This is the only occurrence of the particular compound ἀνταναπληρόω in biblical Greek. Lightfoot gives classical quotations, in order to bring out that the special force of ἀντί is 'from another quarter.' That is what is sought to be expressed by 'on my part.' But T. K. Abbott ('Intern. Crit. Com.' in loc.) points out that ἀναπληρόω itself, in the two instances where in NT it is used with ὑστέρημα (1 Co 16^{17}, Ph 2^{30}), expresses a supply coming from a different quarter from the deficiency. He finds the idea of balance in the ἀντί, and hopes it is not an over-refinement to suggest that ἀνταναπληρόω is more unassuming than ἀναπληρόω, 'since part of the force of the word is thrown on the idea of correspondence.' Christ's afflictions are incomplete till Paul brings his quota of affliction to add to them. And every Christian must bring his quota of affliction to add to them before they are complete. For the afflictions are not the afflictions of the Redeemer, but of His Body the Church. They are His afflictions just because the Church is His Body.

ḥêlebh, Ps 81[16] 147[14] 'the finest of the wheat,' lit. as AVm and RVm 'fat of wheat': the fuller phrase 'kidney-fat of wheat' is found in Dt 32[14]. (5) καθαρός, Jth 10[5] 'fine bread' (RVm 'pure').

In all other cases 'fine' goes with its subst. in order to bring out the full meaning of the subst. in the Heb. or Greek. It is used (1) along with linen for šēš shêsh, Gn 41[42], Ex 25[4] etc., Ezk 16[10. 13] 27[7]; for בּוּץ bûṣ, 1 Ch 4[21] 15[27], 2 Ch 2[14] 3[14], Est 1[6] 8[15], Ezk 27[16]; for סָדִין ṣâdhîn, Pr 31[24] (RV 'linen garments'), Is 3[23]; for אֵטוּן 'êṭûn, Pr 7[16] (RV 'linen of the yarn'); for βύσσος, Lk 16[19], Rev 18[12]; for (adj.) βύσσινος, 1 Es 3[6], Rev 18[16] 19[8 bis. 14]; and for σινδών, Mk 15[46] (RV 'a linen cloth'). (2) With flour for סֹלֶת ṣôleth, Lv 2[1] etc., Nu 6[15] etc., 1 K 4[22], 2 K 7[1. 16. 18], 1 Ch 9[29] 23[29], Ezk 16[13. 19] 46[14]; and for σεμίδαλις, Sir 35[2] 38[11], Bel [3], 2 Mac 1[8] 15[39], Rev 18[13]. (3) With gold for פָּז pâz, Job 28[17], Ps 19[10] 119[127], Pr 8[19], Ca 5[15], Is 13[12], La 4[2]; for כֶּתֶם kethem, Job 31[24], Pr 25[12], Dn 10[5] (RV 'pure gold'); and for חָרוּץ ḥârûṣ Pr 3[14], Zec 9[3]. (4) With brass for χαλκολίβανον [-os], Rev 1[15] 2[18] (RV 'burnished'). Thus the adj., which was introduced to mark a distinction in the Heb. and Greek words, has been used so freely as to obliterate any distinction, and RV has done little to restore it. 'Fine' means 'finished' (Lat. finitus, Old Fr. fin), and hence of superior quality, and that is its meaning in all those places. RV, however, has introduced the word in the sense of 'broken small,' 'of minute particles,' Dt 9[21] 'as fine as dust' (דַּק לְעָפָר, AV 'small as dust').

The verb to fine (mod. 'refine') is derived from the adj., and signifies to make pure. It occurs only Job 28[1] 'Surely there is a vein for silver, and a place for gold where they fine it' (יְזֹקֵּקוּ, RV 'which they refine'). 'Fining' is used twice, Pr 17[3] 'the fining pot is for silver' (מְצֹרָף, Amer. RV 'refining pot'), so 27[21]. 'Finer' occurs only Pr 25[4] 'a vessel for the finer' (צוֹרֵף, Amer. RV 'refiner').

FIR (בְּרוֹשׁ bĕrôsh; once בְּרוֹתִים bĕrôthîm, Ca 1[17]; ἄρκευθος, κέδρος, πίτυς, κυπάρισσος, πεύκη; abies, cupressus). From the numerous words by which the LXX has tr[d] the Heb. original, it is clear that the learned men of that day were not agreed as to the identity of the tree intended. In a considerable number of passages the tr[n] is not the name of a tree at all. The conditions required in the tree are—(1) That it could supply boards and planks and timber for doors (LXX πεύκιναι, 1 K 6[15. 34]). (2) That it could supply beams (LXX κέδρινοι, 2 Ch 3[5]) for the roofing of the temple. These must have been large, and very strong. (3) That it was useful in shipbuilding (Ezk 27[5]). The LXX in this passage has transposed the words for cedar and fir, giving as follows: 'The cedar from Senir was built for thee, the planks of the decks were taken off the cypress of Lebanon, of which to make for thee pine masts.' It uses here κυπάρισσος for the transposed word. It is not clear why the word pine in the last clause was added. Perhaps it refers to the resinous quality of the wood. (4) It was suitable for musical instruments (2 S 6[5]). The LXX, however, in this passage renders the word bĕrôshîm by ἐν ἰσχύι, in strength, and not by the name of any tree. This corresponds with the parallel passage 1 Ch 13[8] 'with all their might,' where the Heb. text is בְּכָל־עֹז instead of בְּכָל עֲצֵי בְרוֹשִׁים וּבְשִׁירִים. If we adopt the reading of 1 Ch in 1 S, the abruptness and apparent unseasonableness of the mention of the wood of which the musical instruments were made is avoided, and the two passages satisfactorily reconciled. The slight clerical error which would thus be corrected is obvious on a comparison of the two texts side by side. Budde has adopted this amended reading in his new edition of the text of Samuel. Should we also adopt it, there would no longer be any necessity to consider the adaptation of the bĕrôsh to the manufacture of musical instruments (see Wellh. and Driver, ad loc.).

Pinus Halepensis, Mill., has been proposed as the equivalent of bĕrôsh. But its wood is not durable, and would hardly have been chosen for the beams of the temple. Two other trees have been proposed as the equivalent of bĕrôsh, either of which would meet all the requirements: Juniperus excelsa, M.B., and Cupressus sempervirens, L. The former is called in Arab. lizzâb and sherbîn. It grows in the alpine and sub-alpine regions of Lebanon and Antilebanon, up to an altitude of 9000 ft. Its comus, when not hacked by the woodman, is ovate-lanceolate. Its trunk is straight, and its wood very solid and durable. It has dense ascending branches, small appressed leaves, and black berries as large as a marrowfat pea. The wood is well stored with resin—a fact which threatens the tree with extinction, as the remaining forests are fast being cut down by the tar smelters. Its trunks make solid and indestructible beams, and its wood, which is reddish and fragrant, is suitable for boards, planks, ship timber, and other purposes. But, notwithstanding the suitableness of the juniper as a tree to the requirements of the case, the weight of evidence is in favour of the cypress, Cupressus sempervirens, L. This tree has qualities resembling those of the last named. It has a straight trunk, horizontal, somewhat straggling branches, forming an ovate-oblong comus, small appressed leaves, and globular galbules, about an inch in diameter, composed of woody, shield-shaped scales. Its wood is useful for all the purposes indicated for the fir. Its name, κυπάρισσος, is one of the most frequent translations of it in the LXX. It is called in Arab. saru and sherbîn, both of which are the equivalent of cypress in that language. Contrary to an opinion cited in Oxf. Heb. Lex., under the head בְּרוֹשׁ, it is found in abundance in Lebanon and Antilebanon. A variety of it, with ascending branches, forming a lanceolate comus, is the familiar cemetery cypress, so common in the neighbourhood of Oriental cities. Many of these have tall straight trunks, which would make massive beams and ship timbers. G. E. POST.

FIRE (in OT most commonly אֵשׁ, πῦρ, πυρισμός, also אוּר, אִשָּׁה, בְּעֵרָה; in Dn occurs Aram. נוּר; in NT πῦρ, also πυρά, φῶς) denotes primarily the ordinary process of combustion, with its accompaniments of light and heat. The Scripture references to it are too numerous to classify exhaustively. Those which deserve special attention fall into two groups, according as the word is used in a literal or in a figurative sense.

I. LITERAL USAGE.—Here we may distinguish —1. Fire accompanying God's presence. Besides numerous metaphorical allusions in connexion with theophanies, there are several references to fire as a physical phenomenon appearing on such occasions. See Gn 15^{17}, Ex 3^{2} (the burning bush), Ex 19^{18}, Dt 4^{36} (Mt. Sinai), Ex 40^{38}, Nu 9^{15}, Dt 1^{33}, Ps 78^{14} 105^{39} (the guiding pillar). 2. Sacrificial fire. (a) Sacrifice by fire was a primitive mode of worship (Gn 8^{20} 22^{6}). (b) Under the Mosaic law fire was a most important means of offering the various prescribed sacrifices, which are described as 'offerings made by fire unto J".' For this purpose a fire was kept continually burning on the altar of burnt-offering (Lv 6^{13}, 1 Es 6^{24}). According to Lv 9^{24} it had a miraculous origin, and it was similarly rekindled in Solomon's temple (2 Ch 7^{1-3}). Some find a reference to this perpetual fire in Is 31^{9} (but see Cheyne, Delitzsch, in loc.), and in the name Ariel (the hearth of God?) applied to Jerus. in Is $29^{1.\ 2.\ 7}$. In 2 Mac 1^{19-22} there is a legend about the hiding of the sacred fire at the fall of Jerus., and its discovery by Nehemiah after the Exile. For the story of a later rekindling see 2 Mac 10^{3}. (c) Mention is made of special answers by fire when sacrifices were offered elsewhere than at the regular sanctuary, as in the cases of Gideon (Jg 6^{21}), Elijah (1 K 18^{38}), and David (1 Ch 21^{26}). (d) Fire was used for offering incense. It was carried in censers (Lv $16^{12.\ 13}$), or placed on the altar of incense (Ex $30^{7.\ 8}$), and the incense sprinkled upon it. To use any other than the sacred fire for this purpose was to offer 'strange fire,' the offence for which Nadab and Abihu perished (Lv 10^{1}, Nu 3^{4} 26^{61}). (e) Human sacrifice, especially child sacrifice, by fire was practised by certain of Israel's neighbours (Dt 12^{31}, 2 K 17^{31}). It was strictly forbidden in the law (Lv 18^{21}, Dt 18^{10}), but is repeatedly mentioned as a sin of Israel (2 K 17^{17}, Jer 7^{31} 19^{5} 32^{35}, Ezk 16^{21} $20^{26.\ 31}$), being carried on in particular by Ahaz (2 K 16^{3}, 2 Ch 28^{3}) and Manasseh (2 K 21^{6}, 2 Ch 33^{6}). The scene of these rites was Topheth in the valley of Hinnom (Jer 7^{31}). See W. R. Smith, RS, pp. 352, 353, and Driver, Deut. p. 222. 3. Lightning. In such expressions as 'fire from heaven,' 'the fire of God,' etc., which describe at times a destructive agency (Lv 10^{2}, 2 K $1^{10.\ 12}$, Job 1^{16}), and at times the token by which sacrifice was approved (2 c, above), some such phenomenon as lightning is evidently to be understood, as also when 'fire and hail' are mentioned together (Ex $9^{23.\ 24}$, Ps 105^{32} 148^{8}). 4. Fire for domestic purposes. Its use in this respect was twofold. (a) For the preparation of food, as for roasting flesh (Ex 12^{8}, 2 Ch 35^{13}, Is 44^{16}, 1 Es 1^{12}), for broiling fish (Jn 21^{9}), for baking (1 K 17^{12}, Jer 7^{18}). (b) For warmth, as in Is 44^{16}, Jer 36^{22}, Mk 14^{54}, Lk 22^{55}, Jn 18^{18}, Ac 28^{2}. In Pal. fire is only occasionally used for heating, and there are no regular fireplaces except in kitchens, but portable braziers or 'fire-pans' are employed. The larger houses have special 'winter rooms' (Jer 36^{22}, Am 3^{15}). In these a cavity is made in the middle of the floor, in which the 'stove' (אח) is placed. When the fire has burnt out a wooden frame is placed over it, and this is covered with a carpet so as to retain the heat (Keil, Bib. Arch. ii. 107; Nowack, Heb. Arch. 141; Benzinger, Heb. Arch. 124). The Arabs in the desert use as a hearth a hole lined with stones (Niebuhr, Travels in Arabia, i. 209). The use of fire on the Sabbath for domestic purposes was forbidden in the law (Ex 35^{3}; Jos. Wars, II. viii. 9). 5. Fire in metallurgy. Fire has been employed from the earliest times for refining, casting, and forging metals. Among the Scripture allusions to this use are Ex 32^{24} (the golden calf), the various references to 'molten images,' and also Is 44^{12} 54^{16}, 2 Es 16^{73}, Sir 2^{5}, 1 P 1^{7}. 6. Fire as a destroying agent. Among the effects of fire destruction is naturally prominent. Death by fire (or possibly burning after execution by another method) was the penalty for certain offences (Lv 20^{14} 21^{9}, Jos $7^{15.\ 25}$), and was also a mode of inflicting vengeance (2 S 12^{31} [?], Jer 29^{22}, Dn $3^{11.\ 15}$, 2 Mac 7^{5}). Conquerors burned the idols of vanquished nations (2 K 19^{18}, Is 37^{19}), and the Israelites were specially enjoined so to destroy those of the Canaanites (Dt 7^{5}, 1 Mac 5^{68}). Fire was a common means of destroying cities and property taken in war; and hence 'a fire shall go forth,' 'I will send (or kindle) a fire,' are formulæ which occur frequently in the prophetical books. Setting a crop on fire was one way of provoking a quarrel (Jg $15^{4.\ 5}$, 2 S 14^{30}), and provision was made in the law (Ex 22^6) for making good the damage done by fire accidentally raised. Fire was a convenient method of destroying obnoxious writings (Jer 36^{23}, 1 Mac 1^{56}). The disposal of human bodies by burning was quite exceptional among the Hebrews (1 S 31^{12}, Am 6^{10}), but the refuse of the bodies of animals used in sacrifice was destroyed by fire (Lv 4^{12} 6^{30} 16^{27}, He 13^{11}). Garments infected by 'leprosy' were to be burnt (Lv $13^{52.\ 57}$), and it was also common to burn rubbish of various kinds, as stubble (Is 5^{24}), chaff (Mt 3^{12}, Lk 3^{17}), and tares (Mt 13^{30}). Topheth (2 e, above) is said to have become in later times a receptacle and burning-place of rubbish. (This is doubted by Robinson; see BRP[2] i. 274.) Fire is contemplated as the means by which the visible universe is to be destroyed (2 P 3^{7-12}). 7. Fire as a purifying agent. This use arises from the previous one in cases where impurities are of a combustible nature while the material to be purified is not so (Nu 31^{23}).

II. Metaphorical Usage.—Many of the foregoing properties and uses of fire have suggested fig. applications of the word. Thus we find it employed as a symbol—1. Of God Himself. (a) Of His glory, in such visions as those described in Ezk $1^{4.\ 13}$ $10^{6.\ 7}$, Dn 7^9 10^6. (b) Of His protecting presence (2 K 6^{17}, Zec 2^5). (c) Of His holiness (Dt 4^{24}, He 12^{29}). 2. Of God's righteous judgment, which tests the deeds of men (Zec 13^9, Mal 3^2, 1 Co 3^{13}). 3. Of God's wrath against sin (Is $66^{15.\ 16}$, Jer 4^4 21^{12}, La $2^{3.\ 4}$, Ezk 21^{31} 22^{21}, Am 5^6 7^4 etc.). 4. Of the punishment of the wicked (Ps 68^2 97^3, Is 47^{14}, Ezk 28^{18}, Mt $13^{42.\ 50}$, 2 Th 1^8). Topheth or Gehenna (I. 6 above) suggests the language in Is 66^{24}, Jth 16^{17}, Sir 7^{17}, Mt 18^9, Mk 9^{43-48}. Fire is the emblem of the danger which the saved escape (Zec 3^2, Jude ^{23}). 'Eternal fire' and 'the lake of fire' are images of the punishment of the lost (Mt 25^{41}, Jude ^{7}, Rev 19^{20} $20^{10.\ 14.\ 15}$ 21^8). 5. Of sin (Is 9^{18} 65^5), and particularly of lust (Hos 7^6, Sir 23^{16}), and of the mischief of the tongue (Pr 16^{27}, Ja 3^6). 6. Of trouble and affliction (Ps 66^{12}, Is 43^2, Jer 51^{58}, Hab 2^{13}). 7. Of religious emotion (Ps 39^3), and especially of prophetic inspiration, as 'the word of the Lord' (Jer 5^{14} 20^9 23^{29}). 8. Of the law (2 Es 13^{38}). 9. Of the Holy Spirit (Mt 3^{11}, Lk 3^{16}, Ac 2^3).

Reference is apparently made in 2 Mac 10^3 to the method of procuring fire by striking steel against flint. With regard to fuel, the material used for the sacrificial fire, both in primitive and in later times, was wood (Gn $22^{3.\ 6}$, Lv 6^{12}). Special arrangements were made for supplying the altar fire. The Gibeonites were made 'hewers of wood' for the house of the Lord (Jos 9^{23}), and after the Exile a special wood-offering was appointed for the temple (Neh 10^{34} 13^{31}). It is called by Josephus the festival of Xylophoria (Wars, II. xvii. 6). For ordinary purposes the staple fuel was charcoal (see Coal), but other materials were also used, such as thorns (Ps 58^9 118^{12}, Ec 7^6, Is 33^{12}) and grass (Mt 6^{30}, Lk 12^{28}). The asphaltum found near the Dead Sea is combustible, as is also the 'stink-stone' found in the same neighbourhood, which is burnt along with camel's dung (Burckhardt, Travels in Syria, p. 394). The last mentioned, as well as other kinds of dung (Ezk 4^{15}), is also used alone as fuel (Niebuhr, Travels in Arabia, ii. 232; Wright, Palmyra and Zenobia, p. 369).

FIRST-FRUITS (בִּכּוּרִים, in Lv 23^{20} בִּכּוּרִים, LXX πρωτογεννήματα; ראשׁית ἀπαρχή). — The custom of offering first-fruits was shared by the Isr. with many other ancient nations, and it is also found in many savage religions. Frazer (Golden Bough, ii. 68–90) cites many examples to show that the new corn was eaten sacramentally in order that the worshippers might share in the divine life of the corn-spirit, with which it was assumed that the grain was instinct. The eating of the first-fruits is, then, similar to the earliest form of animal sacrifice, in which the victim was regarded as divine, and the essence of the sacrifice lies in the communal feast and the participation of all the worshippers in the divine life. The two still remain separated by an important difference. The divine animal probably belonged to the kin of the worshippers, and the sacrificial meal strengthened the bond of kinship by a distribution of the common life. There is no reason for assuming this in the case of the corn-spirit. He gives, further, several instances of the offering of the first-fruits to the deity, in which the sacramental idea is absent (Golden Bough, ii. 373–384). The offering is in these cases of the nature of tribute or thank-offering. It is considered unsafe to eat of the new crops till the god has received his share, and the rite thus falls into the same category as numerous others familiar to the student of ritual and custom. The offering of the first-fruits does not sanctify the rest of the crop, but it makes it lawful food (W. R. Smith, RS,[2] 241).

The Heb. first-fruits belong to the latter class; they are tribute, not the staple of a sacramental meal. The history is not in all points clear, partly owing to the shifting sense of the terminology. It is essential, if confusion is to be avoided, to keep the regulations of the codes distinct, and take them in their chronological order.

(a) In the oldest legislation (JE) the first-fruits of the harvest are required (Ex 23^{16} 34^{22}). Twice the curious phrase occurs, 'the first of the first-fruits' (רֵאשִׁית בִּכּוּרִים Ex 23^{19} 34^{26}, so in Ezk 44^{30}). This is taken by some to mean the first-ripe, by others the choicest, of the first-fruits. But probably 'of the first-fruits' is added to explain 'the first,' the first, that is, the first-fruits. It seems probable that in Ex 22^{29} first-fruits are referred to in the words מְלֵאָתְךָ וְדִמְעֲךָ (lit. 'thy fulness and thy tear,' paraphrased in RV as 'the abundance of thy fruits and of thy liquors'), on account of the mention of the firstborn in the parallel clause. If so, the first-fruits can hardly be confined to cereals, but will include wine and oil ('thy liquors'). The LXX gives ἀπαρχαὶ ἅλωνος καὶ ληνοῦ ('first-fruits of thy threshing-floor and wine-press'). A feast was connected with the offering, 'the feast of harvest, the first-fruits of thy labour' (Ex 23^{16}), 'the feast of weeks, even of the first-fruits of wheat harvest' (Ex 34^{22}). The amount to be offered is not stated; it seems to have been left to the discretion of the offerer. It is interesting to observe that a man brought Elisha as a gift 'bread of the first-fruits, twenty loaves of barley, and fresh ears of corn' (2 K 4^{42}).

(b) In Deuteronomy (D) the Isr. is ordered to bring of his first-fruits in a basket to the central sanctuary and present it to the priest, with a profession of gratitude to God for deliverance from Egyp. bondage and the possession of the fruitful land of Palestine. A feast then follows, in which the Levite and the stranger are to share the offerer's hospitality (Dt 26^{1-11}). According to 18^4 the priest is to receive the first-fruits of corn, wine, and oil, and the first of the fleece. The two regulations seem to be in conflict, and it has been supposed that 18^4 is a later addition. Possibly there is no discrepancy. The basket of first-fruits may be only a portion, and this may be the first-fruits meant in 18^4, the rest being kept for the feast, or it may be the whole and the feast not made of the first-fruits at all. (See Driver, Deut. p. 290. He decides for the latter alternative.) It is not clear what was the relation of the first-fruits to the Tithe. Several scholars regard them as really identical, but this is not certain. See TITHE.

(c) As Dt 18^4 claims the first-fruits for the Levitical priests, so Ezekiel, whose legislation forms the transition to the Priestly Code, claims for the priests (i.e. the sons of Zadok) 'the first of all the first-fruits of everything,' and, in addition, the first of the dough (44^{30}).

(d) In the small code known as the Law of Holiness (H) it is enjoined that on the day after the Sabbath a sheaf of the first-fruits of the harvest should be brought to the priest, who should wave it before the Lord. A burnt-offering and a meal-offering are to accompany this ceremony, and, till it is accomplished, no bread, parched corn, or fresh ears must be eaten (Lv 23^{10-14}). Seven weeks later two wave loaves of two-tenths of an ephah of fine flour and leavened are to be offered as first-fruits (Lv 23^{17}. The additional regulations in 23^{18-20} are for the most part a later insertion interpolated from Nu 28^{27-29}).

(e) In the Priestly Code (P) the rêshîth and the bikkûrîm seem to be distinguished. In Nu 18^{12} the best of the corn, wine, and oil, that is, the rêshîth, belongs to the priest. In the next verse the bikkûrîm of all that is in their land also belong to the priest. Probably, the bikkûrîm should be interpreted as the first ripe raw fruits, while the rêshîth will be the prepared oil and wine and corn. (So Wellhausen, Nowack, and RV.) Accordingly, we find in Neh 10^{35} that the bikkûrîm of the ground and of the fruit trees were brought into the house of the Lord, while the rêshîth of dough, heave-offerings, fruit, wine, and oil were brought into the store-rooms of the temple (10^{37} 12^{44}). The distinction is observed in LXX and by Philo and Josephus. In Nu $15^{20.\ 21}$ it is enacted that the first of the dough also shall be given as a heave-offering. According to Lv 2^{12} leaven and honey might be included in the first-fruits, though they could not be part of any offering made by fire. The meal-offering of first-fruits consisted of parched corn in the ear with oil and frankincense. Part of the corn and oil with all the frankincense was to be burnt (Lv 2^{14-16}). An interesting law, which rests on the same principle as the law of first-fruits, is that of Lv 19^{23-25}, which ordains that the fruit of a tree shall not be used for the first three years after it is planted ('three years shall they be as uncircumcised unto you'), and shall be consecrated to God in the fourth year. In the fifth year it may be eaten.

(f) In the later period a distinction was made between the bikkûrîm and the tĕrûmôth (תְּרוּמוֹת oblations); the fullest treatment of the subject is in the two tracts of the Mishna which bear these names. The bikkûrîm were taken from wheat, barley, grapes, figs, pomegranates, olives, and honey. The fruits were offered fresh by those who dwelt near Jerus., and dried by those who came from a distance. The companies came in a procession headed by the ox for the sacrifice, and marched to the music of pipes. They were met in Jerus. by the chief priests. The offerers then carried their wreathed baskets on their shoulders to the temple courts, and were welcomed by the Levites with the singing of Ps 30. Then the baskets were given to the priests, and the formula (Dt 26^{5-10}) was repeated. The tĕrûmôth were a tax for the support of the priests, and used only by them, and were levied on every kind of fruit of the ground and of trees. The choicest of the fruits were to be given; not more than $\frac{1}{40}$ or less than $\frac{1}{60}$ of the crop was expected. There was also the Ḥallah (חַלָּה), which was the first of the dough, $\frac{1}{24}$ of the whole piece in the case of private individuals, and $\frac{1}{48}$ in that of public bakers.

FIRSTLING.—A firstling * is the first (in time) of its kind, Pr 3^9 Cov. 'Honoure the LORDE with thy substaunce, and with the firstlinges of all thine encrease.' In Macbeth, IV. i. 147, Shaks. uses the word of the first thoughts of the heart and the first acts of the hand—

> 'From this moment
> The very firstlings of my heart shall be
> The firstlings of my hand.'

In EV it is used only of the firstborn of beasts, though the Heb. words so tr^d (בְּכוֹר or בְּכוֹרָה, and פֶּטֶר) are used also of the firstborn of women.

FISH.—Fishes are very abundant in the inland waters of Pal. and Syria, except the Dead Sea, as well as in the adjacent Mediter. and the Nile. Even the intensely salt springs by the Dead Sea swarm with certain kinds of fish, while the water of that sea, which contains a large percentage of chloride of magnesium, is fatal to all animal life. Thousands of fish are borne by the rapid current of the Jordan into that sea, and, as soon as they reach its waters, are stupefied, and fall a prey to cormorants and kingfishers, or their bodies are washed up on the shore and feed the ravens and vultures. Tristram mentions forty-three species of fish found in inland waters. Of these the large number of twenty-two are peculiar to Pal. and Syria, and of this number fourteen are peculiar to the Jordan Valley and one to the mountain lake of Yamûni, S.E. of the cedars, and three inhabit only the Damascus lakes. Many of the species swarm in immense shoals in the Sea of Galilee and in the warm fountains by its shores, as well as in the Jordan and its affluents, the Leontes, the Orontes, and the lakes of Antioch, Ḥems, etc. Fresh-water fishes are also very abundant in all the perennial streams which flow into the Mediter., often ascending long distances, and not infrequently leaping up the rapids and cascades to reach their spawning places. The adjacent Mediter. is also well stocked with a large number of species of fish.

The large number and great fecundity of fish is expressed in the Heb. name דָּג dâg, from דָּגָה to multiply abundantly. They were taken from the earliest times, and many of them used as food (Gn $9^{2.\ 3}$). Not a few of them are highly specialized in form and aspect; yet, while a considerable number of land animals and birds and even insects had names in Heb., not a single species of fish is named in the Scriptures. The only attempt at classification was into clean and unclean (Lv $11^{9.\ 10}$). The former comprised those which had fins and scales; the latter, all others. This distinction was recognized in ancient Egypt (Wilkinson, Anc. Egyp. iii. 58, 59), and under el-Ḥâkim, who prohibited the sale of unclean fish (Lane, Mod. Egyp. i. 132). The good and bad fish (Mt 13^{48}) may have referred to this distinction, or to some other standard of excellence. The writer has seen a fisherman on the Mediter. coast in his anger beat to a jelly the head of a fish to which he objected.

* From first and ling a suffix with varying force but generally dimin., seen also in changeling, darling, fatling, fondling, foundling, gosling, hireling, inkling, nestling, nurseling, seedling, stripling, starveling, underling, worldling.

At other times they cast them away on the shore, or back into the water.

The Hebrews seem to have classified together all creatures living in the waters, whether 'whales' AV, or 'sea-monsters' RV (Gn 1^{21}; Heb. tannînîm), or 'great fish' (Jon 1^{17} דָּג גָּדוֹל dâg gâdhôl), or the 'living creature that moveth' (Gn 1^{21}), or 'fish' (v.^{28}).

The fish was an object of idolatry in all the ancient world. The Philistines worshipped Dagon, the Fish-god (1 S 5^4), who was represented with the body of a man and the tail of a fish (but see DAGON, p. 544[a]). Hence it was forbidden to make an image of a fish (Dt 4^{18}), which to the Heb. included, as before said, all living creatures in the water (Ex 20^4). G. E. POST.

FISHER.—Fisher, says Bradley (Oxf. Eng. Dict.), is now archaic, being superseded in ordinary use by 'fisherman.' AV has followed previous versions in giving 'fisher' in Is 19^8, Jer 16^{16}, Ezk 47^{10} (דַּיָּג, only plu.), Mt $4^{18.19}$, Mk $1^{16.17}$ (ἁλιεύς), though it has 'fisherman' after Tind. and the others (except Wyc. and Rhem.) in Lk 5^2 (ἁλιεύς). For the 'fisher's coat' of Jn 21^7 see COAT.

FISHING.—The natural history of Palestine fish has been little studied. Along the coast there are the usual Mediterranean varieties, with an undue proportion of mullet. Some 33 varieties of fresh-water fish have been counted in the Jordan Valley, where fish swarm in Galilee as remarked by Tristram, and in the waters of Merom one may see tons taken in one day by a drag-net. The fact that the fish of this basin resemble African species was first observed by Josephus. 'There are several kinds of fish in it (Galilee), different both to the taste and sight from those elsewhere.' Also he says of the Capharnaum fountain, 'it produces the Coracin fish' (BJ III. x. 8). Several Nilotic species abound. The Chromides, carp-like, are called by the Arabs 'combs,' from their flat shape and projecting spines. Of the Siluridæ, sheat fish (Clarias Macracanthus, Arab. Berboot) grows to the size of 3 or 4 ft.; its flesh is much prized. Most abundant are the barbel and bream, while dace, bleak, and loaches are found. Eels are in many streams, and swarm in the Orontes. Near Tripoli is a pool full of sacred fish. Fossil fish, beautifully preserved in the Lebanon limestone, are of existing genera. While not strictly fish, we may mention that along the coast are dolphins, seals, and whales—the two latter very rare. The 'badger skins' (AV Ex 26^{14}) were probably of the Red Sea dugong, a marine mammal, whose skin is used now; and the Hebrew term תַּחַשׁ corresponds to Arab. tuḥas, which includes this animal.

Fishes technically are not mentioned in the creative acts of the fifth period except as included in the terms שֶׁרֶץ, lit. 'swarmer' (AV 'moving creature'), and תַּנִּינִם הַגְּדֹלִים (AV 'great whales,' RV 'great sea-monsters'). The first of these terms occurs more specifically Lv 11^{10} שֶׁרֶץ הַמָּיִם. The dominion of man, however, it is interesting to note, is given over fish, דְּגֵי הַיָּם (Gn 1^{28}, renewed Gn 9^2, cf. Ps 8^8).

Fish were a staple article of diet in Egypt, and their loss part of the plague (Ex $7^{18.21}$). The Israelites murmured, 'we remember the fish we did eat freely' (Nu 11^5). The ceremonial law declared all that had not 'fins and scales' an 'abomination' (Lv $11^{9\text{-}12}$). The repeated prohibition of worship of anything 'that is in the water under the earth' (Ex 20^4), 'the likeness of any fish that is in the waters beneath the earth' (Dt 4^{18}), was needed, for the Philistines worshipped Dagon = 'little fish' (1 S 5^2; but see art. DAGON). It has also been alleged (but see Baethgen, Rel.-ges. 60) that 'Sîdon was the fish goddess of Phœnicia' (Tristram). This cult existed both in Assyria and India. Solomon, in his wisdom, 'spake of the fishes' (1 K 4^{33}). In the time of Nehemiah, fish, probably cured, were brought by the Tyrians to Jerusalem (Neh 13^{16}), where we know there was a 'Fish-gate.' See JERUSALEM.

The 'great fish' (דָּג גָּדוֹל Jon 1^{17}) prepared' for Jonah has been supposed to be a shark or whale. Both AV and RV tr. κῆτος in Mt 12^{40} 'whale' (RVm 'sea-monster'). The fact that a killer-whale, 21 ft. long, can swallow porpoises and seals would imply that a much larger whale might swallow a man. Part of the skeleton of a whale, 43 ft. long, is in the museum of the Syr. Prot. College, Beirût. The carcass of this whale was cast by a storm on the coast near Tyre.

As a type of restoration, Ezk $47^{9.10}$ tells us that in the Dead Sea 'shall be a very great multitude of fish.' 'These fish shall be according to their kinds, as the fish of the great sea, exceeding many.'

Fish in NT brought a livelihood to the apostles; they are one of the 'good gifts' (Mt 7^{10}) twice miraculously multiplied to the multitudes (Mt $17^{17ff.}$ $15^{34ff.}$). Broiled fish was eaten by our Saviour (Lk 24^{42}) and given by Him to the disciples (Jn $21^{9.13}$). The discrimination between good and bad fish is used as a type of final separation of classes of men (Mt 13^{48}). To the early Christians the fish became a sacred symbol, the Greek word ἰχθύς being formed by the initial letters of the four Gr. words used in the confession, 'Jesus Christ, Son of God, Saviour' (Ἰησοῦς Χριστός, Θεοῦ υἱος, Σωτήρ). See D.C.A. s.v. Ἰχθύς.

As formerly, so now, in the East fishing is the occupation of the simple and poor, and wholly unknown as a pastime. The methods and means have likewise changed but little. These were principally—

(1) The small net cast by hand, חֵרֶם (Ezk $26^{5.14}$ 32^3 47^{10}, Hab $1^{15.17}$, Mic 7^2, Ec 7^{26}), δίκτυον (Mt 4^{20} etc.), ἀμφίβλητρον (Mt 4^{18}, Mk 1^{16}). This is very commonly employed still. The present writer has watched its use at Tabigha (probably Bethsaida), where fish gather at the outlet of streams into the lake.

(2) The seine, מִכְמֹרֶת (Is 19^8) or מִכְמֶרֶת (Hab 1^{15}), σαγήνη. This was used in two ways—either let down into the deep and drawn together in a narrowing circle and then drawn into the boat or boats (Lk $5^{4\text{-}9}$), or as a semicircle drawn to the shore (Mt 13^{48}). Both these methods are seen daily.

(3) The hook, חַכָּה (Is 19^8, Job 41^1), צִנָּה, סִיר (Am 4^2), ἄγκιστρον (Mt 17^{27}). This was used with a line, חֶבֶל, but no mention is made of a rod, as fly-fishing is unknown. Hab 1^{15} mentions all the three methods we have described.

(4) The harpoon or spear (Job 41^7), EV 'barbed irons' (שְׂכוֹת), 'fish spears' (צִלְצַל דָּגִים). This is a method depicted on Egyptian and Assyrian monuments. At present it is practised only at night by torchlight.

In spite of the mistranslations 'fish pools' (Ca 7^4 AV), 'ponds for fish' (Is 19^{10} AV), there is no evidence that the pools of the Bible were used for fish culture.

The Turkish Government now taxes fishing as an occupation, and also takes 20 per cent. of the price of the fish sold in the seaports, and collects this again if the fish are taken to another port. The fisheries of Merom and Galilee are farmed out to contractors, who forbid all others to engage in the trade.

As an occupation fishing has been honoured by the selection of its followers as apostles; by being the object of Jesus' special favour on two occasions (Lk $5^{1ff.}$, Jn 21); and chosen as the type of earnest, skilful soul-saving (Mk 1^{17}, Lk 5^{10}).

FISH-GATE.—See JERUSALEM.

FISH-POOL occurs in AV of Ca 7^4 'Thine eyes are [like] the fish-pools of Heshbon,' but the exact translation is simply 'pools' (so RV; Heb. בְּרֵכוֹת, LXX λίμναι). See Hitzig, ad loc., and art. HESHBON. Equally unwarrantable is the introduction of 'fish' in Is 19^{10}, where AV, following Ibn Ezra, tr. כָּל־עֹשֵׂי שֶׂכָר אֲגַמֵּי־נָפֶשׁ 'all that make sluices [and] ponds for fish.' The passage is obscure (see Skinner, ad loc.), but probably the correct tr^n is that of RV, 'all they that work for hire shall be grieved in soul.'* It is possible that the elsewhere unexampled אֲגַמֵּי (for עֲגָמֵי) was a play suggested by the employment of the 'workers for hire' in the construction of water-tanks (אֲגַמִּים; so Del. quoting Ehrentreu, ad loc.). The LXX, while agreeing with this tr^n of אֲגַמֵּי־נָפֶשׁ (λυπηθήσονται καὶ τὰς ψυχὰς πονέσουσιν), gives 'manufacturers of strong drink' (ποιοῦντες τὸν ζῦθον),† instead of 'workers for hire.' They must have read שֹׂכָר for שָׂכָר.

FITCHES.—AV gives fitches in the text in two places. 1. Ezk 4^9. Here the Heb. is כֻּסֶּמֶת kuṣṣemeth, tr^d in AVm and RV spelt. We believe the plant intended is the kirseneh or kirsenneh of the Arabs, Vicia Ervilia, L. The same Heb. word is used in two other places (Ex 9^{32}, Is 28^{25}), where AV has rye and RV spelt (see RYE). 2. Is $28^{25.27}$. Here the Heb. is קֶצַח keẓaḥ. This is the nutmeg flower, Nigella sativa, L., a Ranunculaceous plant, cultivated everywhere in the East for its black seeds, which are used as a condiment and a medicine. It is called in Arab. shûnîz, or shihnîz, and ḥabbat el-barakah, i.e. the seed of blessing, or el-ḥabbat es-sauda, i.e. the black seed. An Arab. proverb says, 'in the black seed is the medicine for every disease.' Avicenna recommends it in dyspepsia, and for bronchial and other affections. Orientals often put a pinch of the seeds on the middle of the upper surface of the flat loaves of bread before baking. In baking they adhere. Pliny alludes to their use by bakers (Nat. Hist. xix. 52). They are believed to assist digestion. They have a warm aromatic flavour and carminative properties. Like other seeds produced in small quantities, as cummin, they are often beaten out with a stick, as mentioned in Is 28^{27}, instead of being threshed out with the môrag.

G. E. POST.

FLAG.—Two Heb. words are tr^d by flag. 1. אָחוּ ('âḥu; ἄχει [in LXX of Sir 40^{16} this was supposed till 1896 to represent the Heb. 'âḥû] βούτομον) occurs in three connexions. (a) Where the kine feed in an 'âḥu (Gn $41^{2.18}$). (b) Where Bildad asks, 'Can the rush (גֹּמֶא, πάπυρος) grow up without mire? can the flag (אָחוּ, βούτομον) grow without water?' (Job 8^{11}). (c) In a passage (Hos 13^{15}) where both AV and RV, following the LXX, give brethren for אַחִים 'âḥîm, which the Oxf. Heb. Lex. regards as a plural of אָחוּ, abbreviated from אֲחֻוִים 'ăḥûwîm, the context seeming to point to a water plant, withering before the E. wind, which dries up its spring. In the passage in Job the gôme and the 'âḥu occur in the two members of a parallelism. RVm gives for gôme 'papyrus,' and for 'âḥu 'reed-grass' (cf. Ebers, Egypten u. die Bücher Moses, 338 f.). The latter is no more definite than flag, and therefore only confuses the question of identity by another term. We have the authority of the LXX that the gôme was the πάπυρος, papyrus, and the 'âḥu, βούτομον, which some believe to be Cyperus esculentus, L., the edible galingale, and others Butomus umbellatus, L., the flowering rush, both swamp plants. אָחוּ (Gn $41^{2.18}$) should be rendered 'in the flowering rushes,' or 'in the sedges,' or 'in the fens.' Similarly, the doubtful אֲחִים 'âḥîm (Hos 13^{15}). The same indefiniteness is found in the Arab. term rabî', which means literally 'spring,' and refers to 'spring herbage,' and ḥalf, which refers to Gramineæ and Cyperaceæ in general. It is also found in the English 'grass.'

2. סוּף (ṣûph, ἕλος, carectum) is used (a) of the sedgy or reedy plants on a river's bank (Ex $2^{3.5}$, Is 19^6); (b) of weeds (Jn 2^5), meaning sea-weeds. From the presence of these, and perhaps of other marine growths, as of coral, the Red Sea was named יַם־סוּף (yam-ṣûph).

G. E. POST.

* Rashi has 'ponds of rest,' where the waters rest and are retained! Ibn Ezra gives 'where are the souls of the fish'; this is also adopted by Kimchi in his Lexicon ('pools in which they hunt fish'); in his Comm. he mentions it, but he himself offers the same explanation as the RV.

† Properly 'beer,' which was a favourite Egyptian beverage.

FLAGON occurs five times in AV, but in only one of these instances is the tr^n retained by RV, namely Is 22^{24}, where both VSS tr. כְּלִי הַנְּבָלִים by 'vessels of flagons.' נֵבֶל or נְבֶל (when not used for a musical instrument) generally means a leather pitcher. Here it is perhaps an earthenware bottle. On the other hand, RV introduces 'flagons' in two instances where it is not found in AV, namely Ex 25^{39} 37^{16} (in both קְשָׂוֹת). This tr^n is probably correct (see CUP), although RV gives 'cups' for the same Heb. word in Nu 4^7. In all these three passages AV has 'covers.' In the remaining four instances where AV gives 'flagons,' the Heb. is אֲשִׁישָׁה (2 S 6^{19}, 1 Ch 16^3, Hos 3^1 [אֲשִׁישֵׁי עֲנָבִים], Ca 2^5 [אֲשִׁישׁוֹת]; cf. אֲשִׁישֵׁי קִיר חֲרָשֶׁת 'the raisin-cakes [AV 'foundations'] of Kir-hareseth,' Is 16^7). The meaning of this word is a 'pressed cake . . . composed of meal, oil, and dibs' (W. R. Smith, OTJC[1] 434, n. 7). Hence in 2 S 6^{19}, 1 Ch 16^3, RV gives 'cake of raisins' for AV 'flagon [of wine],' in Hos 3^1 'cakes of raisins' for 'flagons of wine,' and in Ca 2^5 'raisins' (RVm 'cakes of raisins') for 'flagons.' The LXX has in 2 S 6^{19} λάγανον ἀπὸ τηγάνου, in 1 Ch 16^3 ἀμορείτη, in Hos 3^1 πέμματα μετὰ σταφίδος, and in Ca 2^5 μύροι. Luther, who like AV adopted a false Rabbinical derivation and interpretation of אֲשִׁישָׁה, tr. in 2 S 6^{19} and 1 Ch 16^3 ein Nössel Wein, and in Hos 3^1 eine Kanne Weins. In Ca 2^5 he has Blumen. In Kautzsch's AT we find for 2 S 6^{19} and 1 Ch 16^3 Rosinenkuchen, and for Hos 3^1 and Ca 2^5 Traubenkuchen. See further under FOOD, p. 32[b].

FLAX (פִּשְׁתָּה pishtâh, λίνον, linum).—The Heb. and its equivalents in Gr., Lat., and Eng. are used (1) for the growing plant (Ex 9^{31}); (2) for the stalks when cut (Jos 2^6 פִּשְׁתֵּי הָעֵץ, λινοκάλαμη, stipulæ lini); (3) for a wick made of the fibres (Is 42^3 43^{17}, AV 'tow,' RV 'flax,' marg. 'a wick'). The root form פֵּשֶׁת pēsheth, with suffix פִּשְׁתִּי pishti, LXX ὀθόνιά μου, is also used for the flax fibres (Hos $2^{5.9}$). The plural of the same, פִּשְׁתִּים pishtîm, is used for the hackled fibres (Pr 31^{13}, Is 19^9); these are twisted into cords (Jg 15^{14}) or woven into stuff (Dt 22^{11}). The shorter fibres are called נְעוֹרֶת nĕ'ôreth = tow (Jg 16^9, Is 1^{31}). The plural pishtîm is also used for linen (Lv $13^{48.52}$), as well as for linen garments (vv.$^{47.59}$, LXX ἱματίῳ στιππυίνῳ, Ezk 44^{17} στολὰς λινᾶς).

Flax, Linum sativum, L., is a plant of the order Linaceæ, which has been cultivated from the earliest periods of the world's history. It is a perennial, with slender stalks, 2 to 3 ft. high, linear-lanceolate leaves, and showy blue flowers. Its stalks produce the strong fibres out of which linen is manufactured. These stalks were dried on the flat roofs of the houses (Jos 2^6), then steeped in water to cause the decay of the pulp, then hackled (Is 19[9]) to straighten the fibres and comb out the shorter ones, which are tow (Jg 16[9], Is 1[31]). It was regarded as a crop of importance (Ex 9[31], Hos 2[9]). Linen garments were used by the priests, etc. (Lv 13[47. 59]); the material is usually spoken of as שֵׁשׁ shêsh (a name still retained in the Arab. shâsh, which is used for the grade of cotton cloth known in English as cheese-cloth). The mummies of Egypt were swathed in linen bandages.

FLAYING.—See Crimes and Punishments.

FLEA (פַּרְעֹשׁ par'ôsh, ψύλλος, pulex).—An insect, Pulex irritans, L., universal in warm climates, and a great pest to man and the animals which it infests. Insignificant as it is, its bite is very irritating, often causing considerable swelling and intolerable itching, which robs its victim of many an hour of sleep, and makes him ridiculous in his frequently vain efforts to catch his tormentor. The habit of the natives of the East of sleeping in the same clothes which they wear by day, and spreading their beds on the mats on which they sit, contributes much to the multiplication of the insect in their houses and camps. Fleas swarm esp. in the filthy tents of the Bedawîn, and in stables and dog kennels. The flea is mentioned by David (1 S 24[14]),* who compares himself to this contemptible insect, in order to ridicule the insensate character of Saul's persecution by likening it to the vain hunt above alluded to. In Ex 8[16] RVm has 'fleas' for 'lice' (wh. see).

G. E. Post.

FLESH, represented by בָּשָׂר, שְׁאֵר in OT, and by σάρξ and κρέας in NT. שְׁאֵר occurs very seldom in comp. with the constant word בָּשָׂר, but seems to cover some of the same meanings, particularly flesh for food, and flesh of consanguinity. Cf. Ps 73[26] 78[20. 27], Pr 11[17], Jer 51[35], Lv 25[49]. κρέας is only used twice in NT, and each time in the phrase κρέα φαγεῖν, Ro 14[21], 1 Co 8[13]. It is impossible to do justice to the biblical uses of this term Flesh without clearly distinguishing at least the following five meanings:—

1. Substance of an animal body, whether of beast or of man (e.g. Gn 41[2], Lv 4[11], Job 31[31], 1 Co 15[39]). For this use of the term in its application to Food and to Sacrifices, see under these words. It denotes the living human body in such places as Ex 4[7], Lv 13[10] 17[14]. Indeed, through a great part of OT flesh is equivalent to the whole human Body, on the principle mentioned s.v., in which application, it is to be noted, that the LXX often renders בָּשָׂר (sing.), in accordance with Gr. idiom, by the plural σάρκες (e.g. Gn 40[19], Nu 12[12], Job 32[25]), and even by σῶμα (e.g. Lv 15[2], 1 K 21[27]).

2. Relation, of consanguinity or by marriage (e.g. Gn 2[24] 37[27], Neh 5[5], Is 58[7], Mt 19[5], 1 Co 10[18]). The literal word is used in the orig. in places where the versions, our own included, employ a periphrasis 'near of kin' (e.g. Lv 18[6] 25[49]). In the same significance, the fuller phrase 'flesh and bones' is peculiarly biblical (e.g. Gn 2[23] 29[14], Jg 9[2], 2 S 5[1] 19[12. 13], Eph 5[30], cf. Lk 24[39]).

3. Creature nature generally, human nature particularly. In this use it can denote all terrestrial beings possessing life (Gn 7[21]); especially the finite earthly creature in contrast with God and with the spirit which immediately comes from God. 'The Egyptians are men, and not God; and their horses flesh, and not spirit' (Is 31[3]). The frailness and dependence of man is the thing marked by this contrast (e.g. Gn 6[3], Job 34[15], Ps 56[4] 78[39], Is 40[6-8] quoted 1 P 1[24]). There is a persistent tendency in translators and commentators to ignore this peculiarly biblical antithesis, and confound it with the Greek antithesis between material and immaterial. Further, though finite and creaturely weakness is implied in it, there is not necessarily any moral disparagement, e.g. 'all flesh' is used for the 'whole human race' in connexions that are most honourable, e.g. Ps 65[2] 145[21], Is 40[5], Jl 2[28]. Conclusive as to this is the use of 'flesh' for the human nature of our Lord (Jn 1[14], Ro 1[3] 9[5], 1 Ti 3[16]). In the same line with this stands the more expanded phrase 'flesh and blood' for human nature on its earthly side in contrast with something greater than itself (Mt 16[17], 1 Co 15[50], Gal 1[16], Eph 6[12], He 2[14], to which should perhaps be added Jn 1[13]). This phrase is peculiar to the NT, though germane to the OT idea 'the life of the flesh is in the blood,' and the beginning of the usage can be traced to the OT Apocr. writers (cf. Sir 14[18] 17[31]). It is common in Rabbinical literature. This whole biblical use of the term 'flesh' in application to man means that he is so called from his creaturely nature, or from his nature on its creaturely side.

4. As one constituent of human nature (the corporeal) combined or contrasted with the others.

OT usage presents a variety of such combinations. The whole of man is expressed as 'flesh' and 'soul' in Ps 63[1], Job 13[14] 14[22]; as 'flesh' and 'heart' in Ps 73[26], Ezk 44[7. 9], Ec 11[10], Pr 14[30]; as 'flesh,' 'heart,' and 'soul,' Ps 84[2], in all which a duality of outer and inner, or lower and higher in man, is plainly intended. But so far is 'flesh' from being despised in these contrasts that it is joined with the higher elements in the relation of the whole man to God and to his future (?) hopes, as in Ps 63[1] 16[9] 84[2], Job 19[26]. In the NT its use in this sense for the lower element in man, without any ethical disparagement, though not very frequent, is still clear. In a sufficient number of passages it occurs coupled with 'spirit,' in the Pauline writings as well as others, to show that these two are the natural elements of which man is made up, exactly as 'flesh' and 'soul,' 'flesh' and 'heart' are in the OT (e.g. Mt 26[41], Ro 2[28. 29], 1 Co 5[5]). 'Flesh' is used by St. Paul of corporeal presence, cognizable by the senses, in contrast to fellowship in 'spirit' (2 Co 5[16], Col 2[1. 5]), indeed of man's earthly or bodily life without moral qualification (Gal 2[20], Ph 1[22]). Even when man's sinful state is the topic, the dual nature is sometimes expressed in the usual terms; 'desires of the flesh and of the mind' (Eph 2[3]), 'defilement of the flesh and spirit' (2 Co 7[1]), seem to mean that man's nature, in both its constituent parts, is affected by sin. There is a use of this antithesis, between flesh and spirit, in application to Christ, which points to lower and higher elements in His personality quite peculiar to Himself (e.g. Ro 1[3. 4], 1 Ti 3[16], 1 P 3[18]).

5. Its ethical or doctrinal sense. Besides the morally indifferent applications of flesh already discussed, there is in the NT, and esp. in the Pauline writings, a use of it which is charged with ethical or doctrinal content. It is thus used once in contrast with 'mind' (Ro 7[25]), more frequently with 'spirit' (Ro 8[4. 5. 6. 7 RV 8. 9. 12. 13], Gal 5[16-25] 6[8]). In the same manner the adjectives 'fleshly,' 'carnal' are contrasted with 'spiritual' in Ro 7[14], 1 Co 3[1. 3. 4], 2 Co 1[12], Col 2[18] 'fleshly mind,' orig. 'mind of the flesh.'* That in the connexions cited above flesh with its adjective has reference to the principle of sin and its seat in man's fallen nature, while 'spirit' and 'spiritual' refer to the principle of the regenerate or divine life in man, will hardly be questioned. But various have been the accounts given of the rationale of this metaphorical or indirect use of flesh and 'fleshly' in a theological or doctrinal sense. Writers like Holsten, Pfleiderer, Schenkel make strenuous efforts, without much success, to derive this peculiarly Pauline application of the term from the older sense of it as denoting the weakness and frailty of man's nature. The only account which seems to satisfy all the ideas involved is that the 'carnal' denotes the sinful element in man's nature, because that element entering his nature now in the ordinary course of human production is an inheritance of the flesh; whereas the 'spiritual' is that which comes into it from above, or is given in the New Birth. This explanation is confirmed by our Lord's words, reported in Jn 3^6. For some further remarks on this question and on the possible connexion of all the meanings of flesh here noted, see PSYCHOLOGY.

* Its mention in 1 S 26[20] is due to corruption in MT (see Driver, Wellh., Budde, ad loc.).

* There occurs in the same writings a quite unethical use of 'carnal' as equivalent to 'corporeal' or 'earthly,' e.g. Ro 15[27], 1 Co 9[11], 2 Co 3[3] 10[4], He 7[16]; for the complications both of reading and rendering in these passages, created by the use of σαρκικός or σάρκινος, see Trench, N.T. Synonyms, s.v.

FLESHLY, FLESHY.—Modern editions of AV have retained the distinction between 'fleshly' and 'fleshy' of 1611. Fleshly is that which belongs to the flesh and not the spirit, carnal. It occurs in NT 2 Co 1^{12}, 1 P 2^{11} (σαρκικός), Col 2^{18} 'fleshly mind' (νοῦς τῆς σαρκός, 'mind of the flesh'). In Ad. Est 14^{10} the meaning is apparently simply mortal (σάρκινος). Fleshy is that which is made of flesh (and not of stone), soft, tender, Sir 17^{16}, 2 Co 3^3 (σάρκινος). The distinction did not appear in the earlier versions: Wyc. Tind. Gen. Bish. have 'fleshly' in 2 Co 3^3, Cov. has 'fleshy.' Nor was it observed by Eng. writers of the day: T. Wright (1604), Passions, v. iv. 212, says, 'Fleshy concupiscence deserveth rather the name of Mercenarie Lust then Love,' and Culpepper and Cole, Anat. I. xvii. 45, 'Such as are given to fleshy desires have larger Kidneys than ordinary.' But once made it is well worth maintaining.

FLINT (in OT חַלָּמִישׁ, ἀκρότομος, στερεὰ πέτρα; צֹר, ἀκρότομος, πέτρα, ψῆφος; צַר, στερεὰ πέτρα; in Apocr. ἀκρότομος, κόχλαξ) is the term by which the foregoing Heb. words are rendered, in AV generally, and in RV uniformly. The reference in every case is to a rock or stone whose characteristic quality is hardness or sharpness. The Gr. equivalents have a general rather than a definite meaning, ἀκρότομος being elsewhere (Sir 40^{15} 48^{17}) tr^d 'hard (RV sheer) rock,' while in Is 2^{21} 51^1 στερεὰ πέτρα stands in LXX for צוּר (rock); though, on the other hand, in Job 22^{24} צוּר is represented in Vulg. by silex. On the whole, flint is the substance which best fulfils the conditions stated, and in the passages where small stones rather than masses of rock are referred to it is probably the true rendering.

חַלָּמִישׁ corresponds to Assyr. elmêšu (ZDMG xl. 728), which seems to mean any hard stone used for striking fire, even rock crystal or diamond. According to Hommel (PSBA, xv. 291), elmêšu is abbreviated from algamîšu (Heb. אֶלְגָּבִישׁ Ezk $13^{11.\ 13}$ 38^{22}), both being variants of gilgamish or gibilgamish, which is a synonym of Gišdubar, an ancient Bab. fire deity.

Flint is the name given to the rock from which Moses brought water in the wilderness (Dt 8^{15}, Ps 114^8, Wis 11^4). Flints were the primitive instruments of circumcision (Ex 4^{25} RV, Jos $5^{2.\ 3}$ RV). In the latter passage LXX expands חַרְבוֹת צֻרִים into μαχαίρας πετρίνας ἐκ πέτρας ἀκροτόμου. The LXX additions to Joshua relate how these knives of flint were preserved as a memorial in Timnath-serah, and were buried with Joshua there (21^{42d} 24^{30a}). In 1 Mac 10^{73} the absence of flints in a plain is given as a reason why cavalry should not be encountered there, as slingers would thus be at a disadvantage. The word used is κόχλαξ, and it is found in a similar connexion in the LXX of 1 S 14^{14}, which, however, does not correspond with the MT (Wellhausen, Text der BB. Sam. 87, 88; Driver, Heb. Text of Sam. 82, 83). In the Song of Moses 'oil from the rocky flint' (Dt 32^{13}) is a poetical way of describing olives growing on rocky soil (see Job 29^6). In Job 28^9, to illustrate man's power and skill, it is said that the miner puts forth his hand upon the flinty rock, and overturns the mountains. The hoofs of the Assyrian horses are compared to flint (Is 5^{28}), which is also an emblem of prophetic resoluteness (Is 50^7, Ezk 3^9).

Flint is a form of silica, a mineral which occurs in its purest condition as quartz. Flint is found in bands and nodules in certain calcareous rocks, notably in chalk, in various parts of the world. It is exceedingly hard, and breaks with a glassy fracture and sharp edges. When pieces of it are struck together, or against steel, sparks are emitted, and this method of obtaining fire has been used from the earliest times. It is probably alluded to in 2 Mac 10^3. Flints are often dark coloured owing to impurities. Their origin is one of the problems of geology not yet completely solved, but it is supposed that the siliceous framework of certain marine organisms was dissolved, and afterwards deposited in cavities, or actually substituted for the material of other organic remains.

A great part of Palestine and the Sinaitic peninsula is composed of Cretaceous strata, which pass on the W. into Nummulitic (Eocene) limestone. In both of these formations flints are found; and in some of the strata, especially those which line the Jordan Valley, they are particularly abundant (Green, Physical Geology, 231–33; Hull, SWP 61).

FLOCK.—Four Heb. words are tr^d flock:—

1. עֶדֶר 'êder, ποίμνιον, ἀγέλη. This word, when used alone (Gn $29^{3.\ 8}$, Jg 5^{16}, 1 S 17^{34}, Ps 78^{52}, Ca 1^7 etc.), usually signifies a flock of sheep or goats, or both mingled. It corresponds to the Arab. kaṭîʾ. The exception to this is in Gn $32^{16.\ 19}$, where it is tr^d drove. עֶדְרֵי צֹאן (Gn 29^2, Jl 1^{18}, Mic 5^8) signifies flocks of sheep, and עֶדְרֵי בָקָר, in the same sentence in Jl, is herds of cattle, and עֶדֶר הָעִזִּים (Ca 4^1 6^5) flock of goats. עֶדֶר יהוה (Jer 13^{17}) is the flock of J", that is, God's people (cf. Zec 10^3), and עֶדֶר הָרֳחֵלִים (Ca 6^6) a flock of ewes. מִגְדַּל עֵדֶר the tower of 'êder (the flock) (Gn 35^{21}) is a place near Bethlehem, mentioned again (Mic 4^8) as the 'hill' (marg. 'Heb. Ophel') of the daughter of Zion. Some suppose it to have been a tower on the hill Ophel at Jerusalem. If Ophel be Zion, the allusion would be perfect in its details. See HERD.

2. צֹאן ṣô'n. This word, which means sheep, is the original of most of the passages in OT tr^d flock. It corresponds to the Arab. ḍân, but ḍân refers to sheep as distinguished by having wool, from goats, which are known by the name of maʿz. Ṣô'n may include both, Gn 38^{17} RV (cf. AV) 'I will send thee a kid of the goats from the flock' (ṣô'n). In some cases the context makes it clear that it does not include both, as in 1 S 25^2 'he had three thousand sheep (ṣô'n), and a thousand goats ('izzîm), and he was shearing his sheep (ṣô'n) in Carmel.' Where ṣô'n and bâḳâr are mentioned together, they are always tr^d flocks and herds. It would be better, in every case where the context does not clearly demand the rendering flock, to translate ṣô'n sheep.

3. מִקְנֵה הַצֹּאן miḳneh haṣṣô'n (Gn 47^{17}), is tr^d AV, RV 'flocks,' RVm 'cattle of flocks.' It would have been better rendered possession of sheep, and miḳneh habbâḳâr, in the same verse, possession of oxen (cf. Ec 2^7).

4. קִנְיָה miḳneh (Ps 78^{48}), is tr^d AV, RV 'flocks.' It is elsewhere generally rendered 'cattle'; once 'possessions' (Ec 2^7).

The NT words for flock are ποίμνη and ποίμνιον, the latter of which is used exclusively in a fig. sense of the Church (Lk 12^{32}, Ac 20^{28}, 1 P 5^2 etc.).

G. E. POST.

FLOOD (Gn 6–9^{17}).—A story connected with the early history of man, which tells how, in consequence of their sins, especially those of violence, God destroyed by a flood the whole race, excepting only Noah and his family and two (or seven) pairs of every animal. These were saved in a huge ark or chest, which Noah had been directed to make when first warned of the coming flood. As the waters were abating, Noah sent forth a raven which did not return, and afterwards a dove twice at a week's interval, in order to ascertain whether the ground was dry. This was shown to be so by the dove returning the second time with an olive leaf in her mouth. The ark finally settled on Mt. Ararat. On leaving the ark, Noah offered up a sacrifice which appeased God, who promised never again to destroy the earth with a flood.

Simple and uniform as this story appears, it is a fact admitting of no reasonable doubt that the account of Genesis is really composed of two Flood stories, which, while agreeing in general purport, differ considerably both in character and detail. One belongs to the early source of the Hexateuch known as J, the other to the post-exilic P. They may be clearly distinguished here by the names of God and other well-known characteristics of these documents. The sections ascribed to J in Kautzsch's AT are 6^{1-8} $7^{1-5.\ 7-10.\ 12.\ 16b-17.\ 22-23}$ $8^{2b-3a.\ 6-12.\ 13b.\ 20-22}$, to P 6^{9-22} $7^{6.\ 11.\ 13-16a.\ 18-21}$ 7^{24a}–8^{2a} $8^{3b-5.\ 13a.\ 14-19}$ 9^{1-17} (on $7^{8.\ 9}$ see below). It will be sufficient to notice that in P we find the minute directions regarding the construction and size of the ark, the blessing of Noah, the laws against murder and eating blood, the covenant of the rainbow; in J only we have the picturesque narrative of sending out the raven and the dove, and the sacrifice of Noah, which so pleased J″ that He determined never again to curse the ground. In some respects the accounts of J and P contradict each other. (a) According to P one pair of every kind of animals is to be selected (6^{18-20}), according to J seven pairs of clean and two of unclean ($7^{2.\ 3}$). But in $7^{8.\ 9}$, where the actual entry is made, a reviser has, it would seem, combined the statements of J and P so as to agree with P. As it stands, the distinction between clean and unclean animals in that verse is purposeless, and indeed has the effect of emphasizing what appears like an act of disobedience on Noah's part, who took only one instead of seven pairs of clean animals as directed in 7^2. In J this verse must have run much as follows: 'Of clean beasts, seven and seven, of unclean beasts, two and two, went unto Noah into the ark.' In P the statement was probably, 'Of the fowl after its kind, and of the cattle after its kind, and of everything that creepeth upon the ground after its kind, two of every (sort) did he bring into the ark, as God commanded Noah.' (b) According to P it was 150 days before the waters began to subside (8^3), and it was 8 months and 13 days before the tops of the mountains were visible (cf. 7^{11} and 8^5), and a whole year and 10 days before the earth was perfectly dry (8^{14}). According to J the duration of the Flood was only 40 days (7^{12} 8^6), and even before this the water had considerably abated ($8^{2b.\ 3a.\ 6-10.\ 12.\ 13b}$). (c). What is in P a covenant with Noah that the waters should 'no more become a flood to destroy all flesh' (9^{15}), is in J the self-deliberation of J″ in consequence of Noah's sweet-smelling sacrifice ($8^{21.\ 22}$). See HEXATEUCH.

I. HISTORICITY OF THE FLOOD.—Until comparatively recent times the belief in a deluge covering the whole world and destroying all men and animals except those providentially preserved in the ark was practically universal among Christians. The fossil remains of marine animals, and the Flood traditions common to people in so many different parts of the world, were confidently appealed to as establishing the truth of the Bible story. Our increased knowledge of geology on the one hand and of comparative mythology on the other have now shown the little value of such evidence, and on these and other grounds this belief has been now surrendered by most biblical scholars as untenable. (a) It has been frequently pointed out that the whole quantity of moisture contained in the world, whether in an aqueous or vaporous form, if all reduced to water, would not be nearly enough to cover the highest mountains, supposing that the earth's surface was in anything like its present condition. But there is no evidence or scientific probability that the whole surface was ever so contracted or so levelled as to admit such a possibility. (b) Again, a thorough examination and a comparison of the numerous Flood myths make it impossible to refer them all to one single event. (c). Anthropological science points in the same direction. The diversity of the human race and of language alike makes it extremely improbable that men were derived from a single pair, and this, together with what we know of the early civilization of man, makes it impossible that a universal Flood should have occurred within at least many centuries of the time assigned by biblical chronology. The early relics of primitive man found in caves, ancient graves, etc., all over the world, point to an unbroken succession of human beings, their advance in civilization developing by gradual stages, and the whole extending over many thousands of years.

(d) But, after all, the most obvious difficulties are those which lie on the surface in the narrative itself, supposing that it describes a flood extending over the whole world as we now know it. Noah is said to have collected together animals of every kind, one pair at least of each. Let us try to imagine the long journeys necessary to different parts of the world, including the Tropics and the Arctic Regions, and that in an age when the difficulties and dangers of travelling must have made it almost impossible, and the difficulty of capturing and bringing home the animals when captured. How many years will it still take the Royal Zoological Society, with all the resources of modern civilization, to collect even single specimens of all the known larger animals of the world, to say nothing of the hundreds of species still unknown, nothing of the myriads of insects, crustaceæ, etc., included in the 'creeping things' of the Bible! Again, the dimensions of the ark could not possibly have allowed room for the housing of all the creatures; for, supposing that they were shut up in separate cells ('nests,' Gn 6^{14} RVm), almost as much space would have been required for passages to get at them as for the cells themselves. We have also to take into account the immense amount of room required for the storage of food, especially that needed for the larger animals, such as hay for the elephants, and animals of different sorts for the carnivoræ, besides all the food necessary for some time after the Flood, before revived vegetation should make fresh food procurable. Even if we could suppose that the dimensions of the ark permitted all this, how would it have been possible to keep all these animals alive? The polar bear would have required very different conditions from the tiger or the boa-constrictor. How, again, is it conceivable that eight persons should have been sufficient to attend to the wants of all these animals, as well as to their own? But besides all this, there is no provision for making the ark seaworthy. It is merely a huge wooden box liable to capsize, and quite incapable of weathering a storm. The difficulties here pointed out readily suggest the true answer. The Flood was not in the writer's view universal, as we should understand a universal Flood, simply because the world he is writing of is a totally different world from ours. It is a very little world. Men and animals are all living within easy reach of each other. Man is still the lord of creation. He can gather together the animals to be saved, whether beast of the field or fowl of the air, at his will. No difficulties, even such as would have occurred in the writer's own day, have any place in that ideal world of the distant past, where holy men walked with God, and there was no need of miracles, because everything was of course so different. That the writers and compilers of Genesis sincerely believed the story we need have no doubt, but in the light of scientific and historical criticism it must be frankly recognized as one of those many stories or legends which are found in the folk-lore and early literature of all peoples.

II. The Relation of the Bible Flood Stories to similar Stories of other Peoples.—It was formerly supposed that the many Flood stories found in different parts of the world were all traditions of the Bible Deluge brought by various peoples from the ancient cradle of the human race. A comparison, however, of the stories with one another and with the Bible narrative makes it quite clear that they stand severally in a very different relation to the latter, and are due to many different causes. We may roughly divide these stories, according to their resemblance to the Flood story of Genesis, into the following classes:—

i. First and foremost stands the Babylonian or Accadian account of the Deluge. This is so like the Bible story, both in its general drift and many of its details, that it cannot be other than a different version of the same. The Babylonian legend itself exists in two forms. One is contained in the fragments of Berosus, an Egyptian priest of the 3rd cent. B.C., who wrote a history of Babylon. The second is contained in a cuneiform inscription on tablets preserved in the British Museum, and first deciphered by George Smith in 1872.

(a) Of these the first is very short and of comparatively little importance, except that some differences of detail in comparison with the other prove that the Babylonian story had a wide currency. The main differences are the clay which Xisuthros, the hero of the Flood, finds on the legs of the birds when they return for the second time, and the translation of Xisuthros' daughter and the pilot of the ship, as well as that of Xisuthros himself and his wife.

(b) The story of Berosus is altogether thrown into the shade by the far fuller and more circumstantial account found on the Accadian tablets. These contain an epic poem in 12 parts. Each part is connected with a sign of the Zodiac, and the 11th, containing the Flood story, has the sign corresponding to Aquarius, 'the water-bearer.' In this part the deified Sît-napišti, or, as the name is sometimes written, Khasisadra (Xisuthros), communicates the history of the Flood at the mouth of the Euphrates to his grandson Gisdubar (the Nimrod of Genesis). Ea, the god of wisdom, reveals to Ṣît-napišti the intention of the gods of Surippak—Anu, Bel, etc.—to bring a Flood, and commands him to build a ship, and save what he can of the germ of life. Ṣît-napišti expostulates on the absurdity of building a ship on dry land, but finally consents. The making of the ship is then given in some detail, among other things its dimensions (according to G. Smith, 600 cubits long, 60 broad, 60 high; omitted by Sayce), and the pouring of bitumen over its sides, inside and out. Food was brought into the ship, including beer and wine, and also all that he had of gold and silver. 'Slaves and concubines, the cattle of the field, the beasts of the field, the sons of the people: all of these did I bring up.' The ship was built by the help of the sun-god Samas, who fixed the season for the Flood on the evening before Ṣît-napišti shut the door. A highly poetical description is then given of the storm, brought about by the direct agency of the gods of wind, water, etc., so terrible that even the gods trembled and sought refuge in the heaven of Anu, where they crowded in a heap 'like a dog in his kennel,' and gods and goddesses wept for pity. For six days and nights the storm continues, and subsides on the seventh. The sea begins to dry. Ṣît-napišti opens the windows and sees the corpses floating on the water. On the horizon he sees land, and the ship is steered for the mountain of Nizir, which it reaches the second day. On the seventh day after this he sends forth a dove, which finds no resting-place and returns; then a swallow, which does the same; and lastly a raven, which feeds on the carrion and does not return. The animals are sent forth to the four winds, and a sacrifice is offered on an altar which he builds on the peak of the mountain. The gods smelt the savour, and 'gathered like flies over the sacrifice.' Thereupon the great goddess lighted up the rainbow which Anu had created. Bel, angry with the gods that his will had not been fully carried out, alone refused to come to the altar. He stayed by the ship and would have stopped the exit of the survivors; but Adar explained that Ea had revealed the counsel of the gods to Ṣît-napišti. Then Ea himself expostulates with Bel for wishing to destroy the faithful with the sinners. Better at any rate to send wild beasts, or famine, or plague. After all, it was only by a dream that he had revealed the determination of the gods. Then Bel enters the ship and very graciously makes a covenant with Ṣît-napišti, saying that henceforth he and his wife are to be as gods, and Ṣît-napišti is to dwell at the mouth of the river. (Sayce, Fresh Light, ch. ii.)

This story is said by experts to be as old at least as 3000 years B.C. That the early Hebrews derived the story from Babylonia, and not vice versâ, may be considered a practical certainty. While Babylonia from the days of the Patriarchs was highly advanced in civilization, the Jews, even far down into their history, were comparatively simple and far less civilized even than the Canaanitish tribes, who themselves derived their culture from Babylon. The Babylonian language and script had already before the Exodus become naturalized in Palestine, and been made, as the Tel el-Amarna tablets show, the official means of communication between the Babylonian court and the various Canaanitish tribes. Thus there was more than one channel by which a popular story of Babylonia might become part of Jewish folk-lore. At the same time the variations in the story suggest that it is likely to have passed through many mouths before it reached its Bible form. Even the differences in its religious character are more probably due to gradual changes of thought and feeling than to a single literary process. It is, however, quite possible that if several variations of the story were, as is probable, current, some few particulars in the Bible story may be actually more original than in the Accadian version. The sending out of the birds in the latter is rather pointless, as the non-return of the raven, which fed upon the corpses, proved nothing. Both the J and P stories are derived from the Babylonian, each document selecting for the most part, and sometimes enlarging upon, those details which best accorded with its own character and aim.

ii. A very large number of Flood stories bear only a very general and probably accidental resemblance to the biblical or Accadian Deluge. The mere fact that a legend has to do with a flood, even though it be a universal one, is not enough to constitute any real relationship to the Bible Deluge-story. For such legends can be proved to have arisen from several different causes. These causes may be roughly divided into three classes: 1. Some theory of Creation which connects it with water as perhaps a creative element. Flood stories dealing with Creation bear comparison with 'the deep' of Gn 1^2 rather than with Noah's Flood. Thus the Binnas in the Malay Peninsula held that the earth was originally completely covered with a hard crust. God in early ages broke through the crust, so that the water covered the whole world. Out of the water He afterwards let rise Mt. Lulumet and other hills, as well as the plain on which the Binnas now live. This conception of the centre of the world as a vast body of water we find again in a Flood story of the Acawoio (British Guiana), and is probably to be understood in the biblical phrase 'the water under the earth' (Ex 20^4), the idea being that the land floated on the water.

2. Most frequently, however, the Flood story is the highly coloured tradition of some historical event or extraordinary natural phenomenon.

A. Among island and coastland peoples (a) the early settlement of their ancestors, who came in boats across the ocean. In such stories the particular land in which they live was the land of refuge from the great Deluge. In the story of the Binnas this tradition is combined with the notion of Creation. The primeval man and woman were created in a boat, which moved over the waters until at last it stranded on dry land. (b) The appearance or disappearance of an island by a volcanic eruption. Thus the inhabitants of the Minahassa (the northern volcanic peninsula of Celebes) relate that the land originally rose out of a flood; and the stories of the Fiji and Pelew islanders appear to have originated from the disappearance of islands by volcanic action. (c) A tidal wave resulting from an earthquake. The Flood story current among the Eskimo in the Prince of Wales Peninsula is expressly connected with an earthquake. In a story of the Makah Indians (Washington Territory) it is related how the water flowed into the land from the Pacific, until Cape Flattery became an island. Similar features are found in the stories of some other Indian tribes—among them the Araucanians (in Chili), with whom the Flood is the result of an earthquake accompanied by volcanic eruptions.

B. Among inland peoples the causes of Flood stories are (a) very frequently the overflow of some river, especially where, by the bursting of its banks, a large plain is inundated. This is the case in China, where, however, the Flood stories have hardly passed out of the region of sober history into that of myth, and deal with floods similar to those which have been known to have taken place,—the last two during the 19th cent. in 1852 and 1881. In the second of these no fewer than two millions are said to have perished. The Chinese Flood stories, then, are evidently not derived from Babylonia, and we should avoid yielding to the temptation of appealing to the early connexion in language and script between China and Babylonia.* (b) The formation of a lake or inland sea, or its disappearance by the water eating out a channel for itself through soft rock, such as limestone. Livingstone tells a legend describing how the Dilolo Lake in Central Africa (on the southern border of the Congo State) came into existence as the consequence of a woman's curse pronounced upon a native chieftain who refused hospitality. The inhabitants of Thibet relate how once a flood covered the whole country and destroyed the ape-like inhabitants. By the compassion of a god the waters were drained off, and the new people taught civilization. In Santa Fé de Bogotá in Colombia there is a story that there was once a huge flood brought about by the witchery of a wicked woman, who caused the Rio de Bogotá to overflow and fill the basin-like plain of Cundinamarca. Her good husband changed her into the moon, and opened the present outlet through the limestone rock by which the water now flows down over the Falls of Tequendama (cf. Schwarz, Sintfluth, noticed in Expos. Times, viii., 1897, 271 f.). (c) The melting of the winter snows. In the district of the Indian tribe of the Chippewas there is a story telling how a mouse once gnawed through the bag which held the heat, and this escaping, the melting snow became a flood, which covered the whole world.

3. Not infrequently, and sometimes in connexion with one or more of the causes already mentioned, the Flood story appears to have originated in an attempt to account for some otherwise unexplained fact, as—(a) The dispersion of peoples and difference of language. This is especially frequent among, if not indeed peculiar to, the Indian tribes of N. America. Among the Thlinkeets in the North West the difference of speech between them and the rest of mankind is naïvely accounted for by the breaking of the ark in two, their ancestors having been in one half, those of all other races in the other! More frequently, the dispersion is the result of the boats drifting away in the waters of the Deluge, as, e.g., with the Bella Coola Indians (between 52° and 53° N. lat. on the coast of the Pacific). The ancient rock-carvings found among the aborigines of Mexico, in which, as it is said, a dove is depicted distributing gifts of speech in the form of tongues to the survivors of the Flood, would be a striking illustration of this kind of Flood story, could we be certain that this interpretation of it is correct; but it is at least doubtful. (b) The red colour of some of the N. American tribes. This colour is, according to the Crees, the direct consequence of the Flood, the Red Indians of to-day being the descendants of the single woman who was rescued, when the waters had all but covered her (see below, III. 9). On the other hand, the Herero, a native tribe of South Africa, relate that it was the Flood that brought to their ancient home the white man and woman from whom they are descended; hence their pale colour. (c) The existence of fossil remains on dry land, and even on hills. It is curious that the same evidence which, from the days of Tertullian at any rate, has been frequently adduced as evidence of the Bible Flood has been appealed to by several different peoples as evidence of their own Flood stories; and if the remains did not in every, or perhaps in any, case actually give rise to the story, they certainly helped to give it credence and permanence. With the Leeward islanders the mussels and corals on their hills are a standing proof of an ancient flood, in which all but one small coral island were immersed. The Samoan islanders call attention to the fish which have been turned into stone; and the central Eskimos of N. America can still see the outer shells of many mussels, fish, sea-dogs, and whales which were left upon the dry land by the Flood. (d) The same Eskimo tribes give a similar explanation of glaciers. They are the icebergs left on the tops of the mountains by the receding waters.

It is also important to observe that the cause of the Flood story has very often a special connexion with the locality to which it belongs. Thus we notice that the melting of the ice is a frequent cause with the extreme northernly tribes of N. American Indians. Earthquakes are a common feature in the Flood legends of tribes on those coastlands of America where they frequently occur. The submergence or emergence of islands accounts for those of tribes inhabiting volcanic districts. In China the Flood stories are associated with the bursting of the banks of the great rivers where such events occur, and are accompanied with great loss of life and property. Still more remarkable is it, on the other hand, that in Africa, where the overflow of the great rivers is a regular and expected phenomenon, and, in fact, has become necessary to cultivation, and therefore cannot be considered as the result of special divine agency, Flood stories are singularly rare, and never of this kind.

iii. Very frequently an old myth has become mixed up with, or at any rate coloured by, the Babylonian or Bible story. Thus the account of the Grecian Flood (Deucalion's) as given in the de Deâ Syrâ of the pseudo-Lucian, a writer of the 2nd cent. A.D., differs from the earlier form of the story as contained in Ovid (Met. i. 163–437), for instance, by the addition of several details belonging to the Babylonian and biblical stories, such as the name Sisythes (=Xisuthros), the building of a chest, the saving in it of Deucalion's family and pairs of every animal. Plutarch similarly introduces Deucalion's sending out the dove to ascertain the weather (!), according as it returned or remained behind. This colouring is probably, however, in most cases due to the teaching of Christian missionaries, who would naturally emphasize and unconsciously, or perhaps even intentionally, exaggerate points of resemblance between native folk-lore and Bible stories. Andree (see Literature below) quotes a story to show how easily the Bible Flood could find its way into the folk-lore of an imaginative people. A missionary heard a Flood story from a native Hottentot which bore a suspicious resemblance to that of the Bible, and yet he was assured that it had been handed down from early ages. Shortly after he met another missionary, who told him that he had himself taught the native the Bible story. It is not always easy to say positively that a legend has been influenced by the Bible Flood, but in the following cases it may be considered highly probable:—(a) When the legend resembles the Bible story in one or more definite particulars, but in general drift or in its more important features differs widely from it. In that of the Mandari (a branch of the Kohls, East India), the flood out of which a brother and sister only had been rescued under a tree, is put an end to by the serpent Lurbing, in connexion with whom appears the rainbow. In the Lithuanian story the rainbow is sent to comfort a pair of wretched survivors, and counsels them to obtain offspring by jumping over the bones of the earth. The Lummi Indians (north of Washington Territory) have a story that an old man escaped on a raft to a mountain, and thence twice sent forth a crow, which returned the second time with a leaf. (b) When the parts corresponding with the Bible story break the context, and do not fit in well with the rest. This is obviously the case with a story of the Algonquins (an Indian tribe of N. America), preserved in a very curious pictographic document, where, in the middle of a passage describing how some of the people were rescued on Turtle Island, the mention of a boat, as though an independent means of rescue, is very awkwardly introduced. (c) Where two forms of the story exist, in one of which the biblical features occur and in the other are absent. When, as with Deucalion's Flood, the former is known to be later, the probability of interpolation may be considered a certainty. Among the Mandans, an Indian tribe on the Missouri River, according to a current Flood legend the ark is a tower-like building, and the supposed model of the building, which is preserved as a relic in a public place, is in shape like a wooden cylinder. But not only is this model called 'the great canoe,' but, in the festival which commemorates the Flood, the representative of 'the First Man,' who was saved therein, tells how 'the great canoe' stranded on a high mountain. Moreover, the festival is always arranged to take place when the willows are in leaf, because, so they say, it was a branch of that tree, with all its leaves on, which the bird brought back to the ark. It is clear that we have here a confusion between two stories—an ancient legend according to which the survivors were saved in a tower, and the Bible Flood. (d) Where the Flood legend is mixed up with other stories from the Bible. Thus in that of the Papagos (an Indian tribe, east of California), Montezuma, the hero of the Flood, is so ungrateful to his deliverer, that he presumes to build a house whose top is to reach to heaven, whereupon the great Spirit sends his thunder and destroys the building. This evident borrowing from the Tower of Babel story makes us suspect that his sending out the jackal after the Flood to see how far the land extended, originated in the sending forth of birds from Noah's ark. In one of the Mexican legends, current in the neighbourhood of Cholulu, an artificial mountain, raised as a memento of the mountain in the caves of which the seven giants were saved from the Flood, threatened to reach to heaven, whereupon the gods sent down fire and destroyed several of the builders. This legend, connected with a half-finished pyramid, shows how readily Bible stories found their way among the aborigines of Mexico, and explains why features of the Bible Flood so often occur in the Flood myths of various Mexican tribes. In the story of the Mandari, above referred to as giving special prominence to the Bible feature of the rainbow, the creation of man out of earth stands in close connexion with the Flood. Similarly, the Flood story of the Macoushi (near British Guiana) relates how the first man found, on waking out of a deep sleep, a woman standing by his side. After this we can feel very little confidence in the originality of the statement that after the Flood the rat sent out by a survivor returned with an ear of maize in its mouth. This is evidently nothing else but a local adaptation of the dove and the olive branch. (e) The stories of the Papagos and Macoushi give another ground for suspecting biblical influence, namely, where some well-known features of a class of Flood legends appear so changed as to agree with the Noachian Deluge. The object of the sending forth of animals in the Indian stories is, as a rule, to obtain earth to create dry ground for the survivors. A rat is sent forth as well as other animals for this purpose in the legend of the Ojibways and the Chippewas, a fish in those of the Sac and Fox Indians. But in the stories of the Papagos and Macoushi the object is, as in the Bible, to discover the extent of dry land.

In some cases, however, the appearance of biblical details may be after all a mere coincidence. The likelihood of such coincidence becomes far greater than we might have thought when we take into account the very large number of Flood stories and the singular variety of detail. The following is an attempt to give as shortly as is practicable some idea of the extraordinary extent of this variety.

III. Variety of Details in different Flood Legends.—(1) The Beings destroyed by the Flood are often described as strange or unnatural beings, such as baneful monsters (Persian Bundehesh); ape-like men (Thibet); descendants of a primeval man and woman, who were drowned in the sea and became a whale and a crab; the descendants appear, however, to have been human in form, at any rate capable of religious and moral delinquency (Andamanese); giants (later Scandinavian Edda); men, one tribe of whom consisted only of women, another of men with dog-like tails (Fiji islanders); gods of the earth upon whom the Flood was sent at the request of the nether gods (the Sac and Fox Indians); a demigod (Ojibways, see above); imperfect men (Quiché Indians of Guatemala); the descendants of gods and men (Miztecs of Mexico, cf. Gn 6^{1-4}).

(2) The reasons for the Flood are differently given. Very frequently to get rid of these monstrous forms of life (in the Bundehesh a second Flood is necessary to purify the world of the poison which the monsters still left behind them); as in the Bible, to punish men for their wickedness (Andamanese); or, more frequently, for some definite crime or offence, as the refusal to wash and work (Mandari); killing and eating a huge serpent (Dyaks of Borneo); cooking a fish in violation of a sacred promise (Gipsies of the Sieben Gebirge); the crime of the demigod Menaboshu against the water-serpents in killing their king and three sons in revenge for the destruction of his little pet wolf (Ojibways); the inhospitality of a local S. African chieftain towards a woman who, in consequence, brought about a local flood through her incantation (Dilolo Lake); the insult perpetrated on a sea-god by a fisherman who fished in sacred waters and caught the god by his hair (Leeward Islands); the injury done to the raven by 'the wise man,' who had punished it by throwing it into the fire (Hare Indians, North America). In one case, as already noticed, the Flood is the result of a quarrel between the gods of the nether and upper world (the Sac and Fox Indians).

(3) The direct cause of the Flood is usually the rise and overflow of the sea, or of some river or lake; rather less frequently a prodigious storm and rainfall. An exceptional case is the melting of the winter snow (Chippewas, see above, II. 2 B c). Once it is occasioned by the blood flowing from a slaughtered giant (later Edda). Occasionally, the Flood consists of hot water (Finns). In the legend of the Quiché there is a second Flood of resin after one of water, and occasionally fire takes the place of water (so with the Yuracarés in Bolivia, among whom a legend of this sort has many parallels with the Flood stories of other peoples). In an Eskimo story the people are destroyed by heat as well as by the water. In one case the Flood is caused by the accidental breaking of a jar (examined through curiosity) containing the waters of the ocean (Haiti Island). Similarly, a flood is caused by an inquisitive ape taking away the mat placed in a hollow tree to stop up the water which communicated with the water beneath the earth (Acawoio, British Guiana).

(4) The Flood generally seems to have come unexpectedly; but sometimes the survivors were forewarned, as a rule by a god, but occasionally through the medium of animals. In the sacred books of India it is the fish, which is no other than the incarnate Vishnu, or, in one form of the legend, even the great Brahma himself. In the legend of the Cherokee Indians (N. America) it is a dog which tells his master, having first attracted his attention by standing up to his neck in the water and refusing to stir. In one of the Peruvian stories it is the llamas which warn their shepherd. He had noticed that they looked sad and gazed at the stars, upon which he inquired the cause, and was told of the coming Flood.

(5) The Flood is generally represented as universal, though originating in some definite place; but sometimes it is purely local.

(6) Men are usually drowned, but in one legend some of them are devoured by sea-monsters (Algonquins). In several of the Peruvian Flood stories they are changed into fish, and in one instance the dead bodies become salmon and frogs (Maidu, near Sacramento).

(7) The number of survivors varies very greatly in the different stories. Where the inhabitants of the world are monsters, they are, of course, all destroyed. Sometimes even men are all destroyed, and a new set of men created. Sometimes, on the other hand, they appear to have all escaped (Kabadi, a south-east district of New Guinea). As a rule, the survivors are very few, most frequently a single family, or even less; in several cases only one man or woman. Once it is only the coyote (prairie-wolf) of all living beings (Wappo, California); in another story it is the coyote and the demigod Montezuma (Papagos); in another the raven and his mother (Thlinkeets, Indian tribe of N. America, see below, III. 9).

(8) The reason why the particular survivors were permitted to escape is generally left unexplained. But when it is explained, it is usually, of course, because they had no part in the cause for which the Flood was sent. Thus in the Gipsy legend (see above, III. 2), while the wife who cooked the fish is struck by the first lightning flash of the storm which preceded the Flood, the husband, who was faithful to his promise, was saved. In the legend of the Leeward Islands (see above, III. 2), however, by a strange want of poetic justice, the penitent fisherman succeeds in appeasing the wrath of the god, and he and his family alone escape.

(9) The methods of escape exhibit also great variety. In many cases it is by fleeing to a mountain or an island, the latter generally being left unimmersed by the rising water, not so much from its elevation as from its sacred character (Algonquins, Victoria, Leeward Islands, Greece, etc.). Sometimes the place of refuge is the top of a tree (Karens in Burmah, Tupi in Brazil, Acawoio in British Guiana), or underneath (!) a tree (Mandari), or in caves (Mexicans of Cholula); once in the hole of a huge crawfish in a rice field (Uraus, a branch of Kohls); in a tower expressly built for the purpose (Mandans, see above, II. iii. c). The most usual method of escape, however, is by a boat or raft of some kind. In one of the Fiji stories, two gods themselves come in a boat, and fish the drowning bodies out of the water. The raft or ship is usually allowed to drift, but sometimes, as in the Accadian story, it is regularly steered. In the legends of India it is towed by the god-fish with a rope tied to his horn. Sometimes, to prevent its drifting away, it is secured by a rope, fastened either to a stone acting as an anchor (Kamtschatka), or, more frequently, to a tree (Pelew islanders, Twanas of Puget Sound, Washington Territory). Occasionally, as in the Bible story, the means of escape is a floating chest (Banar in Cambodia); in one legend a nut-shell, which conveniently fell from a god, who was eating nuts in heaven during the Flood, on to the topmost peak of a mountain, whither men had fled for refuge (Lithuanians). Usually, as in the Accadian and Bible stories, the ark lands on a mountain; but, curiously enough, in some of the Persian legends the mountain of refuge itself floats like a boat. Other means of escape are still more quaint. In one legend the raven and his mother, presumably in a pre-raven state of existence, put on birds' skins and fly up to heaven, which the former, in his impetuosity, hits so violently that his beak gets stuck. In this predicament he is obliged to wait till the waters reach him (Thlinkeets). In another the single surviving maiden succeeds in catching hold of a bird, which flies up with her to a rock of safety (Crees).

(10) The Flood usually disappears by subsidence or evaporation; but, in isolated instances, it flows away down a hole (Deucalion's Flood, Tinney Indians), or into a rift in a mountain, and so finds its way into the sea (Maidu).

(11) The survivors in several legends send out animals from their various retreats, usually to dive down into the waters, that they may get earth, out of which new land is created. Of this we have a characteristic example in the story of the Ojibways, in which the surviving Menaboshu, after having stood on the topmost peak of a mountain for five days, with the water up to his mouth, in despair prays a passing sea-gull to dive down and discover whether the land has been entirely washed away. After the gull has dived several times to no purpose, Menaboshu sees the stiffened body of a musk-rat floating by. Having restored it to life, he sends it down on a similar quest. After a long while the dead body of the musk-rat appears on the surface with a few grains of sand in its claws. These Menaboshu throws on the water, and they become little islands, which grow and join together until they form habitable earth. In the stories of the Sac and Fox Indians, it is a fish which returns with its huge mouth full of earth; in that of the Chippewas, the beaver, otter, musk-rat, and northern diver, all dive down, and the last returns with mud in its webbed feet. Sometimes, as in the Bible, and presumably the Accadian stories, the animals are sent forth to discover whether or where the land is dry (Papagos, etc., see above, II. iii. e).

(12) The survivors, hard put to it for food, sometimes feed on fish, which they either cook by putting them under their armpits (!) (Tolowa in California), or with fire procured by rubbing sticks together, at which the god is angry, and turns the fish into dogs (an old Mexican story in the Codex Chimalpopoca). Fire is obtained in a similar way in the legend of the Dyaks of Borneo. In the Andamanesian story an arctic bird sends down a firebrand from heaven. In one of the Peruvian legends, meals are provided for the two surviving brothers by two parrots.

(13) There is a very curious variety with regard to the methods by which the world was re-peopled after the Deluge. When all the inhabitants were destroyed, there was, of necessity, a new creation. Most frequently, as in the Bible, the new men were simply the offspring of the few survivors, but in several legends they appear as propagated in some strange and miraculous manner, as by stones thrown over the survivors' heads (Deucalion's Flood, Acawoio and other Indian tribes on the Upper Orinoco). In one story cocoa-nuts are thrown with a similar result (Maypuri and neighbouring tribes of S. America). In the Lithuanian story men come into being by the survivors leaping over the bones of the earth. According to the Pelew islanders, it was by intercourse of the gods with a woman whose dead body was brought to life, and indwelt for a time by a goddess. Another legend ascribes it to the union between the single surviving maiden and a great eagle (Crees). Still more curious is the legend of the Wappo, who ascribe the re-peopling of the world to the coyote, which planted the tail feathers of various birds in the places where wigwams formerly stood. According to the Tinney Indians, it was brought about by the gods changing animals into men.

(14) The deification of Xisuthros after the Flood in the Accadian story has hardly a parallel in the myths of other peoples. Sometimes the survivor is already a sort of god (Papagos). In the story of the Pelew islanders the gods wish to deify the last woman, whom they had already restored to life, but are prevented by the malice of the bird Tariit (Rallus pectoralis).

If we now examine these legends in connexion with their locality, we shall find that features which repeat themselves (leaving out of consideration what has been borrowed from the Bible story) in several legends are of two kinds: (a) those which characterize the legends of neighbouring or related tribes; and (b) those which appear sporadically, so to speak, in far separated peoples. As examples of the first we may notice, generally, the tendency to combine Flood stories with animal fables common to almost all tribes of American Indians, and more especially the fables of the coyote, the jackal, and the raven, each of which marks off a definite group of tribes. We may instance also the floating mountain, which is confined to the neighbourhood of Peru. In many cases the second class belongs to the form which the legend would be most likely to take. It is more likely that men would escape a flood by going up into a mountain, or by means of a boat or raft, than in any other way, and therefore we find this to be most frequently the case. But when we consider the great multiplicity of stories, it is not at all surprising that, in a few isolated cases, the imagination of different peoples should independently hit upon the same idea. Where so many methods of escape suggested themselves, it might easily have occurred to more than one people that the boat of safety was like a chest, or, again, that the boat was tied by a rope. In the same way we may account for the really far stranger incident, the subsequent creation of men out of stones.

It is of the greatest importance to notice that this second class of similarities is by no means confined to features contained in the Bible story. Those who argue for the truth of the latter on the ground that several of its details are confirmed by other legends, are in danger of proving too much. The same argument makes equally for the truth of other details not found in the Bible. If all these stories are really the traditions of one single event, does not the evidence point to a boat rather than an ark, if indeed the survivors did not merely ascend a mountain; and is not the statement of the boat being moored by a rope, which appears in legends so widely scattered, at least as probable as that of the sending out of animals, on the presence of which, in different legends, so much stress is often laid? For, as a matter of fact, the stories which contain this feature are often liable to the suspicion of a Christian colouring on the grounds above given, and indeed it is just this picturesque touch which would inevitably most strike the imagination, and most easily find its way into the popular stories of a people. It must also be borne in mind that there is a vast difference between sending out animals to ascertain how far the waters were dry, and begging them to dive down under the water to obtain earth for making dry land. The clay on the feet of the birds in the Babylonian story is connected with the first, that on the feet of the diver in the story of the Chippewas with the second. In a word, all that the multifarious Flood stories really can be said to prove is, that there was among a very large number of ancient peoples the belief in a Flood, and often, though by no means so frequently, in a universal Deluge; but this alone does not prove that they all describe one real event, still less that the one true account of that event is the Bible Flood. It is rather the case that a thorough study and comparison of these stories make both these hypotheses extremely improbable.

IV. The Cause of the Accadian Flood Story.—Four theories as to the origin of the Flood story are possible. That it was originally (1) a mere product of the fancy, (2) a nature myth, (3) a cosmogonic fable, (4) the poetical presentation of some natural occurrence. The first is contrary to the analogy of similar legends among all peoples, and hardly needs serious discussion. The second has in its favour the connexion of the Flood story with Aquarius, and possibly, perhaps, the location of Šit-napišti at the mouth of the Euphrates; but, on the other hand, this watery subject, supposing the story to be already in existence, was specially suited for this particular zodiacal sign; and the mouth of the Euphrates might be deemed a fitting place for the deified hero of the Flood. The third finds some analogy among the Flood legends of other nations, but the analogy of the great majority of Flood stories is strongly in favour of the fourth, and there can be no doubt that it is correct.

The question then arises, 'What event is likely to have given rise to the Accadian story?' (a) That it was a universal Deluge is, for reasons already given, quite out of the question. (b) Writers have, however, still maintained (and founded their arguments on scientific grounds) that this Flood was much more than a local flood, and really covered a very considerable area. Among these is the late Professor Prestwich, a man who, on account of his geological researches, is entitled to the highest respect (see Literature). He maintains the view, that long after the appearance of palæolithic man there was a submergence of the crust of the earth, chiefly in Western Europe, but extending to the N.W. of Africa, though probably not as far as Egypt, causing a great inundation of the sea, which rose (relatively speaking) at its highest to about 1500 ft. on the Continent, and 1000 ft. in England. It seems to have risen suddenly and to have subsided soon; that is to say, the inundation did not probably last more than a year or two at most. It destroyed a vast amount of animal and some human life, so that some species of animals became extinct in regions which they formerly inhabited: for example, the lion, panther, spotted hyæna, caffir cat, hippopotamus, African elephant in Europe and N. Africa, and all the then existing mammalia in Malta. The proofs of this inundation are: (1) the various forms of what the Professor calls distinctively Rubble Drift (distinct in character from the Glacial Drift in its various forms of breccia, etc.), and (2) a sedimentary deposit (loess) found on mountains (distinct from all valley deposits left by rivers). It seems probable to him that, when the Flood rose, animals of all sorts were driven to the mountains, where some escaped, from which the submerged districts were again re-stocked after the Flood. In one instance (at Palermo) it would appear that the light-footed animals, which would have had little difficulty in making their escape, survived, whereas the hippopotamus became extinct. Without attempting to call in question the geological arguments on which this view is maintained, it will be readily seen that it is extremely difficult to make it square with the evidence of the Flood traditions of different peoples, to which Professor Prestwich himself appeals to fortify his case. Had this view been correct, we should certainly have expected to find wide recollections of the Flood throughout the region where it occurred, and more faint traditions in other parts. But this is by no means the case, and the district of Babylonia, from which the most important and graphic Flood story originates, is, according to our present knowledge, wanting in those geological phenomena on which the Professor depends (indeed they have not yet been discovered even in the east of Europe), and therefore is apparently beyond the region of the supposed Deluge. On the other hand, in Europe Flood legends are comparatively scarce, and usually of a very mythical type (Edda, Lithuanians, etc.); in N.W. Africa they are altogether absent. Again, they are most frequent by far in Northern and Central America, regions far removed from the supposed locality of the Flood. The same objection, though not to the same extent, lies to the view that the Accadian Flood story is to be referred to geological changes in Thibet, by which what was once a great inland sea became a plain (see above, II. 2 B b).

Judging from the genesis of similar legends, this Accadian story is far more likely to have originated in Babylonia itself, and to be due to some local cause. The same analogy, if we take also into account the character of the country, suggests that our choice lies between a great overflow of the Tigris and Euphrates caused by an extraordinary rainfall, and the incursion of a tidal wave through an earthquake somewhere in the south. Edward Süss, whose views are mentioned by Andree, is inclined to think that both these causes were at work. He argues from the description of the Accadian story, which speaks not only of the earth trembling, and the breaking out of the floods below the earth, and the waves of the storm-god reaching up to heaven—expressions which point to an earthquake accompanied by a tidal wave—but also of the whirlwind, and the thunder, and the overflow of the canals. Del. (Gen. 1887, p. 164), Haupt (Amer. Journ. Philol. ix. 423 f.), and esp. Huxley (Essays on Controverted Questions, 586 ff., 619), agree with Süss, and Dillm. (Gen.[6] p. 175) inclines to the same view. Andree gives several instances, recorded in history, showing to what an enormous distance an earthquake affects the movement of the sea. For example, an earthquake which took place in Peru on the 13th of August 1868, caused a great wave which struck the Sandwich Islands on the following day, and on the day after washed the coastlands of Australia and New Zealand. How terrible the destruction wrought by a local inundation may be, is shown by the cyclone which struck the coast of India on Nov. 1st, 1864, and involved the loss of 60,000 lives. It is not so very surprising that in Babylonia, as in many other countries, such a flood should by long oral tradition have been magnified into a universal Deluge, from which only a few survived.

It has been necessary in this article to lay considerable stress on points of resemblance between the Flood story of the Bible and the numerous Flood legends of other peoples. We have shown that, looked at from a merely historical point of view, they stand on a similar footing, and, in fact, that the Bible story is merely a later variant of one of them. Here, however, the resemblance ends. In tone and religious character the Bible story is immeasurably above all others. It is true, indeed, that the God of the Flood, Who took pleasure in the sweet smell of Noah's sacrifice, stands far below the God of the psalmist, Who delighted not in burnt-offerings and sacrifice, but in a broken and troubled spirit. But for all that, it is a God who hated iniquity, transgression, and sin as utterly unworthy of His own creation, not a deity avenging a merely personal insult, far less, as in the original story, a troop of gods wrangling with each other in jealous rivalry. Even though it be true that the Israelites found this Flood story handed down from the religious mists of a far distant past, a religious student of Scripture will have no difficulty in recognizing that divinely guided religious feeling and insight by which an ancient legend became the vehicle of religious and spiritual truth.

FLOOD.—A flood is a flow of water. In early Eng. (as in late) it is used of the flow of the tide, as Trin. Coll. Hom. (1200) 177, 'For swiche flode, and for swich ebbinge the prophete nemmeth this woreld se.' But in the earliest quotation in Oxf. Eng. Dict. it is applied to a stream,—an application which has long since dropped out of prose, though it is still in use poetically. In this sense 'flood' is of frequent occurrence in AV. The following is a complete list of the passages in which the word is found.

1. A stream: Job 14^{11} (nâhâr, usual word for 'river,' RV 'river'); 20^{17} 'the floods, the brooks of honey and butter' (nâhâr, RV 'the flowing streams'); 28^{11} 'he bindeth the floods from overflowing' (nâhâr, RV 'the streams that they trickle not,' RVm 'Heb. from weeping,' the allusion is to the use of lime or clay to prevent water percolating into the mine—Davidson); Ps 98^{8} (nâhâr); Job 28^{4} 'the flood breaketh out from the inhabitant' (nahal, usual word for 'brook,' here understood of the miner's 'shaft,' RV 'he breaketh open a shaft away from where men sojourn'); Ps 74^{15} 'Thou didst cleave the fountain and the flood' (nahal, in ref. to the stream from the rock in the wilderness); Is 44^{3} 'I will pour water upon him that is thirsty, and floods upon the dry ground' (nôzĕlîm, ptcp. of nâzal, to flow, RV 'streams'). In Apocr., 2 Es 16^{60} (flumen, RV 'river'), Ad. Est 11^{10} 'a great flood' (ποταμὸς μέγας, distinguished from μικρὰ πηγή, 'a little fountain'; RV 'river'); Sir 21^{13} 39^{22} (κατακλυσμός). This meaning is found in Shaks., but more rarely: Much Ado, I. i. 318—

> 'What need the bridge much broader than the flood?'

2. A special river: (a) The Euphrates, Jos 24^{2} 'Your fathers dwelt on the other side of the flood in old time' (בְּעֵבֶר הַנָּהָר, RV 'beyond the River'); so 24^{3} (מֵעֵבֶר 'from,' etc.), 24$^{14, 15}$. In Apocr., 2 Es 13^{44} 'the most High . . . held still the flood, till they were passed over' (statuit venas fluminis, RV 'stayed the springs of the River'); 1 Mac 7^{8} 'Bacchides . . . who ruled beyond the flood' (ἐν τῷ πέραν τοῦ ποταμοῦ, RV 'in the country beyond the river'). Cf. Rev 9^{14} Wyc. 'Vnbynde foure aungels, that ben bounde in the great flood Eufrates'; Milton, PL i. 419—

> 'With these came they who from the bordering flood
> Of old Euphrates to the brook that parts
> Egypt from Syrian ground, had general names
> Of Baälim and Ashtaroth.'

(b) The Nile: Ps 78^{44} (נוֹזְלֵיהֶם, RV 'their streams'); Am 8^{8} bis 9^{5} bis; the Heb. is yĕ'ôr, the word for the Nile, the River, as RV; in 8^{8b} and 9^{5b} Mizraim 'of Egypt' is added, but that is quite exceptional. Sometimes RV translates boldly by 'Nile,' Is 19$^{7\ ter.\ 8}$ (AV 'brook'), 23$^{3.\ 10}$ (AV 'river'), Jer 46$^{7.\ 8}$ (AV 'flood'), Zec 10^{11} (AV 'river'). Cf. Ac 7^{21} Wyc. 'whanne he was put out in the flood, the daughter of Farao took hym up.' (c) The Jordan: Ps 66^{6} 'they went through the flood on foot' (nâhâr, RV 'river'). Cf. Pr. Bk. 1549, 'by the Baptism of thy well-beloved Son Jesus Christ, thou didst sanctify the flood Jordan, and all other waters, to this mystical washing away of sin' (so 1552, 1559, and Scot. Liturgy, 1604; but in 1662 changed to 'the river Jordan').

3. An overflow of water, a torrent: Job 22^{16} 'whose foundation was overthrown with a flood' (lit., as Dav., 'was poured away and became a flood,' RV 'was poured out as a stream,' Heb. nâhâr); Ps 32^{6} 'in the floods of great waters' (לְשֵׁטֶף מַיִם רַבִּים, RV 'when the great waters overflow'); 69^{2} (שִׁבֹּלֶת shibbôleth, the word which baffled the Ephraimites to pronounce, see SHIBBOLETH); 69^{15} 'waterflood' (shibbôleth mayîm, 1611 'water flood'); 90^{5} 'Thou carriest them away as with a flood' (זְרַמְתָּם, lit., as Cheyne, 'thou stormest upon them'); Is 28^{2} 'a flood of mighty waters overflowing' (zerem, properly a flood of rain, a downpour; RV 'tempest'); Jer 47^{2} 'an overflowing flood' (nahal, RV 'stream,' Cheyne 'torrent,' who says, 'It is in autumn-time that the torrents of Palestine become dangerous, and water-courses, dry or almost dry in summer, become filled with a furiously rushing stream'); Dn 9^{26} 11^{22}, Nah 1^{8} (shêteph). In Apocr., Wis 5^{22} 'the floods shall cruelly drown them' (ποταμός, RV 'the rivers shall sternly overwhelm them'). In NT, Mt 7$^{25.\ 27}$ (ποταμοί), Lk 6^{48} (πλήμμυρα, fr. root of πίμπλημι, to fill); Rev 12$^{15.\ 16}$ (ποταμός, RV 'river'); and 12^{15} 'that he might cause her to be carried away of the flood' (ποταμοφόρητον, RV 'carried away by the stream').

4. Noah's flood is always designated in Heb. mabbûl, in LXX κατακλυσμός, and in Vulg. diluvium (whence Eng. 'deluge'). The reff. in OT are Gn 6^{17} 7$^{6.\ 7.\ 10.\ 17}$ 9^{11} bis.$^{15.\ 28}$ 10$^{1.\ 32}$ 11^{10}, Ps 29^{10}; in Apocr., 2 Es 3$^{9.\ 10}$, Wis 10^{4}, Sir 40^{10} * 44$^{17.\ 18}$; and in NT, Mt 24$^{38.\ 39}$, Lk 17^{27}, 2 P 2^{5}. See preceding article.

The only doubtful ref. is Ps 29^{10} 'The LORD sitteth upon the flood' (לַמַּבּוּל יָשָׁב), RV 'sat as king at the Flood'). The majority of recent commentators take it with RV to be a ref. to Noah's Flood. 'The storm,' says Kirkpatrick, 'reminds the poet of the great typical example of judgment and mercy, in which Jehovah's judicial severity was exhibited.' The chief argument in favour is the use of the word (observe that it has the article 'the Flood'). Against is the unexpectedness of the reference to the Flood, and the prep. (לְ) 'at,' 'to,' or 'on.' Kirkpatrick says of the prep.: 'we may render, Sat for the Flood; with His seat on His throne in order to execute that memorable judgment (Ps 97).' The tr^{n} of AV (which is that of Geneva Bible) makes the ref. to be to a flood of water in the storm itself. This is clear from the note in the Gen. Bible. Johnson (Speaker's Com.) agrees. But the storm is a storm of wind, not of water; of rain there is no mention in the psalm, although it may be argued that it is presupposed. Cheyne carries the psalmist's mind beyond the Noachic Flood to the original meaning of the word. That is 'destruction'; 'a wasting flood' being only secondary. He therefore boldly ignores the Flood and any ref. to water, and tr. 'At the storm Jehovah sat enthroned' (Book of Psalms, p. 81, and Crit. Note on p. 380).†

5. It is only in poetic parallelism that 'flood' is used of the sea: Ps 24^{2}—

> 'He hath founded it [the earth] upon the seas,
> And established it upon the floods';

Ps 93$^{3\ ter}$, Jon 2^{3} (all nâhâr); and Ex 15^{8} (nôzĕlîm, of the waters of the Red Sea). In Apocr., 2 Es 4$^{15.\ 17.\ 19.\ 21}$ (fluctus, RV 'waves').

* So plainly in AV, since the marg. ref. is to Gn 7^{11}; and the Gr. is κατακλυσμός: but RV omits the ref., and prints 'flood,' not 'Flood'; and the recently discovered Heb. text gives 'river' (Cowley and Neubauer).

† This cancels the 'Parchment' tr^{n} 'Jehovah has seated himself above the flood,' and its note, 'either the deluge or the heavenly ocean already referred to in v.^{3}.'

6. Finally, the word is thrice used metaphorically: 2 S 22^5=Ps 18^4 'the floods of ungodly men made me afraid' (נַחֲלֵי בְלִיָּעַל, lit. 'streams of Belial'; RV 'floods of ungodliness'; see Selbie, Cheyne, and Hommel in Expos. Times, viii. [1897] 360, 423, 472; and Baudissin, Cheyne, Jensen, ib. ix. 40, 91, 283, 332). Cf. Shaks. Timon of Athens, I. i. 42—

'You see this conference, this great flood of visitors.'

Also 1 Mac 6^{11} 'a flood of misery' (ποταμός, RV simply 'a flood'). Cf. Milton, On Time, 13—

'And joy shall overtake us as a flood.'

FLOOR.—The word 'floor' is now most familiar as the part we tread on in a room; but it once as readily suggested the platform on which corn was threshed. Hence in AV (after earlier VSS) 'floor' stands as the tr^{n} of גֹּרֶן gôren, fourteen times, which elsewhere is mostly tr^{d} 'threshing-floor.'

The Heb. word occurs altogether 36 times: it is tr^{d} 'threshing-floor' (1611 two sep. words) 19 times (Gn 50^{10}, Nu 15^{20} $18^{27.30}$, Ru 3^{2}, 1 S 23^{1}, 2 S 6^{6} $24^{18.21.24}$, 1 Ch 13^{9} $21^{15.18.21.22.23}$, 2 Ch 3^{1}, Jer 51^{33}), and 'floor' 11 times (Gn 50^{11}, Dt 15^{14}, Jg 6^{37}, Ru $3^{3.6.14}$, Is 21^{10}, Hos 9^{2} 13^{3}, Jl 2^{24}, Mic 4^{12}). RV gives 'threshing-floor' everywhere except Gn 50^{11}, Is 21^{10}, and Jl 2^{24}, retaining 'floor' in these places. Elsewhere gôren is tr^{d} 'barn-floor' 2 K 6^{27} (1611 'barn floor'; RV 'threshing-floor'), 'threshingplace' 2 S 24^{16} (1611 'threshing place,' RV 'threshing-floor'); 'a void place' 1 K 22^{10}=2 Ch 18^{9} (RV 'an open place'), 'barn' Job 39^{12} (RV 'threshing-floor'), 'corn' Dt 16^{13} ('after that thou hast gathered in thy corn and thy wine,' RV 'after that thou hast gathered in from thy threshing-floor and from thy wine-press'), and in Hos 9^{1} [all] the fuller phrase kolgornôth dâgân is tr^{d} 'cornfloor' (1611 'corn floor').

The only other OT word is אִדָּר 'iddar, which occurs only Dn 2^{35} and is tr^{d} 'threshing floor' (אִדְּרִיזֵנִים, EV 'summer threshing-floors'). In NT ἅλων occurs only Mt 3^{12}, Lk 3^{17} and is tr^{d} 'floor,' RV 'threshing-floor.' In Apocr. area is tr^{d} 'floor' 2 Es 4^{32} (so RV), $4^{35.39}$ (RV 'threshing-floor'). See AGRICULTURE.

FLOTE.—The timber for the temple, being cut in Lebanon, was conveyed by sea to Joppa in flotes: 1 K 5^{9} (רְבָרוֹת, RV 'rafts'), 2 Ch 2^{16} (רַפְסֹדוֹת). The logs themselves would form the raft; hence in 1 Es 5^{55} it is said that for the building of the second temple the timber was brought to the haven of Joppa, not 'by rafts' (AV, as if σχεδίαις), but 'in rafts' (RV, cf. LXX σχεδίας). In 1 K 5^{9} LXX reads σχεδίας, in 2 Ch 2^{16} σχεδίαις.

AV 1611 spells 'flotes' at each occurrence. Modern editions give 'flotes' in 2 Ch 2^{16}* and 1 Es 5^{55}, but 'floats' 1 K 5^{9}. Scrivener restores 'flotes,' and is followed in Camb. Bible for Schools and Colleges.

FLOUR.—See FOOD.

FLOURISH.—Two stages may be marked in the use of the verb to flourish: 1. To flower, blossom, said (a) literally or (b) metaphorically, as (a) Lyte (1578), Dodoens, II. xx. 117, 'It beginneth to floure at the toppe of the stalke, and so goeth florishing downewarde.' So in AV Ec 12^{5} 'the almond tree shall flourish' (יָנִאץ, RV 'shall blossom'); Ca 6^{11} 7^{12} of the vine (פָּרַח, RV 'bud'; cf. Chaucer, Parsonnes Tale, § 43, Student's ed. 697, 'To smelle the sote savour of the vyne whanne it florissheth'); Is 17^{11} 'in the morning shalt thou make thy seed to flourish' (תַּפְרִיחִי, RV 'thou makest thy seed to blossom'); Ps 90^{6} of the grass (יָצִיץ, Del., Cheyne 'blossoms'). (b) Metaphorically of persons or things: Ps 103^{15} 'As for man, his days are as grass: as a flower of the field so he flourisheth' (כָּצִיץ הַשָּׂדֶה כֵּן יָצִיץ, lit. 'as the flower of the field so he flowereth': so Ps 72^{16} 92^{7} 132^{18}, all ẓûẓ [in Hiph.], which means to bring forth flowers, and is tr^{d} 'blossom' in Is 27^{6} as well as [in Qal] Ezk 7^{10}); Sir 39^{14} 'flourish as a lily' (ἀνθήσατε ἄνθος; RV 'put forth flowers'). 2. To shoot up quickly, or grow vigorously, again said literally of plants and metaphorically of persons and things. Thus Ezk 17^{24} in the Wyclifite version of 1388 is 'Y made the drie tree to brynge forth boowis,' but the earlier version has 'Y made the drye tree for to florisshe,' which is retained in AV. In this sense are all the remaining instances of the word, the Heb. being some part of פָּרַח, or (in Ps 92^{14}) the adj. רַעֲנָן (Aram. רְעַנָּן Dn 4^{4}); the Greek ἀναθάλλειν, Sir 1^{18} 11^{22} 46^{12} 49^{10}, Ph 4^{10}; and the Lat. florēre, 2 Es 6^{28}.

FLOWERS.—Visitors to Palestine unite in their enthusiasm over the flowers. Everywhere they brighten the landscape with their brilliant colours, white, yellow, blue, violet, purple, maroon, crimson, scarlet, brown, and even black. Fields, many acres in extent, are aglow with anemones, ranunculi, poppies, chorisporas, silenes, clovers, milk vetches, chamomiles, groundsels, crocuses, colchicums, irises, ixiolirions, gladioli, and tulips. The hedges are gay with their wealth of broom, roses, and brambles. The sandstone is clothed with pink and white rock-roses, and dainty little heaths. The hillsides are adorned with the lavish blossoms of the styrax, the redbud, the arbutus, and the myrtle. Even the bleak shingle of alpine Lebanon, 10,000 ft. above the sea, is covered with large patches of Vicia canescens, Lab., and V. gregaria, Boiss. et Held., with their beautiful racemes of blue and white flowers. The tableland of Moab is gorgeous with deep purple irises. Finally, the deserts have a rich and varied flora, numbering over 400 species, not found in other localities. Flowers are an emblem of beauty (Mt $6^{28f.}$), but at the same time of frailty and instability (Job 14^{2}, Ps 103^{15}, Is 28^{1} 40^{6}, Ja 1^{10} etc.). The coming of flowers is a sign of spring (Ca 2^{12}). 'The flower of her age' is the bloom of a maiden's youth (1 Co 7^{36}).

G. E. POST.

FLOWERS in Lv $15^{24.33}$ signifies the menstrual discharge (נִדָּה, RV 'impurity'). So Andrew, Brunswyke's Distyll-Waters, A iii. 'the same water . . . causeth women to have her flowers, named menstruum.' In the same sense Fr. fleurs; but both are now obsolete.

FLUE-NET.—In Hab 1^{15}m 'flue-net' is given as an alternative for 'drag' of the text (Heb. מִכְמֶרֶת). The form flu is found in French, and fluwe for a fishing-net in Dutch. The flue (together with the 'trammel or hooped net whatsoever') is forbidden to river fishermen in early laws. The word is still in occasional use, as Three in Norway (1882), vi. 44, 'Seven boats . . . were out with a huge flue net.' Coverdale has 'yarne' in this and the foll. verse, and is followed by the Geneva and Bishops' Bibles.

FLUTE.—See MUSIC.

FLUX.—Ac 28^{8} 'the father of Publius lay sick of a fever and of a bloody flux,' i.e. lit. a flow of blood (from fluxus, ptcp. of fluĕre, to flow, through Fr. flux; the spelling in 1611 is 'flixe' ['bloodyflixe'], a spelling derived from the Fr. pronunciation with ü—Bradley); Gr. δυσεντερία in TR, but edd. prefer the later form δυσεντέριον; RV 'dysentery.' The AV tr^{n} comes from Wyclif, who in ed. 1380 has 'Sothli it befel, the fadir of Puplius for to ligge trauelid with feueres and dissenterie, or flix,' thus using 'flix' without the adj., for it often stood alone in early Eng. as a synonym for dysentery. But the ed. of 1388 has 'blodi flux.' So in Mt 9^{20} Wyclif (1380) gives 'And loo! a womman that suffride the flix, or rennynge of blood (Gr. αἱμορροοῦσα) twelve yeer, cam to byhynde and touchide the hemme of his clothe,' but ed. 1388 'the blodi flux.' And so T. Fuller, Holy Warre (ed. 1640), p. 216, 'The siege was no sooner begun but the plague seised on the Christian armie: whereof thousands died; amongst others, Tristram, King Lewis his sonne: And he himself of a flux followed after.' But p. 94, 'King Almerick himself, wearied with whole volleys of miseries, ended his life of a bloudy flux.' See MEDICINE. J. HASTINGS.

* Why was flotes left in 2 Ch? Because less read, and reckoned of less consequence? So in the Heb. Bible some explain the presence of Esh-baal, 1 Ch 8^{33} 9^{39}, when the name was changed in 2 S into Ish-bosheth.

FLY.—In 1 S 14^{32} (reading וַיַּעַט with Ḳerê, for Kethîbh וַיַּעַשׂ) and 15^{19} (וַתָּעָט) AV gives (and RV retains) 'fly upon the spoil,' a more forcible rendering than that of the previous versions 'turn to' (the Bishops' have 'gate them to' in 14^{32}). In 1 S 25^{14} 'flew upon' (AV 'railed on') is used figuratively: עַיִט 'bird of prey' comes from the same root.

In Lv $11^{21.\ 23}$ occurs the curious combination 'flying creeping thing' (שֶׁרֶץ הָעוֹף). As Driver points out (art. CREEPING THINGS, see also Com. on Dt 14^{19} where the phrase is 'every creeping thing that flieth'), the Heb. word here used does not describe creeping but swarming creatures; so that the tr^{n} should be 'winged swarming things,' not as in RV 'winged creeping things,' the reference being to insects like the locust.

FLY, FLIES.—Two Hebrew words are translated fly:—1. זְבוּב zĕbhûbh, μυῖα, musca. This word is found only in two places (Ec 10^{1}, Is 7^{18}). It corresponds to the Arab. dhubâb, which is specially applied to house flies, but is also understood in the general sense of insects resembling them. It is used in Arab. as an emblem of weakness, 'he is more frail than the fly'; and of contemptibleness, 'he is more contemptible to me than the buzzing of the fly.' 'The refuge of the fly' is a proverb, applied to him who is protected by his ignobleness. 'The father of the fly' signifies a person with a stinking breath (cf. Ec 10^{1}). It is also said of such a person that he is 'more stinking in breath than the father of the fly.' From these qualities dhubâb has come to signify evil or mischief. An unlucky man is 'a fly man.' The same expression is also used to denote demoniacal possession, or insanity, or ignorance. More or fewer of these various significations in the Arab. may have obtained also in the Heb. word, which would account for the god of Ekron being called Baal-zebub (2 K 1^{2}), 'the god of flies.' See BAAL-ZEBUB.

2. עָרֹב 'ârôbh, κυνόμυια, omne genus muscarum, EV Ex 8^{21-31} swarms of flies, AV Ps 78^{45} 105^{31} divers sorts of flies, RV swarms of flies. In all three passages LXX gives κυνόμυια, dog-fly, a word the significance of which in Greek is not clear. The Rabbins interpret 'ârôbh as referring to a mixture of noxious insects, as if from עָרַב 'ârab, to mix. Some have argued from Ex 8^{31} 'there remained not one,' that the fly referred to must be a definite species, which was sent as a plague, and totally destroyed at its close. But even if the expression 'not one' is to be pressed to its literal interpretation, it would not necessarily imply that the swarms were all of one kind. They might have been 'divers sorts.' The fact that the swarms of flies 'devoured' the Egyptians, has been supposed to imply that they were flies that bit them. But, apart from the fact that a biting fly could hardly be said to devour its victim, the true interpretation is to be sought in the comparison of the two members of the parallelism, 'flies which devoured them, and frogs which destroyed them.' Both are strong expressions of the ruinous nature of the plague, and in both the reference is probably more to the corruption of their food and drink than to the destruction of their bodies. As it is impossible to determine whether a particular insect, or a mixture of insects, is intended, we may accept swarms of flies as conveying the essential meaning in the passages in question. See PLAGUE.

A resident in the cooler parts of Europe and America can hardly realize the number and persistence of the flies which swarm in Egypt and Syria. They not only defile food, but convey contagion, particularly that of ophthalmia, diphtheria, and, one kind of fly, that of malignant pustule. They also deposit their eggs in wounds and sores, and sometimes in the nose and ears of filthy people, and their larvæ hatch out, and fill these cavities, to the great distress and injury of the unfortunate patient.

G. E. POST.

FODDER occurs only once in AV (Job 6^{5} as tr^{n} of בָּלִיל, strictly mixed food, farrago [see Oxf. Heb. Lex.]). RV not only retains the term here, but introduces it in Jg 19^{21}, where the denom. vb. בָּלַל ('give fodder,' AV 'give provender') occurs. The same Heb. word בָּלִיל occurs in Job 24^{6}, but here RV has 'provender' (AV 'corn'), and in Is 30^{24} (AV and RV 'provender'). This last term (see PROVENDER) is more frequently the tr^{n} of מִסְפּוֹא Gn $24^{25.\ 32}$ 42^{27} 43^{24}, Jg 19^{19}. See further under AGRICULTURE.

FOLD.—(A) IN OT.—1. גְּדֵרָה (only in plur.), properly the walls or fences erected to shelter and defend the flock, Nu $32^{16.\ 34.\ 36}$, Zeph 2^{6}. 2. דֹּבֶר Is 5^{17} Mic 2^{12} prob. means 'pasture' (so RV), but both the text and the meaning of this passage are doubtful (see Nowack, ad loc.). 3. מִכְלָה, a transcriptional error for מִכְלָא (from כָּלָא 'shut up') in Hab 3^{17}. The correct form appears in Ps 50^{9} 78^{70}. 4. נָוֶה 'farm' or 'homestead' (2 S 7^{8}), including both farm-house and lands; often used in connexion with sheep and shepherds (Is 65^{10}, Jer 33^{12}), and also poetical for 'habitation,' whether of men or flocks (Is 23^{20}, Jer 31^{23} of Jerus.; Pr 3^{33} of the righteous; Ex 15^{13}, 2 S 15^{25} of J″). 5. [נְאֵה] only in pl. const. נְאוֹת 'pastures' (Jl 2^{22}, Ps 65^{12}, Jer 23^{10}, Am 1^{2}, where see Driver's note). 6. עֶפְתַּיִם, which in AV of Ps 68^{13} is tr^{d} 'pots,' prob. means 'sheepfolds' (so RV), like 7. מִשְׁפְּתַיִם Gn 49^{14} (of Issachar 'couching between the sheepfolds' [RV], 'between two burdens' [AV]), Jg 5^{16} (of Reuben; see Moore's note). 8. In Is 13^{20} where AV has 'neither shall the shepherds make their fold there,' it is a verb that is used, תַּרְבִּיץ, which RV accurately tr. 'make their flocks to lie down.' 9. In 2 Ch 32^{28} עֲדָרִים לָאֲוֻרוֹת cannot mean as in RV 'flocks in folds'; the AV 'cotes for flocks' is prob. correct, although this involves a transposition and the reading אוֻרוֹת לְעֲדָרִים (see Kittel in SBOT, ad loc.).

(B) IN NT.—1. αὐλή, the enclosed space or court within which the sheep were penned, Jn $10^{1.\ 16}$. 2. ποιμνή. In Jn 10^{16} AV has 'there shall be one fold,' a mistranslation which suggests an erroneous doctrine of the Church. The meaning is correctly given by RV 'they shall become one flock' (cf. Mt 26^{31}, Lk 2^{8}, 1 Co 9^{7}).

Folds were used mainly as a protection at night from wild beasts (cf. Gn 31^{39}, 1 S 17^{34}). They consisted of an enclosure surrounded by a stone wall (Nu 32^{16}), by preference near a well (Ex $2^{16ff.}$, Ps 23^{2}), and had often the extra protection of a tower (Gn 35^{21} (?), 2 Ch 26^{10}, Mic 4^{8}). The flocks were carefully counted as they passed in and out (Jer 33^{13}). Sometimes a number of flocks might be kept in one fold under the charge of a 'porter' (θυρωρός), who opened to each shepherd as he came to reclaim his flock (Jn 10^{3}). See further under SHEEP, SHEPHERD. J. A. SELBIE.

FOLDEN.—This earlier ptcp. of the verb to fold is found in Nah 1[10] 'while they be folden together as thorns' (RV 'like tangled [Amer. RV entangled] thorns'). The meaning is that the thorns are intertwined so as to form an impenetrable hedge. The tr[n] comes from the Geneva Bible, 'For he shall come as unto thornes folden one in another,' with the marginal gloss, 'Thogh the Assyrians thinke them selves like thornes that pricke on all sides, yet the Lord wil set fyre on them.' For this sense of the verb to fold cf. Mt 27[29] Wyc. 'thei foldynge a crowne of thornis,' and Ca 7[5] Cov. 'The hayre of thy heade is like the kynges purple folden up in plates.' The Heb. (סָבְכִים) is used in Job 8[17] of roots entwined round a heap of stones, EV 'His roots are wrapped about the heap.'

J. HASTINGS.

FOLK was at one time used as equivalent to 'nation' (Ger. Volk). Thus Ac 10[35] Wye. 'in eche folk he that dredith God and worchith rightwisnesse is accepte to hym'; Ps 33[12] Cov. 'Blessed are the people that holde the LORDE for their God, and blessed are the folke whom he hath chosen to be his heritage' (a tr[n] preferred by 'Four Friends': see Psalms Chron. Arranged, 1891, p. 387); 2 Es 5[26] Cov. 'Amonge all ye multitudes of folkes thou hast gotten the one people.' So in AV Jer 51[58] 'the people shall labour in vain, and the folk in the fire' (לְאֻמִּים; RV 'the nations for the fire'). So in Pr 30[26] the meaning is 'nation,' though the application is to the 'conies,' after Cov. 'the conyes are but a feeble folk' (Heb. עַם). But in Gn 33[15] (עַם) the word is used of a chieftain's followers or retainers, a special sense which is now only Scottish.* Cf. G. Pettie (1581), Tr[n] of Guazzo's Civ. Conv. iii. 170, 'The maister of the house . . . ought . . . to shewe himselfe more seuere towards his owne folke, then towards others.' In NT the word is thrice used for people or persons indefinitely (Mk 6[5], Jn 5[3], Ac 5[16]), and there is no corresponding Greek word. In the last passage a plural form is employed ('sicke folkes' in 1611), which is now used only of relatives, esp. in the phrase 'young folks,' the word 'folk' being itself collective. See KINSFOLK.

J. HASTINGS.

FOLLOW, FOLLOWER.—In the OT 'follow' is sometimes the tr[n] of the adv. אַחַר aḥar (often in plur. constr. אַחֲרֵי), after, with some verb meaning to go or walk, thrice with הָיָה to be (Ex 23[2], 2 S 2[10], 1 K 16[21]). This verb is often omitted, however, a pregnant Heb. idiom being the result, as 1 S 13[7] 'all the people followed him trembling' (חָרְדוּ אַחֲרָיו), literally, as AVm 'trembled after him'); Am 7[15] 'the Lord took me as I followed the flock' (מֵאַחֲרֵי הַצֹּאן, lit. as AVm 'from behind the flock,' RV 'from following'). Still more idiomatically, the verb 'to fill' is used with this adv., and then the Eng. is 'follow fully' or 'wholly,' as Dt 1[36] 'he hath wholly followed the LORD' (מִלֵּא אַחֲרֵי יהוה, lit. 'he hath filled up after the LORD,' or as AVm 'fulfilled [to go] after').

Occasionally, the meaning is to follow so as to overtake, to pursue, when the Heb. is רָדַף, as Ps 38[20] 'I follow the thing that good is.' Then the Eng. is most often 'follow after,' as Gn 44[4] 'Up, follow after the men; and when thou dost overtake them, say unto them.' The force of these passages is probably lost to the modern Eng. reader. Thus in Is 5[11] 'Woe unto them that rise up early in the morning, that they may follow strong drink,' though RV retains 'follow,' the word conveys the sense of determined pursuit (LXX διώκειν, Vulg. sectari, Luther sich befleissigen). Cf. Shaks. Coriol. IV. v. 104—

> 'Since I have ever followed thee with hate.'

In Ps 23[6] 'Surely goodness and mercy shall follow me all the days of my life,' the Heb. is the same (יִרְדְּפוּנִי), but the Eng. is probably rather 'accompany me,' as 1 Co 10[13] Tind. 'There hath none other temptacion taken you, but soche as foloweth the nature of men.'

To the Heb. text יִרְדְּפוּ, i.e. 'pursue' of Jg 3[28] (EV 'Follow after me'), Moore prefers יְרַד, i.e. 'follow down,' after LXX Κατάβητε ὀπίσω μου, and the Heb. of the next clause.

Another Heb. phrase tr[d] 'follow' is lit. 'at the feet of,' as Jg 8[5] 'the people that follow me' (בְּרַגְלָי, lit. 'at my feet'); so Ex 11[8], 1 S 25[27], 1 K 20[10], 2 K 3[9]. Finally, the Heb. verb דָּבַק to cleave to is occasionally translated 'follow close after,' Jer 42[16], or 'f. hard after,' Ps 63[8] (and in Hiph. 1 S 14[22], 2 S 1[6], 1 Ch 10[2]); or 'f. hard upon,' 1 S 31[2] (Hiph.) 'And the Philistines followed hard upon Saul and upon his sons.' Cf. Job 13[25] Cov. 'Wilt thou be so cruell and extreme unto a flyenge leaf, and folowe upon drye stubble?' and Bingham (1623), Xenophon, 115, 'They dare and will be readie to follow upon us if we retire.' RV adds Jg 20[42] 'the battle followed hard after them' (AV 'overtook them').

In 2 Mac 4[48] προαγορεύω in its solitary occurrence in bibl. Greek is tr[d] in AV 'followed the matter' (οἱ προηγορήσαντες, RV 'they that were spokesmen'). The word is common enough in class. Greek in the sense here intended, viz. to speak for, or claim a right, in public. The Eng. of AV means to pursue the matter to its accomplishment, to prosecute the affair; for which cf. Hum. Town (1693), i. 30, 'giving his lawyer double Fees, that his Cause may be well followed'; and Shaks. 2 Henry IV. I. i. 21—

> 'O! such a day,
> So fought, so followed, and so fairly won,
> Came not till now to dignify the times,
> Since Cæsar's fortunes.'

No other obsolete or unusual expression seems to be used in the Apocr. which is not represented in OT or NT. But the variety of words tr[d] in AV 'follow' is instructive. The foll. are found: ἀκολουθέω, Jth 15[13], Sir 23[28] (RV omits), 2 Mac 4[17] 8[36]; ἐξακολουθέω, Sir 5[2], Three 18; ἐπακολουθέω, Ad. Est 15[4], Sir 46[6]; παρακολουθέω, Jth 11[6]; παρακολουθέω, 2 Mac 8[11]; διώκω, Sir 11[10] (RV 'pursue') 27[8] 29[19] (Gr. διώκων ἐργολαβείας, AV 'he that undertaketh and followeth other men's business for gain,' RV 'undertaketh contracts for work') 31[5] 34[2]; καταδιώκω, Sir 27[17] (RV 'pursue'); πορεύομαι, To 4[5]; πορεύομαι ὀπίσω, Sir 46[10], RV 'walk after'; ἐπιπορεύομαι, 2 Mac 2[23] (Gr. τὸ δὲ ἐπιπορεύεσθαι τοῖς ὑπογραμμοῖς τῆς ἐπιτομῆς ἀτονοῦντες, AV 'labouring to follow the rules of an abridgement,' RV 'and again having no strength [marg. 'making no effort'] to fill in [marg. 'enlarge on'] the outlines of our abridgement'); ἐξέρχομαι ὀπίσω, 1 Mac 2[27] (RV 'come forth after'); γίνομαι πρός, 2 Mac 11[29]; ζηλόω, Sir 51[18] (AV 'earnestly I followed,' RV 'I was zealous for'), 2 Mac 4[16] (AV 'followed so earnestly,' RV 'earnestly followed'); σύνειμι, 2 Mac 9[4] (RV 'accompany'). Besides those verbs there are the expressions τὴν ὑπογεγραμμένην ἐπιστολήν, 1 Es 2[16], AV 'these letters following,' RV 'the letter following'; τὰ ὑπογεγραμμένα, 'as followeth'; τῇ ἑχομένῃ, 'on the day following'; and in 2 Es sequor 6[7. 9] 11[13], subsequor 7[35].

In NT the most frequent word is the simple verb ἀκολουθέω, which is used 77 times in the Gospels of following Jesus, and only once otherwise (Mk 14[13]) of following the man with the pitcher of water. We find also 5 of its compounds tr[d] either 'follow' or 'follow after': (1) ἐξακολουθέω, to follow out or to the end, 2 P 1[16] 2[2. 15]; (2) ἐπακολουθέω, to follow close upon, Mk 16[20], 1 Ti 5[10] (EV 'diligently followed'), 5[24] ('Some men's sins are open beforehand, going before to judgment; and some men they follow after,' i.e. may be undetected by man, but follow them hard to God's judgment-seat), 1 P 2[21]; (3) κατακολουθέω, to follow behind, used only of women in NT, Lk 23[55], Ac 16[17]; (4) παρακολουθέω, to follow close, to follow up, tr[d] 'follow' in AV only in 'Mk' 16[17] 'these signs shall follow them that

* Cf. Kethe's version of Ps 100[3] (as it first appeared in Daye's Psalter, 1560–61)—

> 'The Lord ye know is God in dede > with out our aide, he did us make:
> We are his folck, he doth us fede, > and for his shepe, he doth us take.'

Modern editors have altered 'folck,' which represents 'people' in the prose versions, into 'flock,' which represents nothing.

believe,' but the same vb. is used in Lk 1^3 of following up the details of a narrative (AV 'having had understanding,' RV 'having traced the course'), also in 1 Ti 4^6 of closely following Paul's teaching, so as to teach alike (AV 'good doctrine whereunto thou hast attained,' RV 'which thou hast followed until now), and in 2 Ti 3^{10} so as to practise it (AV 'hast fully known my doctrine,' RV 'didst follow my teaching'); (5) συνακολουθέω, to follow by one's side, to accompany a leader, Mk 5^{37} 14^{51}, Lk 23^{49}.

As rādhaph in OT is almost invariably tr^{d} by διώκω in LXX, so διώκω itself is sometimes tr^{d} in NT by 'follow,' He 12^{14} 'Follow peace with all men,' 1 Th 5^{15} 'f. that which is good,' 2 Ti 2^{22} 'f. righteousness,' and Lk 17^{23}; or 'follow after,' Ro $9^{30.\ 31}$ 14^{19}, 1 Co 14^{1}, Ph 3^{12}, 1 Ti 6^{11}. RV has 'follow after' throughout, except Ph 3^{12} 'press on.' The compound καταδιώκω is used in Mk 1^{36}, its only occurrence, and tr^{d} in EV 'followed after'; but, as Gould says, that tr^{n} is inadequate, since the κατά gives the idea of hard, persistent search, as in our phrase 'to hunt down,' hence rather 'pursued him closely.' In all those passages, however, the Eng. 'follow,' even with the addition of 'after,' is now inadequate.

In the tr^{n} of some of the compounds of ἀκολουθέω the sense of 'follow' is very nearly 'imitate.' This is unmistakably the meaning where the Gr. is μιμεῖσθαι, 2 Th $3^{7.\ 9}$, He 13^{7}, 3 Jn ^{11}. Thus in He 13^{7} 'whose faith follow.' RV has always 'imitate.' Cf. T. Adams (1615), Spirit. Navig. 41, 'Glasse among stones is as a foole amongst men; for it followes precious stones in colour, not in virtue.' So μιμητής in all its occurrences (1 Co 4^{16} 11^{1}, Eph 5^{1}, 1 Th 1^{6} 2^{14}, He 6^{12}) is rendered by 'follower' in AV, by 'imitator' in RV; and συνμιμητής, Ph 3^{17}, is in AV 'followers together,' in RV 'imitators together.' Cf. Burke (1781), Corresp. ii. 437, 'We, who ought to have taken the lead in so noble a work, are but ill followers even of the examples which are set to us.'

In 1 P 3^{13} the edd. prefer ζηλωταί after the best MSS to μιμηταί of TR, hence 'zealous' in RV for AV 'followers.'

FOLLY.—See FOOL.

FOOD.—I. The material eaten for the sustenance of the body is often mentioned in the Bible, in AV most commonly as bread, but often as meat, occasionally as food or victuals. מַאֲכָל ma'ăkhāl, or victual in general, is used about 29 times, always in its literal sense; לֶחֶם leḥem, literally bread, is used for food in general about 230 times, and is often used figuratively (see BREAD). אֹכֶל 'ōkhel is used 42 times for food or victuals in the literal sense, and the cognate 'okhlah is used by Ezekiel for fuel, in the sense of food for the fire. In the NT βρῶμα is the word used 17 times, and τροφή 16 times. βρῶσις is used 4 times by St. John and 5 times in the Epistles, often in a metaphorical sense. The commonest metaphorical uses are (1) that which refreshes the soul, doing the will of God, Jn 4^{32}; and in a cognate sense Christ our Saviour is the food of the soul, Jn 6^{55}; (2) advanced doctrinal teaching, 1 Co 3^{2}, He 5^{14}; (3) mere ceremonial observances, He 9^{10} 13^{9} (for other uses see BREAD).

II. FOOD-STUFFS.—According to Gn 1^{29} the original food of mankind consisted of fruits and seeds which the earth produced naturally. In this respect man resembled those of the higher mammals which are most nearly allied to him in structure, which are for the most part herbivorous and frugivorous. After the primary dispersion the spoils of the chase were added to the primitive dietary even from the earliest times, for the broken bones of wild animals and the shells of molluscs which had served as food are among the earliest traces of primeval man as yet discovered. There were mighty hunters even before Nimrod (Gn 6^{11} 10^{9}), and implements of the chase were among the first of man's inventions.

In process of time, as agricultural and pastoral industries developed, the produce of the tilled field and of the herd and flock supplied men with additional food-stuffs (Gn $4^{2.\ 3.\ 4.\ 20}$). The expression of the divine sanction for these additions, recorded in Gn 9^{3}, seems to have for its special object the injunction of the taboo concerning the eating of blood.

A. The inhabitants of the Bible lands lived chiefly on vegetable food. At the present day, bread, olives and oil, butter, milk, and cheese, fruit and vegetables, with meat on special occasions, or in particularly wealthy households, make up the dietary of most of their descendants in the East (Thomson, i. 98). The staff of life was, and is, bread made of cereal grains, especially wheat, millet, dhûrah, and barley, to which is now added rice, unknown in Bible times (see BREAD).

(a) Parched corn is 5 times mentioned as an article of diet, and is coupled with bread in Lv 23^{14}. One form of this, called קָלִי (ḳālī), was made of the common, nearly ripe wheat by heating the grain on an iron 'girdle' (Lane, i. 251; Robinson, ii. 50), or by binding the ears into wisps and roasting them over the fire (ib. iii. 393). In Arabic ḳali means anything done in the frying-pan, and the material of the parched corn may be meal, or polenta, or flour, or else the unground grain. It is a common food of labourers (Ru 2^{14}), and is sold ready prepared in Eastern towns as a convenient food for travellers. David brought 3 pecks of it to his brethren at Elah (1 S 17^{17}); and Abigail brought 5 pecks to David's men (1 S 25^{18}). In Lv 2^{14} 'green ears of corn dried by the fire' are mentioned, and in Lv 23^{14} these are coupled with parched corn. This form is made, according to Abu'l Walid, of finer garden wheat, which is called כַּרְמֶל karmel (2 K 4^{42}). In RV this is called 'bruised corn of the fresh ear,' alluding to its being beaten in a mortar (Pr 27^{22}). When this bruised corn was dried in the sun it was called רִפּוֹת rîphôth (Pr 27^{22}, 2 S 17^{19}), Grain of this kind was used to cover the well in which Ahimaaz and Jonathan were hidden at Bahurim (LXX ἀραφώθ, Vulg. siccans ptisana). The flour and parched corn of 2 S 17^{28} is called ἄλευρον καὶ ἄλφιτον, flour and polenta or meal in LXX (see Herod. vii. 119). Ἄλφιτον is used in Homer for barley-meal only, but Hippocrates uses this word for meal in general. For classic and Hebrew usage of polenta see Gruner, de oblatione Primitiarum, in Ugolini, vol. xvii. Royle has contended that ḳali is not corn, but some leguminous plant, as ḳalee is the Hindi for pulse; but R. Salomon in his Commentary on Aboda Zara says that there are two kinds—one of corn and one of cicer or lentiles. For mention of parched peas see Plautus, Bacch. iv. 5. 7, and Horace, de art. poet. 249. Robinson speaks of a variety of this parched corn which is first boiled, then bruised in a mill to take off the husk, then dried; this is named burgoul (ii. 394). According to Burckhardt, burgoul is wheat boiled with leaven and dried in the sun, cooked by being boiled with butter and oil. It is the common dish with all classes in Syria (Notes, i. 59).

(b) The leguminous plants, beans and lentiles, form an important part of the diet of the Western Asiatics. These were probably included in the זֵרוֹעִים zērô'îm, or pulse of Dn 1^{12}, which was despised but sufficient nourishment (v.$^{10.\ 15}$); in Theod. the word is σπέρματα (LXX ὄσπρια, RVm herbs), which meant any vegetable food; see the name of the herbseller in Aristoph. Lysist. 457. In 2 S 17^{28} the word pulse is not in the Hebrew.

Lentiles (עֲדָשִׁים 'ădāshîm, LXX φακός), the seeds of Ervum lens, which is still, as formerly (2 S 23[11]), cultivated in Palestine, and used as food (Thomson, i. 253; Burckhardt, Arabia, i. 65). There are two varieties, one pale red the other dark brown, and the pottage made by boiling either of these is savoury (Gn 25[34]), pleasant to the taste, and red, hence Esau called it 'the red, this red' (see incident in Diog. Laert. vii. 3). In Egypt lentiles were called ārŝāna (Pap. Anastasi, iv. 15), and in Assyria a'ssu. In Greece they were used as food by the poor (Aristoph. Plutus, 1004–5; and Pherecrates, ap. Athen. iv. p. 159). The Romans regarded lentiles as an Egyptian plant (Virg. Georg. i. 228; and Martial, Epig. xiii. 9), and they were sometimes used as a bread-stuff (Athenæus, Deipnos, iv. 158; see also Ezk 4[9]). An allied species of vicia is used as a camel-food by the Arabs, and called kersenna (Robinson, ii. 83). Lentile flour is sold in this country under the name 'revalenta.' Lentiles were brought by Barzillai to David in exile (2 S 17[28]). Pottage is sometimes made by boiling the lentiles with meat, more commonly a little suet is added to the water when boiling (Kitto).

Beans (פּוֹל pol, LXX κύαμος), the seeds of the common bean, Faba vulgaris, are also used in Palestine for food, especially by the poor. The bean is originally a native of Persia, and was sometimes used as a bread-stuff, as it is still in Savoy and other parts of Europe (Ezk 4[9]; Pliny, xviii. 12); it is sometimes eaten parched or roasted (Theocritus, Id. 7. 65; Robinson, iii. 87). Food of this kind was brought to David in exile (2 S 17[28], but LXX omits the parched pulse). More commonly, beans are boiled in oil with garlic (Shaw, Travels, i. 257) or in water, and made into pottage, with or without meat; sometimes they are eaten with butter and pepper. Robinson describes raw beans, soaked in water until they sprout, as part of the Lenten fare of the monks at Mount Sinai (i. 259). In Egypt beans were used, and have been found sometimes in mummy cases; they were called kat'a, ari, and sometimes pir, but the last was probably the bean of the Nelumbium lotus, and kat'a is tr. by Lieblein the Opuntia fruit. Birch and Eisenlohr tr. khep in the Harris papyrus as 'bean'; if so, they formed a part of the offering to Ptah; although Herodotus says that they were not eaten in Egypt, and were accounted impure (ii. 37). For similar prejudices against beans, see Porphyry, de Abstinentia, i. 26; Diog. Laert. viii. 19; Clement Alex. Strom. iii., and other authors. The high priest was forbidden to eat beans and lentiles on the day before the great Day of Atonement (Gemara, Joma, i. § 4), and the Flamen Dialis was forbidden to eat them also, as they were thought to dull the senses and cause disturbing dreams. For other superstitions concerning beans see Pliny, xviii. 12.

Husks (κεράτια) in the parable of the Prodigal Son (Lk 15[16]) are the dark purple horn-like pods of Ceratonia siliqua, the charrub tree of the Arabs and of the Talmud. This is a large handsome spreading tree common in Mediterranean countries, whose sweet, fleshy pods, the caroba beans of the Italians, are used as food by the poor (Robinson, ii. 250). In Greece and Italy they were used by the Stoics as a disciplinary food for youths (Persius, iii. 55; Juv. xi. 58), and Horace's reference, Ep. II. i. 123, is well known. In Palestine, where the tree is fairly common, the beans are used as cattle food (Shabbath, xxiv. § 2), and are occasionally mentioned in the Talmud (see Maimon. in Demai, ii. § 1, and Buxtorf, s.v.). Pliny refers to their use in feeding swine (xv. 24; see Columella, vii. 9), and in Italy they are thought to give a sweet taste to the animal's flesh. They are imported into this country, and are sometimes called 'locust-beans' or St. John's bread, from a mistaken notion that they were the ἀκρίδες of Mt 3[4]. Steeped in water they are used to make a pleasant, sweetish drink (see Pliny, xiii. 16 and xxiii. 8).

Fitches in Ezk 4[9] (kussemoth) were cereal grains, probably spelt (see BREAD). The same word in AV of Is 28[25-27] is in Heb. קֶצַח ḳeẓaḥ, LXX μελάνθιον, and signifies the black cummin, which is the seed of a ranunculaceous plant, Nigella sativa, a native of the Eastern Mediterranean countries. These seeds are beaten out of the pod-like follicles with a maṭṭeh or staff, and sprinkled on bread as a carminative, as we use caraway seeds (Pliny, xix. 7). They have a hot but not unpleasant taste. The plant is called ḳizaḥ by the Arabs and kuzatu in the Assyr. plant list, and in Vulg. is named git. For references to the use of these seeds, see Plautus, Rudens. v. 2, 39; Ausonius, 344, 8; Dioscorides, iii. 83; Pliny, xix. 8, xx. 17, etc.

(c) Of cucurbitaceous plants, melons, cucumbers, and gourds are mentioned in the Bible. The two former are fruits much relished in Egypt (Nu 11[5]).

Cucumbers (קִשֻּׁאִים kishshu'îm, LXX σίκυοι) are the fruit of Cucumis chate (the khata of the Arabs) and C. sativus, the common cucumber. Both species grow freely in Egypt (Nu 11[5]) and in Palestine, and, according to Kitto, are eaten by all classes to an extent that would scarcely be credible in this country; and Forskål says this is the commonest fruit in Egypt (Fl. Ægypt. 168). Finn speaks of Arabs eating cucumbers by the wayside for refreshment (Byeways in Palestine, 2). Robinson saw fields of them (iii. 344), and Thomson describes a garden of cucumbers with a booth for a watchman (Is 1[8]). As birds do not eat them, a scarecrow is useless in such a place (Bar 6[70]). In Assyr. they are called kissu and in Egyptian skheptu. Hippocrates speaks of them as eaten when green (de Vict. Ratione, ii.). The fruit of the chaté is longer and greener than the common cucumber. They are often eaten with vinegar or bread, or filled with mince-meat and spices. Tristram notes Arab children bringing to school as their dinner barley-bread and cucumber, which they ate rind and all. Forskål describes the method whereby a delicious drink is made from its juice.

Melons (אֲבַטִּחִים 'ăbaṭṭiḥîm, LXX πέπονες, Nu 11[5]), called by the Arabs baṭṭikh, are grown and used abundantly both in Egypt and Palestine. Both the water-melon (Citrullus vulgaris) and the flesh-melon (Cucumis melo) are cultivated, and both were probably included under this name. The Talmudists distinguish these, calling the former melapepon and the latter 'ăbaṭṭiḥîm (Maaseroth, i. § 4; Terumoth, viii. § 6; Chilaim, i. § 2), but in Aruch they are both known by their Heb. name. It is singular that in Coptic they are called by their Greek name.

Wild Gourd (פַּקֻּעַת), in plural pĕḳṳ̄îm, 1 K 6[18] 7[24], or paḳḳuôth, 2 K 4[39], tr. in former passage 'knops,' in the latter 'wild gourd,' is the fruit of the vine-like Citrullus colocynthis, which is common in the Jordan Valley. 'To human nature it is of so mortal bitterness that little indeed, and even the leaf, is a most vehement purgative. They say that it will leave a man half dead, and he may only recover his strength by eating flesh meat' (Doughty, i. 132). It is very rare in the hill-country of Ephraim, hence the son of the prophet who gathered it did not know the plant, but mistook it for the non-poisonous Cucumis prophetarum or globe cucumber common in Samaria. In an Arabic version of La 3[15] the text is rendered 'he hath sated me with colocynth,' so proverbial is its bitterness. Its elegant shape suggested its imitation in the ornamenting of the carved panelling of the temple and of the edge of the molten sea. In Assyr. it is pikkuti.

Jonah's Gourd (קִיקָיוֹן ḳîḳāyôn, LXX κολοκύνθη

was supposed from the likeness of the name to the Egyptian kiki (Herod. ii. 94) to be the Ricinus communis, the Palma Christi or castor-oil plant, a rapidly-growing herb which Pliny describes as becoming almost tree-like and capable of affording shade; even in our gardens its growth under favourable conditions is extraordinarily rapid. It is not quite clear what the kiki of the hieroglyphic texts was, as ricinus is in Coptic called jismis, which represents the ancient form kesmes or kesbet. Maimonides in Shabbath, ii. 1, says, however, the oil of kik is from a plant called by the Arabs kherua, which is ricinus. Tristram objects to this identification, as the ricinus is not a climbing plant, but the passage in Jon 4^6 does not describe it as such; he supposes the plant to have been the roof-gourd or Lagenaria vulgaris of which Pliny states that 'shooting upwards with the greatest rapidity it soon covers the arched roofs of houses and trellises' (xix. 24). The Vulg. renders it hedera or ivy, and this occasioned a controversy between Jerome and Augustine (see Hieron. in Jon 4^6 and Epist. 89). In early Christian art the plant is fancifully represented as a trailing melon-like plant covering a trellis-work, as on the sarcophagus in the Lateran from St. Peter's crypt (Parker's Photog. No. 2905; see also Bellorius, de Antiq. Lucernis, pl. iii. fig. 30, for a representation on a lamp). An undetermined species of climbing plant in Assyrian was called ḳaḳulla.

(d) Of alliaceous vegetables there are three mentioned as favourite foods of the Israelites in Egypt—onions, leeks, and garlic (Nu 11^5). All these are still much cultivated in Bible lands, and are in constant use among Orientals either raw or cooked.

Onions (בְּצָלִים bĕṣālîm, LXX κρόμμυον), the bulbs of Allium cepa. These are commonly eaten raw as a relish with bread, or boiled with meal (Robinson, ii. 211), or with lentiles (Terumoth, x. 1; Martial, Epig. iii. 376), or with beef (Apicius, 224). By the Assyrians the onion was called sursu, and by the Egyptians het (Copt. mejol). Herodotus tells that on the casing of the great pyramid was inscribed the value of the onions, garlic, and radishes eaten by the builders (ii. 25). The later Latin writers say that the onion was deified by the Egyptians (Juv. xv. 9; Plut. de Iside, 353). Pliny (xix. 6) says that garlic and onions are invoked by them when taking an oath; and Lucian (Jup. Trag. 42) says that the inhabitants of Pelusium were especially devoted to this cultus. There is, however, no native evidence for this. Among the Greeks onions were highly esteemed, and Homer speaks of Hecamede giving Patroclus an onion as a relish (Il. xi. 630); but Lucian describes them as food for the poor (Dial. Mer. 14. 2; Ep. Sat. 28).

Leeks (חָצִיר ḥāṣîr, LXX πράσα). The Heb. name used in Nu 11^5 literally means 'green herb,' and is rendered grass, hay, or green herb in 15 other passages; but as these are not human food, the translators have here followed the LXX, leeks being supposed to resemble grass in habit and colour. Leeks are eaten raw with bread, or sliced and put into vinegar, or boiled in pottage (Artemidorus, i. 67). Nero is said to have on stated days fed only on leeks and oil to improve his voice (Pliny, xix. 6). The Egyptian leek was particularly esteemed by the Romans. It was known as āga (Copt. ēgi), while the Assyrians called it ezallu usuratti. Ludolf translates ḥāzîr 'lettuce,' and Scheuchzer says that it probably means the Nelumbium lotus; but the balance of evidence is in favour of the common leek (Allium porrum).

Garlic (שׁוּם shûm, LXX σκόρδον). The cloves or bulbs of Allium sativum were so commonly used as flavouring that the Jews were reproached for their liking for these strongly-scented herbs. In Shabbat Jehuda they are said to smell foully of garlic; and Salomon Levi defends their taste in Theriac. Jud. i. § 20. In Egypt this plant was, and is still, much used (Herod. ii. 125; Wilkinson, i. 169; Lane, i. 257). Garlic was supposed to have the power of neutralizing the poison of the asp, and its use by penitent criminals was believed to purify them and absolve them of guilt. In Maaser sheni, v. § 8, garlic is called the 'Lord of tears.' At the present day it is much prized in the East as a remedy for many ailments and as an antidote for many poisons; Pliny enumerates 61 ways in which it was recommended medicinally, and Prudentius speaks of an altar to the garlic as being erected at Pelusium. The Egyptians called it ṣeṣen (Copt. ṣeṣen).

Bitter Herbs (מְרֹרִים mĕrōrîm, LXX πικρίδες, Vulg. lactucæ agrestes) are mentioned in Ex 12^8, Nu 9^{11}, and referred to in La 3^{15} (EV 'bitterness'). Bitter salads are often eaten with meat in Egypt, Syria, and elsewhere, the commonest plant used for this purpose being the lettuce (Lactuca sativa), the āfa of the Egyptians, called by the Hebrews ḥazereth (probably the Assyrian haserottu). According to the rabbinical writers (Pesachim, ii. § 6), there were five bitter herbs which might be eaten with the paschal lamb: the endive (Lactuca endivia) was the second of these, called by them ulshin (probably the Assyr. harussu); it also is common in Egypt. The third is called ṯamkah, described by Maimonides as a garden endive, the cichorium of Pliny (xix. 6), but said in Aruch to be a carduus, in the Gemara to be a gingidium, probably the Artedia squamata of botanists, a bitter aromatic umbelliferous plant. In Zematt David it is said to be a kind of helminthia which grows near date palms. The fourth, ḥarḥabina, was probably marrubium, or the horehound, but according to Lightfoot the beet; and the fifth, maror, is called in Aruch a pot-herb, possibly Inula Helenium or Elecampane, which was a plant highly esteemed as a stomachic in the Regimen sanitatis of Salernum. Maimonides says it was a bitter coriander, which, according to Varro, was often pounded, mixed with vinegar, and sprinkled over meat; but Lightfoot thinks that maror is horehound (Ministerium Templi, xiii. v. 2).

It is probable that the words of the ordinance of the passover were not meant to specify any particular bitter herb. According to Pesachim, ii. § 6, the herbs might be eaten fresh or dried, but must not be soaked, stewed, or boiled. Delitzsch gives marru and muraru as the names of bitter garden plants (Assyr. Handwörterbuch, 427).

For Mandrakes see MEDICINE.

(e) The fruits mentioned in the Bible are not very numerous.

Almonds (שָׁקֵד shâḳēd, LXX κάρυον) are mentioned in Gn 43^{11} as part of the present sent by Jacob to the Egyptian viceroy. They are said not to be common in Egypt, and the Egyptian name of the fruit is doubtful. Brugsch believes it to be the tree called net'; but the Coptic uses the Greek name, which means any nut. According to Heracleon, Epicharmos, and Philyllius, κάρυον is specially used for the almond, the bitter almond being distinguished in Greek as κάρυα πικρά or ἀμυγδάλα (see Athenæus, Deïpnos, ii. 38). The almond was supposed to prevent the intoxicating effect of wine, and was consequently taken at wine banquets (Pliny, xxiii. 8; Plutarch, Quæst. Conviv. vi. 4). This tree grows wild on Carmel and in Moab, and is cultivated extensively in Palestine. The Heb. name means 'hastener' in reference to its early blossoming, hence the paronomasia in Jer 1^{12}. The blossoms, which look white at a distance, are compared to grey hair in Ec 12^5, and their shape was the pattern from which the cups of the seven-branched candlestick were made (Ex 25^{33}). Aaron's rod was probably an almond branch (Nu 17^8); but there was an old tradition that it was of storax wood, and that its bearing almonds was miraculous (see the verses falsely attributed to Tertullian, contra Marcion. iv. 117). In Gn 30^{37} the almond tree is named לוּז lúz, the word from which the old name of Bethel was derived. Robinson notes a sweetmeat made of a mixture of almonds and dates as a present given to distinguished guests (i. 115). The ancient Medes mixed almonds with their bread.

Apples (תַּפּוּחַ tappûah, LXX μῆλον), mentioned in Ca $2^{3\text{-}5}$ 7^8 8^5, Pr 25^{11}, Jl 1^{12}, cannot be the fruit to which we give this name, as it does not grow freely in Palestine, of which country it is not a native (see H. C. Hart, PEFSt, 1885, 282). Thomson says that he has seen it growing luxuriantly (i. 172), but Tristram believes that he has mistaken the tree (N.H. of Bible, 334). Robertson Smith, on philological grounds, has defended the claims of the common apple (Pyrus malus) to be identified with the tappûah, but its scarcity renders this very improbable (Journal of Philology, xiii. 1885, p. 65). Kitto believed it to be the citron, which now grows freely in Palestine, and is described in Jos. (Ant. XIII. xiii. § 5) as one of the trees whose boughs were used at the feast of Tabernacles; but the citron is a native of N. India and China, and was probably of late introduction. Tristram has claimed the apricot as the apple of Canticles. It is a very widely cultivated tree, but is a native of Armenia (hence called by Dioscorides μῆλον Ἀρμενιακόν, HP i. 160), and is probably also a late import. The characteristics suggested by the texts are—(1) a shady tree, (2) with golden coloured fruit, (3) which is fragrant, (4) and pleasant to taste, (5) and which is the symbol of love. All these conditions are fulfilled by the quince. The tree is not very large, but it is one under whose shade one could sit or lie, as in the texts, and it is as suitable for this purpose as the vine or fig tree. Its fruit is extremely fragrant, and some varieties might be called golden by contrast if gathered in a silver filigree basket (Pr 25^{11}). It is pre-eminently the fruit of love (see the mass of evidence on this gathered in Celsius' Hierobotanicon, i. 255 ff.). The quince is called μῆλον without any adjective by some of the Greek authors (see, however, Il. ix. 542, where the μῆλον tree is called tall), and is the first of the apples described by Pliny (xxiii. 6). In the light of the description in the passage in Ca 8^5 the weight of evidence is in favour of regarding this tree as the quince, which, though unpleasing to the taste of most Europeans, is yet eaten with relish by many in the East, and esteemed most wholesome. Athenæus says that full ripe quinces are better food than any other kind of apple (Deipnos, iii. 20). For a discussion on the nature of the tappûah, see Houghton, PSBA, 1889, 42. The quince has a special name in the Talmud, parish (see Kelaim, i. 4), and in Arabic, which forms the basis of Robertson Smith's argument; but in Jerus. Talmud, according to Abu'l Walid, parishim means asparagus; see Guisius, in loco, Chilaim (I. iii.). A common tradition identifies the quince with the tree of the knowledge of good and evil.

Dates, the fruit of the date-palm, Phœnix dactylifera, though given in the AVm 2 Ch 31^5 as a possible translation of דְּבַשׁ dĕbash (elsewhere rendered 'honey'), are not otherwise mentioned in the Bible. This is remarkable considering how frequently palms are referred to, and it has been supposed that the word honey in the phrase so often used in the Pentateuch descriptive of Palestine may refer to dibs or date-honey made by boiling down the fruit. This sweetmeat was made in Babylonia where palms abounded (Herodotus, i. 193), and was also made at Jericho (Jos. BJ IV. viii. § 3). LXX translates קַיִץ in 2 S 16^1 φοίνικες, 'dates,' and the palm is put among the fruit trees in Jl 1^{12}. As a cultivated tree the palm is little grown now in Palestine west of the Jordan. In Egypt the date-palm was called ám and bà, and dates benrà. In Assyria the date-palm was gisimmaru, and date-honey dispu. According to Doughty (i. 148), there is no worse food than the date, and he reports the Arabs as saying that when the date is eaten alone human nature decays. For references to the palm in classical and Oriental literature, see Celsius, Hierobot. ii. 445 ff.

Figs (תְּאֵנָה tĕ'ēnâh, LXX συκή), the fruit of Ficus carica, next to the grape the most highly prized of all the fruits of Bible lands, and 53 times mentioned in the Bible. Mohammed says of it that if any fruit has really come from Paradise it must have been the fig. Botanically speaking, what is called the fruit is the soft fleshy receptacle within which are the flowers and later the grain-like, hard, dry achenes. Hence the ancient authors speak of the fig tree as bearing fruit without flowers (Macrobius, Saturnalia, ii. 16); but as the fig itself is the inflorescence, the language of Hab 3^{17} is strictly correct. The buds or young figs appear before the leaves, hence a fig tree in full leaf should have its fruit developed. The precocious tree of Mt 21^{19} and Mk 11^{13} was therefore unnaturally barren. The fig tree bears every year (Thomson, ii. 101), but the Rabbinists speak of a variety called benoth shuah, which only brings forth fruit each third year (Maimon. Demai, i. 1, and Bartenora in Shebiith, v. v. 1), and it has been supposed that this is referred to in Mk 11^{13}. The manuring of such an unpromising tree is alluded to by Cato, as in the parable, Lk 13^6.

The first crop, called בִּכּוּרָה bikkûrâh, πρόδρομοι, begins to redden in March and is ripe by June; unripe figs are called פַּגִּים paggim (hence the place-name Bethphage, 'house of green figs'). LXX calls the unripe figs in Ca 2^{13} ἕλυνθοι; but according to Theophrastus (vi. 8) and Hippocrates (574. 23) these are winter figs, which grow under the leaves and do not ripen. The early figs are the most delicious and refreshing (Is 28^4, Jer 24^2, Mic 7^1, Hos 9^{10}), and are easily shaken off (Nah 3^{12}). See Macrobius, ii. 16. The untimely figs of Rev 6^{13} are olynthi.

The summer figs, קַיִץ (2 S 16^1), ripen in August and September (see also Mic 7^1, Am 8^1). These are either eaten fresh or dried in the sun (Shabbath, viii. § 6), or made into cakes called דְּבֵלִים dĕbēlîm (1 S 25^{18} 30^{12}, 2 K 20^7, 1 Ch 12^{40}, Is 38^{21}). In making these the figs are sometimes first beaten in a mortar, then pressed into a cake (Taanith, xxviii. 1). These cakes, called by LXX παλάθη, were either round or square (see Terumoth, iv. § 8; Baba mesia, ii.). Herodotus uses the name παλάθη of other fruit cakes (iv. 23), but Athenæus distinguishes fig cakes as π. Συρίακη. Such cakes are still used by the Arabs (Burckhardt, i. 51), and with barley-bread are the common food of poor travellers in the East. The town Beth-diblathaim means the house of the two cakes of figs. On the two crops of figs see the διφόρου συκῆς of Arist. Eccles. 708.

A third crop of winter figs appears in August, and ripens at the end of November. These sometimes hang on the tree when the leaves are shed, unless the tree be exposed to frost.

Figs are liable to disease, both from parasitic fungi and from insects. There are several species of both, which attack the fruit and cause it to be shed prematurely, or to shrivel and become uneatable (Jer 24^8 29^{17}). For reflections on this vision see Hieron. Comment. in Jer., on 5^{24}.

Sycomore Figs (שִׁקְמָה, pl. shiḳmîm or shiḳmôth in Ps 78^{47}) are the small fig of the Ficus sycomorus, a bluish-purple fruit eaten by the poorer classes, but considered unwholesome and indigestible (Dioscor. i. 182). The tree grows to a large size, and is found in Palestine in the lower lands from Joppa to Egypt (1 K 10^{27}, 2 Ch 1^{15}; see Bartenora in Shebiith, ix. 2). Jerome notes that they are easily killed by frost, and so they were destroyed by the storm-plague in Egypt (Ps 78^{47}). As in the hollow receptacle the flowers which bear stamens are at the upper and those bearing pistils at the lower part, it ensures fertilization to pinch or incise them, thereby facilitating the entrance of the insects whose movements in the plant promote fertilization; this is known as caprification (Pliny, xiii. 14; Theophrastus, iv. 2). Amos calls himself a בּוֹלֵס bōleṣ, or scratcher of sycomore fruit, in allusion to this (LXX κνίζων συκάμινα, RV 'dresser of sycomore trees'). The superintendence of this was probably the function of Baal-hanan (1 Ch 27^{28}). This tree is abundant in Egypt, and of its wood most mummy coffins are made; as its branches generally arise from the trunk low down, it is easily climbed (Lk 19^4). The fruit was free from tithing among the Jews (Demai, i. 1).

Mulberries (בָּכָא baca, LXX συκάμινος) are not mentioned as fruit; but as the tree is common in Palestine, and as the berries are now eaten freely, they were probably used in Bible times. The trees are named in 2 S $5^{23f.}$ and 1 Ch 14^{15}, and the place named from them 'Baca's vale' in Ps 84^6. Our Lord refers to the tree under the name sycamine in His lesson on faith (Lk 17^6). For a description of the marvels of this tree see Pliny, xvi. 41, where it is described as being as remarkable as a creature possessed of animation (see also xxiii. 7).

Nuts (בָּטְנִים boṭnîm, LXX τερέβινθος) are the fruit of the Pistacia vera. This tree is a native of Syria, although not very abundant, and was brought into Europe by the Romans. The nut is the stone in the centre of the greenish drupe, and its kernel is oily, soft, and not unpleasant to taste. It is mentioned only in Gn 43^{11}. The tree is often mentioned, but its name אֵלָה 'ēlâh or 'ēlôn is translated oak or teil tree, as Is 6^{13} (RV terebinth tree).

Olives (זַיִת zayith, LXX ἐλαία), the same name for both tree and fruit. These are often mentioned in Scripture (37 times in OT and 18 in NT), and the Olea Europæa is a native of Palestine, and much cultivated for the sake of the oil extracted from its drupes. In Egypt the tree was called degam, and was esteemed in early days as a specific for all ailments (see Papyrus Ebers, p. 47; in the Harris Pap. it is called degetu). The tree is small, slow of growth, and irregularly branched. Its wood is hard and fine-grained, and its leaves like those of a large privet, but whitish beneath. It has a small white flower growing in racemes, and its fruit is well known. The wild plants of the olive are sometimes used as stocks on which to graft cultivated varieties with larger fruit (Ro 11^{17}). The low size of the tree made the olive leaf brought by the dove to Noah significant (Gn 8^{11}). These trees are cultivated in orchards or olive yards (Ex 23^{11}); when ripe they are beaten (Dt 24^{20}) in order to strike off the fruit (in Is 17^6 and 24^{13} badly tr. 'shaken'), and the fruit is brought to the oil mills, which consist of circular stone basins in which the drupes are crushed by a heavy stone wheel that is rolled over them. The mass is then put into small wicker baskets, which are piled over each other in a m'azerah or handpress, in which they are squeezed either by means of a long lever or a screw. The ancient presses were all lever presses. After the first pressing the pulp is put into copper pans, sprinkled with water and heated, and then pressed again. Where there is water-power the press is larger, and the mill is called a mutrûf; in this the olives are pressed in a stone cylinder, within which an iron-shod shaft rotates. In old presses the pressure of the lever was supplemented by heavy stones (Thomson, i. 286). The oil is allowed to stand until the sediment subsides, and it is then poured off; sometimes salt is used to clarify it. Among those who have no oil presses the pulp is put in hot water and the oil skimmed off. The fruit is sometimes kept until soft and black before crushing. It is possible that in this state it may sometimes have been trodden by the feet, but that is never done now (Mic 6^{15}). The oil is kept in cisterns of stone or cement (1 Ch 27^{28}), or in jars (khawabies) kept in cellars. For a description of the oil presses see Robinson, BRP iii. 365; and Thomson, Land and Book, ii. 286 ff. Gethsemane means an oil press.

The oil of the olive was one of the most important products of the Holy Land: corn, wine, and oil were its three staple crops. 'Certe oleo et vino gaudebat Palæstina præ Ægypto' (Reland, Palæstina, ccclvii.). The oil is used in cookery (Lv 2^4), and is spread on bread (Ex 29^{23}), or burnt in lamps for lighting (Ex 25^6), or used externally for anointing. This use is referred to in Jotham's parable (Jg 9^9). The excessive use of oil was a luxury which brought men to poverty (Pr 21^{17}). Olive oil is called שֶׁמֶן זַיִת shemen zayith; the finer oil which runs out of pounded olives without compression is distinguished as כָּתִית kāthîth (Ex 27^{20}, Lv 24^2 etc.). Olive oil was one of the exports from Judah to Tyre (Ezk 27^{17}). Oil was occasionally carried as a part of their provisions by travellers (Lk 10^{34}).

The olive tree is liable to a parasitic mould disease, a mildew which causes it to cast its fruit or makes its flower to shrivel (Dt 28^{40}, Job 15^{33}). It is also liable to be attacked by insects (Am 4^9). The olive tree is used as a type of heavenly favour (Ps 52^8, Hos 14^6, Jer 11^{16}), and of family prosperity (Ps 128^3). Oil is used metaphorically as expressive of divine grace (see ANOINTING); or the salutary reproof of the righteous (Ps 141^5). The oil of joy is spoken of in Is 61^3, see Erman, p. 231. The oil tree, 'ēṣ shemen of Neh 8^{15}, 1 K 6^{23}, Is 41^{19}, is generally believed to be the zackum or Balanites Ægyptiaca, a native of the Jordan Valley, and one whose oil is esteemed as a useful medicine.

Pomegranates (רִמּוֹן rimmôn, LXX ῥόα), used both for the tree and the fruit. This is also an abundant fruit in Palestine, of which it is a native, and is mentioned 32 times in the Bible. Pomegranates were among the fruits brought back by the spies from Eshcol (Nu 13^{23}). The tree (Punica granatum) grows to about 20 ft. in height, and has myrtle-like leaves and scarlet flowers, which come out early in the spring (Ca 6^{11}). The fruit is well known, and was a favourite with the Jews; its bright colour is referred to in Ca 4^3. Its sour juice was, and is, used in cookery (Russell, i. 85; Thomson, i. 286) and in making cooling sherbet, as we use lemons. The juice is sometimes fermented (Dioscorides, v. 34), but the wine is rather tasteless unless spiced (Ca 8^2). 'In this fruit Nature has shown to us a grape, and indeed not must, but wine ready made' (Pliny, xxiii. 6). The pomegranate supplied a pattern for ornament (1 K 7^{20}, Ex 28^{33}). In RV 'pomegranates' in 1 K 7^{18} is tr. 'pillars').

Vines (גֶּפֶן gephen; in Nu 6^4, Jg 13^{14} גֶּפֶן הַיַּיִן gephen hayyayin, the wine-vine). The Vitis vinifera was the fruit tree most abundantly cultivated in Palestine and Egypt in ancient times. It is a native of the hilly countries north of Syria, but early spread along the shores of the Mediterranean. Grape kernels have been found in mummy cases of the 11th dynasty in Egypt, dating from about B.C. 2000. A special variety with dark red grapes is called שֹׂרֵק sôrēḳ (Is 5^2, Jer 2^{21}, Gn 49^{11}); these grapes have very small kernels. Figuratively, the unpruned vine in the sabbatic year and jubilee is called נָזִיר nāzîr, being compared to the untrimmed hair of the Nazirite. The colocynth plant in 2 K 4[39] is called gephen sādeh, a vine of the fields. A wild grape-vine bearing worthless grapes is called gephen nokri in Jer 2[21], 'the degenerate plant of a strange vine.' Palestine, especially in its hilly parts, is well suited for vine-growing—'Apertos Bacchus amat colles' (Virgil, Georg. ii. 113). The valley of Eshcol, named from its bunches of grapes, produced the great cluster which the two spies carried home between them on a staff, Nu 13[24] (see Wagenseil, Sota, 709[a]). Modern travellers have seen bunches of 10 to 12 lb. in weight; still larger bunches up to 19 lb. have been grown in this country under glass. The hills about Jezreel, where Naboth's vineyard was situated, were famous for their vines, as were the grapes of Ephraim (Jg 8[2]). The Moabite hills of Sibmah (Is 16[8. 9], Jer 48[32]), and those of Heshbon and Elealeh, were also renowned, and those of Engedi (Ca 1[14]) in Judah. It was in the hill-country of Judah that the sôrēḳ grew (Gn 49[11]), and the valleys of Sorek and Eshcol were named from these, as was Beth-haccherem, 'the house of vines,' near Tekoa (Jer 6[1]). A bottle of Bethlehem wine was a present fit for a king (1 S 16[20]). The wines of Lebanon (Hos 14[7]) and of Helbon (Aleppo *) (one of the exports from Syria to Tyre, Ezk 27[18]) are also named (Robinson, BRP iii. 472).

In preparing the vineyard, the stones had to be gathered out of the soil (Is 5[2]). This is noticed by Cato (De Re Rustica, 46), who says that the vineyard should be 'bipalio delapidato.' It needed also to be fenced with a hedge (Mt 21[33]), a stone wall (Nu 22[24]), or a ditch, to protect it from the wild beasts, such as jackals (Ca 2[15], Ezk 13[4]), boars (Ps 80[13]), and from robbers (Jer 49[9]). The favourite site was a hillside (Is 5[1], Jer 31[5], Am 9[13]), and the plants are set about three paces from each other in rows (Robinson, ii. 80 f.). When the vines grew up they were sustained on stout stakes, over which the branches were trained (Ezk 19[11. 12]). This was also the practice in Egypt; see Lepsius, Denkmäler, ii. 53, 61. All these conditions may be observed to this day, although the Mohammedan rule has discouraged viticulture in Palestine. There is usually a tower (πύργος) in a large vineyard, as described in Mt 21[33], in which the watchers of the vineyard stay. Vineyards were called in Heb. כֶּרֶם kerem. In Am 5[11] this is coupled with חֶמֶד ḥemed, 'pleasant,' in Is 27[2] with חֶמֶר ḥemer, 'of wine,' but Targ. reads ḥemed here also, and LXX καλός. The towers in the vineyards for the keepers or vine-dressers (כָּרְמִים) (Ca 1[6]) are mentioned in Chilaim, v. § 3, but in smaller vineyards they lived in booths (Is 1[8]). The vineyard must not be sown with two kinds of seed, else the whole produce was forfeited as a קֹדֶשׁ ḳōdesh, or sanctified thing (Dt 22[9]); but trees of other sorts, as fig trees, might be planted in a vineyard (Lk 13[6], Mic 4[4]). Ramses III. had olive trees in his large vineyard, which was called the 'spirit of Egypt,' Pap. Harris, i. 8. 7.

The vine-buds appear in March, and send out new branches, which are called שָׂרִיגִים sarîgîm. These are not tendrils, for in Gn 40[10] they are described as bearing fruit; when living, these new branches are green, but when the surface is eaten by locusts the skeleton branch looks white (Jl 1[7]). The tendrils are called זַלְזַלִּים zalzallîm in Is 18[5], or ṣalṣillôth in Jer 6[9] (see BASKET). The flowers appear in early April, and have a slight fragrance (Ca 2[11. 12]). This was the time when the vines were pruned, hence it is said in the passage that in the spring-time the period of the זְמִיר or pruning of vines (RVm) has come (so LXX, Aq. Symm. Targ. Vulg.). AV follows Parchon and Kimchi in rendering it 'the time of the singing of birds is come.' The reference to the pruning of vines in Jn 15[2] is familiar.

* But Schrader (COT[2] ii. 121) disputes the identification.

The grape (עֲנָב 'ēnāb) grows in clusters, which are named אֶשְׁכֹּל 'eshkôl, LXX σταφυλή. The fruit-bearing branch is in Nu 13[23] called זְמוֹרָה zĕmôrâh, which is the word used in the phrase descriptive of the worship of the sun in Ezk 8[17] 'they put the branch to the nose,' usually taken as referring to an old Persian custom of holding a bundle of vine-rods, called barsom, before the face of the priest when praying to the unextinguished fire of the Pyrætheia (Strabo, ed. Casaubon, xv. 733). For a different meaning see Tract Joma, 77[a].

The ripening grapes are called בֹּסֶר bōṣer in Is 18[5], and nearly the same word is used in Job 15[33]. These are sour and set the teeth on edge (Ezk 18[2]). Sickly vines sometimes drop their grapes in this stage (as in Job 15[33]), the result of a blight. In June or July the early grapes are ripe (Is 18[5]), and in September the vintage (בָּצִיר bāṣîr) begins. This is a season of rejoicing, and during the grape-harvest the people live in booths in the midst of the vineyards. It has been conjectured that the ordinance of the Feast of Tabernacles was a mode of turning this custom to the service of religion. This vintage season was celebrated at Shechem (Jg 9[27]). The grapes are cut with a מַזְמֵרָה mazmērâh, or pruning hook (Is 2[4], Jl 3[10]), which is called מַגָּל maggâl, or sickle in Jl 3[13], and are collected in baskets. There was no vine-harvest in the sabbatic or jubilee year. For particulars on viticulture see Thomson, The Grape Vine; and Barron, Vine Culture.

The best grapes were dried in the sun into raisins, which were compressed into צִמּוּק ṣimmûḳ, or cakes (Kimchi). Abigail brought 100 such cakes to David (1 S 25[18]), and David refreshed the fainting Egyptian with two such cakes (1 S 30[12]). Similar cakes were brought by Ziba to David (2 S 16[1]; see also 1 Ch 12[40]). These raisins, as well as fresh grapes, were forbidden to the Nazirite while under his vow. To him all that comes of the grape, from the חַרְצַנִּים ḥarṣannîm, or kernels, to the זָג zāg, or husks, was taboo (see Jg 13[14]). The אֲשִׁישׁוֹת 'ăshîshôth, given by David to those who accompanied him in bringing the ark to Jerusalem (2 S 6[19], 1 Ch 16[3]), and tr. in AV 'flagons of wine,' were probably cakes of raisins, as in RV, which has made a similar change in Ca 2[5]. The reading in the AV is supported on Talmudic authority, but this rests on a very doubtful etymology. For the use of these fruit-cakes by travellers see Russell, i. 82. Cakes of this kind were used as offerings to Baal (Hos 3[1]).

The grape gatherers were forbidden to glean, the עֹלֵלוֹת 'ōlēlôth or gleanings being left for the stranger, the widow, and the fatherless. In the prophetic picture of rebellious Jerusalem as a vine, the fruit is described as being completely gleaned, the gatherer turning his hand back into the tendrils of the vine (Jer 6[9]; see also Jer 49[9]).

A portion of the grape-harvest is used in making artificial honey or dibs, the juice expressed from the grape being boiled into a syrup, 'dulcis musti Vulcano decoquit humorem, et foliis undam trepidi despumat aheni' (Virg. Georg. i. 295). The Heb. name is דְּבַשׁ dĕbash, or honey, and it was an article of commerce exported from Palestine to Tyre (Ezk 27[17]), and sent by Jacob to Egypt (Gn 43[11]). (See Dates, above.) Dibs forms 'a part of the food of the present inhabitants of Palestine' (Thomson, i. 279; Russell, i. 82). It was, and is, the ordinary sweetener of cakes and pastry (Lv 2[11], Robinson, iii. 381).

Most of the crop was carried in baskets by girls and children to the wine-presses (see description of the shield of Achilles, Il. xviii. 562 ff.). These were cavities either hollowed out of the rock or built on the ground, and lined with masonry and cement (Mt 21[33]). Each press, called גַּת gath, LXX ληνός, was made of two parts. The upper was the פּוּרָה pûrâh (LXX προλήνιον), or wine-press proper (Is 63^3 5^2). From the bottom of this a pipe, צִנּוֹר ẓinnôr, leads into the lower receptacle or יֶקֶב yeḳeb (LXX ὑπολήνιον, the 'fat' or vat of Jl 2^{24} and 3^{13} as in Mk 12^1 AV, wine-press RV). The names yeḳeb or gath are used, however, for the whole wine-press. In Hag 2^{16} the pûrâh is called the press-fat (AV) or wine-fat (RV, see Aboda Zara, iv. 8). In these presses the grapes were trodden. The whole process is shown in several Egyptian pictures (Lepsius, ii. 13, 53, 96, iii. 11[a]; Wilkinson, i. 385), in one of which the treaders are represented holding by cords from the roof over the pûrâh. Sometimes flat stones are put over the grapes to assist the treading. The garments and feet of those treading are dyed with the 'blood of the grape' (Dt 32^{14}, Is 63^3). As they trod they shouted (Jer 48^{33}) and sang their vintage songs (Is 16^{10}). It has been supposed that there is a line of one of these preserved in Is 65^8 (see Smith, OTJC[2] 209). The same customs are still observed wherever wine is made in the East (Robinson, i. 431 and ii. 81). The wine-press is a favourite figure with the prophets, typifying God's judgments on sin (Is 63^3, La 1^{15}, Rev 14^{20}).

The first part of the juice which entered the yeḳeb was the first-fruits (Ex 22^{29}), and was offered to God. In Egypt the residuum from the press is put into a sack and squeezed by wringing; see Lepsius, ii. 53.

There is no mention in the Bible of the subsequent processes of wine-making, but probably the expressed juice was left in the 'fats' until fermentation had set in (Hag 2^6), or put, as represented in the Egyptian picture (Wilkinson, i. 385), into jars, or, when fermented, it was transferred for storage to large ox-skins. These at the present day are kept ranged around the storehouse or cellar, which is called in 1 Ch 27^{27} אוֹצַר תִּירוֹשׁ 'ôẓar hayyayin. Bruce speaks of ox-skins capable of holding 60 gallons, and greased on the outside to prevent evaporation (Travels, iv. 334; see Athenæus, ii. 28. Herodotus speaks of camel-skin vessels, iii. 9). When the deposit of the tartarous matter or lees (שְׁמָרִים shĕmārîm, LXX τρυγέας, δόξα, or φύλαγμα) had taken place, the clear supernatant wine was poured off into a new vessel (Jer 48^{11}), and this is the well-refined wine of Is 25^6. In this passage shĕmārîm is used in alliteration with shĕmānîm, 'fat things,' in the earlier clause. Drinking the lees is used allegorically in the sense of the bitter penal consequences of sin (Ps 75^8; see also Zeph 1^{12}, Jer 48^{11}).

Wine is known by nine names in the OT, but these do not necessarily mean different kinds. The varieties of wines are named from the locality of their production. Thus we read of the wines of Kerotim, Tolim, Bethrima, Bethlaba, and Signa as those suited for the service of the sanctuary (Menachoth, viii. 6). Other well-known wines were those of En-gedi, Acco, and Gaza. In Egypt the wines of Bubastis (Herod. ii. 126), of Sebennytus, and of Mareotis (Strabo, xvii. 779; Athenæus, i. 33) were highly esteemed. Saronitic wine was so strong that it needed two parts of water to dilute it (Shabbath, lxxvii. 1), and Babylonian wine needed also to be diluted (Berachoth, i.). See Kimchi (Comm. on Hos 14^8).

The commonest word used for wine is יַיִן yayin, a loan word from a non-Semitic root. This occurs 143 times, being first mentioned in connexion with Noah's drunkenness. It is the word used for wine in the blessing of Jacob (Gn $49^{11.\ 12}$); it is said to cheer God and man (Jg 9^{13}), and to make glad the heart of man (Ps 104^{15}). Repentant and returning Israel is to be rewarded by again drinking the wine of her vineyards (Am 9^{14}), as she had done before (Ec 9^7). It was to be given to them of heavy heart (Pr 31^6), but its use had to be limited, for it was intoxicating, as in the cases of Nabal (1 S 25^{37}), Lot (Gn 19^{32}), Amnon (2 S 13^{28}), the drunkards of Ephraim (Is 28^1). It was the wine used by Job's family (Job 1^{13}); but king Lemuel was dissuaded from its use, because it is said to prevent judgment (Pr 31^5), and to cause vomiting (Is 28^7 5^{11}, Hos 7^5). It is called a mocker (Pr 20^1; see also Jer 23^9). It was this form of wine with which Melchizedek welcomed Abraham's return (Gn 14^{18}). It is usually rendered οἶνος by LXX. In general, this word is used when wine is spoken of as a beverage.

תִּירוֹשׁ tîrôsh occurs 38 times, and is rendered by LXX by οἶνος, ῥώξ (Is 65^8), or μέθυσμα (1 S 1^{15}, Jer 13^{13}, Hos 4^{11}). It is so called because it takes possession of the brain and inebriates (Gesenius; but most moderns reject this etymology). In enumerating the products of the land, corn and wine (tîrôsh) are mentioned 21 times, and oil is coupled with tîrôsh 15 times. The Targumists, Onkelos, and Jonathan render it by ḥamer. It is said to take away the understanding in Hos 4^{11}, and its intoxicating qualities are referred to by the Talmudists, 'Tirosh easily takes possession of (יוֹרֵשׁ, a play upon the word) the mind,' Sanhedrin, lxxvi. § 1. In Joma, lxxvi. 2, it is said, 'If thou abuse it thou shalt be poor (רֵישׁ), if thou rightly use it thou shalt be head (רֹאשׁ)'; and in the Gemara on this, 'Wherefore is it called tirosh? Because all taken by it shall be poor.' In Jer $40^{10.\ 12}$ the words yayin and tîrôsh are used as synonyms, and in general tîrôsh is translated 'new wine' in AV. It has been argued that tîrôsh meant grapes, because the phrase is used 'to gather tîrôsh'; but the same is used of yayin, and both are spoken of as trodden out, yayin in Is 16^{10}, tîrôsh in Mic 6^{15}. Collating all the references, it seems as if tîrôsh was especially used for wine as the produce of the vineyard. See further, Driver, Joel and Amos, 79 f.

שֵׁכָר shēkār, LXX σίκερα, is the word tr. in general 'strong drink,' which occurs 23 times in OT. It was used for the drink-offering (Nu 28^7), and was permitted to be bought with the tithe money and consumed at the temple (Dt 14^{26}). In excess it caused merriment (Is 24^9, Ps 69^{12}) and intoxication (Is 56^{12}); it is often coupled with wine, as if another intoxicating fluid; Ibn Ezra says it was made from palm-juice or wheat, Kimchi says from fruit juice, Jerome from grain, grapes, or honey (Epist. ad Nepotianum, ii. 11), so it may have been like the barley wine of the Egyptians (Herod. ii. 77), or like arrack, which is at present often used in Palestine (Robinson, iii. 195). It is mentioned, among other places, in Lv 10^9, Nu 6^3, Dt 29^6, Jg $13^{4.\ 7.\ 14}$, 1 S 1^{15}, Mic 2^{11}. Strong drink was to be given to those ready to perish (Pr 31^6), which has been supposed to refer to the practice of giving intoxicants to deaden the pain of execution. Lightfoot says that it was the practice of wealthy women in Jerusalem to provide the strong drink for this purpose (Hor. Heb. xi. 366). The vinegar given to our Lord may have been intended for this purpose. Shēkār seems to be named from its effects (שָׁכַר 'to be drunk').

חֶמֶר ḥemer, used twice in Heb. (Dt 32^{14}, Is 27^2, but last probably mistake for חֵמֶר) and six times in Aram. (Ezr 6^9 7^{22}, Dn $5^{1.\ 2.\ 4.\ 23}$), seems to be derived from the sparkling, foaming appearance of fermenting wine. In Is 27^2 the clause in which it occurs appears to be another line from a vintage song. It was wine of this kind that Cyrus gave for the temple use (Ezr 6^9). In Dt 32^{14} it is called the pure blood of the grape, i.e. not mixed with water; but RV has tr. it the blood of the grape, wine. It is red wine in Is 27^2, and it was the wine which Belshazzar drank out of the temple vessels (Dn 5^1).

עָסִיס 'āṣîs, a poetical synonym meaning that which is trodden out. It is the new wine of Ca 8^2; the sweet intoxicating wine of Is 49[26], the sweet wine lamented by the drunkards in Jl 1[5], and that which is supplied to the restored remnant of Israel as a blessing (Jl 3[18]). It is rendered in LXX νᾶμα, γλυκασμός, but the sweet wine of Am 9[13] is μέθη. It is probably the same as 'the sweet' of Neh 8[10], where it is called מַמְתַקִּים mamtaḳḳîm, or sweetnesses.

סֹבֵא ṣôbe', intoxicating drink in general, the wine of Is 1[22], which was spoiled by mixture with water, or that in Hos 4[18], which had become sour, or that which drenched the drunkard to helplessness (Nah 1[10]).

מֶסֶךְ meṣeḳ, in Ca 8[2] מֶזֶג mezeg, LXX κέρασμα, is mixed wine, to which spices have been added to make it hotter and improve its flavour. In Pr 23[30], Ps 75[8], Is 65[11] it is called mimṣāk. In Pr 9[2. 5] it is used metaphorically for the inspiring drink supplied by wisdom, and in Is 5[22] for the strong drink which warps the judgment. In Pr 23[30] it is a parallel synonym for yayin.

חֹמֶץ ḥômeẓ, or vinegar, is sour wine, the common refreshing drink for labourers, forbidden to the Nazirite while under his vow (Nu 6[3]), used in the harvest field (Ru 2[14]), and prophetically mentioned in Ps 69[21]. In Pr 10[26] LXX renders it ὄμφαξ, an unripe grape.

In NT the word commonly used is οἶνος, as at the marriage feast at Cana. This wine in excess produced μεθύσις (Jn 2[10]). New wine was regarded as inferior to old (Lk 5[39]). Γλεῦκος, 'new sweet wine,' is mentioned in Ac 2[13] as that by which the Jews thought the apostles were intoxicated at Pentecost. It cannot have been unfermented, as that would not have produced the effect, and Pentecost was eight months after the vintage.

The collecting of juice from the grapes, which the chief butler in his dream squeezed into the cup, was plainly only a symbol, as in the dream he saw the whole process of budding, blossoming, and fruiting taking place. There is no evidence of any such custom as squeezing grapes into a cup for royal or guest refreshment. There are several figurative names for wine: 'the fruit of the vine' (Lk 22[18]), 'the blood of the grape' (Dt 32[14]); the former reminds us of Pindar's δρόσος ἀμπέλου (vii. 3), or of the name of the vine οἴνου μήτηρ in Æschylus (Persæ, 614).

The study of the names applied to wine shows that they are, for the most part, evidently synonyms, and that the substance indicated by them all was one which, if used to excess, was liable to cause intoxication. An attempt has been made to obtain a textual support for total abstinence by differentiating intoxicating from unfermented wine in the biblical terminology; but it is only special pleading without adequate foundation. The teaching of Scripture as to the pernicious effects of intemperance in any form is clear and explicit, and the Apostle Paul has stated the case for total abstinence in Ro 14 in a way which does not require the treacherous aid of doubtful exegesis for its support.

The wine stored in the large skins in the cellar was drawn for use into smaller skins, the bottles of Scripture, called חֵמֶת ḥēmeth in Gn 21[14ff.], נֵבֶל nēḇel, 1 S 1[24] 10[3], 2 S 16[1] (this word is used figuratively for the clouds in Job 38[37]), or נאד nōd, Jos 9[4-13], Jg 4[19], 1 S 16[20]. This word is also used figuratively in Ps 56[8] in alliteration with nōd, 'wandering,' for there is no evidence of the use of lacrymatories among the Jews. The nōd was liable to shrivel if hung up in the heat (Ps 119[83]). In LXX and NT bottle is ἀσκός. These were made of goat-skins, prepared by cutting off the head, tail, and feet, and then drawing off the skin from the body without other cutting, and stuffing it with straw, into which wooden wedges were then driven, to stretch it to its fullest capacity. The hair was left on the outer surface, the tail and limb holes were closely sewn up, and the neck hole left open. The skin was thereafter tanned with oak or acacia bark. These skins are prepared in this manner at the present day, and are called zumzammîm or mattaru. When filled, the neck hole is tied round with a thong. Robinson saw about 500 of these bottles in one tanyard (ii. 75). The larger bottles are of he-goat skins, the smallest of the skins of kids. This variety of size is alluded to in Is 22[24]. When active fermentation is in progress these skins become much distended, and are liable to burst. This is especially liable to occur with new skins of young animals, which are called אוֹב, as in Job 32[19]. These are called in Vulg. lagunculæ. Skins which are old are liable to crack, and cannot bear the tension of the carbonic acid produced during fermentation. This is referred to in Mt 9[17], Mk 2[22], Lk 5[37]. The preservation of the wine did not mean keeping it from fermentation,—for, with the total absence of antiseptic precautions characteristic of Orientals, it would have been impossible to do so,—but the storing of it in a bottle which could resist the strain. One of these bottles was a load for a man (1 S 10[3]).

Wine was largely used in Egypt, and the figures of drinking feasts, and the painting of an inebriated female from a tomb of the New Empire, are well known (see Wilkinson, i. 392, 424, etc.). There is an interesting letter written by the scribe Amen-em-apt to Penta-ur, in which the evils of intemperance are graphically described (Pap. Sallier, I. ix. 9, etc.). The commonest beverage in Egypt was beer, made from barley, and called ḥeḳ. The wine made from the grape, also commonly used, was called arp, and date wine was called baḳ. Among the presents to Ptah enumerated in the Harris Papyrus were 2366 wine vessels of one form and 820 of another; and in the inventory of presents on pl. 72 of that papyrus are 486,303 vessels of beer. The Persians were also much addicted to wine (Herod. i. 133), and the royal wine of Est 1[7] is referred to by Athenæus (Deipnos. i. 51); it was called Chalybonian, and Posidonius says that it is made in Damascus. Figuratively, the washing of garments in wine means plenty and prosperity (Gn 49[11]). Wine of astonishment, Ps 60[3] (RV staggering), is a figure of God's judgment on sin, making its objects helpless, as if intoxicated. This is called the cup of staggering in Is 51[17].

The Vine of Sodom (Dt 32[32]) is probably, as Seetzen and Robinson have supposed, the 'ôsher or Calotropis procera, an asclepiadaceous plant, whose fruit looks attractive, but is full of dry cottony hairs. These are the 'grapes of gall.' Pococke supposed that it referred to diseased pomegranates, and Hooker conjectures that the colocynth may have been meant; but its fruit has no resemblance to grapes (see Wild Gourd, above). Elliot suggests oak galls as referred to, and Hasselquist the egg plant, either Solanum melongena or S. Sodomæum; but the first identification is most probably correct, more especially as the Calotropis, while not very common, grows abundantly in one locality by the Dead Sea.

Walnut (אֱגוֹז 'ĕgōz, καρύα) is not mentioned as a fruit; but a garden of nuts, which is mentioned in Ca 6[11], is taken by the rabbinical authorities as meaning a garden of walnuts. The Arabs call the tree gyaus, and it is very common in Palestine. The common walnut, Juglans regia, is too well known to need description.

Fruit is referred to metaphorically in the sense of (1) the result of a course of conduct (Ro 6[21]); (2) the work of the Holy Spirit in the conduct (Gal 5[22], Eph 5[9]); (3) children (Ps 127[3]); (4) praise (Is 57[19]); (5) the results of industry (Pr 31[16. 31]), etc.

Mallows (מַלּוּחַ mallûaḥ, LXX ἅλιμον, Vulg. Ar- brum cortices) are spoken of in Job 30[4] as plants eaten by starving outcasts. They have been variously identified as nettles by R. Levi, as possibly a mesembryanthemum by Kitto, as mallows (malva) by Thomson (L. and B. i. 291), as Corchorus olitorius by Sprengel; but are most probably the saltwort, as in the RV, the Atriplex halimus or sea-purslain, which is called by the Arabs mulluah, and grows on the shores of the Dead Sea and of the Gulf of Akabah. It is a plant with sour leaves, and has been known to form a part of the diet of the people in periods of scarcity. Thomson saw poor people cutting coarse green food of this kind as a relish for bread (ii. 345). The mallow in Arabic is called khubbarzeh. In a parallel passage in Job 24[5] the poor are said to cut בָּלִיל for their children, which may be cattle food (Is 30[24]) or coarse vegetables in general, and probably the אֹרֶת or greens which the prophet went to gather were of the same nature (2 K 4[39]). The Syriac uses this name mallûah for the חַרוּל or 'nettle' of Zeph 2[9].

Juniper roots (רֹתֶם rōthem). This occurs along with the last as part of the food of the outcast in Job 30[4], but the word occurs also as the name of the tree under which Elijah sheltered (1 K 19[4ff.]), and in the phrase 'coals of juniper' in Ps 120[4]. LXX renders it Ῥαθμέν or Ῥαμάθ, and in Job ῥίζας ξύλων. Symm. tr. it ῥίζαν σίτων ἀγρίων, and Josephus does not name the tree, but calls it 'a certain tree' (Ant. VIII. xiii. 7). The Syriac VS calls it a terebinth, and Clement a Paliurus (Pædagog. iii. 236). The later Jewish authorities, however, recognized it as the desert broom, Retama retem, which the Arabs call retama. It is a shrub with pale pink flowers and very bitter roots. It grows about 10 ft. high, and in many places in the desert is the only shrub under which one could shelter. Robinson describes it in such places; and one of the wilderness stations of Israel was called Rithmah = broomy (Nu 33[18]). The roots were used as fuel (Ps 120[4]), and the Revisers have put 'to warm them' in marg. of Job 30[4], which, considering the uneatable nature of the roots, is a more intelligible rendering. The word לַחְמָם may be regarded as a derivative of the verb חָמַם 'to heat,' in which sense the same word occurs in Is 47[14]. This sense is taken by some Heb. commentators, as R. Levi ben-Gerson (in loc.), but the rendering of the text is that in the Gemara, Aboda Zara, i. Juniper roots are often used for fuel in the wilderness (Thomson, i. 345).

B. Animal food consisted either of flesh or of animal products, such as milk, eggs, and honey. Flesh was habitually used only in royal or great houses, and among ordinary people was chiefly used at feasts. Its sources were restricted by law among the Jews, by custom among the neighbouring nations. The word שְׁאֵר, which literally means flesh meat (Ps 78[20. 27]), was sometimes used for food in general (Ex 21[10]).

The division of beasts into clean and unclean, mentioned in the story of the Deluge (Gn 7[2]), was written in the light of later legislation, but embodies a distinction which can be traced back to a very early period of human history. The two lists of clean and unclean animals (Lv 11[3ff.] and Dt 14[4ff.]) are practically identical. The mammals permitted to be eaten were the ruminants proper, except the camel, which, with the hyrax, hare, and swine, are prohibited by name. There is reason to believe that this selection is of more than arbitrary value, and that the danger of the transmission of parasitic diseases by the flesh of these is less than in the case of the excluded forms (see Guéneau de Mussy, Étude sur l'hygiène de Moïse). For fanciful representations of the forbidden animals as types of vices, see Eusebius, Præp. Evang. viii. 9; Clement, Pædag. ii. 10; Novatianus, de cibis Judæorum, iii.

The permitted mammals named in Dt are ten. (a) The three domestic groups, oxen, sheep, and goats. The first group was called in general בְּהֵמָה bĕhēmâh, or cattle (Dt 14[4]), neat cattle being distinguished as בָּקָר bāḳār, LXX βόες, tr. the herd, as distinguished from the flock. The calf is in Heb. עֵגֶל 'ēgel (Is 27[10]); an 'ēgel marbēḳ or fatted calf was killed for Saul by the witch (1 S 28[24]); see also Gn 18[7] (where the calf is ben bāḳār, 'the son of the herd') and ὁ σιτευτὸς μόσχος of Lk 15[30]. שׁוֹר shôr (LXX μόσχος) is used for a bullock, as in Lv 22[27], Neh 5[18], or else פַּר par, as in Nu 8[8], Ps 22[12]; and a heifer is called 'eglath bāḳār (Gn 15[9], Dt 21[3]) or pārâh (Gn 41[2], Nu 19[2]). Bulls are named (poet.) אַבִּירִים 'abbîrîm (Is 34[7], Ps 22[12]), and cows or cattle in general אֲלָפִים 'ălāphîm. The commonest breed were black or brown, short limbed and small, and they were principally kept in the valleys and in the low country. Fat oxen were part of Solomon's daily provision (1 K 4[23]); these were fed in a אֵבוּס or stall, and hence are called stalled oxen (Pr 15[17]); Solomon had also pasture-fed oxen (1 K 4[23], see also Elisha, 1 K 19[21]). The aurochs or wild bull (the Hebrew rĕ'ēm) was probably seldom captured, even in nets (Is 51[20]). The buffalo was not originally a native, but has been imported into Palestine since Bible times.

From the flock צאן ṣôn (Gn 4[2]) the food animals were טָלֶה ṭāleh, or sucking lambs (LXX ἀρνὸς γαλαθηνός), as in 1 S 7[9]. A hogget or lamb from one to three years old was named בֶּבֶשׂ kebes (Nu 7[15]) or כֶּשֶׂב keseb (Lv 3[7]), LXX ἄμνος or ἀρνός. In Aramaic a young sheep is called אִמֵּר 'immar, as in Ezr 6[9]; a ewe is רָחֵל rāḥēl (Gn 31[38]); and a fatted sheep כַּר kar (2 K 3[4]); while sheep in general are called שֶׂה seh (Jg 6[4]). The commonest breed of sheep in Palestine is the fat-tailed variety, whose tail is wide and flat, and may weigh 10 lb., most of which is pure fat. This fat tail (RV) is the אַלְיָה 'alyâh or rump (AV) of Ex 29[22] (see Herod. iii. 113). In Northern Palestine and Syria there is also a short-woolled small sheep, resembling the merino; both are varieties of the one species Ovis Aries. The lamb was the commonest of all meats for feasts, and is still the animal often killed for a guest (Doughty, i. 16). The ram, אַיִל 'ayil, possibly the beden or wild-goat (Gn 15[9]), was also used as food (Gn 31[38]). For the use of lambs see 2 S 12[4], Is 53[7], and the paschal lamb (Ex 12[3]).

The goat (שָׂעִיר sā'îr) was commonly kept in flocks in the more mountainous districts, while the sheep was fed in the lower pastures; the two species of goat, Capra hircus and C. mambrica, were not apparently differentiated by name; the former is the common goat, the latter has a sheep-like head and long pendulous, flapping ears. The male or he-goat of the former breed is the תַּיִשׁ tayish, Gn 30[35], Pr 30[31], and of the latter עַתּוּד 'attûd (Gn 31[10]), or in Aramaic צְפִיר ṣĕphîr, as Ezr 6[17]. The עֵז 'ēz may have been the Capra Ægagrus or Sinaitica, both of which are natives of Bible lands, and probably the source of Esau's savoury meat. The kid, גְּדִי gĕdî (Dt 14[21]), is mentioned as the material for a small feast (Jg 6[19] 13[15]). Compare the ἔριφος of the parable (Lk 15[29]), and the elder brother's implied comparison between the kid and the calf. As the lamb is useful for his fleece as well as his flesh (Pr 27[26]), the kid is commonly used by the poorer or more economical classes (see 1 Es 1[7]). Rebekah used it for making Isaac's savoury meat (Gn 27[9]).

The thrice-repeated taboo concerning seething a kid in its mother's milk (Ex 23[19] 34[26], Dt 14[21]) has been interpreted: (1) As a prohibition of the slaughter of the mother and offspring at the same time (as in Lv 22[28]). (2) As forbidding the killing of the young animal before it was eight days old; we learn from the passage just quoted that an animal was not allowed to be sacrificed until it had reached that age, and it has been thought that it was also unclean as food. (3) The most probable explanation is that it had reference to some custom among the surrounding nations, such as that described by Cudworth and Spencer (de legibus Hebr. ritual. ii. 335), in which a kid was boiled in its mother's milk, and the broth sprinkled on the ground as a sacrifice to propitiate the harvest gods and ensure fruitfulness. (4) Michaelis has supposed that mother's milk is a euphemism for butter, and that the food forbidden was meat drenched with butter. For other views on this תּוֹעֵבָה to'ēbâh, or abomination, see Tract Chullin, viii. § 4, and Maimonides, More nebochim, iii. 48.

Milk and its derivatives formed an important element of the food of the Bible peoples, Palestine is described as a land flowing with milk and honey (Ex 3^8 and eighteen other places). חָלָב ḥālāb, LXX γάλα, is used for fresh milk (Ca 5^{12}, Is 28^9), or of cream from which butter is made (Pr 30^{33}). Milk of goats was esteemed the best (Pr 27^{27}), then that of sheep (Dt 32^{14}). Cow's milk is rarely as good as either of the others, on account of the unsuitability of the pasture, and is not often specified in the Bible. Camel's milk was probably used by the patriarchs, as we infer from Gn 32^{15}; but it sours more quickly than other milk, and often pains strangers when they first take it (Doughty, i. 216).

Milk is used as a drink with meals (Gn 18^8, Ezk 25^4), and so is coupled with wine (Ca 5^1, Is 55^1). When the pasturage is good, sweet milk is still handed round after an Arab meal. It is also offered as refreshment to travellers. Jael opened for Sisera a nōd, or leathern bottle of milk (Jg 4^{19}), which Deborah (Jg 5^{25}) calls a ṣēphel 'addirim, 'a cup of the nobles' (EV a lordly dish). Goat's milk is spoken of as the staple drink of servants (Pr 27^{27}); and, as the Hebrew children were mother-nursed, milk was their sole sustenance until they were weaned, hence the metaphorical sense of milk-feeding in 1 Co 3^2, He 5^{12}. The comparison of the law to milk was used by the Jews; thus Kimchi on Is 55^1 says, 'As milk feeds and nourishes a child, so the law feeds and nourishes the soul.' Milk mixed with flour or rice, and eaten with salad, or occasionally with meat, forms a large part of the food of the poor in Aleppo (Russell, i. 118) and elsewhere. Among some Jews milk is not eaten with meat, on account of their interpretation of Ex 23^{19} (see above).

Butter (חֶמְאָה ḥem'âh, LXX βούτυρον) is used for cream and thick preparations of it, as well as for butter proper. In Is 7^{22} it probably means cream, and in Jg 5^{25} the milk which was called ḥālāb in Jg 4^{19} is named ḥem'âh; but it was liquid enough to be kept in a skin bottle, and was used to quench thirst. The 'butter' of Gn 18^8 was probably soured milk, which is now much used in the East, and called leben (Burckhardt, Bedouins, i. 240). The process of churning is called מְחִי mîẓ, or 'pressure,' in Pr 30^{33}. It is now performed by rocking a skin of milk upon the knees (Doughty, i. 221), or by beating with a stick a skin of milk hung up in a frame, or jerking a skin thus suspended to and fro (Robinson, i. 485). The milk used is that of goats (Robinson, iii. 69) or cows (Dt 32^{14}); some forms of butter are semi-fluid, and hence the figurative language of Job 20^{17} 29^6. The amount of butter eaten by Arabs is large, when it can be procured. Kitto says that all well-prepared Arab food swims in it; and Burckhardt describes the Arabs as taking a cupful of butter as breakfast in the morning (see Robinson, i. 449). Melted butter is used, poured over bread in a bowl, as a breakfast dish, and is called samen (cf. Doughty, ii. 67 f., 208 f, 655 f.). Metaphorically, the smoothness of hypocritical words is compared to butter (Ps 55^{21}).

Cheese (חָרִיץ ḥārîẓ) is mentioned as a delicacy sent by Jesse to the captain of the troop in which his sons were (1 S 17^{18}), the expression used there meaning ten slices of curd. The [שְׂפַת] shāphāh (pl. shāphôth) of 2 S 17^{29} was probably the leben, which here was made of cow's milk. Cheese is often made of the milk of the ewe or of the goat.

A third word, גְּבִינָה gĕbînâh, means a clot, and is compared (Job 10^{10}) with the material out of which the body develops (cf. גֹּלֶם gôlem of Ps 139^{16}).

The Arabs use dried milk, which they rub up with water when wanted (Doughty, i. 262); this they call mereesy. It is also mentioned by Burckhardt (i. 60).

(b) Besides the three domestic groups, seven forms of large game were allowed to be eaten; these were the fallow deer, Dama vulgaris (אַיָּל, LXX ἔλαφος, the hart of RV and AV, as in Ps 42^1, La 1^6); the gazelle, Gazella dorcas (צְבִי ṣĕbî, LXX δορκάς, AV roebuck, 2 S 2^{18}), called by the Egyptians gahs, and often used as a sacrifice; the wild cow antelope, Bubalus boselaphus (יַחְמוּר yaḥmûr, LXX πύγαργος, Vulg. bubalus, AV fallow deer, RV roebuck), called shes by the Egyptians.

These three were hunted (Dt $12^{15.\ 22}$, Pr 6^5), and formed elements in Solomon's daily provision (1 K 4^{23}). The other large game were: the ibex or wild goat, Capra beden, the n'eafu of Egypt; the Sinaitic ibex is also called יָעֵל (Job 39^1, Ps 104^{18}), hence the name of Heber's wife Jg $4^{17.\ 18}$ (אֵקֶב 'aḳḳô, AV and RV wild goat); the addax, Antilope addax (דִּישֹׁן dishôn, AV and RV 'pygarg,' the ancient Egyptian nudu), an antelope with lyrate horns and white hinder part, not uncommon in some parts of Western Asia, and found in Palestine; the oryx, Oryx beatrix (תְּאוֹ tĕ'ô, LXX ὄρυξ, AV wild ox, RV antelope), a straight-horned antelope, extending in distribution from N. Africa to Persia; the African form, called in Egyptian maud, differs from the Asiatic in some respects, and is called O. leucoryx; it is very commonly represented as being sacrificed in Egyptian pictures; and lastly, the kibisch or mouflon, Ovis tragelaphus (זֶמֶר zemer, LXX καμηλοπάρδαλις, AV and RV chamois). This is a mountain sheep which is found in Lebanon, Moab, and the Taurus, as well as in Corsica. Neither the chamois nor the giraffe is a native of Palestine.

(c) The law of clean birds is one of exclusion. All carnivorous or predaceous birds and seabirds, together with the ostrich, raven, heron, and stork, are declared unclean. On the positive side, the birds named as articles of diet were six: (1) the pigeon (Columba livia, יוֹנָה yônâh, LXX περιστερά); (2) the turtle dove (Turtur communis, תּוֹר tôr, LXX τρυγών). These two were the commonest birds used for food in Palestine, and the only ones admitted as sacrifices. (3) The partridge, of which two species are found in Palestine, Caccabis chukar, the large Indian partridge, and Ammoperdix Heyi, the small partridge of Judæa (1 S 26^{20}). This bird is hunted, as it runs when pursued, and is slow to rise in flight (Robinson, iii. 403). Its nest is sought after on account of the eggs, which are favourite articles of food (Jer 17^{11}, Sir 11^{30}). LXX renders it νυκτικόραξ, which is a kind of heron. The place-name Beth-hoglah means the house of the partridge. Partridges as food are represented on an Assyrian sculpture in the British Museum. (4) The quail (Coturnix communis, שְׂלָו sĕlâv, LXX ὀρτυγομήτρα), which furnished meat to the Israelites in their wilderness journey (Ex 16^{13}). These are common in Egypt, where they are salted and eaten raw (Herodotus, ii. 77). The quail annually migrates in immense bevies across the desert nearly along the line of the Israelites' march (Robinson, i. 260). (5) Fatted fowl, which were prepared for Solomon's table (1 K 4^{23}), are called בַּרְבָּרִים. They were probably ducks or geese, so largely used in Egypt, where they are called aptiu and terpu. They were apparently not domesticated, but caught in nets, fattened and eaten (Lepsius, ii. 46 and 132). (6) Fowl in Neh 5[18] צִפֳּרִים ṣippŏrîm, were probably domestic fowl introduced from Babylonia, to which they had been brought from India, their native country. In NT times they had become domesticated in Palestine. It is said in the Mishna that fowl were not allowed in Jerusalem (Baba Kama, vii. 7); but this is a mistake (see Mt 26[75] and parallel passages). Our Lord was familiar with them and their habits, see Mt 23[37], where He quotes from 2 Es 1[30].

Eggs as articles of food in early times were those of wild birds (Dt 22[6], Is 10[14] 59[5]); but with the introduction of geese from Egypt and domestic fowl from India they became much more important as a part of the diet, and now are very largely used (Lk 11[12]). There is no reference to the ancient modes of cooking them, but at the present day they are boiled, or eaten swimming in hot butter and with honey (Finn. 141), or eaten with olives (ib. 272), or boiled with rice (Robinson, i. 91), or fried in fat.

The white of an egg (רִיר חַלְמוּת rîr ḥallāmûth) of Job 6[6] may be either the material literally expressed, see Tract Chull. 64*a*, or curdled milk; but is understood by some as a succulent, tasteless plant like purslain, Portulaca oleracea, as in the RVm. This plant is common in most places in Palestine, and is in Arabic associated with imbecility. Golius quotes the proverb 'more foolish than purslain,' Sentent. Arab. 81. For other meanings see Gesenius, Thesaurus, sub voce.

Dove's dung, mentioned in connexion with the famine during the siege of Samaria, has been variously understood by commentators. It is said (2 K 6[25]) that one imperial pint of it was sold for about 12s. 6d. חֲרִיֹנִים ḥărîyōnîm, or as it is in Kerê דְּבְיֹנִים dibyōnîm, is understood by Josephus literally, and he supposes it to have been used as a condiment in place of salt (Ant. IX. iv. 4). The threat in Rabshakeh's appeal to the Jews (2 K 18[27]) is in favour of this view. Others have supposed that this material was used for fuel, as the cow dung in Ezk 4[12]; and Harmer thinks it was used to manure melons and other vegetables grown within the city (Obs. iii. 185; see Morier's Second Journey, p. 141). Fuller surmised that it might be the contents of the pigeon's crop. Linnæus and Smith identify it as the root of a liliaceous plant, the Ornithogalum umbellatum or star of Bethlehem; but this as well as Bochart's conjecture, that it was a chick-pea or small species of cicer, and the view that it was a small species of sorghum, are without foundation, as there is no reason why the price of these rare foods should be specified. On the whole, there is as much evidence for the literal interpretation as for any of these guesses.

(d) No reptile was permitted to be eaten; of fishes all that have fins and scales were clean; but it is a remarkable fact that no species of fish is mentioned in the Bible, nor is there any discrimination except good or bad (Mt 13[48]), and big and little (Jon 1[17], Jn 21[11], Mk 8[7]). The Sea of Galilee abounds in fishes, which are delicate and well flavoured (Robinson, ii. 386). Altogether 43 species have been found by Lortet, Tristram, and others, of which 14 are peculiar to the lake and to the Jordan. One of the largest of these, Clarias macracanthus, being scaleless, was unclean (κορακῖνος, Jos. BJ III. x. 8). The largest of the clean fishes are species of Chromis, which resemble the carp, and have large scales. One of these, Chromis Niloticus, called Moncht by the fishermen of Tiberias, has been found up to 5 lb. in weight; another, C. Tiberiadis, is peculiar to the lake, and very plentiful; C. Andreæ and C. Simonis are also peculiar, as is the C. Flavii Josephi. There are also four species of barbel of the genera Barbus, Scaphiodon and Capoeta, as well as one species each of dace, loach, and bleak, and two blennies, B. Lupulus and B. varius. Sea fishery was carried on at Tyre (Ezk 26[5]), and from thence preserved fish were imported into Jerusalem (Neh 13[16]), probably dried and cured. It was likely some dried fishes which formed part of the food with which the 5000 were fed. The fish-market at Jerusalem was probably at the fish-gate (2 Ch 33[14]). The fishpools of Heshbon (Ca 7[4]) have been regarded as indicating that the Jews kept fish in them for use; but the word 'fish' is here an interpolation. Abundance of fish was one of the elements in the prosperity of Joseph, according to his blessing, Gn 49[25]. Fish was one of the staple foods in Egypt (Nu 11[5]). See picture of fishing in Baedeker's Egypt, p. 411, and Wilkinson, ii. 102.

(e) Four insects were allowed to be eaten according to the list in Lv; these were: (1) the אַרְבֶּה 'arbeh, LXX βροῦχος, the swarming locust, Ædipoda migratoria; (2) סָלְעָם ṣol'âm, LXX ἀττάκης, probably Acrydium peregrinum, the bald locust of AV; (3) חַרְגֹּל ḥargôl, LXX ὀφιομάχος (AV beetle), a leaping animal, and therefore not a beetle, probably the khardjala of the Arabs, which the Rabbins supposed to be a grasshopper, more probably the largest of the locusts, Ædipoda cristata; and (4) חָגָב ḥāgāb, LXX ἀκρίς, probably the little black locust found in the Sinaitic desert which the Arabs call Faras el-jundi or soldiers' horses, recalling the description of the locusts in Rev 9[7]. It is, however, not possible precisely to identify these two latter forms. Locusts formed part of the food of the Baptist (Mt 3[4], Mk 1[6]). Doughty describes them as being prepared by salting, and then being stived into a leathern sack in which they kept good a long while. They mingle them, brayed small, with butter-milk. The best is the fat spring locust; the later brood is dry and unwholesome (i. 203). Burckhardt says they are put alive into boiling brine, then dried in the sun, the head, legs, and wings being plucked off and then stored in bags. They are sometimes mixed with butter and spread on bread. They taste not unlike shrimps. On one of the Assyrian sculptures in the British Museum two slaves are represented with long sticks of locusts.

Honey took the place of sugar in cookery, either the natural product (1 S 14[25], Mt 3[4], Lk 24[42], AV, not RV) or the artificial dibs made of grapes or dates, described above. True honey is collected by the bee, Apis fasciata (see BEE). It is found in hollows in rocks (Dt 32[13], Ps 81[16]) or in hollow trees (1 S 14[26]), from which it drops on the ground. A shrub or tree on which was a honeycomb was called יַעַר, a word used for honeycomb in Ca 5[1]. Birds, jackals, and ants would soon reduce a lion to a dry skeleton, so that in a few days a swarm of bees might take possession of it (Jg 14[8]). Herodotus tells us that the head of Onesilus, suspended over the gate of Amathus, became filled with honeycomb (v. 114). See also the account of the Egyptian practice of killing a calf and placing it in a favourable place, when in nine days bees swarm within the carcase (Virgil, Georg. iv. 300 ff.). Compare with this Pythagoras' theory of the origin of bees, Ovid, Metamorph. xv. 27.

As honey is liable to ferment, it was forbidden to be used in any offering to God (Lv 2[11]), the preservative material salt being used instead. Honey was one of the exports of Palestine to Tyre. Along with it is named the substance PANNAG, supposed by some to be a sweetmeat. LXX translates it 'cassia,' and the Vulgate 'balsam.' In the Syriac it is said to be millet.

At the present day honey is used by the Arabs to sweeten cakes (Ex 16[31]) as we use sugar. It is sometimes, but not often, eaten by itself from the comb (Jg 14[9]), or as it drops from the comb (1 S 14[27]). The liquid honey as it has dropped, called צוּף zûph (Pr 16[24], Ps 19[10]), is the best, and a cruse of this was part of the present brought by Jeroboam's wife to Ahijah (1 K 14[3]). Honey was brought with the other provisions to David in exile (2 S 17[29]), and wild honey (μέλι ἄγριον) was part of the Baptist's diet (Mt 3[4]). Butter and honey is expressive of a rich diet, see Burckhardt, Arabia, i. 54, but not Is 7[15. 22]. Milk and honey are the products of a fertile land (Odyss. xx. 68). The effects of a surfeit of honey are graphically described in Pr 25[16]. Honey is still stored in jars or skins as of old (Jer 41[8]).

Salt (מֶלַח), eaten with food as a condiment to flavour it (Job 6[6], Sir 39[26]), used to preserve food, and given to cattle (Is 30[24]), was extracted from the salt beds by the Dead Sea, or made by evaporation from sea water. There are masses of rock salt several miles in extent on the S.E. of the Dead Sea (Robinson, ii. 108), and the salt of Sodom is named in a Gemara; see also Josephus, Ant. XII. iii. 3, XIII. iv. 9. Much of this salt was very impure, hence it sometimes lost its savour as well as its preserving power, and was cast out on the land as waste (Mt 5[13], Lk 14[35]). This was due to the rain washing out the salt and leaving only the earthy dross. Too much salt rendered the land barren, and to sow with salt meant to doom to perpetual desolation (Dt 29[23], Jg 9[45], Zeph 2[9], Jer 17[6], Job 39[6]). Salt was to be used with all the sacrifices (Lv 2[13], Ezk 43[24], Mk 9[49] TR). See Il. i. 449, and Æneid, ii. 133. For this purpose salt was sold in the temple market; see Maii, de usu Salis Symbol. in rebus sacris Dissert., Giessen, 1692; Middoth, v. 3. The addition of salt to the animal sacrifice was probably a later arrangement. See Philo, ii. 255; Hottinger, Jur. Heb. Leg. p. 168, and de Usu Salis in Cultu sacro, Marburg, 1706; Wokenius, de Salitura Oblationum, 1747. Salted incense is referred to in Ex 30[35]. Salt is much prized, both in Syria and Egypt. A Bedawi prefers salt to sugar when both are offered to him. It is an emblem of hospitality; to eat bread and salt with one is to be bound to him by ties of hospitality, a covenant of salt (Lv 2[13], Nu 18[19], 2 Ch 13[5]). A similar alliance is expressed in Ezr 4[14]. See Niebuhr, Beschreibung, 48; Bæhrdt, de Fœdere Salis. For the washing of infants in salt see MEDICINE. It is possible that the Sidonian Misrephoth-maim of Jos 11[8] 13[6] may have been a place of salt-pans where sea water was evaporated.

Hyssop (אֵזוֹב), which may be mentioned as an accessory to the feast of Passover, though in itself not a food-stuff, is a labiate herb of inconspicuous size, which was used by the Egyptian priests for food (Porphyry, de Abstinentia, iv. 7), but is mentioned in the Bible only as a means of aspersion, considered by Celsius to be the Hyssopus officinalis, a thyme-like plant. In Negaim, xiv. 6, there are five kinds recognized—the Greek (Origanum Smyrnæum), the Egyptian (Origanum Ægyptiacum), the wild (O. Syriacum), the Cochali (Origanum maru), and the Roman (Satureja Juliana). As the hyssop had a firm stem and could be tied in a bundle, it was probably the O. maru. Kitto conjectures that it is the poke (Phytolocca decandra); but this is not a native of Palestine. Royle, Tristram, and Stanley believe it to be the caper (Capparis spinosa); but this does not fulfil the conditions; it is soft, smooth, and irregularly branched, besides it is mentioned under another name as אֲבִיּוֹנָה 'ăbîyōnâh (Ec 12[5], 'desire' AV, 'caperberry' RV). The flower-buds of the caper are supposed to stimulate passion and appetite, and were eaten with vinegar along with meat as they are still; hence the metaphorical use in the passage, whose real meaning is better conveyed by the AV than by the RV literal reading.

The following fruits or herbs are used with meats as condiments:—

Anise or dill (Mt 23[23]), an umbelliferous plant, Anethum graveolens, whose fruits were used as a carminative. It is a native of Palestine. The allied Pimpinella anisum is the anise of Pliny; but the dill is called by Hippocrates ἄνηθον, and by Dioscorides ἀνίκητον, the word used in the text. Its properties are much the same as those of the caraway seed. For an account of references in classical literature see Pliny, xx. 17; and for a figure see Woodville's Med. Botany. In Maaseroth, iv. § 5, Rabbi Eliezer says the seeds, leaves, and stem of the shabath or anise are liable to tithe. Dill is called in Arabic shibt. At the present day the fruit of Anethum is called dill, and that of Pimpinella is anise-seed.

Coriander, the small round fruit of Coriandrum sativum to which the manna was compared, used in the same way as anise, especially in Egypt (Ex 16[31], Nu 11[7]). It is an umbelliferous plant, and grows in Syria and Egypt (see Pliny, xx. 20; and for figures of this and the following plants see Woodville).

Cummin, also an umbelliferous plant (Cuminum sativum), whose fruit was cultivated as a carminative, and was beaten with a rod off the plant when it was ripe (Is 28[25], Mt 23[23]). In Heb. it is called כַּמּוֹן, kammôn, and in Gr. κύμινον. For its use see Pliny, xix. 8. As to the doubt of its being tithed see Demai, ii. § 1.

Mint (ἡδύοσμον, Heb. דנדנא), the well-known aromatic labiate plant Mentha sylvestris, mentioned with the last in Mt 23[23]. For its use among the Jews see Celsius, Hierobot. i. 546, and Pliny, xix. 47. See Uketzin, i. § 2; also Nedarim, 51*b*; Shebiith, vii. §§ 1, 2.

Mustard (σίναπι), the small seed of the common Sinapis nigra, which grows to a very large size in Palestine as the 'greatest of herbs' (Mt 13[32] 17[20], Lk 13[19] 17[6]), and is used as a condiment. See Thomson, Land and Book, i. 453. The pungent seeds of a small tree, Salvadora persica, have been supposed by Dr. Royle to be the mustard of the parable; but this is rarely, if at all, found in Palestine, and is not an herb, but a tree. The only claim is, that it is called in India kharjal, while khardal is the Arabic for mustard (see Royle, Journ. Asiatic Soc. 1844, No. xv., and Lambert, Trans. Linn. Soc. xvii. 449).

To the miraculous food by which the Israelites were fed, the name Manna is given. This has been supposed to be the gummy exudation of the Tamarix mannifera, a shrub which grows in the wilderness; but the whole description indicates that it was a miraculous food.

III. TABOOS.—There are certain prohibitions specially mentioned in the Pentateuch. One of these, the kid in mother's milk, has been already discussed. Blood is one of the most ancient of these taboos, and in connexion with it all animals which died of themselves or were killed otherwise than by being bled, were forbidden. Any such נְבֵלָה, nĕbēlâh, or carcase, might be given to strangers, or sold to foreigners, but was an abomination to the Jews (Dt 14[21]). The eater of it was rendered unclean (Lv 17[15] 22[8]). Likewise that which was torn of beasts (Ex 22[31]), while it might be eaten by the stranger, was not allowed to the Israelite (Lv 17[15]). Hunting by dogs was therefore not practised. The observance of this taboo of פִּגּוּל piggûl, or abominable flesh, is referred to in Ezk 4[14] and Ac 10[14] (πᾶν κοινὸν καὶ ἀκάθαρτον), and it was one of the four 'necessary things' prohibited to the Gentile converts by the Jerusalem Council, Ac 15[28] ('things strangled'). The eating of blood, which is one of the most ancient prohibitions (Gn 9[4]) re-enacted in the Mosaic law in which it is frequently repeated, had not only a hygienic basis, but had reference probably to the drink-offerings of blood which were parts of the heathen rituals (Ps 16[4]). It was thus a law of demarcation, and in Lv 19[26] eating with the blood and auguries are bracketed together. The poisonous effects of bull's blood are referred to by several authors; Midas (Strabo, I. xi. § 21) and Psammenitus (Herodotus, iii. 15) are said to have been killed by it.

The Fat of animals was also forbidden (Lv 7[30]) as food, and in the sacrificed victims this is called 'the food of the burnt-offering' Lv 3[11]. 'All the fat is the Lord's' (v.[16]), see 1 S 2[16], 2 Ch 7[7], Gn 4[4]. What is specially referred to is the thick subcutaneous layer, and that around the kidneys and other viscera, as well as the fatty tails of the sheep. The 'fat things' of the promised spiritual feast in Is 25[6] as well as in Neh 8[10] are מַשְׁמַנִּים mashmannim, delicate things, not חֵלֶב ḥēleb, suet.

The Sinew that shrank (Gn 32[32]), which it was the custom of the Jews to avoid, was a tribal taboo although not specially interdicted by statute. It is not known what part is particularized by the name גִּיד gîd, as the word is a general one, used of the sinews of the whole body in the vision of dry bones, Ezk 37[6]. Some have supposed it to be the great sciatic nerve at the back of the hip (Josephus, Ant. I. xx. 2), but that is not situated in the hollow of the thigh. This region, kaph hayyerek, evidently means the groin, which was facing his antagonist when Jacob was wrestling. There are two sinews there which if cramped cause lameness—one the tendon of the psoas, which exactly fits the description, but is very seldom cramped; the other, that of the adductor longus, is exceedingly liable to cramp when the thigh is twisted, and this causes agonizing pain and lameness, and would effectually disable a wrestler. I have known it to be severely strained in athletic exercises, causing lameness for several weeks. Some Jews have recommended that the hind legs of animals should not be eaten, lest by accident this sinew should be partaken of by mistake. This was not the practice in early times, for Samuel's cook set the thigh of the animal before Saul as the piece of honour (1 S 9[24]. AV and RVm tr. שׁוֹק here 'shoulder'). See Tract Chullin, 7.

Swine, forbidden as food to the Jews, were eaten by the surrounding peoples in general. The Egyptians also considered the pig unclean (Herod. ii. 47), for a reason the Greek author forbears to mention, but which we learn from the Book of the Dead, as the demon Set once appeared in the form of a pig. Hence they are never represented in the older monuments, but appear in those of the New Empire (Wilkinson, ii. 100). The foul habits and coarse feeding of swine, their supposed liability to glandular disease [which has given us the Latin name of such swellings 'scrofula' (Celsus, v. xxviii. 7), and its Greek equivalent χοιράς (Hippoc. Aph. 1248)], and the notion that leprosy followed the eating of swine's flesh, contributed to this dislike. After the Captivity, however, especially under Syrian and Roman domination, the keeping of swine was practised for commercial purposes if not for food, hence our Lord's references Mt 7[6], Lk 15[15], Mt 8[30] (see Thomson, i. 355 ff.). Swine's flesh is taboo to the Mohammedan as well as to the Jew. For a detailed consideration of this prohibition see Spencer, de legibus Hebræorum ritualibus, Cambridge, 1727, i. p. 131.

The Camel, which is eaten by the Bedawin, was forbidden by the Levitical code. It is coarse and rather dry meat. The milk, however, was used in patriarchal times (see above). It was probably camel's milk which Jael gave to Sisera.

The Hare (אַרְנֶבֶת), only mentioned as being unclean because it is not cloven-footed, was common in the hilly regions. In the North the commonest species is Lepus Syriacus, in the South L. Ægyptiacus, and in the Arabah and Dead Sea district L. Sinaiticus. It is said to chew the cud from its habit of sitting in its form, but it is not a true ruminant. The same is the case with the shaphan or coney, which is the Hyrax Syriacus.

The oldest taboo is that of the fruit of the tree עֵץ הַדַּעַת טוֹב וָרָע 'of the knowledge of good and evil.' Conjecture as to the actual tree meant is useless, but it is worth noting that the banana was identified with it by many mediæval writers; see Brocard's Descript. Terra Sancta, xi. See also Celsius, Hierobot., in which it is supposed to be the quince.

In the NT there is added the taboo of things offered to idols (Ac 21[25], 1 Co 8[1]). The early ecclesiastics increased the stringency of the apostle's ordinance, and by the Council of Ancyra (c. 7) it was forbidden to a Christian to eat in any place which was connected with idolatrous worship, even if he brought his own food. On the other hand, Gregory, in writing to Augustine (Ep. xi. 76), recommends that the heathen sacrifices of oxen should be allowed to be continued in the English temples to accustom the people gradually to the change of ritual, but that they should be made on saints' days. For the tabooed vineyard on account of mixed seeds see above; and for rabbinical comments on taboos see Aboda Zara, especially v. § 9.

The Ass, though an unclean animal, was eaten during periods of famine. In 2 K 6[25] it is said that during the siege of Samaria a רֹאשׁ חֲמֹר rōsh-ḥămōr, or ass's head, was sold for about £10. It has been supposed that this meant a measure of corn, but this is unlikely. In periods of dearth, distinctions of food are impracticable (Ezk 4[13]); for parallels see Plutarch (vit. Artax. Mnemon, i. 1023, and Xenophon, Anab. i. § 5). Even human flesh was eaten in such straits, see 2 K 6[29], La 4[10], Ezk 5[10].

IV. Food Preparation.—In primitive times the field, the flock, and the herd supplied all that was needful to the family, who procured it directly when wanted as in Gn 18[5]; but with the growth of towns and the consequent division of labour, food became a matter of merchandise. It was so in time of famine (Gn 42[4]), or to those on journeys (Dt 2[6. 28]). Markets or bazaars became established in the towns (Jer 37[21]), and merchants and shopmen (1 K 10[15]) supplied the wants of the town-dwellers. We read of such sellers of victual in Jerusalem (Neh 13[15]) and Samaria (Jn 4[8]). In this way, bread, water, fruit, milk, and flesh are purveyed to the people of the cities of the East.

Cookery was practised or supervised by the wife (Gn 18[6]), or by a slave (Gn 18[7]). At set feasts there was a cook employed (1 S 9[23]) who killed the animals, and hence was called טַבָּח ṭabbāḥ, a word also applied to soldiers or executioners (Jer 39[9]). Some of these were female cooks (1 S 8[13]) who dressed the meats, and differed from the אֹפוֹת or bakers, and the רַקָּחוֹת who were perfumers or spice mixers (1 S 8[13] AV and RV 'confectionaries').

The animals were killed immediately before being cooked (Gn 18[7], Lk 15[23]); the throat was cut and the blood poured out in accordance with Lv 7[26] (see 1 S 14[3–ff.]); they were then flayed (Mic 3[3]) and cut up into joints, except in the case of small animals such as lambs, which were cooked whole (Ex 12[46]). With larger animals the flesh was separated from the bones, and these broken when the flesh was to be boiled (Mic 3[3]). The doubtful ἅπ. λεγ. פִּיכָה is tr. in Job 15[27] collops.

Boiling was the ordinary method of cooking, hence בָּשַׁל bāshal, to boil, is used of cooking in general (2 S 13[8]). The vessels used for this purpose were pots or caldrons of different kinds, which are called by six different names (see below). Some of the sacrifices were boiled, having first been flayed, the fat alone being burned (2 Ch 35[13]). This was especially the case with the sacrificial feasts, peace-offering, or hostia honorifica. In boiling, the caldron was first partly filled with water, and the flesh put in (Ezk 24[3]); sometimes milk was used, as Burckhardt describes being done at the present day (i. 63), and occasionally the bones were used to make the fire burn briskly, as Ezekiel describes. When the scum rises it is taken off (Ezk 24[6], but RV tr. חֵלְאָה hel'âh, as 'the rust of the pot,' not scum, LXX lós). In Ezk 24[10] AV tr. תַּרְקִים harḳîaḥ, 'spice it well," as if derived from רָקַח to mix spices, but LXX has it ἐλαττώθη ὁ ζωμός, and RV renders it 'make thick the broth.' Spicing, that is, mixing with savoury or carminative herbs, was used to render meat savoury (Gn 27[4]), and such food was called 'dainty meat' (Pr 23[3-6] מַטְעַם maṭ'am, but called man'am in Ps 141[4]). Salt was also added, and when boiled the broth, מָרָק mârak (Is 65[4] Kerê, but the Kethib has parak, which means a stew or a mess of mincemeat in broth), was served separately (Jg 6[19. 20]). In modern Hebrew, soup is רַקְרֶקֶת raḳreḳeth. The broth may be used as a sauce for meat (Burckhardt, i. 63), or eaten with bread and butter (Gn 18[8]). Vegetables or rice or meal may be boiled in it or eaten mixed with it. Vegetable food was also boiled in water, with butter or with milk, to make pottage (Gn 25[29], 2 K 4[38]), which was of the consistence of thick Scotch broth or thin porridge.

Roasting was practised with small animals, such as the paschal lamb, which was cooked whole (Ex 12[46]) over an open fire (Ex 12[8], 2 Ch 35[13]), which was of wood (Is 44[16]). Animals taken in the chase were also roasted (חָרַךְ ḥârak, Pr 12[27]). Or the meat was baked in an oven, which may have been sunk in the ground (see BREAD). The paschal lamb was flayed before being roasted (2 Ch 35[11]). Eli's sons (1 S 2[12ff.]) sinned in that they took part of the flesh, which should have been boiled, and roasted it. They also seem not to have been content with the priestly share, which was ultimately fixed as the breast of the peace-offering and the right shoulder (Lv 7[31-32]). The only method of cooking fish mentioned in the Bible is broiling (ὀπτός, Lk 24[42], see Jn 21[9]) on the coals. In the Gizeh Museum there is a representation of shepherds broiling fish over the fire, and wiping the ashes from them with little bundles of straw (see Perrot-Chipiez, Hist. de l'Art dans l'antiquité, i.).

V. VESSELS used in the conveyance and cooking of food. There were several kinds of basket (see BASKET). The pots were of six kinds: 1. סִיר sîr, LXX λέβης, called in Jer 1[13] a sîr nâphûaḥ or boiling caldron. Of this kind were the flesh-pots of Egypt (Ex 16[3]) and the great pot used by the sons of the prophets (2 K 4[38]), as well as the caldron of Ezekiel's visions (11[3. 7] 24[6]), and of Zechariah (14[20. 21]). In the list of temple furniture this word is tr. 'pot' in 1 K 7[45] and 'pan' in Ex 27[3], in which cases it was a brazen vessel for ashes, not for boiling. It is tr[d] 'washpot' in Ps 60[8] and 'caldrons' in Jer 52[18] (RV pots). 2. דּוּד dûd, usually tr. basket (which see), is the kettle of 1 S 2[14] and the caldron of 2 Ch 35[13], tr. λέβης by LXX in the latter case. 3. The pan of 1 S 2[14], 1 K 7[38], and 2 Ch 4[6] is כִּיּוֹר kiyyor, LXX λέβης. This word is variously tr. 'torch' (Zec 12[6], RV 'pan'), 'laver,' or washing vessel (Ex 30[18] etc.), and seems to have been a shallow, wide-mouthed utensil. The כִּירִים of Lv 11[35], which like the tannûr or oven could be broken down, was probably, as AV and RV render it in the text, a firehearth or range for pots (RVm has 'stewpan'), perhaps of two sides as the dual indicates, LXX χυτρόποδες. 4. The caldron of Mic 3[3] is קַלַּחַת ḳallaḥath, similarly tr. in 1 S 2[14], LXX χύτρα, an earthenware vessel for boiling. These were slightly glazed by means of salt and litharge. This may be referred to in the סִיגִים or silver dross of Pr 26[23]. 5. The pot of 1 S 2[14] is קְרוּר pârûr, tr. 'pan' in Nu 11[8] (RV pots); in Jg 6[19] it was a pot for holding broth, LXX χυτρά. 6. The pan of 2 Ch 35[13] is צֵלָחָה ṣêlâḥâh. This is the word tr. 'cruse' in 2 K 2[20], and 'dish' in 2 K 21[13] and Pr 19[24] (AV tr. it here 'bosom' as LXX κόλπος).

The caldron of AV Job 41[20] is properly translated 'rushes' in RV. The figure being that leviathan's snortings make the pool in which he swims to boil like a caldron and the reeds to seem as if on fire.

The סִיר הַבָּשָׂר or flesh hook was a brazen fork (Ex 27[3]), which had three teeth (1 S 2[13]). The hooks of Ezk 40[43] for hanging up the slaughtered carcases of the offered animals are called שְׂפָתַיִם sh̄phattaîm.

The firepan or chafing dish of 2 K 25[15] מַחְתָּה maḥtâh was used for carrying burning coals. These vessels were of gold in the first temple.

The dishes or trays or other vessels in which food and drink were served are known by various names. Pottage was eaten out of the pot in which it was boiled (2 K 4[40]). Thomson describes the Bedawin sitting around a large saucepan and doubling their bread spoon-fashion to eat their lentil pottage (i. 253). Many of the vessels named were employed only in the temple service.

אֲגַרְטָל 'âgartâl, LXX ψυκτήρ, Vulg. phiala, only used in Ezr 1[9] and tr. 'charger,' was a gold bowl or basin, said by Ibn Ezra to be the same as that called mizrâḳ.

אַגָּן 'aggân, LXX κρατήρ, used in Ex 24[6] for a wash-vessel or basin for sacrificial blood, made of gold, silver, or brass. Its plural is tr. cups in Is 22[24]; see also Ca 7[2].

אֲסוּךְ 'âsûḳ, an oil vessel 2 K 4[2] tr. 'pot,' after Kimchi, but more probably a flask or bottle.

אֲרוֹן 'argâz, a coffer or box, which could be slung to the side of a cart, such as that in which the votive offerings of the Philistines were sent (1 S 6[11]).

בַּקְבֻּק baḳbuḳ, a wide-mouthed bottle or cruse for carrying honey (1 K 14[3]). It was of earthenware, and so was easily broken (Jer 19[1. 10]); LXX renders it βικός, which is the name given by Herodotus to the Babylonian casks of palm wine (i. 194). Athenæus uses it for a drinking vessel (784 D). In Maltese a large vessel of this kind is called bakbyka.

גְּבִיעַ gâbîa', wine bowls (as Jer 35[5], LXX κεράμιον), of earthenware, from which wine was poured into goblets. A silver cup used for drinking and divination Gn 44[2]; LXX κόνδυ, said to be a Persian word. It is used for the pots of wine out of which Jeremiah filled the kûsôth for the Rechabites, Jer 35[5].

גֻּלָּה gullâh, LXX στρεπτὸν ἀνθέμιον, a round vessel for holding oil in a lamp Zec 4[3], the golden cruse of Ec 12[6], used also for the rounded bowls above the capitals of the temple-pillars in 1 K 7[41] and 2 Ch 4[12. 13], possibly volutes such as those shown on the tablet of Samas in the Brit. Museum.

כַּד kad, a pail or barrel to hold meal 1 K 17[14], or water 1 K 18[33]. This name is given to Rebekah's pitcher Gn 24[14. 15ff.], and to Gideon's men's pitchers Jg 7[16]; see also Ec 12[6].

כְּלִי kĕlî, a vessel in general, of gold and silver Gn 24[53], or of clay Lv 11[33], apparently so called irrespective of shape, used for the vessels of the temple Is 52[11], Ezr 1[7], Nu 4[15].

כּוֹס kôs, a wine cup as in Gn 40[11. 13. 21]. Pharaoh's wine chalice, the cup which passed around the circle at a meal 2 S 12[3]. See also Pr 23[31], used metaphorically Ps 11[6] 116[13], Is 51[17-22], Hab 2[16] etc.

כֹּר and קַב were vessels of measurement, the former about 8 bushels, the latter about 4 pints. קָאָה, also a measure, nearly equals the English peck, and is a little greater than the μόδιος or 'bushel' of Mt 5[15]. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

כֹּפּוֹר kĕphôr, a deep cup or chalice as 1 Ch 28[17], Ezr 1[10], and 8[27], probably a cup with a cover.

מַחֲבַת maḥăbath, a flat plate(?) for frying or baking bread Lv 6[14] 7[9], 1 Ch 23[29], Ezk 4[3]. See BREAD.

מַחְתָּה maḥtâh, a firepan 2 K 25[15], or an incense bowl Lv 16[12], a coalpan Ex 27[3] 25[38], LXX πυρεῖον.

מְנַקִּיָּה mĕnaḳḳîyâh, a sacrificial dish Ex 25[29] 37[16], Nu 4[7], Jer 52[19], probably a libation vessel.

מַרְכֶּבֶת mĕdōḳâh, a mortar in which e.g. the manna was beaten before being baked Nu 11[8].

מִזְרָק a bowl; of these Hiram made a hundred 2 Ch 4[8], 1 K 7[45. 46]. See Ex 25[29], 1 Ch 28[14. 17], Nu 7[13], Zec 9[15]. For the numbers of these φιάλαι and σπονδεῖα see Jos. Ant. VIII. iii. 7, 8. It is a sacrificial bowl for dashing (זָרַק) the blood in a volume against the altar (see Driver's note on Am 6[6]).

נאד nōd, a skin bottle, see above under Wine.

נֵבֶל nebel, a skin of wine 1 S 1[24] 10[3], 2 S 16[1]; this word is also used for an earthen vessel as in Is 22[24] 30[14]. It is also the name of a musical instrument, a lute (RV) or psaltery or viol Is 5[12].

סַף ṣaph, a basin or bowl for blood Ex 12[22], Jer 52[19], for wine Is 51[17], Zec 12[2].

סְפֶל sĕphel, a bowl Jg 5[25] 6[38]; LXX λεκάνη; also in 1 K 7[50] and 2 K 12[13].

פַּךְ pak, a vial or flask of oil 1 S 10[1], 2 K 9[1-3]; LXX φακός, probably the same as the baḳbuḳ.

צַפַּחַת ṣappaḥath, a water bottle 1 S 26[12], 1 K 19[6], or an oil bottle 1 K 17[12]; an oryballus or round vessel with a narrow neck, see Thomson, ii. 21. See 2 K 9[1-3] for box of ointment.

צְלָחָה ṣĕlāḥâh, a dish or bowl in which sacrifices were boiled as in 2 Ch 35[13], or a flat saucer for salt 2 K 2[20] 21[13], Pr 19[24] 26[15].

צִנְצֶנֶת ṣinṣeneth, in Ex 16[33], was the pot in which the manna was laid up, a vase or jar according to Abu'l Walid and Sa'adya.

Ἀλάβαστρον of Mt 26[7] was a vessel made of satin spar or Oriental alabaster, which is a variegated kind of marble of calcium carbonate, not the gypsum or calcium sulphate now called alabaster. Vessels of this kind are described by Theophrastus (de Odoribus, 41) and by Pliny (ix. 56) as elongated or pear-shaped with fairly narrow necks. Some alabastra were made of glass, gold (Plutarch, Vit. Alex.), or earthenware (Epiphanius, de mensuris et ponderibus, xxiv. 182).

Πίναξ, the charger in which the Baptist's head was sent (Mt 14[8. 11]), was a flat dish. Finn refers to a case in which some Bedawin sent the head of an enemy on a dish on the top of a pillau of rice (p. 35). The παροψίς of Mt 23[25] was a smaller dish on which dainty food was served.

Of other NT vessels, ποτήριον is the drinking cup of Mk 7[4], and that used at the Last Supper Mk 14[23] etc. ξέστης in Mk 7[4] is a Latinism, a corruption of sextarius, a pint measure. The word is used by Sicilian writers. χάλκιον in the same passage is a copper or bronze vessel of any shape. ὑδρίαι λίθιναι at the feast at Cana (Jn 2[6]) were stone pitchers of considerable capacity. Early figures of these from sarcophagi and from the well-known ivory plaque in Ravenna are published by Bottari and Bandini, and an ancient hydria is shown as one of these in the Ch. of St. Ursula in Cologne; for others see Didron, Annales Archéol. xiii. 2.

VI. The usual MEALS in ordinary life were two—a mid-day meal or dinner, and an evening meal or supper, which was the more important. Breakfast was, and still is, an informal repast. That in Jn 21[13] was a meal after a night of toil, so 'dine' in AV is replaced in RV by 'break your fast' (ἀριστήσατε). The meal at the Pharisee's house in Lk 11[37] is also, as in RVm, a breakfast or early meal. Peter, defending the apostles, points out that they could not be drunken, as it was only 9 o'clock in the morning (Ac 2[15]). Early drinking of wine at such a time was a sign of degradation (Is 5[11]), and eating in the morning is deprecated as culpable luxury (Ec 10[16]) and out of due season.

It is still the custom in the East to make the morning repast a very slight one—a cup of milk, a piece of butter. Robinson describes melted butter (semen), or oil poured over bread, as a breakfast dish (ii. 70), or cakes baked on the ashes and broken up and mixed with butter in a dish (ii. 18). The morning meal of the Bedawi is about 9 or 10 o'clock (Burckhardt, Notes, i. 69). Drummond notices how his negro bearers in tropical Africa rose from sleep and began their day's work without food (Tropical Africa, p. 100).

The mid-day meal or dinner in Egypt was at noon (Gn 43[16]), and probably was at the same time in Palestine (Ru 2[14]). Abstinence from this is called fasting (Jg 20[26], 1 S 14[24], 2 S 1[12] 3[35]). From these passages it is evident that the people were accustomed to 'eat bread' at mid-day. God promised to Israel bread in the morning and flesh in the evening (Ex 16[12]). This early meal is the ἄριστον of Lk 14[12]. St. Peter's intended meal, interrupted by Cornelius' messengers, was at 12 o'clock. This meal took some time to prepare, so the good housewife began to make ready this חֹק while it was yet night (Pr 31[15]). The meal is called אֲרֻחָה 'ărûḥâh, as in Jer 40[5] 52[34], 2 K 25[30], and Pr 15[17]. The noon meal is described in Lane's Modern Egyptians, p. 156 ff. (Gardner's ed.). It sometimes was a period of excess (1 K 20[16]).

The supper after the day's work is done (Ru 3[7]) is, and was, the more important meal (see Burckhardt's Notes, i. 69), and the one at which flesh meat was more commonly used. At these meals the whole family was gathered together. According to Josephus, the law required dinner to be at the sixth hour on the Sabbath day (Life, 54), i.e. at 12 o'clock; but in § 44 he speaks of feasting with his friends at the second hour of the night = 8 p.m. See also BJ I. xvii. 4, and the great supper of Lk 14[15ff.].

In the patriarchal days they seem to have sat on the ground as they do at present. Abraham's guests probably thus sat while he stood and served (Gn 18[8]). Jacob says to his father 'sit and eat of my venison,' but that was probably because the blind old man was recumbent (Gn 27[19]). Jacob's sons also sat down to eat (Gn 37[25]), as the Egyptian shepherds are represented in a painting from Sakkarah, now in the Gizeh Museum. The Levite and his concubine sat down to eat (Jg 19[6]). Saul also sat at meat (1 S 20[5. 24]), as did Samuel when he brought Saul to feast with him (1 S 9[22]), and Jesse and his family (1 S 16[11]). The old prophet and his guest likewise took the forbidden meal sitting at a table (1 K 13[20]). Sitting at meat is mentioned in Pr 23[1], Jer 16[8], Ezk 44[3]. Sitting, however, might have in some of these cases meant reclining, for Oholibah is described as sitting on a stately bed with a table prepared before it (Ezk 23[41]), and the guests at Esther's banquet reclined on couches (Est 7[8]). The table is also mentioned in Ps 23[5]. Sitting on the ground was, however, regarded as a sign of humiliation and abasement in prophetic times, as in Is 3[26] 47[1] 52[2], Jer 13[18] RVm, La 2[10], Ezk 26[16].

In NT times the usual attitude was reclining and resting on the left elbow; as at the supper described in Jn 13[23], John reclined in front of our Lord, and so when he leant back to speak to Him John's head was on Jesus' breast. It has been supposed from these expressions that the patriarchal custom changed, and that the practice of sitting as the Egyptians did was adopted by early Israel, the fashion changing in later time into the Græco-Roman custom of reclining on a couch with a cushion for the left elbow, and the right arm free; but it is probable that these changes were slight, and that the phrase sitting at meat does not specify a posture such as that to which we give the name. Thus our Lord uses the phrase of the attitude in His own time (Lk 14^{8} 17^{7} 22^{27}), and the multitude whom He miraculously fed sat down on the ground (Jn 6^{10}). Of the tables, we have preserved a figure in the shewbread table on the Arch of Titus. They must have been high enough in the days of Adonibezek for the 70 captive kings to sit on a lower level (Jg 1^{7}); but the same phrase is used in NT times of the crumbs falling to the dogs under the table (Mt 15^{27}, Mk 7^{28}), and Lazarus is said to have sat at table at the feast (Jn 12^{2}). The couches or mattresses on which the eaters sat or reclined are never mentioned except in the cases given above, and the stool in the prophet's chamber is the only material seat specified in the OT, except royal thrones. At ordinary meals it is probable that the family squatted around the dish, out of which they all helped themselves, even as is done at the present day by the Bedawin. For an account of the ancient tables see Athenæus, Deipnosophistæ, especially ii. 32. The costly couches for reclining, with ivory corners, are mentioned in Am 3^{12} and 6^{4}. Homer refers to sitting at food, Il. x. 578; Odyss. i. 145.

The food at an ordinary meal at present consists of messes of lentile-pottage (נָזִיד nāzîd) eaten with bread or wooden spoons (Robinson, ii. 86; Gn 25^{34}). Sometimes this is thickened with vegetables, or pillaus of rice with or without meat, thin sheets of bread serving for plates, and used to sop up the gravy (Finn, 24). Sometimes bread, cheese, olives, and leben make up the repast (Finn, 272). Doughty describes an Arab meal in which the family surrounded a vast trencher heaped with boiled mutton 'and great store of girdle bread.' Pieces torn off with the hand from the meat were lapped in the thin cakes of bread and handed to those who could not reach the dish (i. 46). Robinson saw, likewise, the guests surrounding a circular tray on which was a mountain of pillau of rice boiled with butter, and small pieces of meat strewed through it. Other dishes used are sausages stuffed with rice and chopped meat. Burckhardt gives a graphic account of the discomforts of such a feast to one unaccustomed to Eastern habits, Notes, i. 63. The poorer classes of Bedawin live chiefly on bread, eaten with raw leeks or radishes for flavouring, which is the 'dinner of herbs' (Pr 15^{17}; see Ro 14^{2}, Dn 1^{12}). For such a meal the son of the prophets went out to collect the 'ôrôth or herbs (2 K 4^{39}). The Bedawi meal described in Ezk 25^{5} consisted of bread, dates, and milk. For an ordinary meal there is generally one dish, so that the member of the family who cooks, when it is brought in, has no further work. Hence our Lord's remonstrance with Martha, that one dish alone was needful (Lk 10^{42}). It was the duty of the cook to bring in the dishes when prepared (1 S 9^{23}), and that of the head of the family to distribute the portions (1 S 1^{5}), whose size might be varied according to his affection for the members of the circle. So Joseph gave Benjamin a fivefold mess, and Elkanah gave Hannah a double portion (but LXX says that he gave her only μερίδα μίαν, 'a single portion,' because she had no child). Very often, however, the circle help themselves when they can reach the dish, and as the meat has been cut up before being cooked it does not need any carving. At the present day the Mussulmans drink water or milk or leben with their meals, but probably in earlier times wine was used as a drink. In ancient times barley or polenta was used as rice is now, and the pillau was the ἠλφιτωμένα κρέα of the classics (see Gruner, de Primit. Oblatione). The food carried on journeys consisted of bread, cakes of figs or raisins, parched corn, and water. The good Samaritan carried also wine and oil. Dough is sometimes carried tied in a wallet or cloth (see Doughty, i. 231).

VII. Feasts, or special meals, were provided on particular occasions, and are frequently mentioned. These were of various kinds—(1) Feasts of hospitality for the entertainment of strangers (Gn $18^{2ff.}$). These might be at any time—Abraham's was at the heat of the day, Lot's (Gn 19^{1-3}) was in the evening. For such feasts at the present day see Burckhardt, Robinson, Doughty, etc. (2) Entertainments of friends specially invited (Lk 14^{16} and many other passages). These were usually evening feasts. (3) Religious or sacrificial feasts, non-Jewish or Jewish, 'eating bread before God' (Ex 18^{12}), eating of sacrifices (Ex 34^{15} 29^{32}, Lv $19^{5.6}$, Nu $29^{12ff.}$, Dt 12^{7} $27^{6.7}$, 1 S 9^{13}, 2 S 6^{19}, 1 K 1^{9} 3^{15}, Zeph 1^{7}); also at the offering of tithes (Dt 14^{26}). Closely allied were (4) anniversary feasts, such as Passover (Ex 12^{14}), Purim (Est 9^{22}), and the Lord's Supper. (5) Celebrations of the completion of a great work, such as the building of the temple (2 Ch 7^{8}), the carrying home of the ark (2 S 6^{19}), a great deliverance (Jg 16^{23}), or the ratification of a treaty (Gn 26^{30} and 31^{54}). (6) At the beginning of a great work or laying a foundation. A reference to such a feast is in Pr 9^{1-5}. (7) Harvest-homes (Ex 23^{16}), sheepshearing (1 S 25^{36}, 2 S 13^{23}), vintage (Jg 9^{27}), and other agricultural events, were likewise the occasions of feasting. (8) Family events were celebrated by feasts of relatives and friends: circumcision (Lk 2^{58-59}), weaning (Gn 21^{8}), marriage (Jn 2^{1}, Gn 29^{22}, To 8^{19}, Jg 14^{10}, Mt 22^{2}), the return of a wandering member (Lk 15^{23}), funerals (2 S 3^{35}, Jer 16^{7}, Hos 9^{4}, To 4^{17}). Birthday feasts were not common among Jews, some of whom thought them profane (Lightfoot, Iselius), probably because other nations, such as the Persians, honoured them so conspicuously (see Herod. i. 133). Birthday feasts are mentioned in Gn 40^{20}, Job 1^{4}, Mt 14^{6-9}). Among modern Jews the circumcision feast is an important occasion (see Circumcision).

Any such feast was called מִשְׁתֶּה mishteh, the primary meaning of which is a banquet of wine, such as that given by queen Esther (Est 5^{6} 7^{7}). Abraham's feast at Isaac's weaning is called a mishteh gādôl, or great drinking. Job feared lest his sons should be led into excess at their periodic feasts (1^{5}) Such drinking feasts are specially mentioned in 1 S 25^{36}, 2 S 13^{28}, Dn 5^{1}, and reprobated by the prophets Amos (6^{6}) and Isaiah (5^{11}). In the NT κῶμοι are spoken of in Ro 13^{13}, Gal 5^{21}, and 1 P 4^{3}. The feast in 2 K 6^{23} is named כְּרָה kērâh, perhaps because the prisoner guests sat in a ring (cf. נִכַּב in 1 S 16^{11}).

For these banquets the food animals were slain early in the day (Is 22^{13}, Pr 9^{2}, Mt 22^{4}), and a second invitation sent to remind just before the feast (Est 6^{14}, Pr 9^{3}, Mt 22^{3}). The guests on arrival were sometimes welcomed with a kiss (To 7^{6}, Lk 7^{45}; see Goezius, de Osculo, in Ugolini, xxx.), and provided with water to wash their hands, as they put their hands in the common dish (Mk 7^{3}; see Odyss. i. 136). These washings were made burdensome by traditional rituals (Mk 7^{2-13}). When the visitors came from a distance they were supplied with water to wash their feet. So Abraham did for the angels at their noontide feast (Gn 18^{4}), and Lot for their evening feast (Gn 19^{2}). So the old man at Gibeah did for the Levite and his concubine (Jg 19^{21}). See our Lord's rebuke to Simon (Lk 7^{44}), His own practice (Jn 13^{4}), and apostolic reference (1 Ti 5^{10}). The anointing of guests is referred to in Ps 23^{5}, Am 6^{6}, Lk 7^{38}, Jn 12^{3} (see Anointing; and in addition to the literature quoted there, see Weymar, de Unctione Sacra Heb., in Ugolini, xii.; Reinerus and Verwey, de Unctionibus, and Graberg, de unctione Christi in Bethania, in Ugolini, xxx.). The crowning of guests with garlands is mentioned in Is 28^1, Wis 2^8, Jos. Ant. XIX. ix. 1. See Plutarch, Symp. III. i. 3, and Martial, x. 19. After these preliminaries they sat down, males and females together (Ru 2^{14}, 1 S 1^4, Job 1^4, Lk 10^{40}); and grace was said in Jewish feasts (Mt 14^{19}, Lk 9^{16}, Jn 6^{11}). The guests were arranged in order of rank (Gn 43^{33}, 1 S 9^{22} 20^{25}, Lk 14^8, Mk 12^{39}, Jos. Ant. XV. ii. 4), the highest occupying the 'chief room,' the seat on the protoklisia. In Assyr. feasts they are represented as sitting (Layard, Nineveh, ii. 411). For Jewish practice see above. According to the Tosaphoth to Berachoth, vi., each guest had a separate table, but Pr 23^1 speaks of sitting at meat with the host; and David says that he sat at table with Saul (1 S 20^5). The food was distributed either by the cook or by the head of the house (2 S 6^{19}, Gn 43^{34}), and the most honoured guest received the largest portion (Gn 43^{34}; see Herod. vi. 57), or else the tit-bit (1 S 9^{24}). To guests who could not come, presents of food were sometimes sent (2 S 11^8, Neh 8^{10}, Est $9^{19\text{-}22}$).

At a feast in NT times the guests reclined on a triclinium, the couches being arranged on three sides of a square, the fourth side being open for serving, and strangers might stand around on the outer side (see Rashi, ad Berachoth, 46*b*. 16; Pesachim, vii. 13). A wine cup was passed round containing wine mixed with three parts of water (Shabbath, viii. 1); to this there are many metaphorical allusions in which the cup in the hand of the Lord is spoken of (Ps 75^8, Jer 25^{15}; see Buxtorf, Synagog. Jud. xii. 242, and Werner, de Poculo Benedictionis). The guests were entertained with music (2 S 19^{35}, Is 5^{12}, Am $6^{4.5}$, Lk 15^{25}; see Maimonides, de Jejuniis, 5), dancing (Mt 14^6), and riddles (Jg 14^{12}). After the feast the hands were washed, as they were soiled by eating. Finn saw a guest taking handfuls of buttered rice from the dish, out of which he squeezed the butter between his fingers and licked it as it flowed down (Byeways, 171; Burckhardt, Notes, i. 63). Grace was said at the close of the meal (Dt 8^{10}, Ro 14^6; see Berachoth, vi. § 8). Wedding feasts were given by the bridegroom (Jg 14^{10}), but the arrangements were carried out under the direction of a symposiarch or ruler of the feast, and they sometimes lasted seven days (Jn 2^9, To 7^8; see Selden, de Uxor. Heb. ii. 11). Wedding garments given to guests are mentioned in Mt 22^{11}.

The giver of the feast sometimes marked distinguished guests by giving them a sop of bread held between the thumb and finger. A ψωμον of this kind dipped in the ḥarôseth was given by our Lord to Judas. Sops are used to catch and convey pieces of meat (Lane, i. 193; Burckhardt, i. 63). In Proverbs the laziness of the sluggard is said to be such that he will not even lift up a sop (19^{24} 26^{15}).

For metaphorical allusions to feasts see Is 25^6; the feast of angels at the finishing of creation is referred to in Job 38^7. For Jewish feasts in general see Buxtorf, de conviviis vet. Hebræorum.

FOOL.—A. IN OT. The words tr^d by 'fool,' 'folly,' 'foolishness,' are the following: 1. נָבָל, נְבָלָה (opp. חָכָם in Dt 32^6, see Driver, ad loc., and on 22^{21} $32^{15.\ 21}$). 2. פֶּתִי, פְּתַיְּה, פְּתִיּוּת, סָכָל, סְכָלָה, סִכְלוּת (the root סכל means possibly 'to be thick, plump, sluggish'). 3. אִוֶּלֶת, אִוֶּלִי, אִוִּיל (root-conception possibly the same as in the preceding). 4. הוֹלֵלוּת, הוֹלֵלוֹת, מְהוּלָל (from a root suggesting the idea of wild frantic folly). 5. תִּפְלָה, תָּפֵל (from a root 'to be insipid'), only in Job 1^{22} 24^{12}, Jer 23^{13}. 6. אֱוִלָה (supposed by Dillm. to be connected with Eth. taḥala, 'to err'), Job 4^{18}.

All these terms denote something distinct from imbecility on the one hand and insanity on the other hand. It is in the forms under 4 only that the notions of 'folly' and 'madness' come together (cf. Job 12^{17}, Is 44^{25} with 1 S 21^{13}, Jer 25^{16}). As a rule, different words (derivatives from שָׁגַע) are used for 'madman' and 'madness.' The OT idea of 'folly' can be best understood from the antithesis it forms to 'wisdom.' Wisdom is not a theoretical or abstractly scientific apprehension of things, but such a practical immediate insight into their reality and manner of action as enables one to use them to advantage. Correspondingly, a fool is not one who is deficient in the power of logical thought, but one who lacks the natural discernment and tact required for success in life. Both wisdom and folly are teleological conceptions, and rest on the principle of adjustment to a higher law for some practical purpose. This general idea is, however, applied with considerable variety as to particular shades of meaning.

(a) In the widest sense folly is lack of commonsense in ordinary affairs (Gn 31^{28}, 1 S 25^{25} [נָבָל, נְבָלָה], 26^{21} [הִסְכַּלְתִּי], 2 S 15^{31} [סַכֵּל]). Here the element of unreasonableness and inexpediency is most prominent.

(b) A moral and religious element enters into the conception where it expresses flagrantly sinful conduct such as offends against the fundamental principles of natural law and usage. In this sense fools are great sinners—impious, reprobate people. But the original idea is retained in so far as the thought of sudden divine retribution lies in the background, it being considered the height of folly, by violating the elementary rules of religion and morality, to expose one's self to the untimely end which frequently befalls the fool (Jos 7^{15}, 2 S 3^{33} (cf. Driver, in loco), Job 2^{10} 30^8 $5^{2.\ 3}$ [all נָבָל, נְבָלָה], Ps 107^{17} [אֱוִיל]). A profounder and more spiritualized turn is given to this idea in some of the psalms, where it is applied to sin as such (Ps 38^5 69^5 [אִוֶּלֶת], cf. 2 S 24^{10} [נִסְכַּלְתִּי]). This whole usage, with its identification of what is sensible and right, bespeaks a high development of the popular moral sense in Israel.

(c) A special usage connected with the foregoing characterizes as folly sexual sins of various kinds (Gn 34^7, Dt 22^{21}, Jg $19^{22.\ 23.\ 24}$ $20^{6.\ 10}$, Jer 29^{23}). The standing phrase is 'folly in Israel,' 'which ought not to be done,' the implication being that such offences go against all reason in undermining the foundations of society as well as destroying the holiness of Israel. נָבָל and נְבָלָה are regularly used in this meaning; a synonym is זִמָּה 'lewdness'; cf. further the sense of נְבָלוּת in Hos 2^{12}, and of the verb in passages like Jer 14^{21}, Mic 7^6, Nah 3^6; further, נְבָלָה in Job 42^8.

(d) Inasmuch as in the Mosaic law a special norm has been given for the wise guidance of Israel's life, disregard of this law is equivalent to foolishness. Apostate Israel is 'a foolish (נָבָל) people and unwise' (Dt 32^6); the Gentiles, not possessed of such a revelation, are 'a foolish nation,' 'a no-people' (Dt 32^{21}; cf. Dt 4^6, Jer 4^{22} [סָכָל]). The heathen diviners stand revealed as fools when the divinely-guided course of history foretold to Israel mocks their prognostications (Is $19^{11.\ 13}$ 44^{25}, Ezk 13^3). Especially the higher classes among Israel might be expected to have profited by this wisdom (Jer 5^4).

(e) A more specialized meaning is assumed by the term 'fool' in the so-called Ḥokhma-literature of the OT (Job, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and some psalms and prophetic passages). Here also foolishness is the opposite of wisdom. But wisdom has developed, out of the unreflecting instinctive gift of seeing right and doing right, into the conscious art of successfully ordering the whole of individual life and conduct in harmony with the teleological principles of the divine government of the world, especially as embodied in the revealed law. Hence wisdom and folly are here introduced as personifications; and the divine wisdom, as the archetypal source of every teleological arrangement, is distinguished from human wisdom. Wisdom in this sense is 'practical virtuosity in the entire domain of ethics' (Riehm); it is equivalent to methodically applied religion and morality, as appears from the frequent interchange between it and the terms denoting piety and righteousness. Folly, as its contrast, is presented under two aspects, being either confined to a simple disregard of the rules of wisdom, or proceeding to open denial of the principle of divine government on which these rules are based. In the former character the fool is elaborately depicted in Proverbs. While wisdom consists primarily in circumspect behaviour, self-control, self-restraint, and teachableness, the fool is he who lets his undisciplined nature have free play—the self-reliant, self-pleased, arrogant, indocile, hasty with words, contentious, envious, quick to anger, intemperate, credulous, sluggish, given to pursuit of vain things, unable to conceal his own folly and shame. As easily seduced, he is called פֶּתִי 'simple,' as unreceptive of instruction either by counsel or experience כְּסִיל, as by nature stupid בַּעַר, as insensible to the claims of God or man נָבָל; cf. the definition of נָבָל in Is 32[6] (in Pr נָבָל occurs only 17[7. 21] 30[22], אֱוִיל 19 t., כְּסִיל 49 t.).

Folly, in the most advanced sense of a systematically conceived and applied theory of life opposed to that of wisdom, is equivalent to practical atheism. The fool (נָבָל) is he who has said in his heart, 'There is no God'; by which, not a theoretical denial of the divine existence, but a practical negation of God's moral government is meant (Ps 14[1] 53[1] 39[8], Is 9[17]). Synonymous with נָבָל in this meaning is לֵץ 'mocker.'

B. In NT. Analogies for most of the above meanings may be found in NT, usually with a somewhat larger admixture of the intellectual element.

(a) Foolishness appears as the lack of commonsense perception of the reality of things natural and spiritual, or as the imprudent ordering of one's life in regard to salvation; ἄφρων, μωρός, ἀνόητος (Mt 7[26] 23[17] 25[2ff.], Lk 11[40] 12[20] 24[25], Gal 3[1. 3]).

(b) The OT נָבָל as a moral reprobate reappears in the μωρέ of Mt 5[22], a term of opprobrium distinguished by its ethical import from the Aramaic Ῥακά, occurring in the same verse and expressing merely intellectual imbecility.

(c) Of the natural foolishness belonging to the heathen mind, the only remedy for which lies in the wisdom supplied by revelation, we read in Ro 2[20], Tit 3[3]. The counterpart of the OT idea of the law as an institution for the wise guidance of Israel is furnished by St. Paul, who represents the gospel as a teleological arrangement in which the highest wisdom is manifested and recognized by the believer (Ro 11[33]). Inasmuch, however, as the Gentile mind sustains a radically wrong relation to the moral world, it fails to see this marvellous adaptation and decries the gospel as foolishness. Even the converted Greek is under temptation to justify its reasonableness from the worldly point of view by such a presentation as will materially alter its character. Hence the sharp antithesis, 1 Co 1[21-25] 2[14] 3[18-23] 4[10], the wisdom of the world is foolishness to God, the foolishness of Christ crucified is the wisdom of God.

(d) In Ro 16[19], Eph 5[15. 17] we are reminded of the Ḥokhma usage. The fool under whose mask St. Paul speaks 2 Co 11[16ff.] corresponds in a formal sense to the boasting fool of Proverbs.

FOOLERY.—Sir 22[13] 'Talk not much with a fool . . . and thou shalt never be defiled with his fooleries' (οὐ μὴ μολυνθῇς ἐν τῷ ἐντιναγμῷ αὐτοῦ BS, -γματι A; RV 'thou shalt not be defiled in his onslaught'). The form in A, ἐντίναγμα, is found in Aq. at Is 28[2] 32[2], and in Symm. Theod. at Is 28[2]; neither form elsewhere in Greek. The verb from which the subst. is derived, ἐντινάσσω, is used in LXX, 1 Mac 2[36] and 2 Mac 4[41] of casting stones, and in 2 Mac 11[11] of charging an enemy. It is probably with the last passage in mind that RV renders 'onslaught.' Edersheim (Speaker's Com.) prefers the more etymological tr[n] 'that which he throws out,' but understands that either saliva is meant literally, or that it is used figuratively for foolish words; Bissell follows Fritzsche and Bunsen, and renders slaver, 'which, of course, is used for low and foolish words.' For the Eng. word, cf. Shaks. Winter's Tale, III. ii. 185—

> 'Thy tyranny
> Together working with thy jealousies,—
> Fancies too weak for boys, too green and idle
> For girls of nine,—O, think, what they have done,
> And then run mad, indeed; stark mad! for all > Thy bygone fooleries were but spices of it.'

FOOT (רֶגֶל, πούς).—There are various ideas connected with the foot due to its position as the lowest part of the human body.

1. Subjection, Jos 10[24], 2 S 22[39], Is 49[23], 1 Co 15[25. 27]. The foot on the neck is seen on the Egyptian monuments. The promise made to Joshua of possessing every place that the sole of his foot should tread upon, is literally claimed and acted upon by Islam. The Sultan is the Shadow of God, the token of the Almighty's presence and power; military conquest is therefore a triumph of the faith and an inalienable possession. After the war with Greece in 1897, this article of belief created a religious dilemma with regard to withdrawing from conquered Thessaly.

2. Humility, as in the relationship of disciple sitting at the feet of master (Dt 33[3], Lk 10[39], Ac 22[3]), and generally of inferior to superior in the act of obeisance and worship (Nu 16[4], Ru 2[10], Ezk 11[13], Mt 18[29], Rv 5[14] etc.). Such prostration forms part of the ordinary Moslem devotions.

3. Defilement, Ex 3[5]. Contact with the common earth was considered defiling, and gave rise to the Oriental rule about removing the shoe, and on certain occasions washing the feet before entering sacred places, such as buildings devoted to worship, shrines, and in houses the carpeted rooms where prayer is offered. Shaking the dust from the feet is an easy and often-repeated act on the dusty roads of the East. The shoe or slipper is not usually removed, but the foot is held out and shaken with the shoe hanging down from the toes, until the dust falls out. It was a symbol of scornful and complete rejection (Mt 10[14], Ac 13[51]). The same thought is now more commonly expressed by shaking the collar of the coat (cf. Ac 18[6]).

The feet were put in stocks (Job 13[27]), fastened with fetters (Ps 105[18]; see Chain). They were also adorned with anklets (Is 3[18]).

When the word of God is called a lamp to the feet (Ps 119[105]), the reference is to village or town life, with ditches, refuse, and dogs in the pathway. A lantern was carried in the hand, or by a servant walking in front. Until recently, before the streets began to be lit by lamps at distant intervals, any one found walking at night without a lantern was liable to be arrested as a thief. In the journeys of the desert the direction is by the stars; or where there is a path the horse or baggage animal is trusted to keep it.

Washing the feet was rendered necessary by the heat and dust of the road, and by the open sandals or loose shoes that were worn. As an attention rendered to a guest, both on account of the humility of the service and the comfort to the traveller, it belonged to the inner graces of hospitality (Lk 7^{38}, Jn 13^5, 1 Ti 5^{10}).

For 'foot-breadth,' Dt 2^5, RV gives 'for the sole of the f. to tread upon.' For 'foot' of laver Ex 38^8 RV gives 'base' (כֵּן). By the lex talionis (Ex 21^{24}, Dt 19^{21}) 'foot for foot' was exacted. In Dt 11^{10} a contrast is drawn between the climate and the methods of cultivation characteristic of Palestine and of Egypt. When Israel was in the last-named country they 'sowed their seed and watered it with the foot.' The reference here appears to be to the use of some machine by which water was raised and distributed for irrigation purposes (see Lane, Modern Egyptians, ed. 1871, ii. 25 ff.), but the precise method is doubtful (cf. the full and interesting note in Driver's Deut. p. 129, and in 2nd ed. p. xxi).*

G. M. Mackie.

FOOTMAN.—This word is used in two different senses: 1. A foot-soldier, always in plu. 'footmen,' foot-soldiers, infantry. The Heb. is either רַגְלִי ragli (always sing. except Jer 12^5, where the meaning is, however, not foot-soldiers but foot-runners; see below), or more fully אִישׁ רַגְלִי 'ish ragli (Jg 20^2, 2 S 8^4, 1 Ch 18^4 19^{18}). The Greek is mostly πεζοί (1 Es 8^{51}, Jth 1^4 $2^{5.19.22}$ 7^{20} 9^7, 2 Mac 11^4 13^2), but we also find ἀνδρές 1 Mac 9^4, φάλαγξ 1 Mac 10^{82}, δυνάμεις 1 Mac 12^{49}, and πεζικοί (א^1 -ή) 1 Mac 16^5. Footmen probably composed the whole of the Isr. forces (1 S 4^{10} 15^4) before the time of David. From Solomon's day onwards Israel certainly possessed also chariots and cavalry (1 K 4^{26} EV). See Army. The Eng. word is used freely in old writers in this sense, as Malory, Morte Darthur, I. ix. 'And when he came to the sea he sent home the footmen again, and took no more with him but ten thousand men on horseback'; I. xiv. 'ever in saving of one of the footmen we lose ten horsemen for him.'

2. A runner on foot: 1 S 22^{17} 'And the king said unto the footmen that stood about him, Turn, and slay the priests of the Lord' (רָצִים raẓîm; AVm 'or guard, Heb. runners'; RV 'guard,' RVm 'Heb. runners'). 'Runners' would be the literal, and at the same time the most appropriate tr^n. The king had a body of runners about him, not so much to guard his person as to run his errands and do his bidding. They formed a recognized part of the royal state (1 S 8^{11}, 2 S 15^1); they served as executioners (1 S 22^{17}, 2 K 10^{25}); and, accompanying the king or his general into battle, they brought back official tidings of its progress or event (2 S 18^{19}, and see Ahimaaz). Out of this running messenger the Persian kings developed a regular postal system (Est 3^{13}, and see Post).

Runners were at one time in England an essential part of a nobleman's train. Thus Prior (1718), Alma, i. 58—

> 'Like Footmen running before Coaches
> To tell the Inn what Lord approaches.'

But the Bee (1791) says 'their assistance was often wanted to support the coach on each side, to prevent it from being overturned.' The modern footman has a different function, but he is the lineal descendant of the 'running footman,' as he came to be called, of an earlier day.

In Jer 12^5 both the Heb. (רַגְלִים) and the Eng. (footmen) seem to be used in the more general sense of racers on foot: 'If thou hast run with the footmen, and they have wearied thee, then how canst thou contend with horses?' Cf. Webster (1654), Appius and Virg. I. i.—

> 'I have heard of cunning footmen that have worn
> Shoes made of lead, some ten days 'fore a race,
> To give them nimble and more active feet.'

J. Hastings.

FOOTSTOOL.—Although this word occurs repeatedly in the Bible, it is remarkable that only twice at most is it used in its literal sense. In OT it appears in 2 Ch 9^{18} as tr^n of כֶּבֶשׂ (fr. כָּבַשׂ 'tread under foot'), the golden footstool of Solomon's throne, but here Kittel (see his note in Haupt's OT) would read כֶּבֶשׂ 'lamb.' The one clear reference to a literal footstool is in Ja 2^3 'sit under my footstool' (ὑποπόδιόν μου). Everywhere else, both in OT (1 Ch 28^2, Is 66^1, La 2^1, Ps 99^5 110^1 132^7, in all of which it is tr^n of הֲדֹם רַגְלַיִם, the word הֲדֹם being poet. or late) and NT (Mt 5^{35}, Mk 12^{36}, Lk 20^{43}, Ac 2^{35} 7^{49}, He 1^{13} 10^{13}, all ὑποπόδιον τῶν ποδῶν, tr^d by RV with strict accuracy 'footstool of my [thy, his] feet' instead of AV 'my [thy, his] footstool'),* it is used metaphorically. Originally הֲדֹם רַגְלָיו, spoken of God, seems to have designated the ark, 1 Ch 28^2, but was naturally extended to include the whole of the temple, La 2^1 (see notes of Thenius and Löhr), Ps 99^5 132^7 (cf. Is 60^{13}, Ezk 43^7). In Ps 110^1 the vanquished foes of the Messianic King are put as a footstool under His feet. In Is 66^1 earth is the footstool of Him whose throne is heaven.

J. A. Selbie.

FOR.—Both as prep. and as conj. 'for' has some archaic or obscure uses that deserve attention.

1. When the meaning is on account of, as Gn 20^3 'Behold thou art but a dead man, for the woman which thou hast taken' (עַל, RV 'because of'). The RV has changed 'for' into 'because of' in Ezk 6^{11} (Heb. אֶל); Gn 20^3, Est 9^{26}, Hos 9^{15} (Heb. עַל); Lv 16^{34}, La 4^{13}, Dn 5^{19} (Heb כֵּן); 2 S 13^2 (Heb. בַּעֲבוּר); 2 K 16^{18}, Jer 9^7 38^9 (Heb. מִפָּנֵי); Jer 11^{17} (Heb. בִּגְלַל): and into 'by reason of' in Lv 17^{11}† (Heb. בְּ); Dt 28^{47}, Is 31^9, Ezk 27^{18}, Hos 8^{10}, Zec 2^4 (Heb. מִן). In NT ἀπό, ἐν, ἕνεκα, ἐπί with dat. and διά with acc. are all used in this sense, and tr^d 'for.' When the Gr. is διά, with acc., RV changes 'for' into 'because of' in Jn 4^{39}, Ro 3^{25} 13^5, 1 Co 7^5, Col 1^5, He 2^9, Rev 4^{11}; and into 'by reason of' in 1 Co 7^{26}, 2 Co 9^{14}, He 5^{12}. For this meaning cf. Chaucer, Romaunt, A 1564—

> 'Abouten it is gras springing,
> For moiste so thikke and wel lyking,
> That it ne may in winter dye,
> No more than may the see be drye.'

Sometimes the meaning approaches that of against, as 2 K 16^{18} 'the king's entry without, turned he from the house of the Lord for the king of Assyria' (מִפָּנֵי, RV 'because of'); so Ps 27^{11} Wyc. 'dresse thou me in thi path for myn enemyes'; and Is 32^2 Cov. 'He shalbe unto men, as a defence for the wynde, and as a refuge for the tempeste.'

2. For means instead of, or in exchange for, as in Dn 8^8 'the great horn was broken; and for it came up four notable ones' (תַּחַת, RV 'instead of it'); Is 61^7 'For your shame ye shall have double; and for confusion they shall rejoice in their portion' (תַּחַת); so Nu 8^{18} (תַּחַת, RV 'instead of');

* In modern Syria, where level irrigated ground like that of Egypt is planted with vegetables or mulberry trees in rows, the field or patch is laid out in shallow drills, and, as each receives its sufficiency of water, a little earth is taken from the end of the next drill and patted by the naked foot into a dam, so that the water may pass to the drill next in order.

* In Mt 22^{44} for AV 'till I make thine enemies thy footstool' RV gives 'till I put thine enemies under thy feet' (ἕως ἂν θῶ τοὺς ἐχθρούς σου ὑποκάτω [TR ὑποτόδιον] τῶν ποδῶν σου).

† On the translation and meaning of this important passage see especially Kalisch, in loc.

Gn 47[17] (בְּ, RV 'in exchange for'); Pr 21[18] (לְ, RV 'in the stead of'); Nu 18[31] (חֵלֶף, RV 'in return for'). Cf. Philem [16] Wyc. 'now not as a servaunt, but for a servaunt a most dere brother.'

3. For is occasionally equivalent to as: Is 43[3] 'I gave Egypt for thy ransom' (כָּפָרְךָ, RV 'as thy ransom'); Mt 21[46] 'they took him for a prophet' (ὡς); 1 P 2[16] 'not using your liberty for a cloke of maliciousness' (ὡς). Cf. Merlin (E.E.T.S.), iii. 642, 'Thei clayme Bretaigne for thiers, and I clayme Rome for myne'; Defoe, Rob. Crusoe (Gold Treas. ed. p. 522), 'I was never pursued for a Thief before.'

4. For, as a conj., is used to introduce the cause or reason. Sometimes modern usage would prefer 'because' or 'seeing that,' as in Wyclif, Select Works, iii. 105, 'And for God made alle thinges to help of mankynde, therfore we sholde axe thes thynges of God'; and p. 110, 'And ones they reprovede Crist, for his disciples wesche nought here hondes whanne they sholde eete, as here custome was'; and Tindale's tr[n] of 1 Jn 3[12] in Expositions, 191, 'And wherefore slew he him? For his deeds were evil, and his brother's righteous' (in edd. of NT 1526 and 1534 'because'). So in some places of AV, as Jn 11[47] 'What do we? for this man doeth many miracles.' In the foll. passages RV changes 'for' into 'because': Nu 21[7] 27[14] 32[12], Dt 14[7], 1 S 9[24], Job 15[25] 32[16], Jer 20[11] 51[11], Ezk 36[18], Dn 9[19], Mt 23[13], Lk 1[13] 4[41] 6[48] 21[28], Ac 22[18], Eph 5[30], Ph 1[29], 1 P 4[14], 1 Jn 3[9], Rev 12[12]: to which Amer. RV adds Jer 3[21], 1 Jn 3[20]. Some of those changes, however, are due to a change in the construction of the sentence, especially Ezk 36[18]. There is, indeed, no glaringly obsolete example of 'for' in this sense in AV, such as we find so often in Shaks. Cf. Tempest, I. ii. 272—

> 'And, for thou wast a spirit too delicate
> To act her earthy and abhorred commands, > Refusing her grand hests, she did confine thee,
> Into a cloven pine.'

5. The foll. phrases are archaic or obsolete: (1) For all, Ps 78[32] 'For all this they sinned still' (בְּכָל־זֹאת); Jn 21[11] 'for all there were so many, yet was not the net broken' (τοσούτων ὄντων). Cf. Chaucer, Knightes Tale, 1162—

> 'The sowe freten the child right in the cradel;
> The cook y-scalded, for al his longe ladel.'

(2) For because, Gn 22[16] 'By myself have I sworn, saith the LORD, for because thou hast done this thing . . . that in blessing I will bless thee' (כִּי יַעַן אֲשֶׁר, RV 'because'); Jg 6[22] 'Alas, O Lord God! for because I have seen an angel of the LORD face to face' (כִּי־עַל־כֵּן, RV 'forasmuch as'). So Knox, Hist. 110, 'Let him be judged of you both foolish, and your mortall enemie: Foolish, for because he understood nothing of Gods approued wisdome; and enemie unto you, because he laboured to separate you from Gods favour'; and p. 159, 'One of the Bishops sons thrust thorow with a Rapier one of Dundie, for because hee was looking in at the Girnel door'; Barlowe, Dialoge, 76, 'W. Why do ye then despise the vniuersall churche, because some of them be noughte. N. Mary for because the more somme of the euyll, surmountethe the lesse number of the good.' (3) For that = 'because,' Ex 16[7. 8] (בְּ), [29] 'See, for that the LORD hath given you the Sabbath, therefore he giveth you on the sixth day the bread of two days' (כִּי); 1 Es 7[15] (ὅτι), 1 Mac 4[58] (καί, RV 'and'); Jn 12[18], 2 Co 1[24] (RV 'that'), 1 Ti 1[12] (all ὅτι); He 7[15] (εἰ, RV 'if') 5[2] (ἐπεί), 2 Co 5[4] (TR ἐπειδή, edd. ἐφ' ᾧ), Ro 5[12] (ἐφ' ᾧ), Ja 4[15] 'For that ye ought to say' (ἀντὶ τοῦ λέγειν, RVm 'Instead of your saying'). RV shows a fondness for this phrase, omitting it from AV only where marked above, and adding Jg 5[2 bis], Ezk 16[5] 23[30] (Heb. בְּ); Nu 12[11 bis], Neh 2[10], Is 19[25] (Heb. אֲשֶׁר); Jn 2[24] (διὰ τό with inf.); 2 Th 2[13] (ὅτι). Cf. Shaks. Mer. of Venice, I. iii. 43—

> 'I hate him for he is a Christian,
> But more for that in low simplicity,
> He lends out money gratis.'

(4) For to: The infinitive of purpose used often to be strengthened by for, an idiom that is still in use locally. Thus Gn 43[30] Tind. (1530), 'Joseph made hast (for his hert dyd melt upon his brother) and soughte for to wepe' (changed in Matthew's Bible of 1537 into 'where'); Pr. Bk. 1549 (Keeling, p. 33), 'To be a light for to lighten the Gentiles' (the 'for' is omitted in the 1552 ed. and afterwards); Fuller, Holy Warre, 215, 'As for his good father, he was content to let go the staff of his age for to be a prop to the Church.' Although in AV this 'for' seems always to express purpose, it was formerly added to the infin. even when no purpose was expressed, as Berners, Froissart, I. cxxvi., 'The king of England being at Airaines wist not where for to pass the river of Somme.' The 'for' is retained or omitted in AV at the mere good pleasure of the translators. Moon (Eccles. English, 117) gives a curious list: Gn 31[18] 'for to go,' Ru 1[18] 'to go'; Is 41[22] 'for to come,' Jer 40[4] 'to come'; Gn 41[57] 'for to buy,' 42[7] 'to buy'; and so on through a list of fifteen couples. The RV for the most part leaves these inconsistencies alone; but it adds some of its own. Thus in AV ἵνα is tr[d] 'for to' in Mk 3[10], Jn 10[10] 11[53], Ac 17[15] 22[5], Eph 2[15], Rev 9[15] 12[4]; RV changes all into 'that' with subj. except Ac 22[5], which it leaves untouched. Again, in Mt 11[8] RV retains 'for to see,' but in the parallel passage, Lk 7[21], omits the 'for,' though the Greek is the same.

6. 'For' as the tr[n] of ἀντί, περί, or ὑπέρ (and it is the frequent rendering of each of these prepositions) assumes considerable theological importance. The RV has been particularly careful and discriminating in this case. Beyond that, the English reader must consult the exegetical commentaries, and such articles as ATONEMENT, PROPITIATION.

J. HASTINGS.

FORAY occurs once in RV (2 S 3[22] 'from a foray,' AV 'from [pursuing] a troop'). The Heb. word גְּדוּד, which frequently means a marauding band (e.g. 1 S 30[8. 15. 23], 1 K 11[24]), seems in this instance to bear the transferred but natural sense of an expedition of such a band.

FORBEAR, FORBEARANCE.—In the still common meanings of abstain from, refrain, or desist, forbear is used in AV both absolutely and with an infin. following. Thus absolutely, 1 K 22[6] 'Shall I go against Ramoth-gilead to battle, or shall I forbear?'; Zec 11[12] 'If ye think good, give me my price; and if not, forbear' (both חָדַל, the usual word so tr[d]); 2 Co 12[6] (φείδομαι). Or with foll. infin., Pr 24[11] 'If thou forbear to deliver them that are drawn unto death, and those that are ready to be slain' (אִם־תַּחְשׂוֹךְ; RV 'Deliver them that are carried away unto death, and those that are ready to be slain see that thou hold back,' taking אִם as a particle expressing a wish, not as a conj. 'if'; so Oxf. Heb. Lex. and most edd.; RVm 'forbear thou not to deliver'); Ezk 24[17] 'Forbear to cry' (הֶאָנֵק דָּם, lit. 'sigh, be silent'; RV 'Sigh, but not aloud'; Skinner, 'Sigh in silence': the Geneva Bible gives 'Cease from sighing'; Bishops', 'Mourne in silence'; Douay, 'Sigh holding thy peace'; Segond, 'Soupire en silence'; Siegfried, 'Seufze still'); 1 Co 9[6] 'Have not we power to forbear working?' ([τοῦ] μὴ ἐργάζεσθαι); Eph 6[9] 'forbearing threatening' (ἀνιέντες τὴν ἀπειλήν; T. K. Abbott, 'giving up your threatening,' which they had been accustomed to use before they were Christians).

Forbear is used once in AV (and retained in RV)

reflexively, a construction which is very rare: 2 Ch 35^{21} 'forbear thee from meddling with God, who is with me, that he destroy thee not' (חֲדַל־לְךָ מֵאֱלֹהִים, Oxf. Lex. 'leave off provoking God'). Here forbear means restrain thyself, refrain: cf. Ad. Est 16^{11} Cov., 'he coude not forbeare him self from his pryde.'

But the most noticeable use of 'forbear' is as a transitive verb, in the sense of bear with, be patient with. The examples are, Neh 9^{30} 'Yet many years didst thou forbear them' (וַתַּמְשֵׁךְ עֲלֵיהֶם, lit. as AVm, 'didst protract over them'; LXX εἵλκυσας [A ἠλ-] ἐπ' αὐτούς; Vulg. 'protraxisti super eos'); 2 Es 1^{9} 'How long shall I forbear them, unto whom I have done so much good?' (usquequo eos sustinebo); Eph 4^{2}=Col 3^{13} 'forbearing one another' (ἀνεχόμενοι ἀλλήλων). So Tindale's tr. of Rev 2^{2} 'thou cannest not forbeare them which are evyll'; T. Adams, II Peter, on 1^{1}, 'Rotten kernels under fair shells, full of Herod's and Naaman's exceptives: in this forbear us'; Livingstone, Memorable Characteristics (Wodrow, Select Biog. i. 324), 'somewhat forborn for their non-conformity'; and Shaks. Othello, I. ii. 10—

> 'with the little godliness I have,
> I did full hard forbear him.'

RV introduces 'forbearing' in this sense into the text of 2 Ti 2^{24} from AVm, the text of AV being 'patient' (Gr. ἀνεξίκακος, lit. 'patient of wrong,' from fut. of ἀνέχομαι to bear, and κακόν wrong); and it is in this sense only that Forbearance occurs, Ro 2^{4} 3^{25} (ἀνοχή), both of God's forbearance with men; and in RV, Ph 4^{5} 'Let your forbearance be known unto all men' (τὸ ἐπιεικές; AV 'moderation,' RVm 'gentleness': Vincent, 'From εἰκός, reasonable, hence not unduly rigorous'; Wyc. 'pacience,' Tind. 'softenes,' so Cov. Cran.; Gen. 'patient mind,' so Bish.; Rhem. 'modestie,' after Vulg. modestia, Luther 'Gelindigkeit,' Weizsäcker 'Lindigkeit,' the French VSS 'douceur.' The idea, says Vincent, is 'Do not make a rigorous and obstinate stand for what is your just due'). See next article. J. HASTINGS.

FORBEARANCE, LONG-SUFFERING. — Forbearance is the tr. in AV of NT of ἀνοχή, and long-suffering of μακροθυμία. Their close connexion in meaning is shown by their combination in various passages. Thus in Ro 2^{4} the wealth of God's 'forbearance and long-suffering' is mentioned as designed to lead men to repentance. In Ro 3^{25} the f. of God is the ground, not of the forgiveness of sins, but of their pretermission; not of the annulling, but of the suspension of His punishment. The same combination is required of Christians in Eph 4^{2}; they are to walk worthy of their calling, 'with long-suffering, forbearing one another in love,' where the last words interpret the first. In OT ἀνοχή seems to occur only in 1 Mac 12^{25} in the technical sense of 'truce'; the corresponding verb is used in a wide range of meanings, which, however, are easily connected with each other. Μακρόθυμος, again, in the LXX is the regular rendering of the Heb. אֶרֶךְ אַפַּיִם. It is most frequently used of God, and in combination with such words as πολυέλεος, οἰκτίρμων, ἐλεήμων. It designates that attribute of God in virtue of which He bears long with that which provokes His anger, and does not proceed at once to execute judgment upon it.

Where μακροθυμία is used of men, the meaning is sometimes rather different. It becomes akin to patience as well as to forbearance. Thus it is combined with ὑπομονή in Col 1^{11} and with κακοπάθεια (-ία WH) in Ja 5^{10}; cf. also 2 Ti 3^{10}. These examples, as well as those in He 6^{15}, Ja $5^{7f.}$, Sir 2^{4}, prove that Trench's distinction is hardly accurate, viz. that μακροθυμία will be found to express patience in respect of persons, ὑπομονή patience in respect of things. In the passages just quoted μακροθυμία is shown in bravely enduring the pressure of what seem adverse circumstances, the trials of the good life, and is better reproduced by 'patience' or 'endurance' than by 'long-suffering.' A real parallel to this use is found in 1 Mac 8^{4}, where we are told how the Romans subdued all Spain by their counsel and their μακροθυμία; where the word evidently means their stubborn persistence, that quality in virtue of which, though sometimes defeated in battle, they were always victorious in war. But though this sense of μακροθυμία is represented in NT, the prevailing one is that which is akin, not to endurance but to forbearance; it is a slowness, like that of God, in avenging wrongs, a restraint of anger, a gentleness and meekness in dealing with those who treat us unjustly. The synonymous word in this direction is rather πραότης than ὑπομονή. There is a difficult passage about God's long-suffering in Lk 18^{7}. If we compare Sir 32^{22} ὁ κύριος οὐ μὴ βραδύνῃ οὐδὲ μὴ μακροθυμήσει ἐπ' αὐτοῖς, ἕως ἂν συντρίψῃ ὀσφὺν ἀνελεημόνων, it can hardly seem doubtful that the evangelist meant by his last words, 'though he shows long indulgence to them,' i.e. to the enemies of the elect; if, however, ἐπ' αὐτοῖς must refer to the elect, then there seems no clear meaning to be got but by confining the force of the οὐ to the first clause, and saying that God surely does not exercise long-suffering (this would be the effect of the interrogative μή) where the interests of His elect are at stake, but avenges them speedily. But whatever we make of this case, there is no doubt that long-suffering and forbearance are characteristically and conspicuously qualities both of the divine and of the Christian character. As distinguished from each other, ἀνοχή suggests that it is merely a temporary restraint that is being practised; this may be the case with μακροθυμία also, indeed it is the case, and hence such warnings as we have in Ro $2^{4f.}$, but it is not suggested by the word itself. J. DENNEY.

FORBID.—To forbid is to order one not to do a thing, and the proper construction is a personal object and an infin., as 1 Th 2^{16} 'Forbidding us to speak to the Gentiles that they might be saved.' But custom allows the omission of the person, as Lk 23^{2} 'We found this fellow perverting the nation, and forbidding to give tribute to Cæsar'; or of the infin., as Nu 11^{28} 'My lord Moses, forbid them,' Mt 3^{14} 'But John forbad him.' But when 'forbid' is found with an impers. object and that alone, the construction is quite irregular. There are two instances, 2 P 2^{16} 'a dumb ass speaking with man's voice forbad the madness of the prophet' (RV 'stayed'),* and Ac 10^{47} 'Can any man forbid water that these should not be baptized?' In both cases the Greek verb (κωλύειν) is that usually translated 'forbid,' and in Greek writers it has the meanings of 'restrain' (as 2 P 2^{16}) and 'refuse' (as Ac 10^{47}), but the Eng. verb 'forbid' has not properly these meanings, and should not have been used. In both places 'forbid' is as old as Wyclif, who, following the Vulg. prohibere, used the word very freely: compare its use in Ac 11^{17} 'Who was Y, that myghte forbeede the Lord, that he gyue not the Hooli Goost to hem that bileueden in the name of Jhesu Crist?'

From Wyclif also comes God forbid, the strong and striking translation of חָלִילָה ḥâlîlâh and of μὴ γένοιτο.

Ḥâlîlâh is a subst. formed from the verb ḥâlal to pollute or (ceremonially) profane, the suffix being locative. It is used

* Cf. Paraphrase 62^{10} (1775)—

> 'The contrite race he counts his friends, > Forbids the suppliant's fall.'

only as an exclamation, Ad profanum! Away with it! Far be it! Twice it stands alone in the sentence, 1 S 14[45] 20[2] (חָלִילָה, לֹא תָמוּת, EV 'God forbid; thou shalt not die'). Sometimes a pronoun accompanies it, 1 S 2[30] (חָלִילָה לִי, EV 'Be it far from me'), so Gn 18[25b], 1 S 20[9] 22[15]. But most frequently it is connected with the sentence by a conjunction, כִּן with infin. Gn 18[25] 44[7. 17], Jos 24[16], 1 S 12[23], 2 S 23[17], 1 Ch 11[19], and (attached to the 'profane' thing) Job 34[10] (חָלִלָה לְאֵל כִּרְשָׁע, EV 'Far be it from God that he should do wickedness'); or אִם 1 S 14[45] 24[7], 2 S 20[20], Job 27[5]. The exclamation tended to assume the form of an oath, and in four places the name of J" is added, 1 S 24[7] 26[11], 2 S 23[17], 1 Ch 11[19]. The shorter form חָלִלָה is used Gn 18[25] bis, Job 34[10].

The LXX translates the word variously: by μὴ γένοιτο Gn 44[7. 17], Jos 22[29] 24[16], 1 K 21[3]; by μηδαμῶς (with or without μοι, σοι) Gn 18[25] bis, 1 S 2[30] 12[23] 20[2. 9] 22[15] 24[6] 26[11]; by ἵλεώς μοι [ὁ θεός] 2 S 20[20] bis 23[17], 1 Ch 11[19]; by ζῇ Κύριος 1 S 14[45]; and by μὴ μοι εἴη Job 27[5].

The Vulg. is more uniform, rendering by Absit (hoc) a me (te, etc.) in all places except Gn 18[25b] nequaquam, 44[7] where absit of Old Lat. may have dropped out, 1 S 14[45] Hoc nefas est, and Propitius sit mihi Dominus in 1 S 24[6] 26[11], 2 S 23[17], 1 K 21[3].

Wyclif followed the Vulgate, the later version having 'Fer be it fro me, thee,' etc., wherever Vulg. has Absit (hoc) a me, te, etc., and 'The Lord be merciful to me' in 1 S 24[6] 26[11], 2 S 23[17], 1 K 21[3]; while Gn 44[7] is 'Whi speketh oure Lord so,' and 1 S 14[45] 'This is unleueful.' The earlier version is less uniform, thus Jos 22[29] 'God shilde fro us this hidows gilt,' 1 Ch 11[19] 'God sheelde,' 1 S 14[45] 'that is felony.' So, wherever μὴ γένοιτο occurs in NT the earlier Wyc. vers. has 'Fer be it,' but the later has always 'God forbede.' And this phrase was accepted by Tindale, and after him by nearly all the Versions both in OT for ḥālīlāh and in NT for μὴ γένοιτο.

AV and RV translate ḥālīlāh by 'God forbid' ('The Lord forbid' 1 S 24[6] 26[11], 1 K 21[3], and 'My God forbid it me' 1 Ch 11[19]) everywhere except Gn 18[25] bis, 1 S 2[30] 20[9] 22[15], 2 S 20[20] bis 23[17], where the Wyclifite phrase 'Far be it from' or 'Be it far from' has been retained. This phrase Amer. RV prefers throughout OT.

As we have seen, μὴ γένοιτο is only one of the renderings of ḥālīlāh in LXX. Of the others μηδαμῶς occurs twice in NT, Ac 10[14] 11[8] (EV 'Not so, Lord'), and ἵλεώς σοι once, Mt 16[22] (EV 'Be it far from thee, Lord'). But μὴ γένοιτο is found fifteen times, all but Lk 20[16] being in St. Paul's Epistles, and in twelve of St. Paul's fourteen instances it is used to express the apostle's abhorrence of an inference which he fears may be falsely drawn from his argument. See Burton, NT Moods and Tenses[2], p. 79. EV translates everywhere by 'God forbid,' a phrase which is undoubtedly more forcible than the original, and for which Lightfoot suggests 'Nay, verily,' or 'Away with the thought.'

'God forbid' occurs also in Apocr., 1 Mac 2[21] 'God forbid that we should forsake the law and the ordinances' (Ἵλεως ἡμῖν καταλείπειν, RV 'Heaven forbid,' RVm 'Gr. May he be propitious. Cf. 2 S 23[17] Sept.'); 9[10] 'Then Judas said, God forbid that I should do this thing' (Μή μοι γένοιτο ποιῆσαι, RV 'Let it not be so that I should do this thing'). J. HASTINGS.

FORCE.—The subst. 'force' has become restricted in meaning since 1611. It then signified a man's personal might, as Jer 23[10] 'their course is evil, and their force is not right' (גְּבוּרָה, Cheyne 'their might or heroism'); even physical strength, as Dt 34[7] 'his eye was not dim, nor his natural force abated' (לֵחַ, only here, but adj. לַח is moist, fresh, of fruit, Nu 6[3], or of growing or freshly-cut wood, Ezk 17[24], Gn 30[37], hence 'neither had his freshness fled'—Driver); Job 40[16] 'his force is in the navel (RV muscles) of his belly' (אוֹן, here of behemoth, in 18[7. 12] of man's strength); Am 2[14] 'the strong shall not strengthen his force' (בֹּחַ). Cf. Ps 102[23] (Sternhold and Hopkins)—

'My wonted strength and force he hath abated in the way.'

Force as a personal attribute is now restricted to strength in action or application, as it is in Ezk 34[4] 'with force and with cruelty have ye ruled them' (חֹזֶקֶה); and in the phrase 'take by force,' which in Mt 11[12], Jn 6[15], Ac 23[10] is the tr[n] of the single verb ἁρπάζειν, to seize.

The phrase 'of force' is now replaced by 'in force.' It occurs He 9[17] 'a testament is of force after men are dead' (βέβαιος); and in a slightly different sense, 2 Es 7[35] 'the good deeds shall be of force, and wicked deeds shall bear no rule' (iustitiæ vigilabunt, RV 'shall awake'): cf. 9[37] 'the law perisheth not, but remaineth in his force' (permansit in suo honore, RV 'in its honour'). The phrase was also used in the sense of 'by compulsion,' as we still use 'perforce'; so often in Shaks. as I Henry IV. II. iii. 120—

'Will this content you, Kate?
It must, of force';

Jul. Cæs. IV. iii. 203—

'Good reasons must, of force, give place to better';

Milton, PL iv. 813—

'No falsehood can endure
Touch of celestial temper, but returns
Of force to its own likeness'; and i. 144—

'Our conqueror (whom I now Of force believe almighty)'— though Craik thinks 'of force' in the last passage may mean 'in power.'

For Force, Forces = military strength, see ARMY.

FORD (מַעֲבָרָה, מַעְבָּרָה. In Jg 12[5. 6] AV needlessly substitutes 'passages' for 'fords'; in 2 S 15[28] 17[16] RV has 'fords' (עברות) where AV has 'plains' (ערבות). See Driver's note, ad loc.).—Fords were important landmarks in early OT times, when there were no bridges across rivers. There seem to have been two principal fords across the Jordan—(1) that opposite Jericho (Jos 2[7], Jg 3[28], 2 S 19[15]), used to this day for crossing from Pal. into Moab, except in early summer when the river is in flood (Jos 3[15]); (2) Bethabara (the reading of TR and AV, but WH and RV have Bethany) where John baptized (Jn 1[28]). The site has been identified by the officers of the Ordnance Survey, and described by Conder as the spot called 'Abârah, where the Jalûd river, flowing down the Valley of Jezreel, debouches into the Jordan (Tent Work in Pal. p. 229). Some of the fords of the Jordan, of which about forty were identified by the Pal. Survey, are impassable in spring or early summer, as the waters, swollen by the melting of the snows of the Lebanon and adjoining regions, rise and overflow their banks, covering the alluvial plains on either side. Such was the case when the Isr. under Joshua crossed on dry ground by command of J" to besiege Jericho (Jos 3[15]). Amongst the other fords mentioned in Scripture are those of the Jabbok (Gn 32[22]) and the Arnon, a river descending from the tableland on the east of the Jordan Valley, and at the time of the Isr. invasion forming the boundary between the Moabites and the Amorites (Nu 21[13]), also referred to in Is 16[2]. The Romans were probably the first great bridge-builders over the streams of Palestine. (See, further, G. A. Smith, Hist. Geog. 266, 337 n.; Moore, Judges, 102 f. 214; Driver, Text of Sam. 245, 257.) E. HULL.

FORECAST.—In the phrase 'forecast devices,' Dn 11[24. 25] (חָשַׁב מַחְשָׁבוֹת, RV 'devise devices'), the meaning is 'contrive beforehand,' as Golding (1587), De Mornay, xiii. 203, 'At the first sight the thing which was forecast by good order, seemeth to happen by adventure.' In Wis 17[11] the word occurs in the sense of 'think beforehand,' 'forbode': 'Wickedness . . . always forecasteth grievous things' (א[c. a] προείληφεν, but B προσείληφεν, whence RVm 'hath added').

FOREFRONT.—In earlier use the 'forefront' was opposed to the 'backfront,' as Evelyn (1659), To R. Boyle, 3 Sept. 'To the entry fore front of this a court, and at the other back front a plot walled in of a competent square,' and Leoni (1726), Alberti's Archit. I. xxxix. 2, 'From the . . . Forefront of the Work I draw a Line quite thro' to the Back-front.' But the 'back' being no longer called a 'front,' 'forefront' is mostly replaced by 'front.' It is used in AV as tr[n] of (1) פָּנִים face, 2 K 16[14], Ezk 40[19] bis 47[1]; (2) מוּל פָּנִים overagainst the face, Ex 26[9] 28[37], Lv 8[9], 2 S 11[15]; (3) שֵׁן tooth,

1 S 14[5]; (4) ראשׁ head, 2 Ch 20[27]; and πρόσωπον face, 1 Mac 4[57]. RV changes Lv 8[9] 'upon the mitre, even upon his forefront,' into 'upon the mitre, in front'; and 1 S 14[5] 'The forefront of the one was situate northward' into 'The one crag rose up on the north.' RV also adds Jos 22[11] 'in the forefront of the land of Canaan' (לְאֶל־מוּל, AV 'over against'); and Ezk 40[15 bis] 'And from the forefront of the gate at the entrance unto the forefront of the inner porch' (עַל־פְּנֵי חַשַּׁעַר הָאֶחָתוֹן עַל־לִפְנֵי אֻלָם, AV 'from the face . . . unto the face').

FOREGO.—Sir 7[19] 'Forego not a wise and good woman: for her grace is above gold' (μὴ ἀστόχει γυναικὸς σοφῆς καὶ ἀγαθῆς, RV 'Forgo not a wise and good wife'). The Gr. verb occurs elsewhere in LXX only in 8[9] 'Miss not the discourse of the elders' (RV 'aged'). In NT it is found only in the Pastoral Epistles, 1 Ti 1[6] (EV 'swerve'), 6[21] (EV 'err'), 2 Ti 2[18] (EV 'err'), and at each occurrence RVm gives 'miss the mark,' which is its lit. meaning (ἀ and στόχος, a mark). The meaning here is almost certainly that suggested by Wahl noli separari ab uxore sapiente, 'do not separate yourself from, i.e. do not divorce a wise wife.' And that is probably the meaning of AV, which seems to be a new tr[n], the earlier Versions having uniformly 'Depart not from a discreet and good woman,'* with the addition, 'that is fallen unto thee for thy portion in the fear of the LORD,' after Vulg. quam sortitus es in timore Domini. For in earlier Eng. 'forgo' had the meaning of forsake, as Cursor Mundi (1340), 13,280, 'Petur and andrew . . . with o word haue thei ship forgone'; and Shaks. Henry VIII. III. ii. 422—

'Crom. O my lord,
Must I then leave you? Must I needs forgo
So good, so noble, and so true a master?'

And this sense is still in use poetically, as in Mrs. Browning, Catarina to Camoens, iv.—

'And if they looked up to you,
All the light which has forgone them
Would be gathered back anew.'

The spelling of modern editions of AV is forego, but forgo, which is the spelling of 1611 ('forgoe'), is the correct form. Forego is a different word, and means 'to go before,' as Fotherby (1619), Atheom. II. iii. 2. 214, 'The cause doth alwayes his effect fore-goe.' The prep. in 'forgo' is for (Ger. ver), not fore, and reverses the meaning of the verb, as in forbid, fordo, forget, forswear, forspent, forspoke. In forbear and forgive it adds force to the simple verb.

FOREHEAD (מֵצַח, μέτωπον).—This word occurs repeatedly in the Bible, both in a literal and in a metaphorical sense. It was upon his forehead that the high priest wore the plate of gold inscribed 'Holy to the LORD' (Ex 28[38]); the stone slung by David entered the forehead of Goliath (1 S 17[49]); leprosy broke out in the forehead of Uzziah when he sought to burn incense (2 Ch 26[19ff.]). In Jer 3[3] 'a harlot's forehead' is the type of shamelessness; in Ezk 3[7. 8. 9] the people in their obstinacy are described as 'of an hard forehead,' but the prophet's forehead is to be made hard against them, his determination is to be equal to their own. In Ezk 9[4ff.] a mark is directed to be put on the forehead of the faithful in Jerusalem. The name for this mark is תָּו tav, a letter (ת) which may have been used in much the same way as a × amongst ourselves (cf. Job 31[35], where, however, the sense appears to be somewhat different; see Davidson's and Dillmann's notes, ad loc.). It is even possible that the reference in Ezk is to practices such as that described in Is 44[5] 'Another shall mark on his hand, Unto the LORD.' See CUTTINGS IN THE FLESH, vol. i. p. 538[b]. These OT passages suggested the NT usage (Rev 7[3] 9[4] 13[16] 14[1. 9] 17[5] 20[4] 22[4]).

In Ezk 16[12], where AV has 'I put a jewel on thy forehead,' RV gives more correctly 'I put a ring upon thy nose' (וְאֶתֵּן נֶזֶם עַל־עַפְּךָ).

For Lv 13[41ff.] ('forehead bald') see BALDNESS.

J. A. SELBIE.

FOREIGNER occurs four times in AV. It is the tr[n] in Ex 12[45] of תּוֹשָׁב (RV more accurately 'sojourner'), in Dt 15[3] and Ob [11] of נָכְרִי, and in Eph 2[19] of πάροικος (RV 'sojourner'). RV substitutes 'foreigner' for AV 'stranger' as tr[n] of בֶּן־נֵכָר in Lv 23[25], and of נָכְרִי in Dt 17[15] 23[20] 29[22]. Amer. RV makes the same change in Ru 2[10], 2 S 15[19], where the Heb. word is the same.

A cognate term is alien(s), which occurs in AV of Ex 18[3] as tr[n] of גֵּר (RV correctly 'sojourner'), of בֶּן־נֵכָר in Is 61[5], and of נָכְרִי in Dt 14[21] (RV 'foreigner'), Job 19[15], Ps 69[8], La 5[2]. RV adds Ex 12[43], Ezk 44[7. 9], Pr 5[10], where AV has 'stranger,' and Ps 144[7. 11], where AV has 'strange children' (Heb. in all these בְּנֵי נֵכָר).

Strangers is the favourite rendering in AV, not only of נָכְרִי or בֶּן־נֵכָר and זָר (see below), but also of גֵּר and תּוֹשָׁב. The latter circumstance is specially unfortunate, because it obscures to the Eng. reader the distinction between the foreigner and the gêr, which in Heb. is marked clearly enough, and on which not a little depends for the understanding of many passages. The gêr is indeed a foreigner by birth, but he resides in Israel and is protected by the community; whereas the foreigner proper (נָכְרִי) is not only an alien by birth, but has neither home nor rights in Israel. It would have been well if RV had uniformly, instead of occasionally, substituted 'sojourner' for 'stranger' as the tr[n] of גֵּר, and left 'stranger,' 'foreigner,' 'alien' to represent such words as נָכְרִי and זָר.

We shall now examine the linguistic usage of the last two Heb. words and their equivalents in LXX and NT.

(a) זָר (zâr) in its root meaning appears scarcely to differ from gêr, although ultimately the two words have very different connotations. The orig. sense of both is one who turns aside from the way (sc. to lodge somewhere). It is easy to connect this with the idea of a stranger or alien. Amongst other applications זָר is used to designate one who is not of a priestly family, Ex 29[33] 30[33], Nu 3[10. 38] 18[7] (all P), Lv 22[10. 12. 13] (H), or who does not belong to the tribe of Levi, Nu 1[51] 18[4] (P). The plur. זָרִים is a frequent designation of foreign (generally hostile) peoples in contrast to Israel, Hos 7[9] 8[7], Is 1[7], Ezk 7[21], Jl 3[17], Ob [11] etc. The LXX equivalents are ἀλλότριος and ἀλλογενής, the former of which occurs not infrequently in NT, the latter only once (Lk 17[18] of the Samaritan leper).

(b) נָכְרִי (nokhrî) or בֶּן־נֵכָר (ben-nēkhâr). If the root idea here is strangeness, perhaps 'stranger' might with advantage be reserved as the special tr[n] of these two equivalent terms. נָכְרִי is ‖ גֹּלָה 'exile' in 2 S 15[19] (of Ittai the Gittite); it is opposed to a 'brother' (אָח), i.e. a fellow-Israelite, in Dt 15[3] 17[15]; it is used of the stranger who directs his prayer towards the temple of Israel's God, 1 K 8[41]=2 Ch 6[32]; of the foreign wives (נָכְרִיּוֹת), Ezr 10[2]; of foreign garb (מַלְבּוּשׁ נָכְרִי perhaps referring to the uniform of the foreign body-guard), Zeph 1[8] (cf. כָּל־נֵכָר 'everything foreign,' Neh 13[30]). The commonest LXX equivalent is ἀλλότριος (cf. Ac 7[6], He 11[9. 34]). ἀλλογενής also occurs (e.g. Gn 17[27], Ex 12[43], Lv 22[25], Is 56[3. 6]) and ἀλλόφυλος (Is 2[6] 61[5]). This last, which is the favourite LXX tr[n] of פְּלִשְׁתִּים (Philistines), occurs only once in NT (Ac 10[28] of Cornelius). Another favourite LXX rendering of נָכְרִי is ξένος (e.g. 2 S 15[19] of Ittai). It is the exact opposite of ἐπιχώριος. The only instances of its occurrence in NT are Mt 25[35. 38. 43] 27[7], Ac 17[21], Eph 2[12. 19], He 11[13], 3 Jn [5].

As in olden times foreigner and enemy were almost convertible terms, we find both זָר and נָכְרִי used so as to include the idea of hostility or barbarism (cf. Is 1[7], Ps 54[3], Ezk 11[9], Hos 7[9] [all זָרִים], Ps 18[44. 45] [בְּנֵי נֵכָר]. The same meaning of hostile is contained in the ἀλλότριοι of He 11[34], 1 Mac 1[38] 2[7], Sir 45[18] etc.).

PRESENCE AND POSITION OF FOREIGNERS IN ISRAEL.—In the early stages of their history, the relations of Israel to foreigners did not differ essentially from those of other nations. As the law, however, was gradually introduced, the attitude of Israelites to non-Israelites underwent a material change, until ultimately the 'nations' outside

* Except Wyclif (1382), 'Wile thou not gon awei fro a wel felende womman, and a good.'

Israel became the 'heathen,' while the stranger domiciled in Israel, the 'gêr,' became the 'proselyte' (Bertholet).

(a) The pre-Deuteronomic Period.—Our earliest sources contain abundant references to foreigners, whether passing strangers or residents in Israel. Trade was frequently the motive of their visits. The two words for 'merchant,' סֹחֵר and רוֹכֵל, both mean originally 'traveller'; in Pr 31^{24} and Job 41^{6} 'Canaanite' is synonymous with 'trader,' showing that in early times the travelling merchantmen in Palestine had been, not Israelites, but Canaanites. The danger of travelling alone (Jg 5^{6}) was avoided by caravans, some of the most important of whose trade-routes traversed Palestine (Gn 37^{25}, 1 K 10^{2}, Is 8^{23} [Eng. 9^{1}] $60^{6.7}$, Ezk 26^{2}). It must never be forgotten that from the occupation of Canaan downwards Israel was in constant contact with foreigners in the shape of the large remnants of the original inhabitants of the land. Our different sources offer different explanations of the survival of the Canaanites, but they all agree as to the fact (Ex 23^{29}, Dt 7^{22}, Jg 2^{23} $3^{1ff.}$). We have the well-known story of the Gibeonites (Jos 9), as well as a whole list of Can. towns enumerated amongst the various Isr. tribes (Jg $1^{27ff.}$); in $1^{32f.}$ it is the Isr. that dwell among the Can., while Issachar is actually tributary to the latter (Gn $49^{14f.}$). In Jg 5^{14} (cf. 12^{15}) we hear of Amalekite remnants, in Jg 5^{24} (cf. Ex $18^{13ff.}$), Nu 10^{31}, 1 S 15^{6} of Kenites, Midianites, etc. The Jerahmeelites, the clans of Caleb, Othniel, Kenaz, etc. (1 S $30^{14.29}$), appear to have been of Arabian or Edomite origin. Even at the era of the Exodus the early narrative JE speaks of a 'mixed multitude' which attached itself to Israel (Ex 12^{38}, Nu 11^{4}). Shechem was still a Can. city in the time of Abimelech (Jg 9); Jerus. continued in the possession of the Jebusites down to the time of David (2 S $5^{6ff.}$), and even after its conquest by the latter we find Araunah the Jebusite still in possession of property there (2 S 24; cf. Jos 15^{63}, Jg 1^{21}); Rahab's descendants dwell in Israel 'to this day' (Jos 6^{25}, JE); Gezer is first taken from the Can. by the Pharaoh who was Solomon's father-in-law (1 K 9^{16}).

The general attitude to foreigners was one of hostility, where some special agreement or safeguard was not present. Driven out from his old settlement, Cain protests, 'Whosoever findeth me shall slay me' (Gn 4^{14}). The Song of Deborah (Jg 5), the story of Samuel and Agag (1 S $15^{32f.}$), the cruelties of David to his prisoners (2 S 8^{2} 12^{31}), illustrate the prevailing temper towards a foreign foe. Conduct passes uncensured when non-Israelites are concerned, which would have been considered improper towards a fellow-countryman (Gn 12 Abraham and Pharaoh, Gn 26 Isaac and Abimelech, Gn $30^{37ff.}$ Jacob and Laban, Ex 3^{22} the 'spoiling' of the Egyptians).

The position of the foreigner being so precarious, people were slow to leave their own country, esp. as this implied also abandoning the service and losing the protection of their ancestral gods (1 S 23^{19}). Amongst the most frequent causes that led to such self-expatriation were famine (Gn 12^{10} Abraham, 26^{1} Isaac, 47^{4} Jacob and his sons, Ru $1^{1ff.}$ Elimelech and his family, 2 K $8^{1ff.}$ the Shunammite), blood-feud (Gn 4^{16} Cain, Ex 2^{15} Moses, 2 S 13^{34} Absalom) or political reasons (1 S 27^{2} David, 1 K 11^{40} Jeroboam, 11^{17} Hadad).

There were, however, three circumstances that helped to mitigate the lot of the stranger in a strange land—(1) The hospitality to strangers, which is one of the noblest virtues of ancient peoples: 'the stranger did not lodge in the street, but I opened my doors to the traveller' (Job 31^{32}; cf. Gn 18. 19. 24. 43, Jg 13. 19, 2 S 12^{4}, 1 K 17). Public inns in the modern sense (the Eastern khân is something quite different) were unknown and unneeded. In Lk 10^{34} we first hear of an inn (πανδοχεῖον) where the host (πανδοχεύς) takes payment for accommodating travellers. While spies naturally received no consideration (Gn 42^{9}, Jos $2^{3ff.}$), the narratives of Gn 19 and Jg 19 show how scrupulously the old Israelites guarded their guests. In an age when the altar was universally an asylum (see ALTAR, p. 76[b]), the helpless stranger was frequently considered to be under the special protection of the god of the land, hence the 'fear of God' (Gn 20^{11} 42^{18}) was an extra safeguard to him. (2) The alliances with other nations of which we read must have exercised a considerable influence upon Israel's attitude towards foreigners (1 K $15^{18ff.}$ Asa with Benhadad, 2 K 16^{5} Is 7^{1} Pekah with Rezin, 2 K 16^{8} Ahaz with Tiglath-pileser, 2 K 17^{4} Hosea with So, 2 K $20^{12ff.}$ Is 39 Hezekiah with Merodach-baladan, Ezk 17^{15} Zedekiah with Egypt). Those who had fought shoulder to shoulder against a common foe would not be strangers in each other's country. One of the most familiar results of this intercourse is seen in the syncretism in religious matters, against which the prophets protest (Is 17^{10}, Ezk $8^{7ff.}$ etc.). (3) Israel's own trading enterprises, which carried her citizens beyond the confines of Palestine (Ezk 27^{11} to Tyre, 1 K 9^{28} 10^{11} 22^{48} to Ophir, 20^{34} to Damascus), taught the Israelites to sympathize with the feelings of a stranger who came to sojourn in their land (Ex 23^{9}).

In Israel, as in most Oriental nations, the king encouraged the presence of foreigners at his court, and depended upon their fidelity more than upon that of his own subjects (1 S 21^{7} 22^{9} Doeg the Edomite, 2 S 15^{18} 20^{7} 1 K $1^{38.44}$ Cherethites and Pelethites, 2 S 15^{19} Ittai the Gittite, 2 K $11^{4.19}$ Carites). By foreign marriages the Isr. king also sought to strengthen his position. Amongst David's wives were Abigail a Kalibbite, Maacah a Geshurite (1 S 25^{42}, 2 S 3^{3}), while his sister was married to Ithra an Ishmaelite (1 Ch 2^{17}, not Israelite 2 S 17^{25}). Solomon's harem included, besides Pharaoh's daughter, Moabites, Ammonites, Edomites, Zidonians, and Hittites (1 K 11^{1}). The wife of Ahab was Jezebel, daughter of Ethbaal king of the Zidonians (1 K 16^{31}). Intermarriages with the Can. are forbidden in Ex $34^{15f.}$ (JE), and there were doubtless many in Israel who disliked mixed marriages (Gn 29^{19} $24^{3.37}$, Nu 12^{1}, Jg 14^{3}); yet these must have been quite common. Unfortunately, the story of Dinah and Shechem (Gn 34), which is of composite origin (Wellh. Comp. 47 f., 312 f.; Kuenen, Abhandl. 255 ff.; see also artt. SHECHEM, SIMEON), has been so often worked over that it is impossible to draw inferences from it with certainty, but Jg $3^{5ff.}$ doubtless gives a true picture of the condition of things (cf. Gn 38^{2}, Jg 8^{31}, 1 K 7^{14}). It was really more through amalgamation than by war that the Can. were subdued. The tribe of Judah confessedly contained a large admixture of Can. elements (see CALEB), and Ed. Meyer goes the length of maintaining (ZAW, 1886, pp. 1 ff.) that Joseph was originally a Can. tribe. It is this process of amalgamation that helps to account for the rapid increase in the number of Israel's warriors between the time of the judges and the early days of the monarchy (cf. Jg 5^{8} with 2 S 24^{9}).

Besides foreign traders and resident gêrim, there must always have been in Israel a number of foreign slaves, either taken captive in war, or bought from Phœn. or other traders (Gn 17^{12}, Lv $25^{44ff.}$, Nu $31^{26ff.}$). See SLAVES.

(b) The Period of the Deuteronomic Legislation.—To protest against religious syncretism had always been a chief part of the prophet's work. The worship of the Tyrian Baal, and the corrupting influences of foreign civilization, were specially distasteful to Elijah, whose feelings were shared by Elisha and the usurper Jehu (2 K 9. 10). It is significant that Jehonadab the son of Rechab is associated with Jehu (2 K 10$^{15ff.}$), for the whole raison d'être of the Rechabite movement lay in opposition to Can. civilization and in attachment to the primitive simplicity, alike in religious and secular matters (Jer 35, cf. W. R. Smith, Proph. of Isr. 84 f.). The attitude of the prophets who have left us their writings is equally clear (Am 2^{11} 3^{15} 5$^{11.\ 25}$ 6^{8} 8^{5}, Hos 2^{19} 8^{14} 9^{10} 10^{13} 12$^{7ff.}$ 14^{4}). Specially noteworthy is Hos 9^{1} 'Rejoice not, O Israel, like the peoples,' where already 'peoples' is almost ='heathen.' The same disinclination to foreigners appears in Is 2^{6} 10^{4} 17^{10} 28^{15} 30$^{1-5}$ (protest against foreign alliances), Zeph 1$^{8.\ 11}$, Jer 2$^{36f.}$ 10^{25} (although this last may be a late interpolation) 35^{15}. 37$^{6f.}$. These feelings find expression in the highest degree in the Deuteronomic 'law-book' of Josiah's reign (2 K 22). Israel is a 'holy people' (Dt 7^{6}), and the land must not be 'defiled' (21^{23}) or 'caused to sin' (24^{4}). The relation of Israelites to non-Israelites is henceforth determined by law. The watchword is separation. The old injunction of Ex 23$^{31f.}$ (JE) is repeated in much stronger terms in Dt 7$^{1-5}$ 20$^{16-18}$ (where the present aversion takes the form of a past command to exterminate the Can.), and special stress is laid upon the prohibition of intermarriages with Can. (Dt 7^{3}, Jos 23^{12}). Further, in Dt 15^{3} and 23^{20}, the foreigner (nokhri) is expressly excluded from participation in two of the Israelite's privileges—that of having a creditor's claims waived every seventh year, and that of borrowing without having to pay interest. In Dt 14^{21} he is allowed to use for food the flesh of an animal that has died of itself, a concession which, although made in the same passage to the gêr, is ultimately withdrawn from the latter, and pronounced to be improper for any dweller in the land of Israel (Lv 17^{15}). See GER.

It is well to remember that universalism as well as particularism may be traced in the conduct and the teaching of the early prophets (cf. 1 K 17$^{8ff.}$ Elijah and the widow of Zarephath, 2 K 5 Elisha and Naaman, Is 2$^{2-4}$=Mic 4$^{1-3}$ the oracle of the mountain of the Lord's house). This element found expression, however, in the direction of proselytizing the gêr, not in that of cultivating friendly relations with foreigners proper. For the development of this subject see GER.

(c) The Exilic and Post-Exilic Periods.—If an approximation of gêr to Israelite was fostered by the Deut. legislation, and grew as time went on, upon the other hand the gulf between Israelite and foreigner became always wider. Even in the 'unclean' land of their exile (Ezk 4$^{13f.}$), where sacrifice could not be offered, Israel could cling to her Sabbaths and to circumcision, and probably meetings akin to those of the later synagogue contributed to the maintaining of her separate existence and manner of life. The legislative programme of Ezekiel is specially instructive for our subject. The uncircumcised foreigners who kept guard in the temple (2 K 11$^{4ff.}$), and probably performed other services (see CHERETHITES), are henceforward to be strictly excluded (Ezk 44$^{6-10}$), and such functions are to be discharged by the Levites (cf. 44^{22} priests to marry only virgins of the seed of the house of Israel or the widow of a priest).

The exiles who returned from Babylon had to solve the problem of their relations with the other inhabitants of Judæa and with their neighbours. A large number of the original inhabitants had never been carried captive at all, Edomites and others had taken possession of unoccupied settlements, and the colonists planted by the Assyr. king in Samaria (2 K 17$^{24ff.}$) had probably also encroached on Judæa. The majority of the old inhabitants, and a section of the returned exiles, were quite willing to coalesce with their neighbours (Neh 13^{24}, Mal 2^{11}), but, thanks to the fiery zeal of Ezra and Nehemiah, such an incorporating union was prevented. The unsparing rigour with which the two reformers carried out their work is matter of history. See EZRA, NEHEMIAH. It was a veritable crisis. Weapons of various kinds were used on both sides. It may be that literature was pressed into the service. If Dt 23$^{4-6}$ be, as Wellhausen and Cornill think, a later interpolation, it may date from this period, while the Book of Ruth may have been a manifesto issued by the party of toleration. The triumph of the puritan party was completed when the covenant was sealed (Neh 10^{30}), 'that we would not give our daughters unto the peoples of the land, nor take their daughters for our sons,' and when the Torah (P) was accepted as the norm of Israel's conduct (Neh 8). The ideal of P, even more than of D, is a holy people dwelling in a holy land, and serving God according to the prescriptions of His law (Nu 35^{34}, cf. Lv 19$^{26-31}$). The narrative portions of P carefully omit or modify what does not tally with this conception (e.g. no mention of Moses' sojourn in Midian, or his relations with the priest of that people; Balaam, again, could not be a prophet of J", but becomes a Midianite counsellor, by whose instrumentality Israel was led into immorality). In accordance with the above conceptions, Ezra deliberately sought to erect a hedge, not only around the law, but around Israel, and thus to prevent all contact, except what was absolutely unavoidable, with those outside the pale of Judaism. If the gêr had become the proselyte to be welcomed, the nokhri had become the heathen to be shunned. For the further development of the subject see GENTILES, HEATHEN.

FOREKNOW, FOREORDAIN.—Both these words translate the same Greek verb προγινώσκειν, the former in Ro 8^{29}, the latter in 1 P 1^{20}. 'Foreordain' does not appear before 1611, but Tindale introduced 'ordain before' in 1 P 1^{20}, which was the more surprising that in Ro 8^{29} he translated both verbs correctly, οὓς προέγνω καὶ προώρισεν, 'those which he knewe before, he also ordeyned before.' Both verbs are rare in English, the earliest certain example of 'foreordain' found by Oxf. Eng. Dict. being Norton's tr^{n} of Calvin's Institutes (1561), iii. 202, 'Some to be foreordeined to saluation, other some to destruction,' though the ptcp. is found in the Prol. to Wyclif's Mark (1420), 'The for-ordenede John.' RV tr. 1 P 1^{20} correctly 'was foreknown,' and retains 'foreordain' for προορίζειν wherever it occurs, Ac 4^{28} (AV 'determine before'), Ro 8$^{29.\ 30}$ (AV 'predestinate'), 1 Co 2^{7} (AV 'ordain'), Eph 1$^{5.\ 11}$ (AV 'predestinate').

FOREKNOWLEDGE.—As an attribute of God, foreknowledge is simply a special case or aspect of omniscience. God knows all things, therefore not only the present and the past, but the future also, must lie open to His sight. This is implied in all His promises, whether they refer to the individual only, as where offspring is promised to Abraham (Gn 18^{14}), or are on a national scale, as when the glory of Abraham's descendants is foretold (Gn 18^{18}). It is implied also in the warnings which God gives, or causes to be given, as in the story of Lot and Sodom (Gn 19), or in that of Moses before Pharaoh (Ex 8–11). To an earlier Pharaoh God shows in a dream 'what he is about to do' (Gn 41^{25}), and similarly, at a later period, to Nebuchadnezzar 'what shall be in the latter days' (Dn $2^{28.29}$). In all such cases, however, it may be objected that they are less examples of foreknowledge than declarations regarding His own future action on the part of One who has full power of doing what He wills; that they illustrate therefore omnipotence rather than omniscience. This close association of the two attributes must always be allowed for in the usage of Scripture. Where all events are referred to the direct action of the Deity, it is not strange that He should know and foretell what He is about to do. It may be the sense that thus to foreknow and bring about events demonstrates the existence and activity of the divine, or it may be that the course of the world was already regarded as possessing a relative independence, which forms the ground of the appeal to the foreknowledge of God as proving His superiority to the idols of the nations. Such an appeal occurs more than once in Deutero-Isaiah, e.g. Is 42^{9} 'Behold, the former things are come to pass, and new things do I declare; before they spring forth I tell you of them'; 46^{10} 'Declaring the end from the beginning, and from ancient times things that are not yet done; saying, My counsel shall stand'; cf. also 44^{6-8} $48^{3.5.6}$. In the NT Jesus asserts foreknowledge on the part of God of what is yet hidden even from the Son (Mk 13^{32}); and St. James (Ac 15^{18}), quoting the words of Amos ($9^{11.12}$), substitutes for 'the LORD that doeth this,' 'the LORD who maketh these things known from the beginning of the world.' All the references, indeed, to the fulfilment of prophecy, which are so frequently found in the NT, are intelligible only on the assumption that they are taken as evidencing the foreknowledge of God.

It is, however, in its application, not to events generally, but to salvation, and that both of the individual and of the community, that the question of the divine foreknowledge has arrested the attention, engaged the thoughts, and sometimes tried the hearts of men. True piety refers all things to God, and rejoices to see in the individual life of faith and love the manifestation of divine activity. It seems to it that, were the case otherwise, there could be no assurance of salvation, and the peace which is the most priceless possession of God's children would be impossible to them. It is argued that, as God is both able and willing to bring about the salvation of the individual, He must know beforehand, not only His purpose to do so, but its fulfilment. We refer salvation, along with all other events, to the Divine Will; but, as God is not only Supreme Will but Supreme Intelligence, before, or accompanying the forthputting of that will there must be an act of knowledge. Thus foreknowledge comes to be associated with ELECTION and PREDESTINATION (which see) as a constitutive element in the ultimate ground of the salvation made known in Christ. But in proportion as this conclusion removes difficulties on the one side, it raises them on the other. While theoretically admitting the determinative influence of the divine action upon the course of events in general, we recognize that to us they are contingent, and we are not perplexed by a difficulty which we scarcely feel. But with the question of personal salvation it is different. Foreknowledge here implies a determinative action which seems to leave no room for choice, or moral freedom. Further, experience shows that there are gradations in the extent of spiritual privileges accorded, and infinite variations in the degree to which men avail themselves of these. Are we then to argue a limitation of the divine power, or of the divine will, to save? The interests of piety and morality, the facts of religion and experience, seem incompatible here, the one demanding an absoluteness of determination which the other cannot admit. It is the difficulty which has divided schools of earnest men and powerful thinkers, like the Augustinian and the Pelagian, the Calvinist and the Arminian, which in various forms and degrees enters into and moulds men's whole conception of the religious life. Into its later phases we cannot here enter; we must confine ourselves to stating the data of the problem as they are presented in Scripture.

In the OT the question in this special form scarcely occurs. The prophets regard Israel as having been chosen from among the peoples of the earth to be God's special heritage (Dt 7^{6-8}, Neh $9^{7.8}$, Is $41^{8.9}$ $44^{1.2}$); but the thought of a decree affecting the eternal destiny of individuals could not present itself to those who had only a dim conception of the future life, and who regarded religious blessings as coming to the individual only through his membership of the elect nation. In the NT the difficulty is for the most part not acutely felt, the two sides of the problem being in turn referred to without any apparent sense of antagonism or incompatibility. Thus Jesus recognizes the Father's action in revealing to babes what is hidden from the wise and prudent (Mt $11^{25.26}$), declares that to some it is given to know the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven, while from others it is withheld (Mt 13^{11-16}), says that many are called, but few chosen (Mt 22^{14}; cf. Jn 6^{44} 12^{40}). On the other hand, He preaches the gospel of repentance (Mt 4^{17}), and laments over Jerusalem for neglecting or abusing her opportunities (Mt 23^{37}). Nowhere is it made an excuse for the rejection of salvation that any one has not been included in the saving purpose of God.

It is in connexion with certain passages in the writings of St. Paul that the questions in regard to foreknowledge definitely arise. These are two. How far does foreknowledge imply predestination, decision of the fate of an individual anterior to his personal existence and therefore to his own moral choice? and, What is the relation of foreknowledge to the ground of salvation; is there anything foreknown which accounts for the saving choice falling upon one and passing by another? In Ro $8^{29.30}$ we read: 'For whom he foreknew (οὓς προέγνω), he also foreordained (AV did predestinate) to be conformed to the image of his Son, . . . and whom he foreordained, them he also called; and whom he called, them he also justified; and whom he justified, them he also glorified.' Here the process of salvation is represented as a chain, as a succession of stages, of which the origin was a divine purpose based upon a divine foreknowledge. The word προγινώσκω in its ordinary classical use means simply 'to know previously,' 'to have knowledge of beforehand,' and hence, since 'all demonstration depends on previously existing knowledge' (ἐκ προγινωσκομένων πᾶσα διδασκαλία, Arist. Eth. Nic. vi. 3), present knowledge leads to forecasting the future by tracing out the probable course of events; cf. 2 P 3^{17} 'Ye therefore, beloved, knowing these things beforehand, beware.' But, with men, the course of events can at best be foreknown only with a high degree of probability, it is never more than an inference founded on experience; but God's foreknowledge must, we argue, be absolute, and involves the actual occurrence of that which is the object of it,—if it refers to time πρόγνωσις seems inevitably to involve πρόθεσις. There is, however, a certain vagueness in the way in which προέγνω is used in Ro 8^{29}, which is still more apparent in Ro 11^{2} 'God did not cast off his people which he foreknew.' There is something wanting to fill up the conception. Cremer (Bibl.-Theol. Lex.) therefore suggests taking these passages in connexion with another class of passages, where the simple verb is used, of which 1 Co 8^{3} may be taken as an example·

'If any man loveth God, the same is known of him' (ἔγνωσται ὑπ' αὐτοῦ). The union between God and man thus expressed is represented in προέγνω as anticipated and determined upon 'in the divine counsels before their manifestation in history.' Another shade of meaning which προγινώσκειν in these texts appears to bear is that in the chain of events leading to salvation it denotes the self-determination of God to that work. With the προορίζειν the first active step to its fulfilment has been taken, but the foreknowledge of God implies His own adoption of the plan. It thus, as Cremer remarks, ideally precedes even the ἐκλέγεσθαι of Eph 1[4.5] 'Even as he chose (ἐξελέξατο) us in him before the foundation of the world . . . having foreordained (προορίσας) us unto adoption as sons,' ἐκλέγεσθαι expressing 'a determination directed to the objects of the fellowship' into which God has resolved to enter with His people. Πρόγνωσις thus 'denotes the foreordained fellowship between God and the objects of His saving counsels, God's self-determination to enter into such fellowship preceding the realization thereof.' This definition establishes the place of foreknowledge in the order of the saving acts, but does not free it of the difficulty which its connexion with that order involves. In the self-determination of God to save, if this has an individual application, the whole problem is raised. It is evident that the apostle, anxious to establish the Christian's faith upon a sure foundation, overlooks for the moment the bearing of his explanation upon the question of moral choice. There is no reason to think that he would ignore the latter. His Epistles are full of appeals which recognize the moral nature and responsibilities of man. But the key to his attitude is probably to be found in that personal experience which he describes in Gal 1[15], where, as Lightfoot remarks, he heaps up words to emphasize the point he is maintaining ('the sole agency of God as distinct from his own efforts'), 'the good pleasure of God, who separated me (set me apart, devoted me to a special purpose), even from my mother's womb, and called me through his grace.' As he felt that he had been destined and was being prepared for his high office, even when he had been unconscious of it, and had been making in the opposite direction, so it was with humanity in general; man was moving towards the goal prepared for him, and God's purpose in spite of human recalcitrancy was being realized. But neither in the one case nor in the other did the leadings of Providence mean that the human will was being set aside.

But now, turning to the other question, has the προέγνω of Ro 8[29] 11[2] any special qualitative import? God knows, foreknows, His people—what constitutes them His people, is there anything in them or about them which accounts for foreknowledge becoming foreordination, which explains the ground of election? Here opinions differ, and it is probable that each exegete will read into the word what agrees with his general doctrinal standpoint. Thus, to take one or two examples, Cremer appears to think there is no such import, the conception being complete in itself, and the word not indicating 'a decision come to concerning any one'; Grimm (NT Lex., Thayer's ed.) holds the meaning to be that 'God foreknew that they would love him, or (with reference to what follows) he foreknew them to be fit to be conformed to the likeness of his Son.' This explanation (that of foreseen love) is adopted also by Weiss (NT Theology, § 88), while Godet (Romans, Eng. tr. ii. 109) takes 'faith' to be the other object of foreknowledge, the condition of salvation which God foreknew that His people would fulfil. It is doubtful, however, whether St. Paul had followed out his thought on this side into a definite form. He was concerned with the purpose of God, not with the ground of that purpose. Both in Gal 1[15], as we have seen, in reference to himself, and in Eph 1[5. 11] in reference to the Church, he lays stress upon the fact that God's action is 'according to the good pleasure of his will, to the praise of the glory of his grace'—'according to the purpose of him who worketh all things after the counsel of his own will.'

To these indications from the Pauline writings, the occurrences of προγινώσκειν and πρόγνωσις in other parts of NT (Ac 2[23] 26[5], 1 P 1[2. 20], 2 P 3[17]) add nothing in regard to the questions we have been considering. St. Paul founds upon election, as the method appointed by Providence for the education of humanity, his religious philosophy of history. Some are set apart for special privilege, but have also laid upon them special duty. The Jews are set aside until the Gentiles be come in; salvation is extended to the Gentiles in order that the Jews might come to share its blessings; but 'God does not cast off his people which he foreknew'; His purpose is not abandoned, but worked out according to the dictates of infinite wisdom and perfect love. It has been suggested (Plumptre, Epp. of St. Peter, in 'Cambridge Bible for Schools') that in the words 'the foreknowledge of God the Father' (1 P 1[2]) 'we find, perhaps, the secret of their (the apostles') acceptance of this aspect of the divine government. The choice and the knowledge were not those of an arbitrary sovereign will, capricious as are the sovereigns of earth, in its favours and antipathies, seeking only to manifest its power, but of a Father whose tender mercies were over all His works, and who sought to manifest His love to all His children.' 'In what way,' says the same writer, 'the thought of man's freedom to will was reconcilable with that of God's electing purpose, the writers of NT did not care to discuss. They felt, we may believe, instinctively, half-unconsciously, that the problem was insoluble, and were content to accept the two beliefs, which cannot logically be reconciled.' In this condition of unsolved antinomy the Bible leaves all such doctrines as those of grace and election, a heritage of discussion and speculation to age after age of the Church; yet, however difficult to the intellect, constantly receiving its practical solution and reconciliation in the Christian experience of the soul, which is at once conscious of its own moral responsibility and of its dependence upon God.

FOREPART.—The forepart (always one word in 1611) is either the front portion of a thing (Heb. פָּנִים face), Ex 28[27] 39[20] (of the 'ephod'), 1 K 6[20] (of the 'oracle'), Ezk 42[7] (of the 'chambers' of Ezekiel's temple, RV 'before'); or specifically the prow or bow of a vessel (πρῷρα), Ac 27[41], where it is opposed to the 'hinder part' (so 1611) or stern (πρύμνα). RV gives 'foreship' in the last passage, so as to correspond with v.[30] (the only other occurrence of the Gr. word), where AV and RV have 'foreship.' The Oxf. Eng. Dict. queries if 'forepart' is obsolete in this sense; it has found no later instance than Dampier (1699), Voyages, II. i. 74, 'The head or fore-part is not altogether so high as the Stern.' For illustration of 'forepart,' meaning generally the front, take T. Adams, II Peter, on 1[2] 'There is a helmet for the head, a corselet for the breast, a shield for the foreparts; but no guard, no regard for the back'; and Bunyan, Holy War (Clar. Pr. ed. p. 224, l. 35), 'Every door also was filled with persons who had adorned every one their fore-part against their house with something of variety and singular excellency, to entertain him withal as he passed in the streets,' where the 'fore-part' is explained by the editor as 'the space lying between a house and the public street or highway, the plot of ground forming a garden or fore-court.'

FORERUNNER (πρόδρομος) occurs once in Apocr. and once in NT. Wis 12[8] 'Thou sentest hornets as forerunners of thy host'; He 6[20] 'whither as a forerunner Jesus entered for us.' The meaning of both these passages is illustrated by the classical usage of πρόδρομος as a military term (Herod. i. 60, iv. 121, 122; Æsch. Theb. 80; Thuc. ii. 22, etc.). It was applied especially to the light-armed soldiers who were sent in advance of an army as scouts. A special corps of πρόδρομοι was attached to the Macedonian army (Arrian, Anab. i. 12; Diod. xvii. 17). When a king was to travel, a forerunner was sent to see that the way was in good order (Is 40[3ff.]; cf. Mal 3[1]). Both these OT passages are applied in NT to John the Baptist as the forerunner of Jesus (Mt 11[10], Mk 1[2], Lk 7[27]). In Lk 9[52] Jesus sends 'messengers before his face to make ready for him.' Cf. Jn 14[2] 'I go to prepare a place for you.' The kings of Israel had runners before their chariots (1 S 8[11]); Doeg the Edomite was the mightiest of Saul's runners (1 S 21[7], reading רָצִים for רֹעִים); Absalom and Adonijah prepared fifty men to run before them (2 S 15[1], 1 K 1[5]); Elijah ran before the chariot of Ahab (1 K 18[46]). See further under GUARD, RUNNERS.

FORESHIP.—In AV, Ac 27[30] only, 'under colour as though they would have cast anchors out of the foreship' (1611 'fore-ship,' Gr. πρῴρα, the bow of a ship). RV adds v.[41]. See FOREPART. It was Tindale that gave 'forshippe' as the tr[n] of πρῴρα in v.[30] and 'foore parte' in v.[41]. The translators of AV retained the variety according to their precept, 'that nicenesse in wordes was alwayes counted the next step to trifling' (The Translators to the Reader). 'Foreship' is still in use. For the anchorage of ships see Smith, Voyage and Shipwreck of St. Paul, 132, and art. SHIP.

FORESKIN.—See CIRCUMCISION.

FOREST.—There are five Heb. words for collections of trees and shrubs:—1. יַעַר ya'ar, δρυμός. This word, which is by far the most common, is tr. sometimes forest (Jer 46[23], Mic 3[12]), more frequently wood (Dt 19[5] RV 'forest,' 2 K 2[24], Ps 96[12] etc.). Its Arab. equivalent, wa'r, signifies difficult, and is used for rugged and stony regions, whether wooded or not. The expression 'thickets of the forest' (Is 9[18]) refers to a forest with tangled undergrowth.

2. חֹרֶשׁ ḥoresh is used twice for collections of trees:—(a) Wood (1 S 23[15] etc.), where (reading חרש) LXX has the proper name Καίνη. RV text has wood, marg. the proper name Ḥoresh (wh. see, and cf. Driver, Text of Samuel, ad loc.). Many believe that the reference here is to a town and not to a forest. (b) Forest (2 Ch 27[4]), where it is tr[d] in LXX by δρυμός. The same word is used for dense foliage (Ezk 31[3] 'shadowing shroud'). It is also used for a 'bough' (RV 'wood') Is 17[9]. The LXX here tr. 'of the Amorites and the Hivites,' and this is probably correct. In every instance of the genuine occurrence of this word, the proper meaning appears to be 'wooded height.'

3. סְבַךְ sĕbhak, thicket (Is 9[18] 10[34], Jer 4[7]). This word is given as a proper name in LXX (Gn 22[13] Σαβέκ). It is also tr[d] by δρυμός, Ps 74[5] (AV 'thick trees,' RV 'a thicket of trees').

4. עֲבִים 'ăbhîm, ἄλση, 'thickets' (Jer 4[29]), called so on account of the darkness of such places.

5. פַּרְדֵּס pardês, παράδεισος. This is a word of Persian origin, found in Sanskrit, paradeza; Armenian, pardes; Syriac, pardaysâ; Arab. firdaus. It is used once (Neh 2[8]) of a royal (AV) 'forest' or (RVm) 'park,' under the care of an officer, whose permission had to be obtained in order to fell wood within its limits. It is twice used for orchards (Ca 4[13], Ec 2[5] pl. RV 'parks').

Pal. and Syria were doubtless much more heavily wooded in ancient times than now. Numerous forests are mentioned in Scripture. (1) The wood lands of the Canaanites and Rephaim clothed the mountains of Samaria and Galilee, and extended apparently to Beth-shean (Jos 17[15-18]). Tabor is a representative of this wood of Ephraim. For another 'wood of Ephraim' see (9) below. (2) There was a forest near Bethel, clothing the sides of the ravines coming up from the Jordan Valley (2 K 2[23. 24]). (3) The 'forest of Hareth' was on the W. slopes of the Judæan hills (1 S 22[5]). (4) A forest in the hill-country, probably near Aijalon (1 S 14[25. 26], cf. v.[31]), where Jonathan ate the honey. (5) The 'fields of the wood' (Ps 132[6]) refer to the region of Kiriath-jearim, the 'village of the woods' (1 S 7[2]). (6) The forests where Jotham 'built castles and towers' (2 Ch 27[4]) were in the mountains of Judah. (7) If ḥoresh (1 S 23[15] etc.) refers to a wood, then there was a forest at the edge of the Judæan desert, near Ziph. The LXX seems to regard it as a place, Καίνη. Conder located it at Khurbet-Khureisa. Tristram, however, thinks that a forest was intended. (8) The latter opinion is strengthened by the allusion (Ezk 20[46. 47]) to the 'forest of the south field' and 'forest of the south' (AV), and 'forest of the field in the south' (Negeb), 'forest of the south' (RV). These must have been forests of S. Judæa, overlooking the Judæan wilderness and et-Tîh. (9) There were extensive forests in Bashan (Is 2[13]) and Gilead (2 S 18[6] 'the wood [RV 'forest'] of Ephraim'). (10) Lebanon was noted for its forests (1 K 7[2]), as also Carmel (2 K 19[23]). RV tr[s] כַּרְמְלוֹ in this passage 'fruitful field' (sc. of Lebanon, which seems demanded by the context). Forests are mentioned in Apocr. (1 Mac 4[38]).

Forests were an emblem of pride (Zec 11[2]). They were contrasted with cultivated ground, as an emblem of neglect (Is 29[17]).

Notwithstanding the ravages of conquerors, and the improvidence of the people, there are still considerable wooded regions, even in W. Palestine. The slopes of the hills, and not a few of the sides of the ravines, are clothed with thickets, and in a few places there are groves of trees, as on the flanks of Carmel and Tabor. Gilead and Bashan have quite extensive open woods of oak, terebinth, arbutus, and pine. There are still traces of the old cedar groves of Lebanon, and large open groves of pine, oak, cypress, juniper, and spruce. There are also many scrubs of dwarf oaks and carobs. Willows and poplars and plane trees are abundant along the watercourses, and tamarisks along the seashore and in the deserts. Acacias are fairly numerous in the valleys around the Dead Sea, and southward to Sinai. Terebinths, carobs, evergreen oaks, ash, hackberry, and Pride of India are scattered freely over the whole country. Large forests of full-grown trees are found in N. Lebanon, and in the heart of Amanus in N. Syria. In the latter chain are large districts, wholly occupied by forests of cedar of Lebanon, beech, pine, oak, hornbeam, cypress, spruce, and yew.

G. E. POST.

FORETELL.—Thrice 'foretell' occurs in AV, each time for a different Gr. verb, and twice in the sense of 'tell beforehand,' not specially prophesy or prognosticate: Mk 13[23] 'Behold, I have foretold you all things' (προείρηκα, RV 'I have told you all things beforehand'); 2 Co 13[2] 'I told you before, and foretell you, as if I were present, the second time' (προείρηκα καὶ προλέγω, RV 'I have said beforehand, and I do say beforehand,' RVm 'plainly' for beforehand). For this meaning see Shaks. Tempest, IV. i. 149—

'These our actors,
As I foretold you, were all spirits';

and III Henry VI. IV. vii. 12—

'For many men that stumble at the threshold
Are well foretold that danger lurks within.'

In the third instance the meaning is prophesy, predict, Ac 3^{24} 'all the prophets . . . have likewise foretold of these days' (TR προκατήγγειλαν, but edd. κατήγγειλαν, whence RV 'they also told of these days'). [προκαταγγέλλω is accepted by edd. in Ac 3^{18} (AV 'God before had shewed,' RV 'God foreshewed'), and 7^{52} (EV 'shewed before')]. J. HASTINGS.

FOREWARD.—In 1 Mac 9^{11} it is said of the army of Bacchides, 'they that marched in the foreward were all mighty men.' The Gr. for 'they that marched in the foreward' is οἱ πρωταγωνισταί, whence comes our 'protagonist.' The same word occurs in 2 Mac 15^{30}, where Judas is called ὁ πρωταγωνιστὴς ὑπὲρ τῶν πολιτῶν, AV 'the chief defender of the citizens,' RV 'the foremost champion of his fellow-citizens.' It signified first the principal actor in a play, and then the person taking a leading part in any enterprise, the one who 'plays first fiddle,' in fact, as Liddell and Scott suggest. The Eng. phrase 'in the foreward' comes from Geneva, 'they that foght in the forewarde were all valiant men.' The foreward (='front-guard') was the foremost line of an army, its vanguard; thus Caxton (1489), Sonnes of Aymon, i. 41, 'Fyrste of alle came the forewarde wyth the Oryflame'; and Shaks. Rich. III. V. iii. 293—

'My foreward shall be drawn out all in length, Consisting equally of horse and foot.'

RV translates, 'the mighty men that fought in the front of the battle'; which is almost a return to Wyclif (1382), 'the first of the bateil al the mighty.' J. HASTINGS.

FORFEIT.—From Old French forfait or forfet after late Latin forisfactum, a trespass, or fine (Lat. foris without, and facere to do), a 'forfeit' was originally an act outside of righteousness, and 'to forfeit' was to act unrighteously, to sin. Thus Berners, Froissart, I. ccccxxxi. 'Sir, ye know well the Flemings that be yonder have done us no forfeit'; and Chaucer, Parsones Tale, 275 (Student's ed. p. 682[a]), 'And al this suffred Jesu Crist, that neuere forfeited.' From this the meaning passed early into the expression of a penalty due for transgression, a fine; and the verb came to signify to lose, or lose the right to, something, a meaning in which both subst. and vb. are still used. But in its only occurrence in AV the vb. 'forfeit' (the subst. is not found) is used with direct reference to the authority or executive power to confiscate; and in that sense it is marked by Oxf. Eng. Dict. as obsolete: Ezr 10^{8} 'And that whosoever would not come within three days, according to the counsel of the princes and the elders, all his substance should be forfeited' (חֵרֶם, AVm and RVm 'devoted'). Cf. Dn 2^{5} Wyc. (1382), 'your housis shuln be maad commoun or forfetid.'

RV introduces 'forfeit' into Dt 22^{9} 'Thou shalt not sow thy vineyard with two kinds of seed; lest the whole fruit be forfeited' (תִּקְדָּשׁ, AV 'defiled,' RVm 'consecrated'; Driver, 'lit. become holy or sacred, i.e. be forfeited to the sanctuary'); Mt 16^{26}, Mk 8^{36} 'forfeit his life' (ζημιωθῇ τὴν ψυχὴν αὐτοῦ, AV 'lose his own soul'); and Lk 9^{25} 'and lose or forfeit his own self' (ἑαυτὸν δὲ ἀπολέσας ἢ ζημιωθείς, AV 'be cast away'). In the remaining occurrences of ζημιοῦν (1 Co 3^{15}, 2 Co 7^{9}, Ph 3^{8}), RV renders 'suffer loss.'

J. HASTINGS.

FORGE, FORGER.—Forge and fabricate come both from Lat. fabricare, the former through the Old French forgier, the latter directly. To 'forge' is therefore to make or shape, as Ex 4^{11}, Wyc. (1382), 'Who made the mouth of man, or who forgide (1388 'made') the dowmbe and the deef, the seer and the blynde?'; Tindale, Works (ed. Russell, 1831), i. 93, 'The power of God . . . altereth him, changeth him clean, fashioneth and forgeth him anew.' It is especially used of shaping metals by fire and hammer; and in this sense RV uses the subst. forger, Gn 4^{22} 'Tubal-cain, the forger of every cutting instrument of brass and iron' (לֹטֵשׁ כָּל־חֹרֵשׁ, AV 'an instructer [m. 'whetter'] of every artificer in brass and iron'; so RVm). The passage is difficult, perhaps corrupt; it is fully discussed in Dillmann and in Spurrell. But in AV 'forge' and 'forger' are used only in the metaphorical sense of framing or inventing lies: Job 13^{4} 'ye are forgers of lies' (טֹפְלֵי־שָׁקֶר); Ps 119^{69} 'The proud have forged a lie against me' (טָפְלוּ עָלַי שָׁקֶר); and Sir 51^{2} 'lips that forge lies' (ἐργαζομένων ψεῦδος). The Geneva tr. of Lk 19^{8} is, 'If I have taken from any men by forged cauillation, I restore hym foure folde.' And Shaks. Rich. II. IV. i. 40, gives—

'If thou deny'st it twenty times, thou liest;
And I will turn thy falsehood to thy heart,
Where it was forged, with my rapier's point.

FORGETFULNESS.—Forgetful in the sense of heedless, neglectful, is perhaps still in use colloquially, but in literary English we should not now say as AV after Tindale in He 13^{2} 'Be not forgetful to entertain strangers' (τῆς φιλοξενίας μὴ ἐπιλανθάνεσθε, RV 'Forget not to show love unto strangers'). 'A forgetful hearer' (Ja 1^{25}) is more modern, but RV prefers 'a hearer that forgetteth' (ἀκροατὴς ἐπιλησμονῆς, lit. 'a hearer of forgetfulness,' as in 2^{4} 'judges of evil thoughts' = evil-thoughted judges').

In Sir 23^{14} the meaning is again, probably, heedless and so unmannerly, 'Remember thy father and thy mother, when thou sittest among great men. Be not forgetful before them, and so thou by thy custom become a fool' (ὡς ποτε ἐπιλάθῃ). But the passage is obscure. Wyclif has it, 'Lest perauenture God forgete thee in the sighte of hem,' after Vulg. Ne forte obliviscatur te Deus in conspectu illorum; and he (or the Vulg.) is followed by Rogers', Coverdale's, the Bishops', and the Douay versions; the Geneva has 'lest thou be forgotten in their sight.' RV slightly alters the construction of the sentence, and so gets a new meaning—

'Remember thy father and thy mother,
For thou sittest in the midst of great men;
That thou be not forgetful before them,
And become a fool by thy custom.'

The great men are presumably the father and mother; if so, 'great ones' would have been better; the Gr. is simply ἀνὰ μέσον μεγιστάνων. Ball, in QPB, follows Fritzsche and AV, and explains, 'Low language reflects upon one's upbringing.'

Forgetfulness occurs in Ps 88^{12} 'Shall thy wonders be known in the dark? and thy righteousness in the land of forgetfulness?' (אֶרֶץ נְשִׁיָּה), where 'forgetfulness' is not the condition of losing all recollection, but of being forgotten, oblivion,—a meaning which Bradley (Oxf. Eng. Dict.) marks as probably obsolete. The condition of losing recollection might be represented as a blessed one, as in Shaks. II Henry IV. III. i. 8—

'O sleep! O gentle sleep!
Nature's soft nurse, how have I frighted thee,
That thou no more wilt weigh my eyelids down,
And steep my senses in forgetfulness?'

But the Psalmist's thought is rather as in Norton (1561), Calvin's Inst. IV. xviii. 704, 'This Masse

. . . shamefully . . . putteth his death in forgetfulnesse'; and Gray, Elegy, l. 85—

> 'For who, to dumb Forgetfulness a prey,
> This pleasing anxious being e'er resigned,
> Left the warm precincts of the cheerful day,
> Nor cast one longing ling'ring look behind?'

This is the meaning also of Wis 17^3 'they were scattered under a dark vail of forgetfulness' (ἀφεγγεῖ λήθης παρακαλύμματι, Vulg. tenebroso oblivionis velamento'); but in 14^{26} 16^{11}, Sir 11^{25}, the word is used in its usual sense of a tendency to forget. J. HASTINGS.

FORGIVENESS.—In OT three words especially are used to express the idea of forgiveness—כָּפַר* 'cover' or 'pacify'; סָלַח (root meaning unknown); נָשָׂא 'lift up' or 'away.' AV and RV render all three usually 'forgive,' sometimes 'pardon.' The first and second are always used of divine forgiveness—the first, rarely (Ps 78^{38}, Jer 18^{23}, Dt 21^8, 2 Ch 30^{18}), the second, frequently (e.g. 1 K $8^{30f.}$, Lv $4^{20f.}$); the third is in common use of ordinary human forgiveness as well (e.g. Gn 50^{17}, Ex 10^{17}, 1 S 15^{25} 25^{28}). In nearly all instances the context implies repentance for the offence, and an intention to avoid a repetition of it, as a condition of the forgiveness; and as a result of it, that the offender is placed again in the position which he occupied before the offence, in the old covenant relation to God, or in the same friendly relation as before to the person affected. Under the sacrificial system the repentance and the amends are represented by the sacrifice which is offered by the offender through the priest (see Oehler, Theology of the OT, § 139); but in other cases in the Psalms and the Prophets there is no suggestion of more than acknowledgment of sin, repentance, and that intention of amendment which is expressed by the phrase 'turning to the Lord.' Forgiveness is a free act on the part of God or of man; it restores the offender to the state in which there is no obstacle to his communion with him from whom he has been alienated; it gives peace of mind (Ps 32), a consciousness of the divine mercy (Ps 103); it removes the fear of punishment and quickens love (2 S 12^{13}, Job 33^{28}, Ps 103^2). Nor is it only an individual matter; the whole nation may be alienated from God through neglect of his will, and may by forgiveness be restored,—such is the burden of many a prophetic exhortation.

It has been said that 'no permanent state of reconciliation' was established under the old covenant; that there was only such forgiveness for the past as might enable men to begin again to seek justification through the works of the law. It has also been maintained that the old covenant furnished only a 'passing over' of sin, a 'closing the eyes' to it on the part of God—by which, though satisfaction was not made, though there was no real remission of sin, punishment was forgone. The consideration of these questions involves the whole subject of ATONEMENT (wh. see); but it may be stated here that neither the national and individual experiences recorded in the OT, nor the words and general language used, seem to suggest any fundamental difference in the idea of forgiveness from that which we find in the NT. When St. Paul in a particular passage (Ro 3^{25}) uses, with reference to sins committed by men living under the old covenant, a word (πάρεσις) different from that (ἄφεσις) which is in common use in the NT to express 'forgiveness,' he has in mind a different thought. He is arguing that because in former ages God had not exacted from men the punishment which was due for their sins (cf. Ac 14^{16}, 17^{30}), his forbearance had been misunderstood: he had 'passed by' sins till the world was in danger of forgetting that he was a God of righteousness; and the time had come for a signal exhibition of his hatred of sin in the propitiation made in Christ Jesus (see Ro $3^{25.\ 26}$ RV, the sense of the argument is lost in AV). With men such 'passing by' might involve forgetting, it could not be the same as 'forgiving'; with God it would be neither (see Trench, Synonyms, § xxxiii.). No argument with regard to the nature of forgiveness under the old covenant can be drawn from the passage. Indeed, so far as the relation between the individual and God is concerned, there is nothing to indicate that the forgiveness granted by God in the experience of his people before the coming of Christ was different in kind from that which Christ proclaimed. A difference in the requirement of it from men in their relations with one another, no doubt, may readily be detected between the teaching of the OT and the NT. It is here that the real development in the ethical teaching of the NT on the subject is to be found. The duty of forgiving injuries and wrongs committed against oneself or others cannot be said to occupy the prominent place in the OT that it has in the teaching of Jesus. It must be recognized that in this respect there is a real distinction to be drawn. But true as it is that the revelation of the divine will and of the ideal of human life and character, the power of the whole revelation made in Christ, has immeasurably facilitated the individual's opportunity of conscious enjoyment of the divine forgiveness, and stimulated his readiness to bestow forgiveness in his measure upon others; yet it is none the less true that the same forgiveness of sin was offered to previous generations of men—'they are not to be heard, which feign that the old fathers did look only for transitory promises.' The materials for determining the idea of forgiveness are, however, so much richer in the NT than in the OT, that we turn to it rather than to the OT for the elaboration of the idea.

So closely, indeed, is the principle associated with the teaching and work of Christ, that forgiveness has been called 'Christ's most striking innovation in morality,' and the phrase a 'Christian' spirit is commonly regarded as synonymous with a disposition of readiness to forgive an injury. The pagan ideal of manly life was to succeed in doing as much good to your friends and as much injury to your enemies as possible; and if it be not true that forgiveness was a virtue unknown in the ancient world, it was at all events not one that was demanded or proclaimed as a duty by any ethical system. Indeed it is clear that without a sense of the need of personal holiness and the consciousness of guilt, without—in the widest meaning of the phrase—a conviction of sin, there could be no true repentance, no sense of the need of forgiveness. And such a conviction of sin neither Greek nor Roman religion produced.

The words which are used in the NT are the Gr. representatives of the Heb. words in the OT. We have, though rarely, the word (καλύπτω) meaning 'cover' or 'hide' (Ro 4^7, 1 P 4^8, Ja 5^{20}, all quoted from LXX); and once, with reference to former times, the word for 'passing by' (Ro 3^{25}); but by far the commonest word is that which expresses the idea of 'sending away,' or 'letting go' or 'releasing' (ἄφεσις), which is rendered in this connexion either 'forgive,' 'forgiveness,' or 'remit,' 'remission.' The noun occurs in this sense eleven times in the synoptic Gospels (not at all in Jn) and Ac (Mt 26^{28}, Mk 1^4 3^{29}, Lk 1^{77} 3^3 24^{47}, Ac 2^{38} 5^{31} 10^{43} 13^{38} 26^{18}; eight times in Lk and Ac, a favourite word of St. Luke), and four times elsewhere (Eph 1^7, Col 1^{14}, He 9^{22} 10^{18}). In eleven of these instances there is added 'of sins,' in one 'of trespasses,' in one the same words are in the immediate context, and in the two remaining instances the word stands absolutely. (AV renders nine times 'remission,' six times 'forgiveness.') The verb with the same meaning occurs about forty times in the synoptic Gospels, once in Ac (8^{22}), three times in Jn [Gospel once (20^{23}), 1 Ep. twice (1^{9} 2^{12})], and twice elsewhere (Ro 4^{7}, Ja 5^{15}). It is found predominantly with the usual word for 'sin' (ἁμαρτία) or 'sins' expressed or implied in the context, but other words—'debt,' 'trespasses,' 'iniquities'—are also used. The verb implies the complete removal of the cause of offence. The sin is taken out of the way, out of sight. The debt is cancelled: the debtor released from his obligation (cf. Mt 18^{23-35}). As far as the offender is concerned, the trespass is done away. He no longer has the sense of sin, of guilt and liability to punishment; he is restored to the harmonious relations which existed before. (It is noticeable that though this is the favourite word of the Gospels and Acts, it is scarcely found in the NT outside them: the idea of forgiveness is merged in the wider ones of justification and salvation). Instead of this word St. Paul uses one (χαρίζεσθαι ten times) which has the special sense 'confer a favour on,' 'be gracious to'—of men towards one another and of Christ in relation to them (2 Co $2^{7.\ 10}$ 12^{13}, Eph 4^{32}, Col 2^{13} 3^{13}). St. Luke has this word twice (Lk $7^{42.\ 43}$), each time of a debt (AV 'frankly forgave'), and twice he has also a word (ἀπολύω, $6^{37\ bis}$), meaning to 'loose from,' 'release,' 'set at liberty.' In the Apocalypse the nearest equivalent is found probably in the idea of the blood 'loosing' from sin and 'cleansing' (e.g. Rev 1^{5} 7^{14}; cf. 1 Jn $1^{7.\ 9}$).

The teaching of the NT as to forgiveness is sufficiently represented by (1) the sayings of Christ which led up to St. Peter's question and the answer to it (Lk $17^{3.\ 4}$, Mt 18^{15-17} and $18^{21.\ 22}$), and the Parables of the Prodigal and of the great Debtor (Lk 15^{11-32}, Mt 18^{23-35}); (2) the clause in the Lord's Prayer (with the comment which is added Mt $6^{14.\ 15}$, cf. Mk $11^{25.\ 26}$); and (3) the allusion to blasphemy against the Holy Spirit (Mt 12^{31} and parallels), and St. John's mention of sin 'unto death' (1 Jn 5^{17}).

(1) The teaching is given much more fully in Mt than in Lk, but the full essence of it is in the words of Lk, 'If thy brother trespass against thee, rebuke him; and if he repent, forgive him. And if he trespass against thee seven times in a day, and seven times in a day turn again to thee, saying, I repent; thou shalt forgive him.' It is clear at once that, if certain conditions are satisfied, the teaching of Christ admits of no limitations to the law of forgiveness. The account in Mt more vividly enforces this point. It represents Christ as at first only enunciating the general principle. St. Peter seeks for further guidance, wishing to reduce the principle to the compass of a definite rule, and asking, 'Lord, how oft shall my brother sin against me, and I forgive him? till seven times?' and it is in answer to his question that the words are elicited which raise the duty out of the sphere of mere numerical calculation—'I say not unto thee, Until seven times: but, Until seventy times seven.' There is to be no limit whatever to the readiness of a follower of Christ to forgive. On the other hand, it is equally clear that something is required on the part of the offender before he can be the recipient of forgiveness. 'If thy brother . . . turn again to thee, saying, I repent'—this is the condition: there must be the consciousness of sin, the free avowal of error (cf. Lk 15^{21}), the recognition of wrong-doing and the turning away from it, and, it seems, the willingness to make amends (cf. Lk 19^{8}). That there must be such repentance* (change of mind, acceptance of a new ideal of life) is still more plainly shown in the account of Mt: the Christian is not to remain passive till the offender of his own accord comes to him penitent and begging reconciliation—he is, on the contrary, to adopt all rational means he can to bring home to him the error and evil of his conduct; and should he still remain inpenitent and obdurate, there is no forgiveness for him—he places himself outside the pale of Christian life—'Let him be unto thee as a heathen man and a publican.'

The Parable of the Prodigal Son shows the same relation between forgiveness and repentance. The wish to leave the father—the revolt against his will, his plan of life—was the sin: the return is in itself sufficient proof of repentance, even though it was prompted by the sense of failure and physical hunger; the father recognizes it as such, and hastens to meet and welcome the offender, and forgives him before he has had time to put into words his confession of sin; the son is in that moment restored to the position in his father's household which he had forfeited. (The teaching of the apostles as described in Ac lays similar emphasis on repentance as a first condition of salvation [e.g. Ac 2^{38}], baptism being from one point of view the outward mark of repentance). So, too, the publican goes down to his house 'justified' because penitent (Lk 18^{14}).

Similarly, a readiness to forgive others is laid down as a condition for a man's own forgiveness (cf. Mt 6^{12}, Mk $11^{25.\ 26}$, Mt 5^{7}). The Parable of the great Debtor shows that the absence of a forgiving spirit in men prevents their being themselves forgiven.

(2) The instances of Christ's teaching which have been cited might be interpreted as having reference only to relations between men, though it is scarcely conceivable that the parables are not intended to be significant of the relations of mankind as sons to God the Father, the ideal of character. The clause in the Lord's Prayer (Mt 6^{12}, Lk 11^{4}) makes it evident that human forgiveness and divine forgiveness are represented as strictly analogous. There is indeed no indication of any fundamental difference between the forgiveness which the Christian wins from God and that which he in turn bestows upon his 'brother.' It is the same phrase which is used throughout—a phrase denoting actual 'remission' of sin; and it is used by Christ of his own action, and alike of God's and of man's part in the mysterious process. If it were not so, it would be mockery to offer up the petition, 'Forgive us our trespass, as we forgive them that trespass against us.' The comment on the clause, which Mt appends to the Prayer, and the similar saying, which Mk introduces in connexion with the exhortation to faith in praying, forbid any differentiation (cf. Col 3^{13}). The statements are quite general. Forgiveness is to be won by repentance and confession, whatever the nature of the offence, whoever the persons concerned may be. (In view of the indisputably general application of the Parable of the Prodigal Son and the other references to forgiveness, it seems impossible to accept the interpretation of Mt 18^{15-17} which would limit its teaching to relations between Christians).

(3) There are, however, two references which seem to set a limit to the possibility of divine forgiveness. One is the case of the blasphemy against the Holy Spirit; the other is St. John's allusion to 'sin unto death.' The first of these references declares that there is a supreme sin for which no man can ever hope to be forgiven—'All their sins shall be forgiven unto the sons of men, and their blasphemies wherewith soever they shall blaspheme' (Mk 3^{28}); but with these sins and blasphemies there is pointedly contrasted one—'Whosoever shall blaspheme against the Holy Spirit hath never forgiveness, but is guilty of an eternal sin,' and it 'shall not be forgiven him, neither in this world, nor in that which is to come' (Mt 12^{32}). All that can be said with certainty as to the nature of this sin is that the opposition of the scribes and Pharisees to Christ was a sign and indication of it, and that the Pharisaic charge that it was by the powers of evil that he was enabled to perform his works of healing, was the immediate occasion of his denunciation of it. Augustine regarded the sin as deliberate persistence in evil (for other interpretations see Westcott, note on 1 Jn 5^{17}). It would appear from the rest of Christ's teaching on forgiveness that it was in any case of such a character as to deaden and destroy the spiritual sense in him who yielded himself up to its influence, so that repentance would become impossible to him. The idea of unpardonable sin is further suggested by St. John's exception of 'sin unto death' from the subjects of intercessory prayer (1 Jn 5^{16}). To one who thus sins the way of forgiveness is closed; at least it is not to be opened through the intercession of his brethren, which in other cases would avail.

* Two words are used which imply change of mind (involving regret for the course pursued and change of conduct for the future) Mt 4^{17}, Mk 1^{15}, Lk $15^{7.\ 10}$, and change of will Mt 21^{29} (on the question whether the distinction holds or not, see Trench, Synonyms, § lxix.); and there are also words which mean 'turning' or 'conversion,' Lk 22^{32}, Mt 18^{3}.

There remains to be considered the problem of the significance of Christ's cry from the Cross, 'Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do' (Lk 23^{34}). It is evident that it is a prayer for the forgiveness of those who have not repented, who have not even come to knowledge of their guilt. It cannot, however, be regarded as limited in its scope to the Roman soldiers, and excluding any reference to the share in the final tragedy taken by the party of the scribes and Pharisees. The soldiers could not be thought of as in any real sense needing forgiveness for carrying out their orders in what they could only consider an ordinary execution: even Pilate was treated as comparatively guiltless. The cry must therefore be the supreme expression of the human sympathy and love of Christ, of the great principle which he had always inculcated. The sin embodied in the conduct of the Pharisaic party he had condemned in burning words; towards it there could not be any change of feeling; but they might be brought to repentance late though it was, and the words which are under consideration are a prayer for that result, a loving hope for the enlightenment of those blind leaders of the blind. It may be a hope against hope, but the cry does not constitute an exception to the principles and conditions of forgiveness which are to be drawn from other parts of the NT. It is a crowning example of 'forgivingness,' if so be that the divine mercy may transcend the usual conditions of the bestowal of the boon. Such a spirit of 'forgivingness' may be present (it has been noticed that it is required in all cases from the individual who has been injured), whether 'forgiven-ness' (the remission of the offence as regards the person who has offended) ensues or not. The word 'forgiveness' is capable of the active and of the passive sense. In the active sense it is clear that it is an ordinary Christian duty; in the passive sense, before it can be realized the conditions which have been elicited must be fulfilled.

FORM.—Numerous as are the Heb. and Gr. words tr^d 'form,' the meanings of the word in AV and RV may be reduced to the following: 1. Shape, as an orderly arrangement of parts, Gn 1^{2} 'The earth was without form' (תֹהוּ, RV 'waste'; so in Jer 4^{23}); Wis 11^{17} 'thy Almighty hand, that made the world of matter without form' (ἐξ ἀμόρφου ὕλης, RV 'out of formless matter'). Cf. Shaks. K. John, III. i. 253—

'All form is formless, order orderless.'

2. Such orderly arrangement as produces beauty, comeliness, Is 52^{14} 53^{2} 'he hath no form nor comeliness' (תֹּאַר); Wis 15^{5} 'they desire the form of a dead image, that hath no breath' (εἶδος; Farrar, 'he yearns for the unbreathing beauty of a dead image'). For this meaning see Shaks. Mids. Night's Dream, I. ii. 233—

'Things base and vile, holding no quantity,
Love can transpose to form and dignity.'

3. The special or characteristic shape of a person or thing, Ezk 8^{3} 'And he put forth the form of an hand, and took me by a lock of mine head' (תַּבְנִית; so 10^{8}); Dn 3^{19} 'Then was Nebuchadnezzar full of fury, and the form of his visage was changed' (צֶלֶם); Mk 16^{12}, Ph $2^{6,7}$ (μορφή, the characteristic form of the Son of God and His characteristic form as the Son of Man; see Gifford, The Incarnation, p. 22 ff.; and art. FASHION). Cf. Shaks. Com. of Errors, II. ii. 200—

'Thou hast thine own form.
No, I am an ape.
If thou art changed to aught, 'tis to an ass.'

Milton, Comus, l. 70—

'Their human countenance,
Th' express resemblance of the gods, is chang'd
Into some brutish form of wolf or bear.'

And Par. Reg. iv. 599—

'True image of the Father, whether thron'd
In the bosom of bliss, and light of light
Conceiving, or remote from Heav'n, enshrin'd
In fleshly tabernacle, and human form,
Wand'ring the wilderness.'

4. The representation or pattern of anything, Ezk 8^{10} 'And behold, every form of creeping things . . . pourtrayed upon the wall round about' (תַּבְנִית); 2 Ch 4^{7} 'he made ten candlesticks of gold according to their form' (מִשְׁפָּט, RV 'according to the ordinance concerning them'); Ezk 43^{11} quater (צוּרָה); Ro 6^{17} 'that form of doctrine which was delivered you' (τύπος, RVm 'pattern'); 2 Ti 1^{13} 'Hold fast the form of sound words which thou hast heard of me' (ὑποτύπωσις, RV 'pattern'). So Wyclif's tr. of 1 Th 1^{7} 'so that ye ben maad fourme, or ensaumple, to alle men bileuynge'; and Locke, Human Underst. III. iii. 230, 'To make abstract general Ideas, and set them up in the Mind, with Names annexed to them, as Patterns, or Forms (for in that sense the word Form has a very proper signification).' 5. Outward aspect (a); often the mere outward appearance as opposed to the inner reality (b): Thus (a) Job 4^{16} 'It stood still, but I could not discern the form thereof' (מַרְאֶה, RV 'appearance'); 1 S 28^{14} 'And the woman said unto Saul, I saw gods ascending out of the earth. And he said unto her, What form is he of?' (תֹּאַר); Dn 2^{31} 3^{25} (רְו, RV 'aspect'). So Shaks. Coriol. III. iii. 109—

'Art thou a man? thy form cries out thou art'; and Henry V. III. vi. 72, 'Why, 'tis a gull, a fool, a rogue: that now and then goes to the wars, to grace himself at his return unto London under the form of a soldier.' (b) 2 S 14^{20} 'To fetch about this form of speech hath thy servant Joab done this thing' (פְּנֵי הַדָּבָר, RV 'to change the face of the matter'); Ro 2^{20}, 2 Ti 3^{5} 'Having a form of godliness, but denying the power thereof' (both μόρφωσις, which is not so purely as σχῆμα the mere outward form, but seems to be so used in both these passages, esp. 2 Ti 3^5, and that is clearly the meaning of AV. See Sanday-Headlam on Ro 2^{20}). In illustration, take again Shaks., Henry V. II. ii. 116—

> 'And other devils that suggest by treasons,
> Do botch and bungle up damnation
> With patches, colours, and with forms, being fetch'd
> From glistering semblances of piety'; and Othello, II. i. 243, 'a knave very voluble, no further conscionable than in putting on the mere form of civil and humane seeming, for the better compassing of his salt and most hidden-loose affection.'

The word 'form' has been occasionally introduced into RV when it is not in AV. It is used to tr. (1) Heb. תַּמֻנָה in all its occurrences except one, either for AV 'likeness' (Ex 20^4, Dt $4^{23.\ 25}$ 5^8), or 'similitude' (Nu 12^8, Dt $4^{12.\ 15.\ 16}$), or 'image' (Job 4^{16}). The exception is Ps 17^{15} 'I shall be satisfied when I awake with thy likeness,' where RV gives 'form' in marg., Amer. RV in text. (2) קָצֶב in 1 K 6^{25} 7^{37} for AV 'size'; but not in the only other occurrence of that word Jon 2^6 (EV 'bottom'—'I went down to the bottoms of the mountains,' AVm 'Heb. cuttings off'). (3) εἶδος Lk 3^{22}, Jn 5^{37} (AV 'shape'), 1 Th 5^{22} (AV 'appearance'). (4) τύπος Ac 23^{25} (AV 'manner').

FORMER.—This comparative adj. was at one time freely used to express the more advanced of two positions. Thus Wyclif (1388), after saying that Jacob 'departide (1382 'dyuydide') the puple that was with hym . . . in to twei cumpenyes,' adds (Gn 32^{17}), 'And he comaundide to the formere (1382 'forther'), and seide, If thou schalt mete my brothir Esau,' etc.; and Knox, Hist. 88, 'Fiftie horse and men of the first rank lay dead at once, without any hurt done to the Scottish Armie, except that the Speares of the former two rankes were broken.' In this way 'former' is used in Zec 14^8 'Living waters shall go out from Jerusalem; half of them toward the former sea, and half of them toward the hinder sea' (הַיָּם הַקַּדְמוֹנִי, AVm and RV 'the eastern sea'); the 'eastern' sea being the Dead Sea, and the 'hinder' or 'western' sea (הַיָּם הָאַחֲרוֹן) the Mediterranean.

FORNICATION. — See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS.

FORSOMUCH. — Wis 12^{15} 'Forsomuch then as thou art righteous thyself' (δίκαιος δὲ ὤν, RV 'But being righteous'); and Lk 19^9 'forsomuch as he also is a son of Abraham' (καθότι, RV 'forasmuch as'). The form is rare. Far more common is 'forasmuch,' which occurs forty-three times in AV, and was introduced generally by Tindale (it does not seem to occur in the Wyclifite versions). Tindale always keeps the parts of the word distinct, 'for as moche'; AV always presents an undivided word. It is Rogers (Matthew's Bible) that gives 'for so much' in Wis 12^{15}; but in Lk 19^9 AV is the first to use that form (perhaps by a slip of the pen or the printer), Tindale and others having 'for as moche.'

FORSWEAR.—To 'forswear' is to undo one's swearing, in accordance with the meaning of for (see under FOREGO). In AV it is always used reflexively, 'to forswear oneself,' with the meaning to swear falsely, to perjure oneself: 1 Es 1^{48} 'And after that king Nabuchodonosor had made him to swear by the name of the Lord, he forswore himself, and rebelled' (ἐφιορκήσας ἀπέστη); Wis 14^{28} 'they . . . lightly forswear themselves' (ἐπιορκοῦσιν ταχέως); and Mt 5^{33} 'Thou shalt not forswear thyself, but shalt perform unto the Lord thine oaths' (οὐκ ἐπιορκήσεις; AV is Tindale's tr^n, Wyclif has the intrans. form, 'Thou shalt not forswere': with which we may compare T. Adams, II Peter, on 1^4 'Peter swore like a ruffian, and forswore like a renegade, till Christ looked on him, and then he wept'). For the AV tr^n cf. Shaks. III Henry VI. V. v. 75—

> 'Clarence. Did'st thou not hear me swear I would not do it?
> Q. Margaret. Ay, but thou usest to forswear thyself;
> 'Twas sin before, but now 'tis charity.'

FORT.—See WAR.

FORTH.—As Germ. fort from vor, so 'forth' is an adverb formed from 'fore'; and its general meaning is 'to the front.' When used with such verbs as 'bring' or 'come' it means forward into view, as Pr 25^9 'Put not forth thyself in the presence of the king' (RV 'put not thyself forward,' RVm 'Heb. glorify not thyself'); Jn 8^{42} 'I proceeded forth, and came from God' (ἐξῆλθον, RV 'I came forth'). In this, its most characteristic meaning, it is used both literally and figuratively, and accompanies a great many different verbs, as bring, Gn 1^{11} 'Let the earth bring forth grass,' Is 41^{21} 'bring forth your strong reasons'; come, Job 14^2 'He cometh forth like a flower, and is cut down'; put, Mt 13^{24} 'Another parable put he forth unto them' (παρέθηκεν αὐτοῖς, RV 'set he before them'); stretch, Ex 25^{20} 'the cherubims shall stretch forth their wings on nigh' (RV 'spread out'); shoot, Gn 40^{10} 'her blossoms shot forth'; send, Ex 15^7 'Thou sentest forth thy wrath'; show, Mt 14^2 'mighty works do show forth themselves in him' (αἱ δυνάμεις ἐνεργοῦσιν, RV 'these powers work'); and in like manner: set, Lk 1^1; stand, Jer 46^4, Mk 3^3; call, Is 31^4; bud, Ca 7^{12}; spring, Job 38^{27}; creep, Ps 104^{20}; reach, Pr 31^{20}; shed, Ac 2^{33}.

Sometimes the idea expressed is motion from a confined place to a more open, as 2 S 22^{20} = Ps 18^{19} 'He brought me forth also into a large place'; Nu 24^6 'As the valleys are they spread forth'; 2 S 11^1 'at the time when kings go forth to war.' This meaning is also expressed by 'abroad.' When 'forth' is used, it is always with a verb of motion; never as in Shaks. Comedy of Errors, II. ii. 212—

> 'Sirrah, if any ask for your master,
> Say, he dines forth, and let no creature enter.'

Then 'forth' expresses generally movement away from a place, as Gn 3^{23} 'God sent him forth from the garden'; and more particularly movement onwards from a given point, as Jos 18^{11} 'the coast of their lot came forth between the children of Judah and the children of Joseph' (RV 'the border of their lot went out'); Mt 9^9 'Jesus passed forth from thence' (RV 'by'); Ph 3^{13} 'forgetting those things which are behind, and reaching forth unto those things which are before' (RV 'stretching forward'). Cf. Ezk 6^{14} Cov. 'from the wildernesse off Deblat forth'; and Ps 72^8 (Stern. and Hopk.) 'His large and great dominion shall from sea to sea extend: it from the river shall reach forth unto earth's utmost end.'

It is in this last sense only—'forward from a given point'—that 'forth' is used with expressions of time. These are: (1) 'from this time forth' (כָּעֵת וְעַד Ps 113^2 115^{18} 121^8); (2) 'from that time forth' (מִן־הָעֵת הַהִוא Neh 4^{16}; כִּן־הָעֵת הַהִיא 13^{21}; ἀπὸ τότε, Mt 16^{21} [RV omits 'forth']); and (3) 'from that day forth' (ἀπ' ἐκείνης τῆς ἡμέρας, Mt 22^{46}, Jn 11^{53}).

In many of the foregoing expressions modern usage would prefer 'forward' or 'out.' In the following examples 'out' is distinctly the modern word: with put, Ac 9^{40} 'Peter put them all forth' (so Gn 8^9, Jg 6^{21}, Mt 9^{25}); with break, 2 S 5^{20} 'The LORD hath broken forth upon mine enemies'; with give, Ezk $18^{8.\ 13}$ 'He that hath not given forth upon usury';* with set, Ezk 27^{10} 'they set forth thy comeliness'; with spread, Ezk 47[10] 'a place to spread forth nets' (RV 'for the spreading of nets'); with cast, Jon 1[5. 12. 15]; let, Lk 20[9] 'A certain man planted a vineyard, and let it forth to husbandmen' (RV 'out'); look, Ca 2[9] 'he looketh forth at the windows' (RV 'in,' Heb. מִן); or omitted altogether, as in Jn 2[11] 'Jesus . . . manifested forth his glory.'

The phrase 'forth of,' which occurs in AV Gn 8[16] 9[18], Jg 11[31], 2 Ch 23[14], Job 5[6], Am 7[17], Jth 2[21], has sometimes been taken to be a prep., as by Abbott (Shaks. Grammar, § 156). It seems, however, to be a contracted form of 'forth out of,' which is found Gn 8[19] 'Every beast . . . went forth out of the ark.' Thus Gn 8[16] 'Go forth of the ark'; Jg 11[31] 'whatsoever cometh forth of the doors of my house to meet me'; Am 7[17] 'Israel shall surely go into captivity forth of his land' (RV 'out of'); and even 2 Ch 23[14] 'Have her forth of the ranges' (RV 'forth between the ranks'). In illustration of the phrase, cf. Knox, Hist. 365, 'Herewith was the Queen more offended; and commanded the said John to passe forth of the Cabinet, and to abide further of her pleasure in the Chamber'; and his tr[n] of Ps 18[16] (Works, iii. 320), 'he hath drawen me forth of many waters'; and so Bacon, Essays ('Of Prophecies,' Gold. Treas. ed. p. 150, l. 13), 'In Vespasians Time, there went a Prophecie in the East: That those that should come forth of Iudea, should reigne over the World.' A further ellipsis sometimes takes place, the 'of' being omitted (not in AV), as Shaks. Mids. Night's Dream, I. i. 164—

> 'If thou lov'st me then,
> Steal forth thy father's house to-morrow night.'

FORTIFICATION, FORTRESS.—See WAR.

FORTUNATUS (Φορτούνατος), a member of the Church at Corinth, is mentioned in the first Epistle to that Church (16[17]) as having visited St. Paul at Ephesus, along with Stephanas and Achaicus. They had gone as deputies to seek the apostle's help and advice regarding certain ethical questions, and especially regarding marriage, meats offered to idols, and spiritual gifts, and to strengthen the tie between him and the Corinthians. The state of affairs which their statements disclosed is dealt with at length in the Epistle in which they are mentioned, and which most likely they carried back with them, perhaps in company with Titus. Weiss suggests that the way in which the names are mentioned, seems to show that F. and Achaicus in some way belonged to the house of Stephanas. The name F., which is Roman, was a very common one, and hence it is precarious to identify St. Paul's visitor, as some have proposed to do, with the F. mentioned by Clement of Rome (Ep. 59). W. MUIR.

FORTY.—See NUMBER.

FORUM.—Only in Appii forum (so 1611, not Forum as in mod. ed.) Ac 28[15], one of the stages in St. Paul's journey to Rome. The Gr. Ἀππίου φόρον is a transliteration of the Lat., which has been taken directly into English. Wyclif translated the word: 'the cheping of Appius'; so did the Geneva translators, 'the Market of Appius,' whom RV follows. But the other versions present various forms of the Lat.: Tind. 'Apiphorum' (though he translates the other name 'the thre taverns'), so the Great Bible; Cov. 'Apiforum'; the Rhemish 'Apij-forum'; Matthew's Bible, the Bishops' Bible, and AV 'Appii forum.' See APPIUS (MARKET OF).

FORWARD, FORWARDNESS.—Forward is used both as adj. and as adv. in AV, but the adj., though independent in early Eng., seems to have been lost, and afterwards re-formed from the adverb. So the adv. properly comes first.

As an adv. 'forward' means 'towards the front,' as opposed to 'backward,' as Job 23[8] 'Behold I go forward, but he is not there; and backward, but I cannot perceive him,' and Nu 32[19] 'For we will not inherit with them on yonder side Jordan, or forward, because our inheritance has fallen to us on this side Jordan eastward' (הָלְאָה, 'further on,' as 1 S 20[22] 'the arrows are beyond thee,' מִמְּךָ וָהָלְאָה, lit. 'from thee and onwards'). So Berners, Froissart, I. xvii. 18, 'All his barones went out of the cite, and the first nyght they lodged vi. myle forwarde.' In the same sense it is applied to time, as Ezk 39[22] 'from that day and forward'; 43[27] 'upon the eighth day, and so forward.' Cf. Stubbes, Anat. Abus. ii. 34, 'If sixtie would serue, they must have an hundred, and so forward.' A bold expression is found in 2 Es 3[6] 'before ever the earth came forward,' that is, into existence (antequam terra adventaret), a tr[n] retained in RV, though it is perhaps unique in Eng. literature.

When used figuratively with certain verbs 'forward' has the meaning of 'advance the interests of, help the progress of an undertaking.' The verbs in AV are (1) set, 1 Ch 23[4] 'to set forward the work of the house of the LORD' (לְנַצֵּחַ), RV as AVm 'to oversee': so in Ezr 3[8. 9] RV changes AV 'set forward' into 'have the oversight,' though in 2 Ch 34[12] 'to set it forward' is accepted for the same* Heb. with RVm 'to preside over it'; and in 34[13] 'overseers' of AV is changed into 'set forward,' for Heb. מְנַצְּחִים). The phrase is applied to evil works as well as to good, Job 30[13] 'they set forward my calamity' (יְעִילוּ); Wis 14[18] 'the singular diligence of the artificer did help to set forward the ignorant to more superstition' (προετρέψατο, RV 'urged forward by the ambition of the artificer'). To those examples RV adds 1 Co 16[6] 'that ye may set me forward on my journey,' and 2 Co 1[16], 3 Jn [6] (all προπέμπω), where the meaning is somewhat different, to start one upon a journey. Shakespeare often uses the phrase intransitively (never trans. as here), as I Henry IV. II. iii. 38, 'We are prepared. I will set forward to-night.' The expression 'set forward' in this literal sense is also found in AV, but only in Nu, where it occurs 15 times of the marching of the Israelites in the Wilderness. (2) Help, only Zec 1[15] 'they helped forward the affliction' (עָזְרוּ לְרָעָה, RVm 'helped the evil'), that is, the heathen not only acted as God's instruments in chastising Israel, but went further. (3) Haste, only 1 Es 1[27] 'the Lord is with me hasting me forward' (ἐπισπεύδων). (4) Bring, only 3 Jn [6] 'whom if thou bring forward on their journey after a godly sort, thou shalt do well' (RV 'set forward,' as above). The same meaning is found intransitively with go in Gn 26[13] 'waxed great, and went forward' (וַיֵּלֶךְ הָלוֹךְ וְגָדֵל, lit. as AVm, 'went going'; RV 'grew more and more'); and Ad. Est 13[4]. The literal sense occurs in Nu 2[24] 10[5] and ('go on forward') 1 S 10[8]. Cf. Goldsmith, Vicar, xi. (Globe ed. p. 21[a] l. 3), 'Mr. Burchell, who was of the party, was always fond of seeing some innocent amusement going forward'; and Shaks. Mids. Night's Dream, IV. ii. 17, 'If our sport had gone forward, we had all been made men.'

In modern English 'forward' as an adj. means presumptuous, impertinent. This meaning is found as early as the beg. of the 17th cent.; thus, Warner, Alb. Eng. IX. xlvii. 221, 'They tould how forward Maidens weare, how proude if in request.' But it does not occur in AV. There the adj. means either ready, 2 Co 8^{10} 'to be forward a year ago' (τὸ θέλειν, RV 'to will'), or zealous, 2 Co 8^{17} 'being more forward, of his own accord he went unto you' (σπουδαιότερος, RV 'very earnest'); Gal 2^{10} 'which I also was forward to do' (ἐσπούδασα, RV 'was zealous'); and 1 Mac 1^{13}, where the zeal is in a bad cause (προεθυμήθησάν τινες). Cf. Hall, Contemplations (Works, ed. 1634, ii. 52), 'What marvell is it if God bee not forward to give, where we care not to aske, or aske as if we cared not to receive?' and (for the meaning 'ready') Livingstone (Select Biographies, Wod. i. 229), 'Mr. James went back with him, and finding him forward to go in with him . . . believed him.'

* The only remaining occurrence of the infin. is 1 Ch 15[21], where AV has 'to excel,' AVm 'to oversee,' and RV 'to lead.' The meaning is undoubtedly always 'to preside over,' whether workmen or more especially a choir of singers. The ptcp. seen in 2 Ch 34[13] is found in the title of many psalms and translated 'the chief (RV Chief) Musician.'

Forwardness occurs once in Shakespeare, and then in later writers frequently in the mod. sense of over-confidence, presumption. As You Like It, I. ii. 159—

> 'Since the youth will not be intreated,
> His own peril on his forwardness.'

But in AV the only meaning is readiness or zeal. Once it is in a bad cause, Wis 14^{17} (σπουδή; RV 'zeal'); elsewhere only 2 Co 8^{8} (σπουδή, RV 'earnestness'), and 9^{2} 'I know the forwardness of your mind' (τὴν προθυμίαν ὑμῶν, RV 'your readiness'). So Hall (Works, ii. 16), referring to the Wise Men from the East, says, 'God encourages their holy forwardnesse from heaven.'

J. HASTINGS.

FOUL (Old Eng. fúl) is of the same root (Sanskrit pū, to stink) as Gr. πύον and Lat. pūs, purulent matter, as from a sore, and its earliest meaning is loathsome, whether to sight or smell. It is applied, for example, to blood, Wis 11^{16} 'a perpetual running river troubled with foul blood,' in reference to the Egyptian plague (αἵματι λυθρώδει, the only occurrence of this adj. in bibl. Greek, lit. 'with blood like gore,' RV 'with clotted blood'). In this sense 'foul' is applied to disease, as Shaks. Hamlet, IV. i. 21—

> 'But, like the owner of a foul disease,
> To keep it from divulging, let it feed
> Even on the pith of life';

and Lear, I. i. 167—

> 'Kill thy physician, and the fee bestow
> Upon thy foul disease.'

2. From this to moral uncleanness the step was easily and early made. In AV it is so applied only to unclean spirits, and only twice, Mk 9^{25}, Rev 18^{2} (both ἀκάθαρτος).

The adj. ἀκάθαρτος is used 22 times in NT with πνεῦμα (Mt 2, Mk 11, Lk 5, Ac 2, Rev 2) and once with πνεῦμα δαιμονίου (Lk 4^{33}). Tindale translates by 'unclean spirit' generally, but he gives 'foul spirit' in Mk 1^{27} 5^{8} 7^{25}, Lk 4^{36} 6^{18} 8^{29}, and is always followed by Cov., Cran., Gen., and (except in Mk 7^{25}) Bish. Wyclif., and the Rhem. NT, after Vulg. spiritus immundus, have 'unclean spirit' everywhere. AV seems quite accidentally to retain 'foul' in Mk 9^{25}; but in Rev 18^{2} it is probably retained for variety, the same Gr. word as applied to birds being tr^{d} 'unclean' in the same verse. RV gives 'unclean' everywhere.

Since ἀκάθαρτος is properly ceremonially unclean, the moral element is less prominent than when πονηρός is applied to πνεῦμα (Mt 12^{45}, Lk 7^{21} 8^{2} 11^{26}, Ac $19^{12.\ 13.\ 15.\ 16}$, AV 'evil' or 'wicked,' RV always 'evil'), and consequently 'foul' with its suggestion of separation through loathsomeness is a very appropriate tr^{n}, and is frequently used of evil spirits, or their abode, in English literature. Thus Shaks. Tam. of Shrew, Induc. ii. 17—

> 'O, that a mighty man of such descent,
> Of such possessions and so high esteem,
> Should be infused with so foul a spirit.'

Cf. Watts, Ps cxxi. (L. M.) 25—

> 'On thee foul spirits have no power.'

Shaks. has 'foul devil' (Rich. III. I. ii. 50), and often 'foul fiend' (14 times, of which 11 are in K. Lear and always in the mouth of 'Edgar'), as Rich. III. I. iv. 58—

> 'With that, methoughts, a legion of foul fiends
> Environed me.'

3. 'Foul' is often set in opposition to fair, and that (1) in the sense of ugly. Thus Chaucer, Clerk-Merchant (E. 1209)—

> 'If thou be fair, ther folk ben in presence
> Shew thou thy visage and thyn apparaille;
> If thou be foul, be fre of thy dispence,
> To gete thee frendes ay do thy travaille.'

This is the meaning of Job 16^{16} 'My face is foul with weeping,' though RVm gives 'defiled,' as if a closer rendering of the Heb. (חָמְרָה); but the Heb. root is to be red, and the most probable tr^{n} 'my face is red with weeping.' So Livingstone, Select Biog. 306, 'When he came out all his face was foull with weeping.' (2) As applied to weather: 1 Es 9^{6} (χειμών), 9^{11} (ὥρα χειμερινή), and Mt 16^{3} (χειμών).

4. Foul is twice found in AV with the meaning of disgraceful: Sir 5^{14} 'a foul shame is upon the thief' (αἰσχύνη; RV 'upon the thief there is shame'); 20^{24} 'A lie is a foul blot in a man' (μῶμος πονηρός). Examples of both phrases are found in Shaks. Thus Rich. III. I. iii. 249—

> 'Hast. False-boding woman, end thy frantic curse, > Lest to thy harm thou move our patience.'
> Q. Marg. Foul shame upon you! you have all moved mine'; and Much Ado, III. i. 64—

> 'Nature, drawing an antick,
> Made a foul blot.'

5. The Amer. RV introduces 'foul' in the mod. sense of dirty: Is 19^{6} 'And the rivers shall become foul' (AV 'And they shall turn the rivers far away'; RV 'And the rivers shall stink'). So Job 30^{6} Cov. 'Their dwellinge was beside foule brokes.' This is the meaning of the verb 'to foul' in Ezk 32^{2} $34^{18.\ 19}$, its only occurrences, where it refers to the polluting of running water.

FOUNDATION.—In the OT the words 'found' and 'foundation' are for the most part tr^{n} of יָסַד and its derivatives, which are freely used in a metaphorical as well as a literal sense. The foundation stones of some of Solomon's buildings are described as huge and costly (1 K 7^{10}). In connexion with the laying of the foundation stone various superstitious rites were widely practised, the offering of a human victim being a not infrequent accompaniment of the ceremony (see Trumbull, Threshold Covenant, 22, 51, 55; Strack, Der Blutaberglaube, 68). It is possible that the record of such an incident was embodied in the original form of the tradition preserved about Hiel the Bethelite, 'He laid the foundation [of Jericho] on (? בְּ) Abiram his firstborn, and set up the gates thereof on his youngest son Segub' (1 K 16^{34}).

In NT 'foundation' is used in two distinct senses, an active and a passive. In the former sense it represents καταβολή (properly 'founding'), which (except in He 11^{11} καταβολὴ σπέρματος, used of Sarah) is confined to the collocation καταβολὴ κόσμου, 'the foundation of the world,' Mt 13^{35} 25^{34}, Lk 11^{50}, Jn 17^{24}, Eph 1^{4}, He 4^{3} 9^{26}, 1 P 1^{20}, Rev 13^{8} 17^{8}. In the passive sense 'the foundations of the earth' (מוֹסְדֵי אֶרֶץ, once Job 38^{6} אֲדָנִים 'pedestals,' once Ps 104^{5} מְכוֹנָה 'bases') frequently appears in OT, Mic 6^{2}, Is 24^{18} 40^{21}, Jer 31^{37}, Ps 82^{5}, Pr 8^{29}. The passive sense of the word is in NT represented by θεμέλιος (both literal and metaphorical). This word is used, e.g., in our Lord's simile of the two buildings (Lk $6^{48\text{f.}}$), as well as in St. Paul's simile of the building tested by fire (1 Co $3^{10\text{ff.}}$). In 1 Co 3^{11} the Church's foundation is Christ, in Eph 2^{20} she is built upon the foundation of (the gospel of) the apostles and (NT) prophets, Jesus Christ being the chief corner-stone.

In Jer 50^{15}, where AV has 'foundations,' the meaning of אֲשִׁיוֹת is prob. 'bulwarks' (RV) or 'buttresses' (see Oxf. Heb. Lex.). In Is 16^7 'raisin-cakes' seems to be the meaning, not 'foundations' (see FLAGON). The 'gate of the foundation' (שַׁעַר מוֹסָד) in 2 Ch 23^5 is obscure. Perhaps we should read שַׁ֫עַר סוּר 'the gate Sur,' as in 2 K 11^6, or שַׁ֫עַר הַסּוּסִים 'the horse gate' (see Oxf. Heb. Lex. s. יְסוֹד). In 2 Ch 3^3 for AV 'these are the things wherein Solomon was instructed,' RV substitutes 'these are the foundations which Sol. laid' (taking הוּסַד as Hoph. infin. of יָסַד). RV further gives 'foundations' for 'posts' in Is 6^4 as tr. of אַמּוֹת, a derivative from אֵם in metaph. sense. Finally, in two instances (Ps 89^{14} 97^2) where AV tr. מְכוֹן 'habitation,' RV gives the correct sense 'foundation.'

J. A. SELBIE.

FOUNTAIN.—1. A fountain is a natural outflow, or spring, of water, and is in this way distinguished from a well of artificial construction (see WELL). Palestine, owing to its physical structure, is especially rich in fine springs of water. Remarkably appropriate is the statement (Dt 8^7), 'For the Lord thy God bringeth thee into a good land, a land of brooks of water, of fountains (עֲיָנוֹת) and depths springing forth in valleys and hills.'

2. The Cretaceous limestone of which W. Palestine is mainly composed being open and porous, the rain (or snow) which falls during the winter months percolates downwards and forms underground reservoirs in the strata, which burst forth along the sides of the Jordan depression, as also on the western flanks of the central table-land.* Equally favourable is the geological structure of the eastern sides of the Jordanic depression for the production of springs; for the heavy falls of snow which cover the Lebanon and Hermon ranges in winter give rise to copious fountains which supply the head waters of the Litany, the Jordan, and the rivers of Damascus. Not less remarkable are some of the fountains of the region of Trachonitis and the Peræa, which have their sources in the volcanic mountains of the Hauran, and their outlets into the Jordan by the Hieromax and the Jabbok. Fine springs are also numerous along the western shore of the L. of Tiberias, scattering verdure and fertility along their course. Amongst the Edomite mountains and those of the Sinaitic peninsula the most important fountains are those of the Wady Musâ, which flows down through the city of Petra; the 'Ain Abu Werideh (or el-Weibeh), and 'Ain Ghurundel in the Arabah; the Wady el-'Ain at the entrance to the grand gorge of es-Sûḳ, between Jebel Musâ and 'Aḳabah;† and those which descend from the flanks of Jebel Mûsa (Mount Sinai) itself. The spring of 'Ain Ḳadis, which issues forth at the base of a limestone cliff in the Badiet et-Tîh (Wilderness of Paran), has been identified, with much probability, as the site of Kadesh-Barnea.‡

3. Thermal Springs.—Many of the springs which flow directly into the Dead Sea and the lower waters of the Jordan have a high temperature, due partly to the existence of volcanic rocks (basalt), still highly heated, with which the waters come in contact; and partly to the depth below the surface to which the underground waters descend before issuing forth into day.

The following are the most important thermal springs§:—

1. Ḥammam (or Ḥammath), situated on the W. side of the Sea of Tiberias, near to which Herod the tetrarch built the city of that name.* Temp. 143·3° Fahr., water sulphurous.† 2. Yarmuk, N. of Umm Ḳeis (Gadara). Temp. 109° Fahr., water sulphurous.‡ 3. Zerḳa Ma'in (Callirrhoë), ten principal warm and sulphurous springs, of which the lowest reaches a temperature of 143° Fahr.§ Here Herod the Great bathed during his last illness.‖ 4. 'Ain Zara enters the Dead Sea on the E. side. Temp. 109° Fahr.¶ 5. 'Ain es-Sulṭân, in the Plain of Jericho (el-Ghôr), W. of the Jordan. Temp. 71° Fahr. (See ARABAH, JERICHO.) 6. 'Ain el-Beida enters the Wady el-Jeib S. of Jebel Usdum. Temp 91° Fahr. 7. 'Ain el-Khubarah, W. of the Dead Sea, water sulphurous. Temp. 88–93° Fahr. 8. 'Ain Feshkhah, W. of the Dead Sea. Temp. 82° Fahr.†† 9. The springs of Ænon ('Ainun) near to Salim in Samaria, where John baptized (Jn 3^{23}). According to Conder the head springs issue from an open valley, surrounded by desolate hills; but the water gushes forth over a stony bed and rapidly produces a fine perennial stream surrounded by oleanders.‡‡ 10. Kishon. The springs forming the head waters of the Kishon are remarkable for their copiousness. Stanley describes them as 'full-grown from their birth.' They rise at the foot of Mt. Tabor and form a chain of pools and springs, together with quagmires and swamps, which were fatal to many of Sisera's army§§ (Jg 5^{21}). The river enters the Mediterranean at the northern base of Mt. Carmel. 11. Baniâs. The springs at the head of the Jordan at Baniâs (Cæsarea Philippi) issue from a cavern above the town, constituting the 'upper sources,' and are augmented by a still larger fountain below, which is known as 'the lower springs'; so that the Jordan is full-grown from its birth.‖‖ 12. The Jerusalem fountains. Jerus. in former times was supplied from several sources; but we are here concerned only with the natural fountains. Of these the most remarkable are the Upper Springs of Gihon,¶¶ which are intermittent, and break out underground in the Kidron Valley (Wady en-Nar), forming the chief source of this stream, from whence the water is carried by an underground conduit to a pool, now known as the 'Fountain of the Virgin' ('Ain Umm ed-Deraj), to the west side of the City of David. This conduit, 1760 feet (or 1200 cubits) in length, was constructed by Hezekiah on the approach of the Assyrian army (2 K 20^{20}, 2 Ch 32^{30}). In 1880 a pupil of Schick observed an inscription which was afterwards deciphered by Sayce and Guthe. It contains in old Heb. characters a record of the construction. This fount is the only natural spring of water at Jerusalem, and is the chief source of supply of pure water at the present day. The pools of Solomon, near Bethlehem, were formerly the chief sources of supply for Jerus., and were conducted into the city by an upper and lower conduit hewn in stone, now fallen into disuse. The pools are supplied by a fine spring which issues

FOUNTAIN GATE.—See GATE and JERUSALEM.

FOUR.—See NUMBER.

FOURSQUARE.—Now that 'square' is confined to that which has four equal sides, 'foursquare' is looked upon as redundant, though writers like Ruskin, steeped in biblical phraseology, use it still. Formerly 'square' meant simply equal-sided, and the number of sides had to be expressed. Thus 'fivesquare,' 1 K 6^{31m}, taken from the text of the Geneva Bible, 'the upper poste and side postes were fiue square.' 'Foursquare' is used of the altar of burnt-offering (Ex 27^{1} 38^{1}), of the incense-altar (Ex 30^{2} 37^{25}), and of the high priest's breastplate (28^{16} 39^{9}), the meaning being clearly expressed in 30^{2} 'A cubit shall be the length thereof, and a cubit the breadth thereof; foursquare shall it be' (רָבוּעַ). It is also used of the borders of the brazen bases in Solomon's temple (1 K 7^{31} מְרֻבָּע); of the inner court of Ezekiel's temple (Ezk 40^{47}) and of the 'holy oblation' (48^{20}); and, finally, of the holy city, new Jerusalem (Rev 21^{16}, τετράγωνος).

FOWL.—The word 'fowl,' now restricted to the domestic cock and hen, 'the barn-door fowl,' was formerly applied to all feathered animals, and occasionally even to all winged creatures. Thus Sir 11^{3} in Wyclif's tr^{n} of 1382 is 'Short in foules (Vulg. in volatilibus) is a bee,' though Purvey's Revision of 1388 gives, 'A bee is litil among briddis.' Indeed, when Wyclif has to make a distinction between feathered and unfeathered creatures that fly, he uses 'fowl' of the latter: Ezk 39^{17} 'Saye thou to eche bryd, and to alle foulis' (אֱמֹר לְצִפּוֹר כָּל־כָּנָף, Vulg. dic omni volucri et universis avibus), though Rogers and Coverdale reverse the order, 'Speake unto alle the foules and euery byrde.'* And AV uses 'fowls' of unfeathered winged creatures in Lv 11^{20} 'All fowls that creep, going upon all four, shall be an abomination unto you' (כֹּל שֶׁרֶץ הָעוֹף). This is Wyclif's tr^{n} 'Alle of foules (1388, 'Al thing of foulis') that goth on foure feete'; after Vulg. Omne de volucribus quod graditur super quatuor pedes; and Tindale's, 'all foules that crepe and goo upon all iiii. shalbe an abhominacion unto you.' The LXX has πάντα τὰ ἑρπετὰ τῶν πετεινῶν; RV 'All winged creeping things' (see art. CREEPING THINGS).† T. Adams (Works, i. 13) distinguishes 'fowls' from 'flies': 'the eagles hunt no flies so long as there be fowls in the air.' He thus uses 'fowls' exactly as we now use 'birds,' and that was its commonest use by far. Thus Bacon, Essays (Gold. Treas. ed. p. 181, l. 22), 'Why, doe you not think me as wise, as some Fowle are, that ever change their Aboad towards the Winter?'

RV accepts the AV rendering 'fowl' or 'fowls' throughout OT, except Lv 11^{20}, Ezk 39^{17}, already noted, and in the three passages in which the Heb. is עַיִט 'ayit, a bird of prey: Gn 15^{11} (RV 'birds of prey'), Job 28^{7} (RV 'bird of prey'), Is 18^{6} (RV 'ravenous birds'). Cf. Bacon, Essays (p. 240, l. 2), 'But now, if a Man can tame this Monster, and bring her to feed at the hand, and govern her, and with her fly other ravening Fowle, and kill them, it is somewhat worth'; and Milton, PL x. 274—

'A flock of ravenous fowl.'

In Wis 19^{11} 'a new generation of fowls' (νέαν γένεσιν ὀρνέων) is changed into 'a new race of birds.' In NT the Gr. (always plu.) is either ὄρνεον (Rev $19^{17.\ 21}$) or πετεινόν (Mt 6^{26} 13^{4}, Mk $4^{4.\ 32}$, Lk 8^{5} 12^{24} 13^{19}, Ac 10^{12} 11^{6}), and, except in the two places in Ac, RV changes into 'birds.'

J. HASTINGS.

FOWL.—Neither in AV nor in RV has any system been followed in the rendering of the various words for birds in the Heb. original. These words are—1. עוֹף 'ôph. This word signifies collectively birds or winged creatures. It is often in the construct state with חַשְׁמַיִם the skies. It corresponds with the Arab. ṭair, the root of which seems to signify to fly. It ought to be tr^{d} everywhere birds. It is, however, more generally tr^{d} fowl, but also often birds (Jer 4^{25}). It is usually collective (Ezk $31^{6.\ 13}$), but sometimes singular (?) (Gn $1^{21.\ 30}$, Lv 17^{13}). It is sometimes used for carrion birds (2 S 21^{10}).

2. עַיִט 'ayit, usually collective (in Is 46^{11} singular, applied to Cyrus) for birds of prey, is, however, tr^{d} in AV fowls (Gn 15^{11}), RV birds of prey; also AV fowls (Job 28^{7}, Is 18^{6}), RV birds of prey and ravenous birds, AV and RV עַיִט צָפוֹר ravenous birds (Ezk 39^{4}).

3. צִפּוֹר ṣippôr is in many places a collective term for birds, from the root צָפַר ṣâphar, to 'twitter,' or 'chirp,' or 'whistle' (cf. Arab. ṣafar, to 'whistle'). It is used collectively, Gn 15^{11}, Lv 14^{4-53}, Dt 14^{11}, etc., where it is tr^{d} AV and RV 'birds'; Dt 4^{17}, Neh 5^{18}, Ps 8^{8}, where it is tr^{d} EV 'fowl.' It is sometimes in construct state with כָּל־כָּנָף (Ezk 17^{23} etc.), at others with כָּנָף (Ps 148^{10}). Ṣippôr, like its Arab. equivalent 'uṣfûr, is also used for the smaller twittering birds, particularly the sparrow (Ps 84^{3} etc.).

The ṣippor is said to nest in the cedar (Ps 104^{17}), to flee to the mountains (Ps 11^{1}), to be taken in nets and snares (Ps 124^{7}, Pr 6^{5}, Am 3^{5}). Four different ways of taking animals and birds are alluded to in a single passage (Job 18^{8-10}). In all there are seven different Heb. words for the various sorts of traps. The 'cage full of birds' (Jer 5^{27}) may refer to the custom of hanging cages of birds on the trees, on which birdlime or snares are placed, or near which the sportsman lies concealed, to entice the birds by the singing of the captives (but see CAGE). The voice of the ṣippôr (Ec 12^{4}) is the morning song, announcing the dawn.

4. בַּעַל כָּנָף ba'al-kânâph (Pr 1^{17}), the 'possessor of a wing,' is a figurative expression for a bird.

5. In NT (and Sir 43^{14}) πετεινά (or τὰ π.) is general for birds, by which it is tr^{d} in RV, while AV gives fowls (Mt 13^{4}, Lk 13^{19}). When birds of prey are intended ὄρνεα is used (Rev 19^{17}).

Birds are divided into clean and unclean (Dt 14^{11-20}). Lv gives the list only of the unclean birds (11^{13-20}). The 'fowls that creep' or 'creeping thing that flieth,' RV 'winged creeping things' (Lv $11^{20.\ 23}$, Dt 14^{19}), may refer to such as the bats, and the insects that do not leap as well as fly (see full discussion in art. CREEPING THINGS). The birds allowed in sacrifice were turtle-doves and pigeons (Lv 1^{14-17}), and ṣippôrîm (Lv 14^{4-53}). The last were prob. any twitterers or clean birds except the two above mentioned. Among the birds mentioned as having been used as food are quails, partridges, fatted fowls (barburîm, 1 K 4^{23}, see COCK), and fowl (ṣippôr, Neh 5^{18}). The last may refer to small birds. It is prob. that the sparrows, sold two for a farthing and five for two farthings (Mt 10^{29}, Lk 12^{6}), were for food. They and other small birds are caught and sold in immense numbers

* The Geneva Bible of 1560 translated more accurately (as LXX Ε:πὸν παντὶ ὀρνέῳ πετεινῷ), 'Speake unto euerie feathered foule.' This was accepted by AV, with marg. 'to the fowl of every wing.' RV has 'Speak unto the birds of every sort'; Siegfried, Sprich zu den mannigfach beschwingten Vögeln.

† This use was either unknown to or ignored by Shakespeare when he wrote, Comedy of Errors, III. i. 79—

'I pray thee, let me in.
Ay, when fowls have no feathers, and fish have no fin.'

at this day, and at prices similar to those of our Saviour's day. Cocks and hens are mentioned in NT, and were doubtless used for food.

The migrations of birds are especially noteworthy in the Holy Land, as a country midway between the tropics and cooler regions of the north. They are noted in Scripture (Ca $2^{11.12}$, Jer 8^{7}).

Their singing is also alluded to (Ec 12^{4}, Ps 104^{12}), and their flight (Ex 19^{4}, Dt $32^{11.12}$).

Eggs were eaten (Lk 11^{12}). The eggs of wild birds, on which the hen was sitting, could be taken, but not the hen at the same time (Dt 22^{6}). Ostrich eggs are mentioned (Job 39^{14}, see OSTRICH). 'Eggs that are left' (Is 10^{14}) may refer to the supplementary eggs of the ostrich or to the nests that have been deserted owing to fright of the parent birds. Eggs of serpents are alluded to (Is 59^{5}). For the expression 'sitteth on eggs' (Jer 17^{11} RV, AVm 'gathereth young'), see PARTRIDGE. Birds' nests are often found in places of worship (Ps 84^{3}). For general subject of birds, their habits, etc., see NATURAL HISTORY.

G. E. POST.

FOWLER is marked by the Oxf. Eng. Dict. as 'now rare,' the more commonplace 'bird-catcher' being its substitute. It is found in AV, Ps 124^{7} (יוֹקֵשׁ, ptcp. of [יָקַשׁ] to lay snares); Hos 9^{8} (יָקוּשׁ [all]); Ps 91^{3}, Pr 6^{5} (יָקוּשׁ, found also in Jer 5^{26}, AV 'he that setteth snares'; RV 'fowlers,' which is Wyclif's word). Shaks. has the word but once—Mids. Night's Dream, III. ii. 20—

> 'As wild geese that the creeping fowler eye.'

For Fowling see under HUNTING.

FOX (שׁוּעָל shû'âl, ἀλώπηξ, vulpes).—There can be no doubt that shû'âl meant both jackal and fox. It is used in the sing. only once in OT (Neh 4^{3}), where the intention is doubtless to refer to a small animal, and fox is more likely to be meant than jackal. The plural shû'âlîm is used in a number of places in OT. AV has tr^{d} it in all of them foxes. In two of these (Jg 15^{4}, Ps 63^{10}) the context makes it pretty certain that the jackal is intended. In the first passage Samson is said to have caught 300 shû'âlîm. This would be well-nigh impossible in the case of foxes, which are shy, solitary animals, but not difficult in that of jackals, which are gregarious. In the second the expression 'they shall be a portion for foxes' implies a carrion-eater. Foxes may sometimes join other animals in feasting on the slain, but it is jackals that share with vultures the carrion of a battlefield. In the other passages of OT shû'âlîm may mean either animal, though the context points rather to the habits of the fox than to those of the jackal. Thus La 5^{18} represents shû'âlîm as walking on the ruins of Zion, and Ezk 13^{4} 'shû'âlîm in the deserts' (RV 'waste places'), and Ca 2^{15} speaks of 'the foxes, the little foxes that spoil the vines' (RV 'vineyards'). A special word for jackals occurs in OT אִיִּים (see DRAGON under תַּנִּים, and JACKAL).

The Gr. ἀλώπηξ means the fox only. In NT the sing. occurs once (Lk 13^{32}), where Herod is spoken of as a fox. Here the reference is to the well-known cunning of this animal. It occurs twice in the plu. (Mt 8^{20}, Lk 9^{58}) 'foxes have holes.'

The fox of Syria does not differ essentially from the common fox of Europe, Vulpes vulgaris, L. Its body is about 14 in. long, and its bushy tail almost as long. It is of a grey colour, has a long pointed snout, and small cunning eyes. It is a nocturnal animal, prowling about houses and encampments. It captures poultry, and small birds and animals. It is also very fond of grapes, and both it and the jackal do much mischief in vineyards.

G. E. POST.

FRAGMENT.—The word κλάσμα (from κλάειν, to break) is used in the plu. (κλάσματα) of the remains of the loaves and fishes in the account of the Feeding of the Five Thousand (Mt 14^{20}, Mk 6^{43}, Lk 9^{17}, Jn $6^{12.13}$), the Four Thousand (Mt 15^{37}, Mk 8^{8}), and in the reference to these miracles (Mk $8^{19.20}$), and it is used nowhere else in NT.*

The Versions have offered a great variety of tr^{n}. Wyclif varies between 'broken gobbets' (Mt 14^{20}), 'relefis' (Mt 15^{37}, Mk 8^{8}, Jn $6^{12.13}$), and 'broken meat' or 'metis.' Tind. has 'gobbets' in Mt 14^{20} and Mk 6^{43}, elsewhere 'broken meate' (1526 ed. in Mk 8^{20} 'levinges'). Rogers (Matthew's Bible) introduces 'scrappes' (Mt 14^{20}), has 'gobbettes' in Mk 6^{43}, and 'broken meate' in the rest. Coverdale gives 'broken meate' everywhere except Mk 6^{43} 'broken peces.' The Great Bible offers 'fragments' as a new tr^{n} (Mt 14^{20}), and 'leauinges' (Mk 8^{20}), says simply 'baskettes full ther of' in Mk 6^{43}, and for the rest has 'broken méate.' The Geneva and Bishops' Bibles follow the Great Bible in all places except Mk 6^{43} 'fragments,' and (Gen. 1560 only) Mt 15^{37} 'fragments' again. The Rhemish NT prefers 'fragments' everywhere except Mt 14^{20} 'leauings.' AV accepts 'fragments' in all but the two passages which refer to the miracle of the Four Thousand, where it falls back on the rendering 'broken meat.' RV chooses 'broken pieces' (which has appeared only once before, Mk 6^{43} Cov.), and uses it consistently throughout.

Why were the Revisers not content with AV 'fragments'? 'For some mysterious reason,' says Sir Edmund Beckett (Should the Revised New Test. be Authorised? 1882, p. 91), 'they prefer "broken pieces" to "fragments that remained over" of the two sets of loaves and fishes. We have all heard of "broken victuals"; but the victuals were once whole, and had been broken. Each piece of bread or fish is a piece, and not broken, though broken off, if they will be so precise. But a fragment is a piece broken off. So here is another miserable bit of pedantry of some kind, and for some unknown reason, which only turns right into wrong for nothing; for the AV is certainly quite as accurate a translation: indeed the Durham Greek professor said more so.'

But there are two good reasons. In the first place the word 'fragment' carries, and has always carried, a sense of contempt. Shaks. uses the word seven times, and this is always present, mostly prominent. The aptest instance is perhaps Troil. and Cress. v. ii. 159—

> 'The fragments, scraps, the bits, and greasy reliques
> Of her o'er-eaten faith, are bound to Diomed.'

Cf. T. Fuller, Holy Warre, iv. 16 (p. 195), 'Yea, now full willingly would the Christians have accepted the terms formerly offered them; and now their hungrie stomachs would make dainties of those conditions which before, when full of pride, they threw away as fragments.' In the second place the 'broken pieces' were not fragments of larger pieces; all that the disciples gave to the multitude were 'broken pieces,' and these which were gathered up were the broken pieces that were in excess of the requirements.

J. HASTINGS.

FRAME.—To 'frame' (from Old Eng. framian, to profit, succeed) is primarily to make good progress, to prosper, as Melville, Diary, p. 272, 'The Bischope haid lurked a yeir or twa lyk a tod in his holl, as his custom was when things framed nocht with him.' Then it is used in a neutral sense, to get on well or ill as the case may be, as Rutherford, Letters, No. xxxii., 'But let us, however matters frame, cast over the affairs of the bride upon the Bridegroom.' And then come the various transitive meanings of preparing, fitting for use. In AV the verb is used with a direct object, except once with a foll. infinitive.

1. To contrive, to manage, Jg 12^{6} 'he could not frame to pronounce it right' (יָכִין לְדַבֵּר כֵּן, lit. 'fix to speak so,' perhaps 'fix the mind,' i.e. catch the slight difference in the pronunciation).

* Its occurrences in LXX are Lv 2^{6} 6^{21}, Jg 9^{53} 19^{5}, 1 S 30^{12}, 2 S $11^{21.22}$, Ezk 13^{19}; where EV give 'piece,' except Jg 19^{5} 'morsel' (of bread), and Ezk 13^{19} 'handful' (of barley).

Cf. Return from Parnass. IV. v. 62 (2nd pt.), 'Schollers must frame to liue at a low sayle.'

2. To direct, Hos 5[4] 'They will not frame their doings to turn unto their God' (לֹא יִתְּנוּ, lit. as AVm 'they will not give'; RV as AVm. 'Their doings will not suffer them to turn unto their God,' with AV text in marg.). Cf. Rutherford, Letters, No. clxxxvii., 'Frame yourself for Christ, and gloom not upon his Cross': Ps 145[21] (L. M.), Stern. and Hopk.—

'Therefore my mouth and lips I'll frame
To speak the praises of the Lord.'

3. To form, Is 29[16] 'Shall the thing framed say of him that framed it, He had no understanding?' (יֹצֵר אָבֶר לְיֹצְרוֹ; Amer. RV 'formed'); and in RV, Job 10[8] 'Thine hands have framed me and fashioned me' (עִצְּבוּנִי; AV 'made me'). So Ps 106[19], Stern. and Hopk.—

'Upon the hill of Horeb they an idol-calf did frame'; and Shaks. Merch. of Venice, I. i. 51—

'Nature hath framed strange fellows in her time.'

4. To fit together, make, Eph 2[21] 'all the building fitly framed together' (συναρμολογουμένη); He 11[3] 'the worlds were framed by the word of God' (κατηρτίσθαι); and in RV, Eph 4[16] 'all the body fitly framed and knit together' (συναρμολογούμενον). Cf. Spenser, FQ II. ii. 30—

'And, thinking of those branches green to frame
A girlond for her dainty forehead fit,
He pluckt a bough; out of whose rift there came Smal drops of gory bloud, that trickled down the same.'

5. To devise, Ps 50[19] 'thy tongue frameth deceit' (תִּצְמִיד); 94[20] 'which frameth mischief' (יֹצֵר); Jer 18[11] 'Behold, I frame evil against you' (יוֹצֵר); and in Amer. RV, Dt 31[21] 'I know their imagination which they frame' (עֹשֶׂה, lit. 'do,' EV 'go about'). So Barclay (1514), Cyt. (Percy Soc.) 23—

'Than frame they fraudes men slyly to begyle'; and Ps 10[2], Stern. and Hopk.—

'In these devices they have framed
Let them be taken sure.'

6. To express, embody, 2 Mac 15[39] 'speech finely framed delighteth the ears of them that read the story' (τὸ τῆς κατασκευῆς τοῦ λόγου; RV 'the fashioning of the language'). AV is a modification of the Geneva tr[n], 'the setting out of the matter,' and may be illustrated from Milton, PL v. 460—

'His wary speech
Thus to th' empyreal minister he framed.'

As a subst. 'frame' occurs twice in AV, and means something constructed. 1. The structure of the body, Ps 103[14] 'he knoweth our frame; he remembereth that we are dust' (יִצְרֵנוּ). To this RV adds Ps 139[15] 'My frame was not hidden from thee, when I was made in secret' (עֶצְמִי, AV 'my substance,' AVm 'or, strength; or, body'); and Amer. RV, Job 41[12] 'his [leviathan's] goodly frame' (חֵין עֶרְכּוֹ, EV 'his comely proportion'). So frequently in Paraphrases in Verse (1775), as 57[4]—

'With sympathetic feelings touch'd
He knows our feeble frame'; and 51[4]—

'We know, that when the soul uncloath'd
Shall from this body flie,
'Twill animate a purer frame
With life that cannot die.'

2. The structure of a city, Ezk 40[2] 'a very high mountain, by which was as the frame of a city' (כְּמִבְנֵה־עִיר, Davidson, 'a building of a city, that is, a city-like or citadel-like building').

3. RV adds Nu 4[10. 12], a frame fitted together for carrying things upon (מוֹט, AV 'bar').

J. HASTINGS.

FRANKINCENSE (לְבֹנָה lĕbhônâh, λίβανος, λιβανωτός).—Lebhônâh is erroneously tr[d] in some places in AV 'incense' (Is 43[23] 60[6], Jer 6[20] etc. In RV it is correctly rendered frankincense). Incense, however, is the proper rendering of another word קְטוֹרָה qĕṭôrâh. This substance was compounded of f. and other aromatic gums, and seasoned with salt (Ex 30[34. 35]), or sweet, i.e. not so seasoned (Ex 25[6], Lv 16[12]). All incense not so made was a strange incense, and could not be offered (Ex 30[9], cf. 'strange fire' Lv 10[1]).

F. is the fragrant resin of an Indian tree, Boswellia serrata, Stackh., procured by slitting the bark. It is imported through Arabia (Is 60[6], Jer 6[20]). It is known in Arabia by a name kindred to the Heb., i.e. lubân. It was one of the gifts offered by the Magi (Mt 2[11]). The 'incense' of both AV and RV (Rev 8[3]) should be 'frankincense.'

G. E. POST.

FRANKISH VERSION.—See VERSIONS.

FRANKLY.—In Lk 7[42] the verb ἐχαρίσατο is tr[d] 'he frankly forgave.' The older VSS have simply 'he forgave' (except Wyclif, 1380, 'he gaf frely'), and RV returns to that. The purpose of the AV translators was, no doubt, to bring out on a special occasion the special force of this word, which, as Bruce says (Expos. Gr. Test. ad loc.), is a warmer word than ἀφιέναι, and was welcome to St. Luke as containing the idea of grace (χάρις). It occurs only in the writings of St. Luke (Lk 7[21. 42. 43], Ac 3[14] 25[11. 16] 27[24]) and St. Paul (Ro 8[32], 1 Co 2[12], 2 Co 2[7. 10] 12[13], Gal 3[18], Eph 4[32], Ph 1[29] 2[9], Col 2[13] 3[13 bis], Philem 22).

The Eng. word 'frankly' is used, not in the mod. sense of candidly, openly, but in the old and literal sense of freely, unrestrainedly, as in Elyot, The Governour, ii. 234, 'puttynge out of their citie their women and all that were of yeres unhabill for the warres, that they mought more frankely sustayne famyne'; and in Shaks. Meas. for Meas. III. i. 106—

'O, were it but my life,
I'ld throw it down for your deliverance
As frankly as a pin.'

J. HASTINGS.

FRANTICK.—Sir 4[30] 'Be not as a lion in thy house, nor frantick among thy servants' (φαντασιοκοπῶν, lit. 'conceiving fancies,' RV 'fanciful': Fritzsche understands 'suspicious,' 'mistrustful,' argwöhnisch, and is followed by Ball [QPB]; but Bissell thinks the AV tr. suits the context best, and translates 'as a crazy man'). Tindale has 'frantick' for AV 'lunatick' in Mt 17[15] 'Master have mercy on my soune for he is franticke'; and Sir T. More (Workes, p. 270) uses the word in nearly the same sense of Luther, 'And therfore among many folishe wordes of Luther, as foolishe as euer hereticke spake, he neuer spake a more frantike, than in that he saith that God hath nede of our faith.'

FRAY occurs in Zec 1[21] of the terrifying of the 'horns' of the Gentiles, and 'fray away' in Dt 28[26], Jer 7[33] of the driving away of wild beasts from a dead body (all as tr[n] of חָחֵרִיד). Amer. RV prefers 'frighten.' 'Fray' is also found in 1 Mac 14[12] 'every man sat under his vine and his fig tree, and there was none to fray them' (οὐκ ἦν ὁ ἐκφοβῶν αὐτούς, RV 'to make them afraid'); and 'fray away' in Sir 22[20] 'whoso casteth a stone at the birds frayeth them away' (ἀποσοβεῖ αὐτά).

Fray is what philologists call an aphetic form of 'affray.' That is to say, the old vb. 'affray' lost its unaccented initial vowel by aphesis [ἀφιέναι], as 'esquire' became 'squire,' and the like; and this happened to 'affray' while still spelt 'afray,' a spelling preserved in its past ptcp. 'afraid' (='afrayed'). To 'fray' is therefore originally to 'disturb' (Anglo-Fr. afrayer, late Lat. ex-fridare, from ex and fridus [Old High Ger. fridu] 'peace'), a meaning well illustrated by the examples in AV

In Hos 10^{11} Cov. uses both forms, 'Yee as a lyon roareth he, that they maye be afrayed, like the children of the see: that they may be scarred awaye from Egipte, as men scarre byrdes: and frayed awaye (as doues use to be) from the Assirians londe.' The only occurrence of the vb. in Shaks. is Troil. and Cress. III. ii. 24: 'She does so blush, and fetches her wind so short, as if she were frayed with a sprite.' J. HASTINGS.

FRECKLE.—In Lv 13^{39} Tindale uses this word as tr^{n} of Heb. bóhaḳ, which occurs only in this place: 'Yf there appeare in their flesh a glisterynge white somewhat blackesh, then it is but frekels growen upp in the skynne: and he is cleane.' Wyclif's tr^{n} (1382) was 'a wemme of whijt colour,' (1388) 'a spotte of whijt colour' (after Vulg. macula coloris candidi, whence also Douay, 'a spotte of white colour'). Cov. preferred 'a whyte scabbe,' Gen. 'a white spot.' But the Bishops' restored 'freckle' (in sing. 'a freckle'), and that was accepted by AV, 'a freckled spot.' RV prefers 'a tetter,' for the Heb. means more than we now understand by 'freckle,' though that word formerly described an eruption on the skin, as in Whitehead, Goat's Beard—

> 'The freckles, blotches, and parch'd skins,
> The worms, which, like black-headed pins,
> Peep through the damask cheek, or rise
> On noses bloated out of size,
> Are things which females ought to dread.'

The word occurs also in Preface to AV 1611, 'A man may be counted a vertuous man, though hee haue made many slips in his life (els, there were none vertuous, for in many things we offend all), also a comely man and louely, though hee haue some warts vpon his hand, yea, not onely freakles vpon his face, but also skarres'—where also the word probably means more than it does now. See TETTER. J. HASTINGS.

FREE, FREEDOM, FREELY.—The adj. free 'has been a chief heirloom from Saxon times, and has made a figure in all stages of the national story. Perhaps no other Saxon adj. is comparable for length and variety of career. Originally meaning lordly, noble, gentle, it has with each change of the national aim so changed its usage as still to take a prominent place. In the growth of the municipal bodies the privileged members were designated free-men; in the constitutional struggles it managed to represent the idea of liberty; and in these latter days, when social equality is the universal pretension, it signifies the manners thereon attendant in the modern coupling free and easy.'—Earle, Philology of the Eng. Tongue[5], 413.

The most modern meaning to be found in AV is also the most common, and it may be best to begin with that and work backwards.

1. At liberty, not fettered, whether physically, as Milton, Samson Agonistes, 1235—

> 'My heels are fetter'd, but my fist is free'; or morally, as Locke, Human Underst. II. xxi. 8, 'So far as a man has a power to think or not to think, to move or not to move, according to the preference or direction of his own mind, so far is a man free.' So Job 3^{19} 'The small and great are there; and the servant is free from his master' (חָפְשִׁי, the common Heb. word), and 1 P 2^{16} 'As free, and not using your liberty for a cloke of maliciousness, but as the servants of God' (ἐλεύθερος, the common Gr. word).

Passages deserving attention are: (1) Ps 88^{5} 'Free among the dead' (בַּמֵּתִים חָפְשִׁי, RV 'cast off among the dead,' RVm 'cast away'). Hitzig, Ewald, and others tr. 'among the dead is my couch' (taking חָפְשִׁי from חָפַשׁ, something spread, a couch, after the doubtful occurrence in Ezk 27^{20}); but most edd. now, as AV or RV (taking the word as the adj. usually tr^{d} 'free'). Cheyne in 'Parchment' Psalms (1884) gives, 'I am one turned adrift among the dead'; but in Book of Psalms (1888), 'I am a freedman among the dead,' remarking there, 'The psalmist alludes to the grim eulogy of death in his favourite poem Job 3^{19} [see above]. But he gives a new turn to the phrase. Unlike Job, he regards such freedom as the reverse of a benefit'—which Kirkpatrick describes as 'a far-fetched interpretation.' There is no question, however; that the phrase recalls Job 3^{19} to our minds, and yet that the word is used here, and here only, in a bad sense. It means either separated from human friendship, or more probably from divine protection. Delitzsch's interpretation, set free, discharged, from the responsibilities of life, like Lat. defunctus, is less appropriate to the context. The cognate subst. חָפְשִׁית [חפשות] is used in 2 K 15^{5}=2 Ch 26^{21} of the separate house or lazaretto to which Uzziah was confined. (2) Ac 22^{28} 'And Paul said, But I was free born.' The Gr. is simply Ἐγὼ δὲ καὶ γεγέννημαι, 'But I was even born'; the word to be supplied is, however, Ῥωμαῖος, 'Roman,' from the previous verse: so RV 'But I am a Roman born.'

RV adds Is 45^{13} 'he shall let my exiles go free' for AV 'let go my captives' (יְשַׁלַּח).

2. Unhindered, unimpeded, as Shaks. Love's Labour's Lost, v. ii. 732, 'For mine own part, I breathe free breath.' So 1 Es 4^{53} 'And that all they that went from Babylon to build the city should have free liberty' (ὑπάρχειν τὴν ἐλευθερίαν, RV 'should have their freedom'); 2 Th 3^{1} 'Pray for us, that the word of the Lord may have free course' (τρέχῃ, lit. 'may run,' as AVm and RV). The AV tr^{n} is a combination of Tind. 'maye have fre passage' and Rhem. 'may have course'; RV is a return to Wyclif's 'that the word of God renne.' RV adds with this sense 1 Co 7^{39} 'If the husband be dead, she is free to be married to whom she will' (ἐλευθέρα, AV 'at liberty').

3. Exempt, Dt 24^{5} 'When a man hath taken a new wife he shall not go out to war, neither shall he be charged with any business; but he shall be free at home one year' (נָקִי), i.e. exempt from public duties. 1 Ch 9^{33} 'the Levites, who remaining in the chambers were free' (פָּטְרִים, RV 'free from service'); 1 Mac 15^{7} 'And as concerning Jerusalem and the sanctuary, let them be free' (ἐλεύθερα, sc. from tribute); Mt 15^{6}=Mk 7^{11} 'he shall be free'—words added in italics to complete the sense without equivalent in Greek; they are omitted by RV; Mt 17^{26} 'Then are the children free.' RV adds He 13^{5} 'Be ye free from the love of money' (ἀφιλάργυρος ὁ τρόπος, AV 'Let your conversation be without covetousness'; RVm 'Let your turn of mind be free': Vaughan is more modern and literal, 'Let your disposition be unavaricious').

4. Acquitted after trial, often equivalent to innocent, as Shaks. Hamlet, II. ii. 590—

> 'He would drown the stage with tears,
> And cleave the general ear with horrid speech;
> Make mad the guilty, and appal the free,
> Confound the ignorant; and amaze, indeed,
> The very faculty of eyes and ears.'

In AV, Nu $5^{19.\ 28.\ 31\ RV}$; and the verb Ro 6^{7} 'For he that is dead is freed from sin' (δεδικαίωται, RV 'is justified'), i.e. is acquitted from the guilt of sin.

5. Voluntary, gratuitous, Ex 21^{11} 'then shall she go out free without money' (חִנָּם, RV 'for nothing'). So the phrase 'free gift,' 1 Es 2^{9} (εὐχαῖς, i.e. votive offerings, RV 'gifts that were vowed'); Jth 4^{14} (ἐκούσια δόματα), 1 Mac 10^{39} (δόμα, RV 'a gift'); Ro $5^{15.\ 16.\ 18}$ (χάρισμα [not in v.^{18}, but understood there also], a word which is almost peculiar to St. Paul, occurring elsewhere only in 1 P 4^{10}, and 'is used of those special endowments which come to every Christian as the result of God's free favour (χάρις) to men, and of the consequent gift of faith'—Sanday-Headlam, Romans, p. 358 ff. It is tr^{d} 'free gift' only in Ro $5^{15.\ 16}$, to which RV adds 6^{23}; elsewhere simply 'gift'). So again we find 'free offering' for the usual 'freewill offering' in Ex 36^{3}, Am 4^{5}, Jth 16^{18}.

6. Generous or even noble, the earliest meaning of the word according to Earle (as above), who quotes Shaks. Troil. and Cress. IV. v. 139—

> 'I thank thee, Hector:
> Thou art too gentle and too free a man.'

This is Chaucer's meaning also in Nonne Preestes Tale, 94—

'For certes, what so any womman seith,
We alle desyren, if it mighte be,
To han housbondes hardy, wyse, and free.'

This sense occurs twice in AV, 2 Ch 29[31] 'And the congregation brought in sacrifices and thank offerings; and as many as were of a free heart burnt offerings' (RV 'willing'), and Ps 51[12] 'uphold me with thy free spirit' (RV 'with a free spirit,' Amer. RV and RVm 'willing'; both נָדִיב, which as a subst. means 'prince,' 'noble,' in Pr 25[7] and elsewhere).

On Ps 51[12] Earle (The Psalter of 1539, p. 290) says, 'So 1535 [Coverdale's Bible] after the Vulg. et spiritu principali confirma me'—which, again, is after Sept. πνεύματι ἡγεμονικῷ στήρισόν με. Here there can be no doubt that 'free' was used, not in any of its lower senses, as when it is the equivalent of liber as opposed to servus; or even in the sense of liberal, bounteous in gifts; but (inclusive perhaps of this latter) with special eye to that higher sense of lordly, noble, generous, princely, royal; which is conspicuous in the best mediæval usage of the word, and which qualified it to represent principalis and ἡγεμονικόν. Keble brought this out well—

'With that free Spirit blest,
Who to the contrite can dispense
The princely heart of innocence.'

Keble, it should be added, has also suggested the correct translation. What the psalmist prays for is not, as AV, that he may be upheld by God's free Spirit, but, as RV, that under the influence of the Spirit of God his own spirit may become willing or spontaneous in the right.

Freedom in Ac 22[28] 'With a great sum obtained I this freedom,' is Roman citizenship (πολιτεία, RV 'citizenship'). See CITIZENSHIP. RV has changed 'liberty' of AV into 'freedom' for Gr. ἐλευθερία in Gal 5[1. 13 bis], 1 P 2[16], though retaining 'liberty' for the same Gr. word in Ro 8[21], 1 Co 10[29], 2 Co 3[17], Gal 2[4], Ja 1[25] 2[12], 2 P 2[19]. In every case but the last it is the freedom of those who are not under law but under grace; 'freedom' is therefore the best word, and might have been used throughout. See LIBERTY.

Freely is found in the sense of (1) unrestrainedly, as in Lv 14[53] Wyc. 'And whanne he had left the sparewe to fle in to the feeld frely'; and in AV Gn 2[16] 'Of every tree of the garden thou mayest freely eat' (אָכֹל תֹּאכֵל, lit. 'eating thou shalt eat,' as AVm; so 1 S 14[30]); Ad. Est 16[19] 'that the Jews may freely live after their own laws' (χρῆσθαι, RV 'live'); Ac 2[29] 'let me freely speak unto you' (ἐξὸν εἰπεῖν μετὰ παρρησίας, RV 'I may say unto you freely'); 26[26] 'I speak freely' (παρρησιαζόμενος λαλῶ); to which RV adds Jn 2[10] 'when men have drunk freely' (ὅταν μεθυσθῶσιν), lit. 'when they are drunken,' as Lk 12[45], and as Vulg. here 'cum inebriati fuerint.' Wyclif has 'whanne men ben fulfillid' (1382 'filled'); Tind. 'when men be dronke,' so Matthew's and the Great Bibles; Cov. 'whan they are dronken'; but the Geneva preferred 'when men have wel droncke,' and it was followed by Bish., Rhem., and AV. RV is a compromise between the two older translations.

(2) For nothing, gratuitously: the most common meaning. It occurs in Nu 11[5] 'We remember the fish, which we did eat in Egypt freely' (חִנָּם 'gratis,' or as RV 'for nought'). 'Freely' was Wyclif's tr[n] [1388, but 1382 'gladly'], and he no doubt used the word in the sense of 'for nothing' after LXX δωρεάν and especially Vulg. gratis, which gave the Douay 'gratis'; 'freely' is the Bishops' word also; but all others 'for nought' (Tind., Rog.), or 'for naught' (Cov., Gen.). Also in 1 Mac 10[33] 'I freely set at liberty every one of the Jews' (ἀφίημι ἐλευθέραν δωρεάν, RV 'I set at liberty without price'); cf. Lk 4[18] Tind. 'frely to set at liberty them that are bruised' (an attempt to express the pregnant phrase ἀποστεῖλαι τεθραυσμένους ἐν ἀφέσει, lit. 'to send away the shattered [so as to be] in release'). And in NT δωρεάν 'as a gift,' from δωρεά, a gift, is so rendered in Mt 10[8 bis], Ro 3[24], 2 Co 11[7], Rev 21[6] 22[17], where the prominent thought is the grace (gratis) of the giver, as Mt 10[8] 'freely ye received, freely give.' And this is no doubt the meaning in Ro 8[32] and 1 Co 2[12] where χαρίζομαι is tr[d] 'freely give.' Illustrations are Ex 21[11] Wyc. 'sche schal go out freli without money' (AV 'free,' RV 'for nothing'); Is 52[5] Cov. 'my people is frely caried awaye' (EV 'for nought'); and Shaks. Winter's Tale, I. i. 19, 'You pay a great deal too dear for what's given freely.'

(3) Voluntarily, spontaneously, approaching the meaning of 'generous,' 'noble' given last for 'free': Ps 54[6] 'I will freely sacrifice unto thee' (בִּנְדָבָה, RV 'with a freewill offering,' after most commentators, but Cheyne prefers 'with a free will' both here and at Nu 15[3]); Hos 14[4] 'I will heal their backsliding, I will love them freely' (נְדָבָה, LXX ὁμολόγως, Vulg. spontanee, Wyc. [1382] 'of my free will,' [1388] 'wilfuli'; Rog. 'wyth al my heart,' Gen. 'frely,' Dou. 'voluntarily,' Cheyne 'spontaneously'). And this is the meaning of 'freely' in Ezr 2[68] (RV 'willingly') 7[15], where it is used to bring out the force of the Heb. verb. This is Milton's meaning (PL viii. 443) where God addresses Adam—

'My image, not imparted to the brute;
Whose fellowship therefore, unmeet for thee,
Good reason was thou freely shouldst dislike.'

Freeman: 1 Es 3[19] (ἐλεύθερος); 1 Co 7[22] 'the Lord's freeman' (ἀπελεύθερος, RV 'freedman'), so as to bring out the spiritual emancipation and to distinguish from the natural 'freeman' (ἐλεύθερος) following. RV adds Col 3[11] (ἐλεύθερος, AV 'free').

Freewoman: 1 Mac 2[11], Gal 4[22. 23. 30], all ἐλευθέρα, of the natural condition, and directly opposed to 'bond-slave' (1 Mac) or 'bondmaid' (Gal). RV adds Gal 4[31]. J. HASTINGS.

FREEWILL OFFERING.—See SACRIFICE.

FREQUENT.—In the sense of crowded, well-attended, 'frequent' is common in writers of the 17th cent. and earlier, as a 'frequent assembly'—Sanderson, Works, ii. 242, 258, a 'frequent college'; 'the College was sa frequent as the roumes war nocht able to receaue them'—Melvill, Diary, 50. The sense in which the word occurs in AV is akin to this, but more exactly well-acquainted, conversant: 2 Co 11[23] 'in prisons more frequent,' exactly as Knox, Works, iv. 139, 'Be frequent in the prophetis and in the epistillis of St. Paul.' The Gr. is περισσοτέρως, and RV follows Bish. and Rhem. 'more abundantly,' the other VSS having 'more plenteously.' Amer. RV and RVm give 'frequent' in 1 S 3[1] for 'open' of AV, 'the word of the Lord was precious in those days; there was no open vision' (אֵין חָזוֹן נִפְרָץ).

FRET.—To 'fret' is primarily to eat up, consume (for, intensive prefix, and etan to eat, like Ger. ver-essen), as in Alisaunder of Macedoine (E.E.T.S.) i. 1159—

'Fayre handes and feete freaten too the bonne.'

But a very early meaning and very common is to eat into, gnaw, corrode, as of a disease, and the word being used in this sense by Tind. in Lv 13[51. 52. 55] 14[44], it was retained in AV. The uses in AV, then, are—

1. Transitively: 1. Literally to eat away, corrode, Lv 13[51. 52] 14[44] 'a fretting leprosy' (צָרַעַת מַמְאֶרֶת), and 13[55] 'it is fret* inward' (פְּחָתָה). So

* It will be observed that in Lv 13[55] 'it is fret inward,' fret is the past ptcp. Cf. More, Utopia, i. (Lumby, p. 46, l. 14), 'For he (and that no marveile) beynge so touched on the quicke, and hit on the gaule, so fret, so fumed, and chafed at it, and was in such a rage that he could not refraine himselfe from chidinge, skolding, railing, and reviling.' Similar forms are 'lift' Gn 7[17] Lk 16[23]; 'whet' Ps 64[3] Pr. Bk.

Fuller says of the death of Godfrey (Holy Warre, Bk ii. ch. 6, p. 51), 'It may be the plague took him out of the hands of that lingring disease, and quickly cut off what that had been long in fretting'; and Shaks. makes Lear in the bitterness of his soul say of his daughter Goneril (Lear, I. iv. 276)—

'If she must teem,
Create her child of spleen; that it may live
And be a thwart disnatured torment to her!
Let it stamp wrinkles in her brow of youth;
With cadent tears fret channels in her cheeks.'

The tr^{n} of Ps 39^{12} in the Great Bible of 1539 was 'When thou with rebukes dost chasten man for sinne, thou makest his bewtye to consume awaye, like as it were a mothe.' In 1540 the explanatory phrase 'fretting a garment' was added, which being thereafter adopted into the text appears in the Pr. Bk. version. Cf. Bacon, Advancement of Learning, II. ii. 5, 'As for the corruptions and moths of history, which are epitomes, the use of them deserveth to be banished, as all men of sound judgment have confessed, as those that have fretted and corroded the sound bodies of many excellent histories, and wrought them into base and unprofitable dregs.'

2. Figuratively, in two senses. (1) To vex. Tindale says (Expos., Parker Soc. p. 31), 'And the nature of salt is to bite, fret, and make smart'; whence Adams passes to the fig. sense (II Peter, p. 47 on 1^{4}) 'Do we cut, and fret, and trouble you: remember we are salt, the sharper the better.' So in AV, Ezk 16^{43} 'Because thou hast not remembered the days of thy youth, but hast fretted me in all these things' (וַתִּרְגְּזִי־לִי; Amer. RV 'raged against'). (2) To disquiet oneself, Ps 37^{1} 'Fret not thyself because of evildoers' (אַל־תִּתְחַר, so 37$^{7.8}$, Pr 24^{19}); Is 8^{21} 'when they shall be hungry they shall fret themselves' (וְהִתְקַצַּף, Del. 'it is roused to anger'; Cheyne, 'he shall be deeply angered'; Skinner, 'he shall break out in anger').

The AV tr^{n} is partly from the Gen. 'he shal euen freat him self,' and partly from the Bish. 'they will bee out of patience.' 'He is out of pacience' is Coverdale's; Wyc. [1382] 'it shal wrathen,' [1388] 'it schal be wrooth,' and the Douay 'he will be angrie,' are both nearer the meaning of the verb, being both after the Vulg. 'irascetur'; but both miss the force of the special form [Hithpael], which is found only here. The LXX gives λυπηθήσεσθε; Luther, 'werden sie zürnen.' A very close parallel occurs in Sir Thomas Wiat (Skeat's Specimens, p. 225)—

'And whilst they claspe their lustes in armes a-crosse, Graunt them, good Lord, as thou maist of thy might,
To freate inward, for losyng such a losse.'

2. Intransitively, be irritable, chafe, grieve, the modern meaning: 1 S 1^{6} 'And her adversary also provoked her sore, for to make her fret' (בַּעֲבוּר הַרְּעִמָהּ), and Pr 19^{3} 'his heart fretteth against the LORD' (יִזְעָף). So Shaks. Jul. Cæs. IV. iii. 42—

'Fret till your proud heart break.'

J. HASTINGS.

FRIEND.—Heb. history has supplied the world with an example of true friendship, as romantic and beautiful as any in Grecian story; and Heb. literature, though it contains no treatise de Amicitiâ, abounds in proverbs, setting forth, as eloquently as Laelius himself, the nature of this fine human relation, the claims which it makes, and the blessings which it brings. If Jonathan and David are the Pylades and Orestes of the Bible, the pithy sayings of the Ḥokhma Lit. contain the philosophy of friendship. A genuine attachment is possible only between the virtuous—this is implied in all the directions given in the Book of Pr to the young man for his guidance in life, and expressly indicated in the warnings of 13^{20} 28^{7}, where the word (רֵעֶה) rendered companion is that elsewhere often translated friend. That even natural ties cannot compare with the bond of friendship for strength and endurance, is said, not without a touch of satire, in 18^{24} 'He that maketh many friends doeth it to his own destruction; but there is a friend that sticketh closer than a brother.' David, in his lament, describes the affection of Jonathan for him as 'passing the love of women.' That, as Lord Bacon puts it in his Essay, the principal fruits of friendship are healthful and sovereign, both for the affections and the understanding, comes out in the striking proverb (27^{17}), 'Iron sharpeneth iron; so a man sharpeneth the countenance of his friend'; while the anguish inflicted on a true heart when one trusted and loved proves false or unkind, is exhibited in a concrete form in the behaviour of Job's three friends, and in many a passionate cry wrung from that patriarch (Job 6$^{14.27}$ 19^{21}), or from a psalmist under similar provocation (Ps 41^{9}).

Among the duties of friendship Cicero places high that of frankness in reproof and counsel; and this could not fail of characteristic recognition in the proverbs of Israel, 'Faithful are the wounds of a friend; but the kisses of an enemy are deceitful' (Pr 27^{6}), while in 17^{9} are indicated the tact and delicacy necessary in the discharge of this duty.

Pr 27^{10} is the Heb. equivalent for the saying that 'old friends are best'; and that poverty and trouble are, like length of time, tests of the genuineness of friendly profession, in contrast with the pretended attachment of flatterers and parasites, is the theme of proverbs like 14^{20} 19$^{4.7}$. True friends are rare with the great and powerful, yet, as Bacon says, they set a higher rate than others on the rare possession, and the Bible gives many instances of the confidence of intimacy between kings and subjects, e.g. David and Hushai; prophets and apostles and their disciples, e.g. Elijah and Elisha, Paul and Timothy.

But, while the Bible presents an ideal of friendship equal to that demanded by other literature, it does not leave it there. It elevates it in a manner all its own to a transcendent height. It presents it, not only as a human relationship, but one possible between God and man. Abraham was the friend of God (2 Ch 20^{7}, Is 41^{8}, Ja 2^{23}). With Moses, too, J$^{\prime\prime}$ spake 'face to face as a man speaketh unto his friend' (Ex 33^{11}), and the Son of God used the name friend in preference to servant, not only of the apostles, but also of all for whom He laid down His life (Jn 15$^{13.14.15}$).

There are nine Heb. words or phrases rendered friend in the AV. Those of most frequent occurrence are connected with the roots אָהַב, expressing affection, and רָעָה sociability, the most common being רֵעַ, rendered 41 times friend, 104 times neighbour, and sometimes companion and fellow. The most usual equivalents in LXX and Vulg. are φίλος and amicus. As a term of salutation the vocative ἑταῖρε is three times in NT rendered friend (Mt 20^{13} 22^{12} 26^{50}).

Of course the term friends sometimes implies no more than political associates or allies, e.g. 1 S 30^{26}, Jer 20$^{4.6}$.

A. S. AGLEN.

FRINGES (Heb. צִיצִת ẓiẓîth).—In the time of our Lord, the Jews, especially those of the Pharisaic party (cf. esp. Mt 23^{5}), attached the greatest importance to three material reminders or 'sensible signs' of their obligations under the Law. These were the ẓiẓîth (EV 'fringes'), the tĕphillîn or phylacteries (wh. see), and the mĕzûzah (Dt 6^{9} 11^{20}) on the doorpost. Of these the first-named was the sign to which the greatest virtue was ascribed. Its observance is first required by the law of Dt (22^{12}), where we read 'Twisted cords (גְּדִלִים, LXX στρεπτά: AV, RV incorrectly 'fringes,' but RVm 'twisted threads') shalt thou make thee upon the four corners ('arbaʿ kanphôth, AV 'four quarters,' RV 'four borders') of thy mantle (lit. 'covering' as Ex 22^{27} [Heb. ^{26}], see below) wherewith thou coverest thyself.' The object here termed gĕdîlîm acquired later the special designation ẓiẓîth צִיצִת,—it is so rendered by the Targum Jerus. i. (pseudo-Jonathan) in Dt 22[12],—for there can be no doubt that we meet the same enactment in an expanded form in the priestly legislation: 'And the LORD spake unto Moses saying, Speak unto the children of Israel, and bid them that they make them fringes * in the borders (so AV, RV; more correctly 'tassels upon the corners'; cf. RVm) of their garments throughout their generations, and that they put upon the fringe of each border (i.e. the tassel of each corner) a cord of blue' (Nu 15[37. 38]). There can be no question that the interpretation suggested by the EV, that a fringe attached to the hem of the garment is intended, is quite erroneous. We have only to turn to Hag 2[12], where a still common Eastern practice is referred to, to see that kānāph applied to an article of dress can only mean 'corner' or loose flowing end of a garment.† Now, the Hebrews seem to have worn as an outer garment a large piece of cloth of the shape of a Scotch plaid (generally called simlah, see DRESS), which also served as a covering (שְׂמֹלָה) by night (Ex 22[26]).‡ To the four corners of this garment, then, the 'twisted cords' of Dt were clearly intended to be fastened. The more extended enactment of the Priestly Code, however, evidently contemplates a more elaborate arrangement of a tassel attached to each corner by a cord of blue. To these tassels the Greek translators give the name κράσπεδα, the term exclusively used by the NT writers. It has even found its way into Targ. Onk. (כרוכפרין) (cf. Dalm. Gram. Aram. 149) in both passages from the Pentateuch. The simlah was worn like the Greek himation, which is its NT equivalent, the loose end being thrown over the left shoulder. It was the ẓiẓîth attached to this corner (τ. κράσπέδου τ. ἱματίου) that was reached with comparative ease by the woman with the issue of blood approaching our Lord in the crowd from behind (Mt 9[20], Lk 8[44]).

When we attempt to go behind the prescription of the Torah, there is reason to believe that we have here an ancient custom,§ perhaps with originally magical or superstitious associations (see W. R. Smith, RS 416, note; Nowack, Heb. Arch. ii. 123) taken up and impressed with a new significance by the Hebrew legislation. Even so late as NT times a special virtue was supposed to be attached to the 'tassels on the four corners' (Mt 14[36], Mk 6[56]; cf. the special sanctity of the four horns of the altar, Lv 4[7ff.], 1 K 1[50f.]). To the more spiritually minded, however, they were, as they were intended to be, continual reminders of the obligation resting on J"s people to walk in His Law, and to keep all His commandments (see esp. Nu 15[39. 40]).

With the change in the fashion of the outer garments of the Jews, and with the increasing frequency and cruelty of heathen and Christian persecution, the Jews gradually ceased to wear the tassels in the way prescribed by the original legislation. A special article of clothing was devised of the shape of a modern chest-protector—one part covering the breast, the other the back—with the necessary aperture in the centre for the head to pass through. This garment, to which the names of ṭallith (טַלִּית) and 'arba' kanphôth (Dt 22[12]) were given, had the tassels attached to its four corners, and was worn as an undergarment, a practice still observed by all orthodox Jews. The more zealous, however, wear it so that one or more of the tassels may be visible. The ṭallith now described came, later, to be known as ṭallith ḳaṭôn or 'small ṭallith,' to distinguish it from the ṭallith gadôl, 'large ṭallith' or prayer-shawl. The latter more nearly corresponds in shape to the ancient simlah, being a quadrangular piece of white woollen (or silken) cloth to which the tassels are attached in the manner about to be described. It is worn universally by the Jews during the daily service in the synagogue, either thrown over the head or round the shoulders, but always so that the tassels shall be visible in front. Special prayers are said before and during the act of adjusting the ṭallith.

The rabbinical prescriptions with regard to the ציצית or tassels have been elaborated with characteristic detail, and fill many pages of the Jewish codes (see literature at end of art.). Only a very few of these need be cited here. From a reference in the Mishna (Menakh. iv. 1) it would appear that the former practice of making the ẓiẓîth by twisting three white threads with one of blue (or blue-purple) was falling into desuetude, perhaps owing to the increasing difficulty of procuring the expensive dye required; and that it was henceforth permissible to use white threads alone so long as the numbers were complete (see Levy, Wörterb. s. voc. עבב). Somewhat later we learn from the curious, and in part obscure, paraphrase of Nu 15[38] in the Targum Jerus. i. (pseudo-Jonathan) apparently based on Talmudic decision, that the threads must be spun expressly for the purpose, not made of the refuse of the loom, and that they must be tied with five knots (קימרין). According to the prescription still in force, it is required that four (white) threads (חוטין) shall be taken, of which one —technically called the shammesh or 'servant'—shall be considerably longer than the rest. A small hole or eyelet (נקב) is made in each corner of the ṭallith three thumb-breadths (גודלים) from each margin; through this the four threads are drawn and the ends brought together. A double knot is tied close to the margin of the ṭallith, the shammesh is then twisted tightly 9 times round the remaining 7 threads and another double knot is tied; then round 9 times and a knot; then round 11 times and a knot; and finally round 13 times and a knot, and the ẓiẓîth is complete. Various mystic significations are attached to the number of knots and twistings. The most interesting, perhaps, is that which deduces from the whole a symbol of the complete Torah: thus the numerical value of the letters of the word ציצית is 90+10+90+10+400= 600, which with the 8 threads and the 5 knots makes a total of 613, the exact number, according to rabbinic calculation, of the positive (248) and negative (365) precepts of the Torah. This has led to the exaggerated statement that the wearing of the ẓiẓîth is of equal merit with the observance of the whole Law.

Males only are to wear the ṭallith (so already Targum pseudo-Jonathan on Dt 22[5]). This is compulsory after the 13th year, when the Jewish boy becomes a bar-miẓvah, but the small ṭallith may be worn earlier. The size of the latter is said by Maimonides to be such that a boy, just able to walk alone, shall be completely covered by it. It is not necessary to wear the ṭallith at night; this is inferred from the words of the Law, 'that ye may look upon it and remember' (Nu 15[39]), an injunction impossible of fulfilment in the darkness of the night.* As an illustration of the importance attached to the wearing of the ẓiẓîth, the following anecdote is frequently quoted. The son of a famous Rabbi was asked which of the commandments above all others his father had especially

* The MT has here ציצת in the singular, but probably we ought to read with the Samaritan ציציות; cf. LXX κράσπεδα.

† Cf. 1 S 15[27] 24[4. 5. 11] where the LXX renders כָּנָף by the exact terms τὸ πτερύγιον τῆς διπλοΐδος, for which see Jevons and Gardner, Manual of Gr. Antiq. 52.

‡ That one and the same garment is intended in Dt and Nu is confirmed by the Targum of Onkelos, which in both passages has שְׂמֹלָה.

§ The practice of wearing tassels was known to the ancient Persians, as appears from the monuments of Persepolis.

* This question was one of the differences between the schools of Hillel and Shammai (Ediyyoth, iv. 10).

charged him to keep. His reply was: 'The law concerning the ẓiẓîth. On descending a ladder my father stepped on one of the threads and tore it off. He refused to move from the spot till it was replaced' (Shabb. 118*b*). See also DRESS.

LITERATURE.—The rabbinical prescriptions are found in the authoritative codes of Maimonides (Yad Ha-ḥazakah, Hilkoth Ẓiẓîth) and Joseph Caro (Shulḥan 'Aruk Yoré Dé'a, ch. viii.–xxiv.). A convenient compendium of the latter work is the ספר חיי אדם על־שלחן ערוך אורח חיים, Wilna, 1888 (rules concerning the ẓiẓîth, pp. 33–38). Also in the tractate Ẓiẓîth in Raph. Kircheim, Septem libri Talmudici parvi Hierosolymitani, Frankfort, 1851; Hiller, De vestibus fimbriatis Hebræorum, in Ugolini Thesaurus, vol. xxi. More easily accessible is Bodenschatz, Kirchliche Verfassung d. heutigen Juden, 1748, pt. iv. pp. 9–15; Buxtorf, Synagoga Judaica, pp. 160–170. Art. 'Fringes' in Kitto's Biblical Cyclopædia[3]. See also Driver on Dt 22[12].

FROCK.—'A linen frock' is named in Sir 40[4] as the dress of the poor in contrast to the 'purple' of the rich (ὠμόλινον, lit. 'raw linen'; RV 'a hempen frock'; the word occurs only here in bibl. Greek). The 'frock' was once the cover-all of the English labourer, and still remains as 'smock-frock.' See DRESS.

FROG (צְפַרְדֵּעַ ṣĕphardēa', βάτραχος, rana).—An amphibious animal, noted in two connexions in the Bible. 1. As one of the plagues of Egypt (Ex 8[2-14], Ps 78[45] etc.). 2. As a form assumed by unclean spirits (Rev 16[13. 14]). It is also mentioned in Wis 19[10]. The frog referred to in the story of the plagues is the Ranula esculenta, L., the edible frog. It is found in all stagnant waters in the Holy Land. The Arab. name for the frog, dufda', bears a strong resemblance to the Hebrew.

G. E. POST.

FROM.—Following the Gen. Bible, 'from' is used in 1 Es 3[23] as equivalent to 'away from': 'But when they are from the wine, they remember not what they have done.' This is the only occurrence of a meaning that is common in Shaks. Thus Macbeth, III. i. 132—

> 'For 't must be done to-night,
> And something from the palace';

and Jul. Cæs. I. iii. 35—

> 'But men may construe things after their fashion,
> Clean from the purpose of the things themselves.'

FRONTLETS.—See PHYLACTERIES.

FROWARD.—Froward is the Northern form of 'fromward,' as we have 'to and fro' for 'to and from.' Cf. Sidney, Arcadia, ii., 'As cheerfully going towards, as Pyrocles went frowardly fromward his death.' Froward is thus the opposite of 'toward,' and is used by Spenser (FQ VI. x. 24) in the literal sense of turned from—

> 'And eeke them selves so in their daunce they bore,
> That two of them still froward seem'd to bee,
> But one still towards shew'd her selfe afore.'

In AV 'froward' is always figurative, turned from in sympathy, opposed, hostile, as in Ps 18[26] 'with the froward thou wilt show thyself froward' (עִם־עִקֵּשׁ תִּתְפַּתָּל, RV 'with the perverse thou wilt show thyself froward'). Then, by an easy transition, that which goes the wrong way to accomplish its ends, twisted, tortuous, not straightforward. Thus Dt 32[5] Tind., 'The frowarde and overthwarte generation hath marred them selues to himward' (עִקֵּשׁ), EV 'perverse,' which does not adequately express the sense, says Driver. Tindale's 'froward' is better than 'perverse,' for its meaning is just what Driver gives as the meaning of the Heb. here, 'the opposite of what is sincere, straightforward, and frank,' denoting 'a character which pursues devious and questionable courses for the purpose of compassing its ends.' Thus Latimer (Sermons before Edw. VI., Arber's ed. p. 115), 'The herte of man is naughti, a croked, and a froward pece of worke.' Still, 'froward' was frequently used in the sense of obstinate, as T. Lever, Sermons (1550, Arber's ed. p. 103), 'The father draweth not by force violentlye them that be stubborne and frowarde, but by loue them that be gentyll, and come wyllyngly.' And the union of the crooked with the obstinate gives perversity. RV prefers 'perverse' in 2 S 22[27] = Ps 18[26] (as above), Pr 2[15] (not Amer. RV) 3[32] 11[20]; and Amer. RV further in Dt 32[20], Pr 2[12] 6[12] 8[13] 10[31] 16[28. 30] 22[5]. RV gives 'crooked' in Pr 8[8] 21[8], and Amer. RV 'wayward' in Pr 2[15] 4[24] 17[20], and 'cunning' in Job 5[13]. But 'froward' is introduced into 2 S 22[27] (AV 'unsavoury'), Pr 23[33] (AV 'perverse'). It will be observed that the ideas represented by this word refer to conduct, especially in public life; it is therefore of most frequent occurrence in Pr, where 'froward' is found 14 times, elsewhere only 7 times.

Wyclif rarely uses the word; not in any of the places where it occurs in AV, his words being 'shrewd,' 'perverted,' or 'wayward.' But it is found in Dt 21[18] (1382), 'If a man gete a rebel sone, and a fraward (1388 'overthewert'), that herith not the fadres and modres heest'; and as a various reading in 2 Ti 3[4]. The introduction of the word so freely into Pr was made by Rogers and Coverdale. Its single occurrence in NT is from Tindale, 1 P 2[18] 'Servauntes obey youre masters with all feare, not only yf they be good and courteous; but also though they be frowarde' (1526 and 1534). The Gr. is σκολιός, which means tortuous as of a river, and then ethically not straightforward. Here, says Salmond, it means not exactly 'capricious' (as Luther), or 'wayward' (as Rhem.), or even 'froward' (as Tind. Cov. Rog. Cran. Gen. Bish. AV, RV), but 'harsh' or 'perverse,' the disposition that lacks the reasonable and considerate, and makes a tortuous use of the lawful.

The adv. frowardly occurs only Is 57[17] 'and he went on frowardly in the way of his heart' (וַיֵּלֶךְ שׁוֹבֵב, lit. 'he walked turning away,' as AVm and RVm; Amer. RV 'backsliding'). For the Eng. word cf. Knox, Hist. 137, 'Then began she to frowne, and to look frowardly to all such as she knew did favour the Gospel of Jesus Christ.'

Frowardness is used only in Pr 2[14] 6[14] 10[32], תַּהְפֻּכוֹת, a word which is found only in the plu. and means lit. 'turnings about,' i.e. 'lines of action, or modes of speech, adopted for the sake of escaping unpleasant realities, or evading the truth, perversions of truth or right'—Driver on Dt 32[20]; see his note. The word is tr[d] by the adj. 'froward' in Pr 8[13] ('the froward mouth,' lit. 'the mouth of evasions') 10[31] 16[28]; by 'very froward' in Dt 32[20]; and by 'froward things' in Pr 2[12] 16[30]. Cf. Barlowe, Dialoge (Lunn's ed. p. 106), 'And no meruell, thoughe Saull fared the worse for hys people, wher as Moyses the most faythfull seruaunte of god was partely by their frowardnes debarred fro the pleasaunt lande of behest.'

J. HASTINGS.

FRUIT.—Palestine is always described as a fruitful land (Ps 107[34], Is 5[1]). The number of 'kindly fruits of the earth' produced here is very large. The great diversity of climate makes possible the cultivation of plants from almost every quarter of the globe. The following list of the products of the soil may be taken as an index, not exhaustive but illustrative of the capabilities of this 'land of promise':—Fitches (Is 28[25. 27]), opium poppy, mustard, cabbage, cauliflower, turnip, cress, radish, flax, sorrel, rue, vine, Indian fig, jujube, lemon, orange, citron, lupine, beans, horsebeans, peas, lentils, chick peas, mâsh (Vigna Nilotica, L.), carob, strawberry, blackberry, peach, plum, almond, apricot, nectarine, apple, quince, medlar, Photinia Japonica, hawthorn, pomegranate, myrtle, watermelon, cantelope, squash, pumpkin, cucumber, coriander, dill, fennel, caraway, anise, celery, parsley, parsnip, carrot, carthamus (bastard saffron), chicory, lettuce, artichokes, potato, tobacco, tomato, eggplant, henbane, nightshade, castor oil, sesame, olive, fig, sycomore, mulberry, hemp, walnut, edible pine, saffron, banana, date, colocasia, maize, wheat, barley, sorghum, sugar cane. G. E. Post.

FRUIT.—The figurative, and indeed all the literal uses of the word 'fruit,' except the primary one of the fruit of fruit-bearing trees, are suggested by the Hebrew idioms, and belong to what may be called biblical English. Thus it is used of the general products of the earth, Ex 23^{10} 'And six years thou shalt sow thy land, and shalt gather in the fruits thereof' (תְּבוּאָה, RV 'increase'). It is also used of the offspring of animals, including man, as Ps 127^{3} 'Lo, children are an heritage of the Lord: and the fruit of the womb is his reward' (פְּרִי, the common word for 'fruit'). In this sense notice La 2^{20} 'Shall the women eat their fruit, and children of a span long?' (פְּרִי).

It has been maintained (Psalms Chron. Arranged, pp. 150, 446) that 'fruit' in Ps 72^{16} has this meaning in AV, 'There shall be an handful of corn in the earth upon the top of the mountains; the fruit thereof shall shake like Lebanon' (פְּרִי). This might be true of Wyclif's tr^{n} (1388), 'Stidefastnesse schal be in the erthe, in the higheste places of mounteyns; the fruyt therof schal be enhaunsid aboue the Liban'; and more confidently of Coverdale's, 'There shalbe an heape of corne in the earth hye vpon the hilles, his frute shal shake like Libanus,' though the 'his' probably refers to 'corn.' But the Geneva tr^{n} is 'An handful of corne shalbe sowen in the earth, euen in the top of the mountaines, and the frute thereof shal shake like the trees of Lebanon: and the children shal florish out of the citie like the grasse of the earth,' with the marg. note, 'Vnder suche a King shalbe moste great plentie, bothe of frute and also of the increase of mankinde.' And there is little doubt that AV followed the Gen. Bible here.

Whether in the Heb. 'fruit' refers to the fruit of the earth or of the King's body is another matter. Ewald takes it to be the King's offspring, his posterity, as in Ps 21^{10}; so also Burgess, 'Let His fruit be abundant, on the top of the hills, like (the cedars of) Lebanon,' who compares Ps 92^{12} and Hos 14^{5}. Cheyne refers the 'fruit' to the people, 'May abundance of corn be in the land, upon the top of the mountains may it wave; [and the people]—like Lebanon be its fruit.'

Figuratively four meanings are found: 1. The product of effort, as Pr 31^{31} 'Give her of the fruit of her hands' (פְּרִי); Ro 1^{13} 'I purposed to come unto you, (but was let hitherto,) that I might have some fruit among you also, even as among other Gentiles' (καρπός). 2. Benefit, profit, Jn 4^{36} 'And he that reapeth receiveth wages, and gathereth fruit unto life eternal' (καρπός, cf. Eng. 'harvest,' the same word philologically). Ro 6^{21} 'What fruit had ye then in those things whereof ye are now ashamed?' (καρπός). 3. By a strongly idiomatic Heb. phrase, 'The fruit of the lip,' that is, praise, Is 57^{19} 'I create the fruit of the lips' (נוּב, cf. vb. in Pr 10^{31}), an idiom that was accepted into bibl. Gr., He 13^{15} 'By him, therefore, let us offer the sacrifice of praise to God continually, that is, the fruit of our lips giving thanks to his name' (καρπός from LXX of Hos $14^{2\,[3]}$, פְּרִי for פָּרִים). 4. Of moral consequences of action, Is 3^{10} 'the fruit of their doings,' cf. Jer 17^{10} 21^{14} etc. This differs from (1), for it is often undesigned, and from (2), for it is often used of punishment.

J. Hastings.

FRUSTRATE.—2 Es 10^{54} 'Forsake me not, lest I die frustrate of my hope' (ut non frustra moriar), and Jth 11^{11} 'That my lord be not defeated and frustrate of his purpose' (ἄπρακτος). So Hooker, Eccl. Polity, I. xi. 4, 'It is an axiom of nature that natural desire cannot utterly be frustrate'; and Knox, Hist. 29, 'King Henry frustrate returned to London, and after his indignation declared, began to fortify with men his frontiers toward Scotland.' Such past participles, formed in imitation of the Latin, are common in Elizabethan English. Shaks. uses this form still more boldly as an adj., Tempest, III. iii. 10—

'The sea mocks
Our frustrate search on land.'

The meaning is 'defeated,' 'baulked.' The same sense is found with the infin. in Ezr 4^{5} 'Hired counsellors against them to frustrate their purpose' (לְהָפֵר); and with the finite verb in Is 44^{25} '[the Lord] that frustrateth the tokens of the liars' (מֵפֵר, Wyc. [1382], 'voide makende toones of deuynoures'; Cov. 'I destroy the tokens of witches'; Del. 'who brings to nought the signs of the lying prophets'). And in the same sense RV adds, Job 5^{12} 'He frustrateth the devices of the crafty' (מֵפֵר, AV 'He disappointeth'). But in Gal 2^{21} the meaning is different, 'I do not frustrate the grace of God' (ἀθετῶ, RV 'make void'), i.e. not 'baulk,' 'thwart,' or 'disappoint,' but 'nullify,' 'render inoperative,' 'make of no avail or value.' So Elyot, The Governour, ii. 385, 'To suche persones as do contemne auncient histories . . . it may be sayd, that in contemnynge histories they frustrate Experience.'

Goodwin, therefore (Works, i. pt. 2, p. 205), misses the point when he says, 'It was God's great design to advance grace, and therefore he calls their stepping aside from the doctrine thereof, a frustrating of the grace of God, Gal. ii. ult., which men do by mingling anything with it; it is a frustrating of the grace of God, because it frustrateth the great design of God, for to frustrate is to make void a design.' Dr. Gwynne (in loc.) brings out the meaning thus: 'I do not make void the atoning grace of God by seeking to justify myself; for if righteousness come by law, then, indeed, Christ died needlessly, and the grace of God is made of none effect.' The older versions are inaccurate or inadequate, Wyc. 'cast not awei' (after Vulg. non abiicio), so Cov. Rhem.; Tind. 'despyse,' so Rog. Cran.; Gen. better 'abrogate'; Bish. 'reject.' Augustine is right—non irritam facio.

FRYING-PAN.—See Food.

FUEL.—The Hebrews indicated fuel by a figure as the 'food of fire' (Is $9^{5.\ 19}$ [Heb. $^{4.\ 18}$] מַאֲכֶלֶת אֵשׁ, EV 'fuel of fire'; Ezk $15^{4.\ 6}$ 21^{32} אָכְלָה). In ancient as in modern times, wood was no doubt the principal fuel, either in its natural state or prepared as charcoal. There is no sufficient evidence of the use of mineral coal as fuel. With regard to the use of wood as fuel, we may assume that the variety of woods employed for this purpose was as great as it is in Syria to-day (see the list prepared by Post in PEF St, 1891, p. 118 ff.). The term עֵצִים (lit. woods) is applied equally to the 'sticks' or twigs gathered by individuals (Nu $15^{32.\ 33}$, 1 K $17^{10.\ 12}$), and to the faggots or logs prepared by felling and cutting up the trees of the forest (Lv $1^{7ff.}$ 4^{12}). A few of such trees are named in Is 44^{14-16}. Shrubs of every variety were used for the same purpose, such as the rōthem (רְתָם Ps 120^{4} 'coals of juniper,' more correctly as RVm 'coals of broom'), a shrub very largely used as fuel by the Arabs of the present day (Palmer, Doughty). Reduced to charcoal (see below), the rōthem (Arab. ritm) is said to throw out an intense heat. References to thorns (קוֹצִים, סִירִים) as fuel are numerous in Scripture; the 'ăṭād (אָטָד Ps 58^{10} [Eng. ^{9}]), probably the buck-thorn (see Thorns and Thistles), is mentioned in particular. The use of chaff, which includes the chopped straw (tibn) from the threshing-floor, is likewise referred to (Mt 3^{12}), as also of withered herbage (χόρτος, EV 'grass') in general (Mt 6^{30}, Lk 12^{28}).

The Hebrews, as we have remarked above, were familiar with the advantage, as fuel, of wood in the form of charcoal, for such, without doubt, was the 'coal' of Scripture (see Coal). The ancient Egyptians, acc. to Wilkinson (ed. 1878, ii. 35, 36), used faggots of wood for heating water and boiling meat, but preferred charcoal for roasting. However this may have been among the Hebrews, the fuel used for the brasier (אָח Jer $36^{22ff.}$ AV 'hearth,' RV 'brasier') or chafing-dish (כִּיּוֹר אֵשׁ Zec 12^{6}, RV 'pan of fire'), by which the houses of the upper classes were warmed in winter, was undoubtedly charcoal (cf. Jn 18^{18} 21^{9}). No such luxury would be found in the houses of the poor, who had to content themselves with a fire of logs or twigs placed in a depression in the floor of the living-room. The smoke from such a hearth (perhaps מוֹקֵדָה—although this word is in our extant literature used only of the altar-hearth, Lv 6^2 [Eng. 6^9]—mod. Arab. the same) escaped as best it could through the door or the latticed window (Hos 13^3, EV 'chimney'). Chimneys in our sense were not known, although, by a corruption of the text, 2 Es 6^4 is made to speak of 'the chimneys of Zion.'

It is uncertain to what extent the Hebrews were familiar with the use of animal dung as fuel. This form of fuel, as is well known, is very extensively used in the East, both by the nomads and the fellahin. The dung of the camel is the favourite fuel of the Bedawin, while the Syrian peasant carefully collects the droppings of his cattle, which he uses either in the natural state when sufficiently dry, or mixed with straw. From the incident recorded in Ezk $4^{12\text{-}15}$ we may at least infer that this form of fuel was not unknown (see esp. v.^{15}), although, as the country was more extensively wooded then than now, there would not be the same necessity as now exists for having recourse to it. A. R. S. Kennedy.

FUGITIVE.—1. Simply one who flees, as from danger or punishment (the modern, as it is also the earliest, meaning of the word, after Lat. fugitivus). So Is 15^5 'His fugitives shall flee unto Zoar' (RV 'Her nobles flee unto Zoar,' with 'fugitives' in marg. The reading is doubtful and difficult, see the Comm.); Ezk 17^{21} 'And all his fugitives with all his bands shall fall by the sword' (so RV and Oxf. Heb. Lex., but reading again doubtful). 2. A deserter from duty. This sense belongs to fugitivus also. So Jg 12^4 'Ye Gileadites are fugitives of Ephraim'; Cov. 'runnagates.' That this is the meaning of EV is certain, but Moore holds that it is a misinterpretation, the Heb. word (פְּלֵיטִים) meaning not 'runagate,' but 'survivor' (see his note); 2 K 25^{11} 'the fugitives that fell away to the king of Babylon' (הַנֹּפְלִים אֲשֶׁר נָפְלוּ עַל, RV 'those that fell away, that fell to the king'); Jth 16^{12} 'as fugitives' children' (ὡς παῖδας αὐτομολούντων, RV 'as runagates' children'); 2 Mac 8^{35} (the only example of the adj. in AV) 'He came like a fugitive servant through the midland unto Antioch' (δραπέτου τρόπον, RV 'like a fugitive slave'). So Shaks. Ant. and Cleop. IV. ix. 22—

> 'But let the world rank me in register
> A master-leaver, and a fugitive.'

3. A Wanderer, as Foxe, Act. and Mon., iii. 747, 'If thou wert an honest Woman, thou wouldest not . . . run about the Country like a Fugitive.' This is the meaning of Gn $4^{12.\ 14}$ 'a fugitive and a vagabond' (נָע וָנָד, ptcp. of נוּעַ to wander; LXX στένων καὶ τρέμων [preserving the paronomasia], Vulg. vagus et profugus; Luther, 'unstät und flüchtig'; Wyc. [1382] 'vagaunt and fer fugitif,' [1388] 'unstable of dwellyng and fleynge aboute'; Cov. 'a vagabunde and a rennagate'; Bish. 'a fugitive and a vagabond'). Shaks. presents a close parallel in I Henry VI. III. iii. 67—

> 'When Talbot hath set footing once in France,
> And fashion'd thee that instrument of ill,
> Who then but English Henry will be lord,
> And thou be thrust out like a fugitive?'

FULLER.—The fuller's art is mentioned in both OT and NT only in connexion with himself. In the former the fuller's field (2 K 18^{17}, Is 7^3 36^2) is the only word used, and indicated an open field on the west of Jerus. where cloths were fulled and spread out in the sun to dry. The process of fulling in those times is unknown to us except indirectly, partly from the etymology of the word (כּוֹבֵס, γναφεύς), and partly from an Egyp. picture. It seems to have consisted in washing the material with some preparation of lye, beating or rubbing it, and exposing it to the rays of the sun. This ensured a considerable amount of cleaning and bleaching; and the remains of ancient Egyp. linen show that the result of the art, rude as it may have been, was highly satisfactory. In NT the only reference to it (Mk 9^3) is where the garments of Jesus at His transfiguration are said to have become 'glistering, exceeding white; so as no fuller on earth can whiten them' (RV); and this description shows that the reader was familiar with the fuller's art and its beautifying effects. The dress of Egyp. and Jewish priests was made of white linen, and among their higher classes of very fine material, whose lustre was enhanced by art. Fulling is still carried on in the E., probably very much as it was practised in ancient times, and is often employed before dyeing cloth and yarn, to remove impurities and improve the process of colouring; but it is rapidly being superseded by the modern mode of bleaching.

J. Wortabet.

FULLER'S FIELD, THE (שְׂדֵה כוֹבֵס, ὁ ἀγρὸς γναφέως, ager fullonis), was the scene of Rabshakeh's interview with Eliakim and others (2 K 18^{17}, Is 36^2), and of that between Ahaz, Isaiah, and his son (Is 7^3). In each case it is named in connexion with the phrase 'conduit of the Upper Pool,' which is 'in' or 'on' 'the highway of the Fuller's Field.' The conduit apparently crossed the highway at a point close to the city, as conversation carried on there could be heard by the people on the walls (2 K 18^{26}). The place cannot now be identified with certainty. En-rogel we know was a resort of the fullers; whence probably its name was derived. The same is true of Birket Mamilla, in the vale west of the city. The former, lying in the bottom of the valley S.E., would have been difficult of approach, and hearing from the walls impossible. The higher aqueduct from Solomon's Pools crosses the valley a little above Birket Mamilla, and seems to have entered the city close by the tower Psaphinus, at the N.W. angle. This, however, could hardly be called 'the conduit of the Upper Pool.' From Birket Mamilla a conduit takes water to the Pool of Hezekiah, passing under the wall northward of the Jaffa gate. Birket Mamilla being the 'upper' of the two pools in the valley, there is at least a possibility that the Fuller's Field was located here. On the N., however, an ancient conduit entered the city E. of the Damascus gate. Its course without the wall has not been traced. It may have come from the large pool some distance out, to the left of the Nâblûs road. On this side the city was easiest of approach; the land here would perhaps best suit the description implied in שָׂדֶה 'arable land'; Josephus (BJ v. iv. 2) speaks of 'The Fuller's Monument,' at the E. corner of the N. wall; and Arculf mentions a gate west of the Damascus gate, which at the time of his visit (towards the end of the 7th cent.) was called Porta Villæ Fullonis, 'Gate of the Fuller's Farm' (cf. Euseb. HE ii. 23). These considerations point to the location of the Fuller's Field on the N. of the city. But there is no evidence to warrant any certain conclusion.

FURNACE.—In OT five words are tr^{d} furnace in EV. 1. כִּבְשָׁן, a kiln for burning limestone into lime, or for smelting ore, chiefly iron. The former was constructed of lime-stones arranged in concentric layers in the form of a dome, with an opening at the top for the escape of air and smoke, and another at the bottom for supplying the hollow of the dome with fuel. In this case, as well as in furnaces for smelting, great and long-continued heat was required, and the combustion caused a thick and dark column of smoke to ascend. It is this appearance that is referred to in the account of the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah: 'and, lo, the smoke of the land went up as the smoke of a furnace' (Gn 19[28]). 2. אַתּוּן, an Aram. word still in use in Syria (Arab. attun) for the lime-kiln described above. It occurs only in Dn 3, but there repeatedly as the 'furnace' into which Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego were cast. 3. עֲלִיל, Ps 12[6], but the text here is quite uncertain. (See Cheyne, ad loc. and Expos. Times, viii. 170, 287, 336, 379.) 4. כּוּר (Arab. kûr, a blacksmith's fireplace), a smelting furnace, for iron (Dt 4[20], 1 K 8[51], Jer 11[4]), but especially for gold (Pr 17[3] 27[21]), used metaphorically (Is 48[10], furnace of affliction). 5. תַּנּוּר, sometimes tr. 'furnace' (Gn 15[17]), and sometimes 'oven' (Lv 26[26])—the latter being probably the correct tr[n]. The Arab. word tannur is still in use on the Lebanon for a special kind of oven in which women bake bread. A pit is dug in the earth, and a hollow cylinder of pottery, about two feet in diameter, is let down into it. Fire is kindled at the bottom, and, when the smoke subsides and the cylinder is sufficiently heated, a thin circular layer of dough, spread out on a pad, is deftly stuck to the inner side of the cylinder. The cakes, which are about a foot in diameter, are considered a very good kind of bread.

The same word in Gr. of NT (Mt 13[42]) and in Arab. (κάμινος, kamîn) means a furnace. In Syria the word is still in use for furnaces employed in heating public baths, and the heat generated in them is very great. J. WORTABET.

FURNITURE.—In Gn 31[34] it is said that Rachel had taken the images (RV 'teraphim') belonging to her father, and put them 'in the camel's furniture.' The Heb. [כַּר] occurs only here (בְּכַר־הַגָּמָל), and designates a basket-shaped palanquin which was placed on the camel's saddle, chiefly for carrying the women. See Dillmann, in loc., who quotes Knobel and refers to Burckhardt, Bedouins, ii. 85; W. G. Brown, Travels, 453; Ker Porter, Travels, ii. 232; Jahn, Bibl. Arch. 54; see also art. CAMEL. The Eng. word is apparently original to AV. The older Eng. VSS were misled by the Vulg. stramenta cameli, and Luther's die streu der Kamel (mod. edd. die Streu der Kameele), and render 'straw' or 'litter,' though Gen. Bible has 'saddle' in marg. (Wyc. 1382 'the literyng of a camele,' 1388 'the strewyngis of the camel'). The AV and RV word 'furniture' is used in the general sense of equipment, accoutrement, as in Bunyan, Holy War (Clar. Press ed. p. 112), 'Wherefore, let it please thee to accept of our Palace for thy place of residence, and of the Houses of the best men in our Town for the reception of thy Soldiers and their Furniture.'

The same word is given in AV 7 times (Ex 31[7. 8 bis. 9] 35[14] 39[33], Nah 2[9]) as the tr. of כְּלִי kĕlî, which is usually tr[d] 'vessel.' RV prefers 'vessel' in Ex 31[8b. 9] and 35[14], but gives 'furniture' as the tr. of the same Heb. in Ex 25[9], Nu 3[8] 7[1], 2 S 24[22] (AV all 'instrument'); Ex 40[9], Nu 1[50b] 4[15. 16], 1 Ch 9[29] (AV all 'vessel').

For an account of the furniture of an Eastern house, see HOUSE. J. HASTINGS.

FURROW.—This is the tr[n] in AV of the following Heb. words. 1. גְּדוּד Ps 65[10] (RV 'ridges'). This word, which is most familiar to us in the sense of a 'troop' (e.g. 1 S 30[8. 15. 23] and oft.), means literally a 'cutting,' and (in plur. fem. גְּדֻדוֹת) appears in Jer 48[37] in connexion with cuttings in the flesh as a sign of mourning. 2. מַעֲנָה or מַעֲנִית Ps 129[3], where the word is used metaphorically, 'The plowers plowed upon my back, they made long their furrows' (מַעֲנִיתָם Kethibh, מַעֲנֵיהֶם Kerê). The only other occurrence of this word is in the obscure expression in 1 S 14[14] מַחֲצִי מַעֲנֵה צֶמֶד שָׂדֶה, which is tr[d] in AV 'within as it were an half acre of land [which] a yoke [of oxen might plow]'; AVm 'half a furrow of an acre of land,' RV 'within as it were half a furrow's length in an acre of land,' RVm 'half an acre of land.' There is the strongest reason to suspect the originality of MT. LXX has ἐν βολίσι καὶ κόχλαξιν τοῦ πεδίου, and it is not improbable that the Heb. expression originally specified the weapons used by Jonathan and his armour-bearer, although in that case we have probably here a gloss transferred from v.[19] (see Wellhausen and Driver's notes, ad loc., also Budde in SBOT). 3. עֲרוּגָה Ezk 17[7. 10], where RV rightly substitutes 'beds,' as in Ca 5[13] 6[2] [all]. 4. תֶּלֶם Job 31[38] 39[10], Hos 10[4] 12[11]. The same word (in plur.) is tr[d] by RV 'furrows' in Ps 65[11], where AV has 'ridges.' 5. In Hos 10[10] the Kethibh has עינתם, Kerê עֲוֹנוֹתָם 'furrows.' Many modern scholars (following LXX, Vulg. and Pesh.) would read עֲוֹנוֹתָם 'transgressions.' The passage appears to be hopelessly corrupt. AV (text) 'when they shall bind themselves in their two furrows,' is of course meaningless. RV proposes 'when they are bound to their two transgressions'; but even this fails to yield a satisfactory sense. Probably Nowack is not far wrong in his conjectural tr[n] um sie zu züchtigen wegen ihrer beiden Vergehungen, 'to punish them for both their transgressions.' Similarly Guthe (in Kautzsch's AT), wenn sie für ihre zwei Verschuldungen Züchtigung empfangen, 'when they receive punishment for their two transgressions.' The latter will be their wrong choice of a king and their idolatry, or perhaps the reference may be to the two calves at Bethel and Dan (see Nowack and Wellh. ad loc., and cf. Siegfried-Stade, s. עָוֹן). See further under AGRICULTURE.

J. A. SELBIE.

FURTHER.—To 'further' in the sense of 'help forward' is used of persons in Ezr 8[36] 'they furthered the people, and the house of God' (נִשְּׂאוּ). So Chaucer, Hous of Fame, 2023—

> 'And gaf expres commaundement,
> To whiche I am obedient,
> To furthre thee with al my might.'

Furtherance occurs in Ph 1[12. 25] as tr. of προκοπή, which in 1 Ti 4[15], its only other occurrence, is tr[d] 'profiting.' RV gives 'progress' in all. On the other hand RV introduces 'furtherance' into Ph 1[5] 2[22] to express the force of εἰς with the acc. (εἰς τὸ εὐαγγέλιον, 'in furtherance of the gospel,' AV 'in the gospel'). Cf. Healey (1610), St. Aug. Citie of God, I. xi. 19, 'The pompes of the funeralls are rather solaces to the living then furtherances to the dead.'

FURY.—The Heb. word חֵמָה ḥêmâh, which is once (Est 1[12]) tr[d] 'anger,' and often 'wrath,' is 66 (חֵמָא of Dn 11[44] and Aram. חֵמָא of 3[13. 19] make 69) times tr[d] 'fury.' Of these occurrences 61 refer to God, and then Amer. RV prefers 'wrath,' except in Is 42[25] 66[15] 'fierceness.' Fury is also the tr. in AV of חָרוֹן ḥârôn in Job 20[23]; RV 'fierceness,' as the word is a few times tr[d] in AV. In the Apocr. 'fury' occurs as the tr. of θυμός Sir 1[22] 45[18] 48[10], Bar 1[13] (RV always 'wrath'); of θυμοί Wis 7[20] (AV 'furies,' RV 'ragings') 10[3], 2 Mac 4[25] (both AV 'fury,' RV 'rage'); and of ἀλάστωρ 2 Mac 7[9] 'And when he was at the last gasp, he said, Thou like a fury takest us out of this present life' (Σὺ μέν, ἀλάστωρ; the only occurrence of the word in biblical Greek, though it is found also in 4 Mac 9[24] 11[23] 18[22]; RV 'Thou, miscreant'). See ANGER. J. HASTINGS.

G

GAAL (גַּעַל, acc. to Wellh. Isr. u. jüd. Geschichte, p. 26='beetle,' cf. Arab. ja'ul; see Gray, Hebr. Prop. Names, p. 110), Jg 9[26-41] son of Ebed (עֶבֶד, LXX, A Ἀβεδ, B Ἰώβηλ, prob. error for Ἰωβήδ, Obed עוֹבֵד; cf. LXX 1 Ch 2[37] 11[47] 26[7], 2 Ch 23[1]. Less prob. Ἰώβηλ, i.e. יובל=יובעל 'J" is Baal,' altered to Ebed to avoid offence).—Gaal, apparently a Canaanite and a new-comer to Shechem, was the ringleader of a revolt against Abimelech, son of Gideon. He first ingratiated himself with the Shechemites, and then adroitly seized the occasion of the popular vintage-festival to incite them to revolt and make himself their leader. Zebul, Abimelech's officer in Shechem, heard of the plot, and sent a warning to his chief. Following Zebul's advice, Abimelech marched against the town and surrounded it with ambuscades under cover of night. Gaal, from the entrance of the gate, noticed the approach of Abimelech's men, and pointed them out to Zebul, who replied first with an ironical answer and then with an open taunt, bidding him go forth and fight with them. In the battle which followed, Abimelech completely defeated the rebels, and Zebul drove out Gaal and his brethren from the city. The context suggests that the revolt was one of 'native Shechemites against the half-Israelite Abimelech' (Moore). Gaal poses as their champion. It is by no means clear that Gaal was an Israelite, and that his object was to rouse the Israelite population against the Shechemite ruler. W. R. Smith, Th. T. xx. 1886, p. 195 ff., would place v.[28] after v.[22]; and Budde, Richt. u. Sam. p. 118, after v.[25]. But no transposition is needed. In v.[28] read with LXX יַעַבְרוּ for עִבְרוּ 'Do not the son of Jerubbaal and Zebul . . . make slaves of the men of Hamor?' Another simple alteration is עָבְרוּ (perf.) proposed by Moore, 'Were not . . . subject to Hamor?' V.[29] for וְיֹאמַר read וְאֹמַר 'and I would say.' V.[31] for בְּתַרְמָה 'deceitfully' (?) read בְּאַרְמָה 'in Arumah,' cf. v.[41]. צְרִים can hardly be right: Stade suggests חֻם מְצָרִים; but the text is doubtful. See further under ABIMELECH. G. A. COOKE.

GAASH (גַּעַשׁ).—A mountain in Ephraim, S. of Timnath-serah or Timnath-heres (wh. see), Jos 24[30], Jg 2[9]. The torrent-valleys (נְחָלִים) of G. are mentioned in 2 S 23[30]=1Ch 11[32].

GABAEL (B Γαβαήλ, A Γαμαήλ).—1. A distant ancestor of Tobit (To 1[1]). 2. A friend and kinsman of Tobit, residing at Rages in Media. To him Tobit, when purveyor to the king of Assyria, once entrusted, as a deposit, 10 talents of silver (Vulg. only: 'lent it under a bond, because G. was needy'), To 1[14]. For years the money was not claimed. The reason for this is given with great variety in the VSS (1[15]). When, however, blindness and poverty came on Tobit in Nineveh, he recollected, after prayer, the long-forgotten treasure (To 4[1]), and wished his son Tobias to fetch it (4[21]). Tobias found a guide, Raphael in disguise, who said he had lodged with G. (To 5[6]). When Tobias married Sarah in Ecbatana he sent Raphael for the deposit (9[2]). G. welcomed him, and brought forth the bags with seals unbroken, returning with Raphael to the wedding feast. All the VSS, except B and Heb. of Fagius, tell of a hearty blessing which G. gave the bridegroom when he met him (9[6]). Instead of this, B (so EV) says, 'Tobias blessed his wife,' and Heb. Fag. 'Tobias was blessed still more, with Sarah his wife.'

Heb. Fag. uses the form גַּבְאֵל, except in ch. 10, where we have גַּבָּאֵל, as always in Munster's Heb. Itala preserves the form most accurately, 'Gabahel,' גַּבְהָאֵל='God is high.' J. T. MARSHALL.

GABATHA (Γαβάθα). — One of two eunuchs whose plot against Artaxerxes (the Ahasuerus, i.e. Xerxes of canonical Est) was discovered and frustrated by Mardocheus (Mordecai), Ad. Est 12[1]. In Est 2[21] he is called BIGTHAN and in 6[2] BIGTHANA.

GABBAI (גַּבַּי, cf. Talm. גַּבָּי 'tax-gatherer').—A Benjamite (Neh 11[8]), but text doubtful (see Smend, Listen, p. 7).

GABBATHA occurs only in Jn 19[13] 'And he [Pilate] brought Jesus out and sat down (ἐκάθισεν, not—according to Justin, Apol. i. 35, and the Gospel of Peter, ἐκάθισαν αὐτὸν ἐπὶ καθέδραν κρίσεως—'set him') on the judgment-seat at a place called the Pavement (Λιθόστρωτον), but in Hebrew Gabbatha' (Ἑβραϊστὶ δὲ Γαββαθά).

The passage offers serious philological and topographical difficulties.

(a) Λιθόστρωτον is clearly 'pavement,' especially of mosaic work (tessellatum); cf. in the OT, Est 1[6], Ca 3[10], 2 Ch 1[3], but especially Aristeas (ed. Schmidt, p. 30, 3), where on the temple of Jerusalem it is said: Τὸ δὲ πᾶν ἔδαφος λιθόστρωτον καθέστηκε.

(b) This particular Pavement was called in Hebrew 'Gabbatha.' It is not necessary or possible, though it is generally attempted, to seek in Gabbatha the exact equivalent of the appellativum λιθόστρωτον (Onomastica sacra, ed. Lag. 189, 87. 202, 62, Γαββαθὰ λιθόστρωτον).

(c) The Greek MSS offer scarcely any variety; some uncials have Γαβαθα; so also the Harclensian VS in the edition of White; but according to Barhebræus it had נאבבאתא; a few minuscules have Καπφαθα. Interesting in this connexion is the spelling of the Peshiṭta, גַּבְּיפְתָּא, with the remark of Barhebræus, that the ג is to be pronounced hard like כ and the פ both times soft (cf. Duval, Gr. Syr. p. 30); the Cureton and Lewis MSS are unhappily defective, but the Arabic Tatian has كَفِيفَثَا Kafîftâ (thus cod. A, the text of Ciasca كَبِيثَا; in the translation Ciasca and Hogg retained Gabbatha). The Evangeliarium Hierosolymitanum shows גיבתא, but codex C (in the forthcoming edition of Mrs. Lewis) גבתא. On the deformations of the word in the MSS of the Latin Bible, see Wordsworth-White. The confusion with Golgotha (first hand of cod. Sinaiticus) is found elsewhere (Oliverus, Descriptio terræ sanctæ, p. 20, 9, codd. DX Golgatha, U Grabata).

In this state of the evidence it is safest to presuppose an Aramaic גַּבְּתָא, as st. emph. of a feminine noun גַּבָּא from the root גבב. But the origin and meaning of גבתא is disputed.

1. In Mt 26[23] we find גבתא in the Evang. Hier.

for τρύβλιον ; cf. Ethiopic gab(b)atâ=patella, Dillm. Lex. 1168, and Latin gabata, Martial, 7. 47, 11. 3. Schwally (Idioticon) identified this with our Gabbatha. But this גבתא seems to be a dialectic form of גַּפְתָּא (fem. of גַּךְ), Thesaur. Syr. 1791 ; cf. גִּפְּתָא and גַּפְּתָא, ib. 766, 1792.

2. Neither can it be=גַּפְתָּא (כיפתא) 'vault,' καμάρα, ἐξέδρα, ψαλίς (Vogüé, Inscr. Sémit. i. p. 50, n. 70, ib. n. 50 ; Targ. Jer. xx. 2, 3, Naz. 56[a]), because of the vowel i in the first syllable, though the meaning would be very appropriate : an arch, niche, or cupola, under which the tribunal was placed on a mosaic pavement.

3. Generally it is derived from גַּב 'back' ; but neither for the form nor for the meaning (Anhöhe, 'height' ; Kautzsch, Gramm. des Bibl. Aram. p. 10) can examples be given. In the OT we have גַּבְתּוֹן ; in the Mishna the plural גַּבּוֹת ; for גיבבא Targ. Ps 68[16], Lagarde printed גיבנא ; Levy, p. 123, has גיבנא ; Gesen. r. 98, 96[a] we have גיבבתא ראשי הרים ; more frequent is גובבתא, Dalman, Gr. des Aram. § 25. i. β, where also an example of spelling with פ is given.

4. Others thought of the root גבע, i.e. of an Aramaized *גבעתא 'hill' (comp. שִׁמְעָה=שִׁמְעָת, שַׁבָּה if =*שַׁבְעָת). (The roots גב, גך, and כך are closely allied ; cf. further גֶּבֶן Lv 21[20]=ܟܦܐ ; ܟܦܐ is explained caverna by Barsalibi; ܟܦܐ ܟܦܐ ܣܟܝܢܐ, spelunca fornicata, Julian, ed. Hoffm. 139. 21). The exact form and meaning must therefore be left in suspense.

(d) No place called Λιθόστρωτον or Gabbatha is mentioned by Josephus, or in any other known source besides the NT. But frequently we hear of a place called גָּזִית (=Ξυστός), especially of the לִשְׁכַּת הַגָּזִית 'the hall of hewn quaders,' where the Sanhedrin assembled (Schürer, HJP II. i. 190). It has been attempted to identify these two places. Tradition seeks Gabbatha near the so-called 'Ecce homo Arch.' Compare the articles JERUSALEM, PILATE, PRÆTORIUM, TEMPLE. For the sitting of the judge on the sella, see Schürer, I. ii. 15 n. 8, and the literature there quoted, especially Josephus, Ant. XVIII. iv. 6, where Philippus is praised : τοῦ θρόνου εἰς ὃν κρίνειε καθεζόμενος ἐν ταῖς ὁδοῖς ἐπομένου . . . ἐκ τοῦ ὀξέος ἰδρύσεως τοῦ θρόνου ᾗ καὶ τύχοι γενομένης καθεζόμενος ἠκροᾶτο.

GABBE (A Γάββη, B Κάββη ; AV Gabdes), 1 Es 5[20].—In Ezr 2[26] Geba.

GABRIAS (B Γαβρίας, א Γαβρεί, indecl. Greek forms of גַּבְרִי [Aram. קַבְרִי], shortened form of גַּבְרִיאֵל 'man of God' ; omitting, as was customary, the name of the deity. Syr. and Heb. Fagii preserve the complete form).—Acc. to To 1[14] Gabrias was the brother of the Gabael to whom Tobit entrusted 10 talents of silver. In To 4[20] the Gr. reads Γαβαήλῳ τῷ τοῦ Γαβρία, א Γαβρεί, which AV and RV render 'the son of Gabrias,' thereby introducing an apparent contradiction, probably gratuitously. Compare Ἰούδας Ἰακώβου, Ac 1[13], with Jude [1].

J. T. MARSHALL.

GABRIEL (גַּבְרִיאֵל, in LXX and NT Γαβριήλ, vir Dei, 'man of God') appears in both OT and NT. In Dn 8[15f.] G. is the 'man' who interprets Daniel's vision of the ram and the he-goat ; in 9[21f.] he explains to Daniel Jeremiah's prophecy about the 70 years (Jer 25[11] 29[10]) as 70 weeks of years, and amplifies details. In NT G. is named by Lk alone ; he foretells the birth of John to Zacharias (1[11f.]), and acts as the angel of Annunciation to Mary (1[26]). Different in some ways as the later is from the earlier presentation, yet both can be easily united as parts, not only of one character, but even of one aspect of it, viz. that of bearing divine sympathy and comforting promise to those in need. These appearances are quite in accordance with the notion of G.'s character afforded by the later and more developed Jewish angelology. The developed angelology of Dn is indeed used as an argument for the later date of that book (Driver, LOT[6] p. 508). If the 'one like the appearance of a man' (Dn 10[18]) be G., as would appear from the fact that his message resembles, even in its words, that of G. in 8 and 9, then G. is a companion of Michael, and both are members of a class, the 'princes' or guardian-angels of the nations. In Enoch 9, G. is one of four great archangels ; but, comparing this with Lk 1[19] and other references, he is one of seven (Rev 8[2]) who present the prayers of the saints and go in and out before God (To 12[15]). The Targums add G. as a gloss to other parts of Scripture ; according to pseudo-Jonathan, the 'man' who showed Joseph the way towards his brethren (Gn 37[15]) was G. ; again, with Michael and others G. takes part in the burial of Moses (Dt 34[6]) ; G. is also the angel whom the Lord sent to destroy the host of Sennacherib (2 Ch 32[21]). About the name Gabriel there is nothing distinctive, but it was probably a proper name from its first use : the personality, however, is very definite. Assuming that the supra-natural beings of the earlier books of the Bible are either the shrivelled-up descendants of the nature-spirits of primitive Semitic superstition (אֱלֹהִים) or subordinate personal beings fully representing God at a definite time and place (מַלְאָכִים) (Schultz, OT Theol. ii. 215 f. ; W. R. Smith, Ency. Brit.[9] art. 'Angel'), it is clear that G. belongs to the latter rather than the former. Nor has his connexion with, far less his derivation from, any of the seven Amshaspends of Zoroastrianism, the seven Babylonian planets, or the seven councillors at the Persian court (Ezr 7[14]), been made out. He is the messenger of J": a characteristic Jewish idea, though the number of the archangels—seven—may have been derived from foreign sources. We possess but little description of the special form under which he presented himself ; to Daniel he is simply 'the man G.,' though an elaborate and striking picture is drawn of the 'man' (G. ?) in Dn 10[5. 6]. St. Luke is equally reticent, but calmness and sublimity are added : 'I am G. that stand in the presence of God.' In Dn 9[21] G. is 'caused to fly swiftly,' but the passage is not clear ; RVm 'sore wearied' seems somewhat inept ; 'gleaming in splendour' (Schultz, OT Theol. ii. 226 n. 2) is more likely, though it proposes an emendation of the original.

G. appropriates to himself the function of revealing God. He brings the divine into the phenomenal world. In this he is contrasted with Michael, who fights for God and the chosen people. Yet in G.'s character there is also a stern element. Mohammed asserts him to have been the revealer of the Koran, —probably in opposition to the later Jews, whose prince was Michael,—but Mohammed also represents G. as fighting for him, e.g. at the head of 3000 angels against the idolatrous Meccans. But, comparing Lk 1[20] (also perhaps Dn 10[13. 20. 21]) with this, we see that these sterner aspects were not wanting even in the Jewish conception of Gabriel.

GAD.—Gad is another form of goad, and the gadfly (so correctly RVm for קֶרֶץ in Jer 46[20] ; AV, RV 'destruction') is the goad-fly, the fly that stings. Hence the favourite derivation for the verb to 'gad' (though it is not very certain) is to rush about like animals stung by the gadfly. Perhaps better and more simply (after Skeat), to drive about (which was the orig. sense), goad ; then rush

* Luther, who had at first translated Pflaster (Pavement), seems to have thought of the root גבה 'to be high,' since he coined the word Hochpflaster (High-pavement).

about as goaded. Cf. Dryden, Virgil's Georgics, iii.—

'their stings draw blood
And drive the cattle gadding through the wood.'

Bacon expresses the usual meaning of the word clearly in Essays 'Of Envy' (Gold. Treas. ed. p. 30, l. 21)—'For Envy is a Gadding Passion, and walketh the Streets, and doth not keepe home.' With which cf. T. Adams, II Peter (on 1^4), 'Man's knowledge should not be a gadding harlot, whose feet cannot keep within doors; but a good housewife to stay at home.' In AV we find, Jer 2^{36} 'Why gaddest thou about so much to change thy way?' (תָּהֹרִי, lit. 'why goest thou?' mostly poetic in Heb., but in Aram. the usual word for 'to go away'); Sir 25^{25} 'Give the water no passage; neither a wicked woman liberty to gad abroad' (after Vulg. veniam prodeundi, which again follows the reading παῤῥησίαν ἐξόδου; B has simply ἐξουσίαν; ℵA παρρησίαν, whence RV 'freedom of speech').

Gadder occurs Sir 26^8 'A drunken woman and a gadder abroad causeth great anger' (after the reading καὶ ῥεμβάς, but not Vulg., which has no corresp. words, but to the Gr. [ὀργὴ μεγάλη γυνὴ μέθυσος] adds et contumelia; RV follows Gr. 'A drunken woman causeth great wrath'). Cf. Grafton, King John, An. 13, 'In the mean while the priestes within England had prouided them a false and counterfeated prophet called Peter Wakefielde, a Yorkshireman, who was a hermite, an idle gadder about, and a pratlyng marchant.'

J. HASTINGS.

GAD (גָּד, δαιμόνιον, δαίμων; Fortuna; also, probably, גָּד, τύχη).—Properly, the word should be used with the article הַגָּד 'the gad,' i.e. 'the (god of) good luck'; that being the meaning of the word, which is apparently the same as גַּד gād, 'fortune,' Arab. jadd, Aram. גַּדָּא gaddâ, Syr. gadā. Gad was, therefore, originally an appellative, and its use as a divine name is due to its meaning. Examples of its appellative use are בִּישׁ גּוּרָא 'the unlucky' (Buxtorf, 387); גּוּרְעָתָא 'the fortune of Athe' (de Vogüé, Palm. 143); גּוּרְגְּמַת and נְעַמְגַּר, etc., in Carthag. inscriptions. The god Gad as Τύχη, 'Fortune,' seems to illustrate the origin of the Old Pers. word for 'God,' baga,* which may be traced back to the Sanskrit bhaga, 'fortune,' and Baethgen quotes in this connexion the Syr. phrase 'I swear by the Fortune (גּוּרָא) of the king' (P. Smith, s.v.), 'fortune' becoming thus a protective divinity, to whom temples were built and statues erected. The worship of this divinity became greatly extended in ancient times, and numerous Gr. inscriptions in the Hauran give the Gr. equivalent word (Τύχη), the identity of which with Gad, notwithstanding the difference of gender (Gad being masc., Tyche fem.), does not admit of doubt. A trace of the Syr. worship of Gad is regarded as being indicated by the exclamation of Leah when Zilpah, her maid, bore Jacob a son (Gn 30^{11}). The expression used is בָּגָד, which is translated in AV (following the Kerê, בָּא גָּד bā gād) 'a troop cometh,' or 'fortune is come.' If, however, the Kethîbh be followed (with pointing בְּגָד bĕgād), the word may be translated 'with Gad'† (in RV 'fortunate,' m. 'with fortune'), a rendering favoured by many scholars. As the name of Gad is not met with in Bab. literature, it would seem to have been a native Can. word, retained by the Israelites in consequence of the tendency to polytheism which existed among them as late as the time of the Bab. captivity, when they 'prepared a table for Fortune [לַגָּד],' and filled up 'mingled wine unto Destiny [לִמְנִי]' (Is 65^{11} RV), as did also the Babylonians and Assyrians for their gods (cf. Bel[3], also Jer 51^{44}). * By the astrologers Gad was identified with the planet Jupiter, called by the Arabs 'Great Fortuna,' and the question naturally arises whether the Assyrian Manu rabû,† 'great Manu,' identified by Lenormant with Meni or 'Destiny,' may not in reality be identical with Gad, Meni being, with the Arabs, 'Lesser Fortuna.' The Assyrians also worshipped a god named Ḳibî-dunki,‡ a name meaning 'Bespeak thou my good fortune,' with whom Gad may also have been identified. The identification of Gad with the star of good fortune (כּוֹכַב צֶדֶק kôkab ṣedeḳ), the planet Jupiter, is regarded as being of late date.

Further testimony to the worship of Gad in Canaan is to be found in the place-names Baal-gad (Jos 11^{17} 12^7 13^5), where Baal was worshipped as god of fortune, and Migdal-gad (Jos 15^{37}), 'the tower of Gad.' The Hebrews also were so accustomed to regard the worship of Gad as a natural thing, that the words addressed by Esau to Isaac his father, 'let my father arise' (Gn 27^{31}), are explained in Bereshith Rabba, p. 65, as an invocation to Gada or Fortune.

GAD (גָּד, Γάδ).—Son of Jacob by his concubine Zilpah, Leah's slave-girl. Gn 30^{11} RV, 'Leah said, Fortunate! and she called his name Gad,' follows the LXX, εἶπεν Λεία, Ἐν τύχῃ, and Vulg. Dixit feliciter. Field mentions the Greek rendering, εὐτύχηκα, 'I have had good fortune,' reading בָּגָד or בְּגָד. Perhaps we should tr. 'With the help of Gad' (Ball, Sacred Books of OT). Dillm. has 'Glückskind.' So Kethîbh; the Kerê, punctuating differently, has בָּא גָּד 'Gad or Fortune comes.' So Symm. (ἦλθεν Γάδ) Onk. and Syr. Aq. has ἦλθεν εὐζωΐα ('well-living'), which Field, on the authority of Jerome, etc., corrects to εὐζωνία ('the being well-girded'). The view taken by these authorities suggests that Gad here is either the divine name found in Is 65^{11} (see preceding art.), or is connected with that name. The AV 'a troop cometh' treats גָּד as equivalent to גְּדוּד, probably on account of Gn 49^{19}, which, however, is rather a play upon words than a serious etymology. Similar translations are given by the Sam. Version (Dillm.) and the Gr.-Ven. ἥκει στράτευμα.

GAD (Tribe); for Name, see preceding article.

1. EARLY HISTORY.—The relation of Gad to the other tribes is indicated genealogically by the statement, Gn 30^{11} (J), 35^{26} (P), that Gad and Asher were the sons of Zilpah, Rachel's slave, i.e. probably, that Gad and Asher were closely connected, and either occupied a secondary position in, or were late accessions to, Israel. The separation of the Palestinian territories of the two tribes shows that this statement refers to a period before the completion of the conquest of Canaan. It is noteworthy that the names Gad and possibly also Asher are connected with the names of Semitic deities. P (Gn 46^{16}, Nu $26^{15\text{-}17}$) enumerates the sons or families of Gad, and states (Nu 1^{14} 2^{14} 7^{42} 10^{20} 13^{15}) that, at the Exodus, the prince of Gad was Eliasaph

* Also the Phrygian name of Zeus, Βαγαῖος.

† The Targ. of the pseudo-Jonathan and that of Jerus. both read 'a lucky planet cometh.' (Cf. also Ball's note, ad loc., in Haupt's OT).

* These lectisternia or tables for the gods are also referred to in connexion with 'the queen of heaven' in Jer 7^{18}.

† WAI III. pl. 66. obv. l. 2 c.

‡ Ib. obv. 30*c*, rev. 29*f*., the latter passage reading 'Kibî-dunki of Assur (and) Istar (or, of the god and goddess) of Suti' (probably the people Sutî transported by Kadisman-Muruš 'from east to west,' i.e. to Amurri or Phœnicia). Kibî-dunki is probably the same as the deity Iḳbi-dunki, who is described as mušêrib damāti, 'the dispenser of favours.'

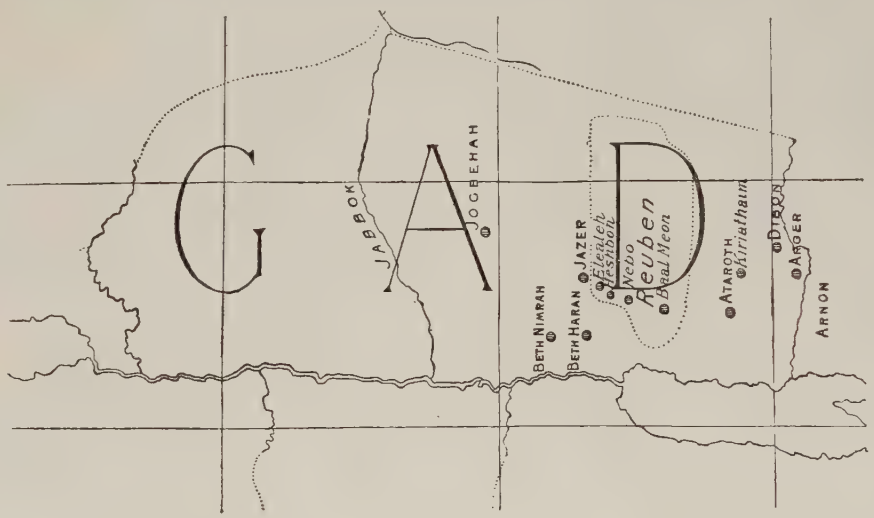
ben-Deuel (or Reuel), and that the Gadite amongst the twelve spies was Geuel ben-Machi. Buchanan Gray (Heb. Proper Names, 205) considers Eliasaph pre-exilic; but places Deuel and Geuel in a list of which he says, 'The probability appears to me great that the following seventeen are of late origin, and, probably, also of artificial character' (p. 210). P also tells us that Gad numbered 45,650 at the first census (Nu 1^{25} 2^{15}), and at the second 40,500 (MT Nu 26^{18}), or 44,500 (LXX Nu 26^{27}); and that Gad marched in the wilderness in the 'Camp of Reuben' with Reuben and Simeon on the south side of Israel (Nu $2^{10\text{-}16}$). In Nu $1^{5\text{-}16}$ Gad occupies the eleventh place, beween Asher and Naphtali; in 1^{24} MT and 26^{15} MT, the third place after Reuben and Simeon, but in the corresponding 1^{36} LXX, the ninth place, between Benjamin and Dan, and in 26^{27} LXX, the sixth place, between Zebulun and Asher. In Nu 2^{14} 7^{42} Gad occupies the sixth place, also after Reuben and Simeon.

ii. The Conquest.—In Nu 32 Reuben and Gad receive E. Palestine from Moses on condition of aiding in the conquest of W. Palestine. Although this chapter owes its present form to P, the main facts were probably contained in J or E or both; but the references to 'half Manasseh' are editorial additions to the original narrative. Similar statements are made in Dt $3^{12\text{-}17}$ 29^{8}, Jos 12^{6} (D^{2}) $13^{8\text{-}28}$ (D^{2} P). Further, Jos $1^{12\text{-}18}$ 4^{12} (D^{2}) tell us that Reuben and Gad fulfilled their promise, and Jos $22^{1\text{-}8}$ (D^{2}) that they afterwards returned home.

Jos $22^{9\text{-}34}$ tells how Reuben and Gad on their return erected a great altar by the Jordan—it is not clear on which side; how the other tribes supposed it to be a schismatic altar and prepared for war, but were appeased on learning that it had been erected as a token of the unity of Reuben and Gad with the other tribes (see Ed). The narrative as it stands is one of the latest additions to P; but it seems to be based on JE, though it has been so entirely reconstructed by a late editor that we cannot recover the original story. Here again the references to 'half Manasseh' are editorial additions.

iii. The Territory of Gad.—Besides minor references, we have two main accounts of the territory: (a) Nu $32^{34\text{-}36}$ (JE) assigns to Gad Beth-haran, Beth-nimrah, Dibon, Jogbehah, Jazer, Ataroth, Atroth-shophan, and Aroer, cities scattered over the district between the Jabbok and the Arnon, and possibly farther north. Nu $32^{37.\ 38}$ (JE) assigns to Reuben, Heshbon, Elealeh, Kiriathaim, Nebo, and Baal-meon—cities lying in a district about midway between the Jabbok and the Arnon. This suggests that Reuben held an enclave in the territory of Gad. See Map, in which the names of the above Reubenite cities are printed in italics. (b) Jos 13. Though this chapter comes to us from P, it is probably based on earlier sources. P knows less about the E. than about the W. tribes, and this ch. is obscure and self-contradictory; but it clearly locates Gad north of a line drawn from the north end of the Dead Sea, a little to the N. of Heshbon, and places Reuben south of the same line. This chapter is followed in the ordinary maps of Palestine.

As to the northern boundary of Gad, the statements as to the division of Gilead between Gad and E. Manasseh are contradictory; and the term Gilead was probably very elastic. The data are too obscure to determine any clear boundary between Gad and E. Manasseh, even as representing any single account. In Nu 32^{29} (P?) Moses gives the land of Gilead to Gad and Reuben; in Nu 32^{39} (JE), Dt 3^{15}, Gilead belongs to Machir ben-Manasseh; in Dt 3^{12} Moses gives half Mt. Gilead to Reuben and Gad; while in Dt 3^{16} Reuben and Gad receive 'from Gilead.' Apparently in Jg 5^{17} Gilead = Gad. In Jos $13^{25.\ 31}$ (P) G. has all the cities of Gilead, and Machir ben-Manasseh has half Gilead. In the list of Levitical cities in Jos $21^{38.\ 39}$ (P), 1 Ch $6^{80.\ 81}$, Heshbon, which is given to Reuben in Jos 13^{17}, is reckoned as belonging to Gad. Ramoth-gilead is given to Gad in Jos 20^{8} (P) $21^{38.\ 39}$ (P), Dt 4^{43}, 1 Ch $6^{80.\ 81}$. See Table, p. 78.



iv. History after the Conquest.—First we may notice the general relation of Gad to the other eastern tribes. Apparently, the strength of Reuben was broken at some early date (see Reuben), and this tribe became dependent on Gad, much as Simeon on Judah. Hence the situation in JE, in which Reuben occupies a group of cities in the territory of Gad. P's arrangement in Jos 13 is probably a conjectural restoration, after Reuben and Gad had disappeared, embodying the general idea that Reuben lay to the south of Gad. Further, P's idea in Jos of the close early confederation of Reuben and Gad with E. Manasseh is also late. It is doubtful whether the eastern settlement of Manasseh was made before Israel crossed the Jordan, or later by Manassite clans, who recrossed the river from the West (cf. MANASSEH). But, in any case, the interests of Gad and E. Manasseh were separate and often conflicting; and the contradictory statements, some of which assign Gilead to Gad, while others make Gilead a clan of Manasseh, probably indicate that at an early date Gad (with its dependent Reuben) was practically Israel east of the Jordan, and that clans of Manasseh afterwards encroached upon Gad's territory and occupied part of Gilead. According to Jg 5^{17} neither Gad nor Reuben had any share in the victory over Sisera. Gad must have been involved in the Ammonite invasion, the deliverance by Jephthah, and the quarrel with Ephraim in Jg 11. 12. 'Gileadite,' used of Jephthah and his followers, may equal 'Gadite,' or be a general term for 'E. Israelite.' The genealogies, if pressed, make Jephthah a member of E. Manasseh; Jg 12^{4} may perhaps suggest that his followers belonged to clans of Ephraim and Manasseh, which had migrated to the east of Jordan; but the verse is corrupt and obscure, cf. 11^{29}. In any case, this Ammonite war illustrates the border raids and more serious invasions to which Gad, in common with Reuben and E. Manasseh, was exposed throughout the country into twelve districts, 'which provided victuals for the king and his household.' The description of the districts is vague and obscure, but it is clear that they do not coincide with tribal territories; and it is sometimes held that this new arrangement marks the close of the old tribal system. But Gad at any rate, having by this time absorbed Reuben, stood for S.E. Palestine, and continued to do so; see below on Moabite Stone.

At the disruption Gad fell to the N. kingdom; and Penuel, apparently Jeroboam's capital (1 K 12^{25}), probably lay within its territory. Jeroboam's interest in the district would add to its prosperity, but tend to abolish distinct tribal organization, and to merge E. Palestine in the N. kingdom. Probably, as the Moabite Stone speaks of cities taken from Moab by Omri, Moab recovered its independence at or soon after the disruption. Such recovery of Moab may have been chiefly at the expense of Reuben; but Gad also must have suffered through the gains of Moab, and profited by the conquests of Omri. Elijah, and probably (G. A. Smith, Hist. Geog. p. 580) the brook Cherith, are of Gilead, i.e. probably Gad.

In the long wars between Israel and Aram, E. Palestine was the battle-ground, and the brunt history. Such a situation, Gad raided and raiding, but more than holding its own, is well described in Gn 49^{19}, the blessing of Jacob (J from older source)—

> 'Gad, the raiders shall raid him,
> But he shall raid upon their heel.'

In Jg 20. 21 (late post-ex. Midrash on earlier basis, possibly J, or J and E, see Moore and Budde, in loc.) the eastern tribes took part in the war against Benjamin; Jabesh-gilead, the only city which furnished no contingent, was sacked, and its inhabitants massacred, only the virgins being saved as wives for the Benjamites.

During the wars with the Philistines, Gad was a stronghold and refuge of the Isr. (1 S 13^{7}). After Saul's death it became the main part of Eshbaal's kingdom (2 S 2^{8}). Later on it afforded a rallying point for David's adherents during the revolt of Absalom (2 S 17^{27}). Amongst David's mighty men was Bani the Gadite (2 S 23^{36}). Apparently, Gad was still strong and intact. It would profit by the strength of Israel under David and Solomon. In 1 Ch 12^{8-15} Gadites come to David when a fugitive from Saul; and in 12^{37} Reuben, Gad, and E. Manasseh come to David at Hebron to make him king. 1 K 4^{7-19} tells us that Solomon divided the fell upon E. Manasseh. Even under Ahab the point of contact was at Ramoth-gilead. Probably E. Manasseh had practically disappeared in these wars, and Gilead again became synonymous with Gad. Gad itself also suffered (Am $1^{3.\ 13}$). About the same time Moab revolted and captured Gadite cities in the South (Moabite Stone). Gad or Gilead shared in the renewed prosperity of Israel under Jeroboam II., but shortly after, in B.C. 734, E. Palestine was carried captive by Tiglath-pileser (2 K 15^{29}), and thus Gad disappears from history.

Apparently, the territory was occupied by Ammon (Jer 49^{1}). Ezk $48^{27.\ 34}$ makes provision for Gad in the restored Israel. On the other hand, in Ob [19] the E. tribes are so completely forgotten that Gilead is promised to Benjamin. In Rev 7^{5} Gad is enumerated among the tribes of Israel.

GAD (גָּד) is entitled the seer (חֹזֶה 1 Ch 29^{29}), David's or the king's seer (1 Ch 21^{9}, 2 Ch 29^{25}, 2 S 24^{11}), or the prophet (נָבִיא, 1 S 22^{5}, 2 S 24^{11}). His activity seems to have lain chiefly in the early period of the king's life, at least it is not he but Nathan who appears prominently in that palace intrigue which resulted in the accession of Solomon (1 K 1[11ff.]). The name might suggest that he belonged to the tribe of Gad; but the only additional support for this view is found in the fact that several of David's chiefs came from that tribe (1 Ch 12[8]). As for Ewald's suggestion, that Gad drew his inspiration from the school of Samuel, while this would agree well with his appearing immediately after David's rupture with Saul (1 S 22[5]), it cannot be considered certain, so long as the existence of 'a school' of Samuel is merely a conjecture.

Gad is represented as having announced the divine condemnation on the royal census, and as having advised the erection of an altar on Araunah's threshing-floor (2 S 24[11ff.] = 1 Ch 21[9ff.]). The Chronicler again (1 Ch 29[29]) names him as having written an account of some part of his master's reign. A late conception associated him with the prophet Nathan (2 Ch 29[25]) in the task of planning some of the king's regulations with reference to the musical part of the service, while (1 S 22[5]) he is also stated to have acted as David's counsellor in peril during the period when the two dwelt together in 'the hold.' A. C. WELCH.

GAD, VALLEY OF (נַחַל הַגָּד ['torrent-valley'], AV 'river of Gad').—2 S 24[5]. Taken in connexion with Jos 13[25] this passage would indicate that the river or valley of Gad was close to Rabbath-Ammon in the land of Gad; but, on the other hand, 'the city that lieth in the valley' is mentioned in connexion with Aroer on the river Arnon (now el-Mojib), Jos 13[9. 16], Dt 2[36]. It appears to be certain that in 2 S 24[5], instead of 'and they pitched in Aroer, on the right side of the city that is in the middle of the valley of Gad' (וַיַּחֲנוּ בַעֲרוֹעֵר יְמִין הָעִיר אֲשֶׁר בְּתוֹךְ־הַנַּחַל הַגָּד), we ought to read, 'and they began from Aroer, and from the city that is in the middle of the torrent-valley, towards Gad' (וַיָּחֵלּוּ מֵעֲרוֹעֵר וּמִן הָעִיר וגו׳). This emendation, originally due to Wellhausen (Text d. B. Sam. 217), was afterwards confirmed by Luc. καὶ ἤρξαντο ἀπὸ Ἀροὴρ καὶ ἀπὸ, κ.τ.λ., and is accepted by Driver, Budde, etc. 'The city in the torrent-valley' was possibly 'Ar. See for a full discussion, both of the text and the topography, Driver, Text of Sam. 285 f., Deuteronomy, 45. C. WARREN.

GADARA, GADARENES.—The country of the Gadarenes is mentioned in the Bible only in connexion with one incident, viz. the miracle concerning the legion of demons who were allowed to enter the herd of swine (Mt 8[28], Mk 5[1], Lk 8[26]), and it is improbable that the city on the seashore mentioned in the account of that incident can be identified with the city of Gadara, which was situated at least 6 miles from the Lake of Gennesaret, and separated from it by a broad plain and the gorge of the river Hieromax. It is possible, however, that the eastern side of the lake at the spot where the miracle actually occurred, which can be located with some certainty (see GERASENES), was situated in the sub-district under the jurisdiction of Gadara. Against this view is the statement of Josephus (BJ IV. vii. 3), that Gadara was the capital of Peræa, which is not supposed to have extended farther north than the Hieromax, the territory beyond that being Gaulanitis.

It has been suggested (Wordsworth's Commentary) that the incident took place on the boundary-line of the jurisdiction of the cities of Gadara and Gergesa, and that the swine owners of these Greek cities belonged to both places. Thomson (The Land and the Book, ii. p. 36) points out that St. Matthew was from this region and personally knew the localities, and that his rendering of Gergesa is most likely to be correct; while St. Mark and St. Luke, being strangers to this part of the country, may possibly have intended by mentioning the country of the Gadarenes to point out to their distant Greek and Roman readers the general position of the place where the miracle occurred; Gergesa, or Gerasa, or Chersa, however pronounced, being small and unknown, while Gadara was a Greek city of importance, celebrated for its temples, theatres, and warm baths. See further under GERASENES.

The city of Gadara has thus no known connexion with biblical history; it was, however, a fortress of great strength, and took a leading part in the struggles between the Seleucidæ and the Ptolemies, and, from the strength of its position and its Hebrew name, it probably existed in early times, and according to the Mishna (Erubhin ix.) was fortified by Joshua. The name does not appear in history until Antiochus the Great, king of Syria, overcame Scopas, the general of the Egyptian king Ptolemy Epiphanes, at Paneas, near the fountain of the Jordan (B.C. 198), and recovered territory previously lost, including Gadara (Ant. XII. iii. 3; Polyb. v. 71). It was again taken from the Syrians by Alexander Jannæus the Hasmonæan king of the Jews, who, acting on a league of mutual defence with Cleopatra queen of Egypt, invaded Cœle-Syria and the territory adjoining and took Gadara after a siege of ten months (c. B.C. 100; Ant. XIII. xiii. 3; BJ I. iv. 2), and enslaved the inhabitants, and compelled them to receive the law of Moses as proselytes of justice (Ant. XIV. xv. 4). The defeat of Alexander Jannæus by Obidas king of the Arabians, is related to have occurred at Gadara, a village of Gilead or Golan (Ant. XIII. xiii. 5; BJ I. iv. 4), probably not the same as the fortress of Gadara.

Gadara was demolished by the Jews and rebuilt by Pompey the Great (B.C. 63) to gratify Demetrius of Gadara, who was one of his own freedmen, when he established the Roman supremacy in Phœnicia, Cœle-Syria, and Palestine; he left the inhabitants in a state of freedom and joined the city to the province of Syria (Ant. XIV. iv. 4; BJ I. vii. 7). It counted from the era of Pompey, and became the seat of one of the five councils which Gabinius, proconsul of Syria (B.C. 57–55), instituted for the government of the Jews (Ant. XIV. v. 4; BJ I. viii. 5). Augustus Cæsar added Gadara to the kingdom of Herod the Great (Ant. XV. vii. 3). The inhabitants subsequently accused Herod to Cæsar of maladministration and plunderings, but Cæsar would not hear them (Ant. XV. x. 2 and 3). On the death of Herod (B.C. 4), Gadara was transferred to the province of Syria (Ant. XVII. xi. 4; BJ II. vi. 3). On the revolt of the Jews against the Roman dominion, they ravaged the country about Gadara, and the Greek inhabitants rose up against the Jews and put the boldest of them to death and imprisoned others (BJ II. xviii. 5). Gadara was taken by Vespasian, on which occasion the inhabitants pulled down its walls to show that they wished for peace. It appears, however, to have still existed for many centuries as an important city, for bishops of Gadara are mentioned as having been present at the general councils of the Church. The style of the existing ruins indicates its having flourished during the time of the Antonines, and the coins extant extend over the period from the rebuilding by Pompey to A.D. 239. Gadara was a fortress of considerable strength (Ant. XIII. iii. 3; BJ IV. vii. 3), situated near the Hieromax (Pliny, HN 16), east of the Sea of Galilee and over-against Scythopolis and Tiberias (Euseb. Onom. s.v.). It was situated on the top of a hill, at the foot of which, at 3 miles' distance, on the bank of the Hieromax, were warm springs and baths called Amatha (Onom. s.v. 'Gadara'; Itin. Ant. Martyr.). It had a district attached called Gadaris (BJ III. iii. 1; Strabo, XVI. ii. 45). It was one of the cities of Decapolis, and is called by Josephus the capital of Peræa (BJ IV. vii. 3), though in another passage (BJ III. iii. 3) he gives the bounds of Peræa from north to south as from Pella to Machærus. It is frequently mentioned by Josephus in connexion with Cœle-Syria (Ant. XIII. xiii. 3). The main roads from Scythopolis and Tiberias to Damascus and Gerasa passed through it. Josephus calls it a Greek town (Ant. XVII. xi. 4; BJ II. vi. 3), but it is evident from the historical accounts that many Jews were living in and around the city (BJ II. xviii. 5), and it is probable that the number of Jews living around may have fluctuated from time to time and have depended on the friendly nature of the government.

The site of Gadara has been recognized at the ruins of Umm Ḳeis, which extend over the summit of a high hill, 1200 ft. above the Mediterranean, east of the Jordan on the southern side of the gorge of the Sheri'at el-Mandhûr (Jarmûk or Hieromax), about 6 miles south-east of the southern side of the Lake of Gennesaret. At the foot of the hill, about 3 miles north of Umm Ḳeis on the right or north bank of the Sheri'at, in a flat space below the cliffs, are the remains of the celebrated hot springs, baths, and buildings of Amatha, described by Eusebius, Antoninus Martyr, and Strabo. There are several hot springs along the bank of the river, but those clustered together at this spot are the most copious. The largest spring gives off more water than that of Tiberias; the temperature is 110° Fahrenheit. The water is strongly impregnated with sulphur. These springs are much resorted to by the Bedawîn for various diseases. The ruins about the baths are very extensive, giving the impression that this spot was also used as a favourite watering-place by the inhabitants of Gadara during inclement weather (Wilson, Recovery of Jerusalem).

Umm Ḳeis is situated at the extreme north-western border of the high land of Northern 'Ajlûn, and commands a magnificent view of the Sea of Tiberias, Southern Jaulân, the Jordan Valley, Galilee, and Mount Tabor. There could hardly be a second point in this part of 'Ajlûn, which combines so perfectly the advantages due to a magnificent soil and a commanding position (Northern 'Ajlûn).

The ruins of Umm Ḳeis contain the remains of a very handsome and extensive city, with buildings of great magnificence, which appear to have been overthrown by an earthquake, many of the buildings remaining as perfect in their ruin as though the shock had taken place yesterday. Josephus records an earthquake having occurred which devastated the country, B.C. 31 (Ant. XV. v. 2), and the ruins of Umm Ḳeis may be due to an earthquake equally severe at a later period. There are to be seen among the ruins two large theatres, a basilica, a temple, the main street running east and west, with colonnades, the columns lying just as they fell, and many large private buildings, the whole surrounded by a city wall with gates. There is a large reservoir, and an aqueduct brought water into the city. The columns are surmounted by Corinthian capitals. The basalt paving is in places quite perfect, and retains traces of the marks of chariot wheels. The eastern theatre is in an almost perfect state of preservation; the approach to it would have been extremely grand, passing from the main street over a great platform surrounded by columns. A very interesting feature is the large Necropolis on the east and north-east side of the town, in which there are both rock-hewn tombs and sarcophagi; the former are cut in the limestone rock without any attempt at concealment. A flight of steps leads down to a small court, from which two or three doors give access to the chambers: the doors are of stone, many of them still perfect, with stone hinges similar to those found in the Hauran. These tombs are inhabited by the present dwellers at Umm Ḳeis. Outside the town, to the east, the ancient name Gadara is still preserved in the name of the ruins, Jedûr Umm Ḳeis (Wilson, Recovery of Jerusalem; Schumacher, Northern 'Ajlûn; Macgregor, Rob Roy on the Jordan). The Christians of Nazareth were in the habit of holding a fair at Umm Ḳeis, until in recent years, the Bedawîn having overrun the country, they were obliged to desist.

GADDI (גַּדִּי 'my fortune').—The Manassite sent as one of the twelve spies, Nu 13^{11} P.

GADDIEL (גַּדִּיאֵל 'God is my fortune'*).—The Zebulunite sent as one of the twelve spies, Nu 13^{10} P.

GADDIS (Καδδίς, otherwise Γαδδίς, A; Γαδδεί, ℵ; Gaddis, Vulg.; ܓܕܝ = Gadi, Syr.; 1 Mac 2^{2}), the surname of Johanan or John, the eldest brother of Judas Maccabæus. The name perhaps represents the Heb. גַּדִּי, Gaddi (Nu 13^{11}), meaning 'my fortune.'

GADI (גָּדִי; cf. Nabatæan גדי (?גדו), Euting, No. 25; Palmyrene גדיא, de Vogüé, No. 32; Γαδδεί B, Γεδδεί, Γαλλεί A, Γαδδί Luc.).—Father of Menahem king of Israel (2 K $15^{14.\ 17}$).

C. F. BURNEY.

GADITES.—See GAD (Tribe).

GAHAM (גַּחַם).—The eponym of a Nahorite clan whose identity has not been established, Gn 22^{24}. Gaham is described as a son of Nahor by his concubine Reumah.

GAHAR (גַּחַר).—A family of Nethinim who returned with Zerub. (Ezr 2^{47}, Neh 7^{49}), called in 1 Es 5^{30} Geddur. See GENEALOGY.

GAI (גַּיְא) is given as a proper name in RV of 1 S 17^{52} 'until thou comest to Gai,' where AV has 'until thou comest to the valley.' This last, however, would demand הַגַּיְא as in v.^{3}. In any case, the valley (ravine) referred to in v.^{52} must be different from that which separated the opposing forces. See ELAH (VALLEY OF). The LXX, as is noted in RVm, has Γέθ (Gath), and this would suit the context (cf. Wellhausen, Budde, and Driver, ad loc.). Wellh. further proposes to treat Shaaraim not as a proper name, but, inserting the article (הַשַּׁעֲרַיִם), as = 'in the gateway.' That is to say, the Israelites pursued the Philistines to the gates of Ekron, and the wounded fell down in the gateway of both Gath and Ekron. An alternative, he suggests, is to view the two expressions, 'until thou comest to Gath and to the gates of Ekron,' and 'even unto Gath and unto Ekron,' as doublets due perhaps to the names of these two cities being in the former clause written indistinctly or incorrectly, in consequence of which an explanatory gloss was added on the margin and afterwards introduced into the text.

GAINSAY.—To gainsay is to speak against, as Udal, Erasmus' Paraphrase on 1 Jn 1, 'And yf we wyll say, that wee have no sinne in us, we make God a lyar, and say agaynst hym: and he that gayne sayeth hym, must needs lye'; Rhem. NT on Jn 6^{49}, 'The discontented and incredulous murmured and gainsaid it [the manna].' Wyclif has the older form agenseyen frequently, as Lk 21[15] (1380) 'I schal gyue to you mouth and wysdom, to whiche alle youre aduersaries schulen not mowe agenstonde, and agenseye.' Sometimes the meaning is rather wider and almost the same as oppose or resist generally. Thus Job 11[10] Wyc. (1382) 'If he turne vpso doun alle thingus, or in to oon drawe togidere, who shal agensein to hym?' (EV 'hinder'); and Pref. to AV 1611, 'For, was there euer any thing proiected, that sauoured any way of newnesse or renewing, but the same endured many a storme of gaine-saying, or opposition?' So in AV we have Jth 8[28] 'there is none that may gainsay thy words,' where the Gr. is ὃς ἀντιστήσεται τοῖς λόγοις σου, lit. 'withstand,' Geneva 'resist'; and Ad. Est 13[9] 'The whole world is in thy power, and if thou hast appointed to save Israel, there is no man that can gainsay thee' (ὃς ἀντιτάξεταί σοι; lit. 'range in battle against thee'; Cov. 'withstonde ner lett the'). And even when the orig. word expresses speaking against, the general sense of resist is often evident.

The verb occurs in Lk 21[15] 'I will give you a mouth and wisdom, which all your adversaries shall not be able to gainsay nor resist' (after Wyc., as above, who has the order 'agenstonde and agensaye,' as Vulg. resistere et contradicere, and as L, T, WH ἀντιστῆναι οὐδὲ [T, WH ἢ] ἀντειπεῖν, while AV follows TR ἀντειπεῖν οὐδὲ ἀντιστῆναι); 2 Es 5[29] 'they which did gainsay thy promises' (qui contradicebant sponsionibus tuis); Jth 12[14] 'Who am I now, that I should gainsay my lord?' (ἀντεροῦσα τῷ κυρίῳ μου); and 1 Mac 14[44] 'to gainsay his words' (ἀντειπεῖν τοῖς ὑπ' αὐτοῦ ῥηθησομένοις); RV 'to gainsay the words that he should speak,' i.e. resist his commands. To these instances RV adds Ac 19[33] 'Seeing then that these things cannot be gainsaid' (ἀναντιρρήτων [WH ἀναντιρήτων] οὖν ὄντων τούτων, the only occurrence of this adj., though the adv. occurs Ac 10[29], as below; AV 'spoken against'); Tit 2[9] 'not gainsaying' (μὴ ἀντιλέγοντας, AV 'not answering again,' AVm 'gainsaying').

The adj. is found in Ro 10[21] 'a disobedient and gainsaying people' (ἀντιλέγοντα). The subst. occurs in Ac 10[29] 'Therefore came I unto you without gainsaying' (ἀναντιρρήτως [WH ἀναντιρήτως]); Jude [11] 'and perished in the gainsaying of Core' (καὶ τῇ ἀντιλογίᾳ τοῦ Κορὲ ἀπώλοντο; cf. LXX ὕδωρ ἀντιλογίας = Heb. מֵי מְרִיבָה = Eng. 'water of Meribah' of Nu 20[13]); to which RV adds He 12[3] 'For consider him that hath endured such gainsaying (AV 'contradiction') of sinners against himself' (ἀντιλογίαν, which in the other two occurrences, He 6[16] 7[7], RV tr. 'dispute'). The personal subst. 'gainsayer' is found Tit 1[9] 'to convince (RV 'convict') the gainsayers' (τοὺς ἀντιλέγοντας ἐλέγχειν; Wyc. [1380] 'to reproue hem that agen seyn' [1388 'agenseien'], but in Prefatory Epistles of St. Jerome, ch. iii. [1388] Wyc. has 'He comaundide also to Tite, among othere vertues of a bishop . . . to withstonde agenseyeris'). J. HASTINGS.

GAIUS (Γάϊος).—The person to whom the Third Ep. of St. John is addressed. He is spoken of in terms of affection and respect as 'beloved' (vv.[1. 2. 5. 11]), walking 'in the truth' (v.[3]), acting well to brethren and to strangers (v.[5]). But beyond this we know nothing of him. Some have thought to identify him with a Caius who is mentioned in the Apostolic Constitutions (vii. 46) as having been appointed bishop of Pergamum by John. Others have attempted to identify him with one or other of the men who bear the same name in the NT—the G. of Macedonia (Ac 19[29]), the G. of Derbe (Ac 20[4]), the G. of Corinth (1 Co 1[14], Ro 16[23]). But these are all associated with the Apostle Paul, and there is nothing in the Epistle itself or elsewhere to help us to an identification. S. D. F. SALMOND.

GALAL (גָּלָל).—The name of two Levites, 1 Ch 9[15. 16], Neh 11[17]. See GENEALOGY.

GALATIA (Γαλατία) is understood by different scholars as the name of two distinct countries; and, as the important associated questions are still under discussion, it is necessary to treat the term under two headings, and describe the history and geography of the two different countries which the term is said to denote. The fundamental question is this: Are the Churches of G., to which St. Paul addressed an Epistle, certain congregations in the northern part of the great inner plateau of Asia Minor variously enumerated by different advocates of 'the North-Galatian Theory,' or are they the congregations of Pisidian Antioch, Iconium, Derbe, and Lystra, in the southern part of the plateau, according to 'the South-Galatian Theory'? Each of the related terms Galatians and Region of Galatia in like manner demands double treatment. St. Paul mentions the Churches of G. in Gal 1[2], 1 Co 16[1]; and they are addressed with others in 1 P 1[1]. Finally, there is a doubt whether in 2 Ti 4[10] Galatia or Gallia should be read, and, if Galatia is read, whether it does not denote Gaul (the modern France).

While the opinions fall into two classes on the crucial question, there are varieties in each class. The South-Galatian theory is held both by those who can see no good reason to think that St. Paul ever was in North Galatia, and by those who consider that he travelled in North Galatia but made no important foundation there. The latter view is held by Zahn (Einleitung in das Neue Testament). The North-Galatian theory in its common form maintains that the Epistle was addressed to the Churches of Ancyra, Tavium, Pessinus, and possibly other cities; but the most vigorous argument that St. Paul never was in Ancyra or Tavium is urged by Zöckler (SK, 1895, p. 79 f.),* who, approximating to Zahn's view, holds that St. Paul travelled little in Galatia, only in the extreme western and south-western parts, ib. p. 59 ff., but maintains, unlike Zahn, that he founded several Churches in that obscure district and addressed his Epistle to them. Salmon (Introduction to NT, and arts. in Smith, DB) seems to come very close to Zöckler's view,† though he translates the critical passage in Ac 16[6] in quite a different way (GALATIA, REGION OF). But these minor differences are comparatively unimportant, relating to points of translation and antiquarian research;‡ it is only the crucial question that is of fundamental consequence: To what group of Churches did St. Paul write his Epistle?

I. GALATIA PROPER, as used in the popular and ordinary Greek way (Roman Gallogræcia), was the name applied to a large tract of country in the interior of Asia Minor, after it was taken possession of in the 3rd cent. B.C. by certain warrior tribes who had migrated from Gaul towards the east. Irruptions of Gallic tribes into the eastern parts of Europe are first recorded in B.C. 281, when a small army under Cambaules attacked Thrace. In the following year (280) three large Gallic armies

* So Findlay in Expository Times, vii. (1896) p. 236. Zöckler takes Chase for the originator of this view; but the latter informs me that this is a misunderstanding of his words, and that he does not hold the view.

† 'St. Luke's narrative does not warrant us to conclude with any certainty that St. Paul made any prolonged stay in Galatia Proper, or did much work in founding Churches there' (Smith, DB[2] i. 1105).

‡ Sometimes agreement in construction and translation results in total disagreement as to interpretation (GALATIA, REGION OF).

advanced—one under Cerethrius against Thrace, a second under Brennus* and Acichorius against Paeonia, the third under Belgius against Macedonia and Illyria. The young king of Macedonia, Ptolemy Ceraunus, was defeated and slain when he rashly gave battle with a small army. In 279 Brennus and other chiefs marched south into Greece; but a quarrel arose on the way, and two chiefs, Leonnorius and Lutarius, led away 20,000 Gauls into Thrace. Brennus' attempt was unsuccessful, and his army seems to have scattered in its retreat; and part of it probably joined the Gauls who had invaded Thrace. Many of the invaders of Thrace went on into Asia, Lutarius crossing the Hellespont in some Macedonian ships which he seized; Leonnorius crossing the Bosphorus at the invitation of Nikomedes, king of Bithynia, who wanted aid in his wars: the date of these events, so calamitous for Asia, was 278–277.

No certainty is attainable as to the exact events and dates that followed. The Gauls ranged through most of western and central Asia Minor, a terror to all the inhabitants, plundering, slaying, burning. Antiochus I., king of Syria A.D. 281–261, was the first to offer any serious resistance; from his victories he is said to have gained his title Soter (saviour); but his success was far from complete. During the uncertain wars of the following years, the Gauls were often hired as mercenaries by the contending kings and generals, usually by the weaker against the stronger. 'Alternately the scourge and the allies of each Asiatic prince in succession, as passion or interest dictated, they for a time indulged their predatory instincts unchecked' (Lightfoot).

But Attalus I., king of Pergamos B.C. 241–197, checked their power in a series of campaigns about B.C. 232, and confined them to a certain fixed country (previously part of Phrygia and of Cappadocia or even of Paphlagonia), which was called henceforth Galatia. They had, however, probably occupied parts of that country long before,† finding it more open to actual settlement than the districts where many strong cities existed; and the result of Attalus' operations was to circumscribe their territory, and to fix definite limits.

In the sketch which Strabo (p. 567) gives of the Galatian constitution, he records the interesting fact that each tribe was divided into four cantons or tetrarchies, an old Gaulish custom mentioned among the Helvetii by Julius Cæsar.‡ Originally each tetrarchy had a chief or tetrarch;§ and there was a common council of 300 meeting in a grove called Drynemeton (Perrot thinks that it was situated near Assarli-Kaya, about 7 hours S.W. from Ancyra),‖ and judging all cases of murder. This old system had wholly disappeared before the time of Strabo; the monarchy of Deiotarus and of Amyntas (44–25 B.C.) had destroyed the last traces of the original Gallic constitution, and the Roman provincial organization was hostile to it. Even in early time, when war broke out, a single chief seems to have been chosen in each tribe (Livy, xxxviii. 19).

The defeat of the Gauls by a Roman army in B.C. 189 (Livy, xxxviii. 18 ff., who uses Polybius as his authority) broke their strength. They were placed between three powers, Pontus, Cappadocia, and Pergamos, and were pressed on by all. They were worsted by Ariarathes, king of Cappadocia, about 164; and they seem to have fallen under the influence of the Pontic kings in the latter part of the 2nd century, for Phrygia was given by Rome to Mithridates IV. in 129, and he could not well rule over Phrygia if divided from it by the great independent country of Galatia (Van Gelder, p. 277).* The Mithridatic wars set free the Gauls from this yoke; and their eagerness to aid the Roman arms against Pontus exposed them to a massacre ordered by Mithridates in 86. In 64, after the war was ended, Pompey appointed or recognized three tetrarchs,† Castor probably among the Tektosages, Brogitarus of the Trokmi, and Deiotarus of the Tolistobogii: Deiotarus also received Armenia Minor with part of Pontus, and, being much the most powerful, gradually made himself master of the Tektosages and Trokmi, and, finally, as the climax of a career of successful treachery and murder, he was recognized as king of Galatia by the Romans. He died at an advanced age in 40 B.C. His kingdom was given by Antony to the younger Castor, along with inner Paphlagonia, which Pompey in 64 had assigned to Attalus (Dion, xlviii. 33). Castor soon died; and in 36 Antony gave Galatia to Amyntas, and Paphlagonia to Deiotarus Philadelphus, son of Castor (probably the elder), who reigned till B.C. 5, when his kingdom was incorporated in the province Galatia (see II.).‡

According to our authorities, the Gauls entered Asia as an army, not separately in distinct tribes; but afterwards they appear as divided into three tribes, who arrogated to themselves three distinct districts, the Trokmi claiming the Hellespontine coast, the Tolistobogii Aeolis and Ionia, i.e. the Ægean coastlands, and the Tektosages the lands of the interior (Livy, xxxviii. 16, where note the word postremo). This tribal classification persisted throughout later history, proving that either the original army was formed mainly from these three tribes, or that three successive swarms, each mainly recruited from one tribe, entered Asia Minor. It seems, however, to be certain that contingents from a number of different tribes swelled the armies that invaded Greece, Thrace, and Asia: similarly, in Gaul certain great tribes, e.g. the Aedui, had smaller tribes as dependants or clients (Cæsar, Bell. Gall. vii. 75, iv. 6). From the ancient arrangement it would appear that the Tektosages were the first to seize Galatia, and that when the bounds were drawn by Attalus I. the Tektosages were forced into the centre and north of Galatia, with Ancyra as capital, the Trokmi were concentrated round Tavium on the east, and the Tolistobogii round Pessinus on the west. In this position we find the tribes in all later time.

The boundaries of the country called Galatia varied greatly at different periods. Thus the chief centre of a people Troknades, at the modern village Kaimaz (between Eski-Sheher and Sivri-Hissar, on the ancient road from Dorylaion to Pessinus), was part of the Roman province Asia (CIL iii. No. 6997); and yet the name Troknades is undoubtedly Gallic, so that the place must have been at an earlier time included in the territory of the Galatæ. That is perhaps the most westerly point to which the territory owned by the settled Gauls ever extended; and both it and even Orkistos, which lies farther east, were probably taken from the Galatian state by Attalus I.,§

* Brennus is perhaps a title, not a personal name.

† Perhaps by permission of the Pontic kings (Meyer).

‡ Bell. Gall. i. 12; see Mommsen in Hermes, 1884, p. 316.

§ Hence the title tetrarch was wrongly given to the three chiefs nominated by Pompey in B.C. 64.

‖ Dry-, intensive prefix (Holder), not (with Perrot) 'oak.'

* Phrygia Magna was given to Mithridates II. (Justin, 38. 6) about B.C. 240; but it then included the country which soon after became Galatia. Moreover, the gift was perhaps a mere Pontic claim, never realized in fact.

§ It was perhaps at this time that Orkistos was placed under the control of Nakoleia (CIL iii. No. 7000); the Pergamenian system was favourable to the growth of powerful cities exerting authority over a large territory.

and passed along with the rest of the Pergamenian kingdom into the hands of the Romans (see ASIA). In late Roman time, probably when the province G. Secunda was created about 390, the name was extended so far to the west as to include the old Phrygian city Amorium, which was after this called a metropolis of Galatia (so Hierocles and most Notitiæ Episc.).*

On the north the dividing line between Galatia to the south and Bithynia and Paphlagonia to the north is indeterminable. Close to the north-western corner lay the city Juliopolis, which was in the 1st and 2nd centuries a Bithynian city † (Pliny, Epist. ad Traj. 77; Ptolemy, v. 1), but about A.D. 297 was made a city of Galatia. Near the north-eastern corner lay Gangra (Tchangri) and Andrapa (probably Iskelib), which were Paphlagonian cities, and Eukhaita (probably Tchorum), a Pontic city, famous for the worship of St. Theodorus Stratiotes.

On the east and south-east the dividing line between Galatia on the one hand, and Pontus and Cappadocia on the other hand, was also a varying one, running east of Tavium (Nefez-Keui), capital of the Galatian tribe Trokmi, and west of the Pontic city Sebastopolis-Heracleopolis (Sulu-Serai). It is mentioned by Polybius that a certain territory, long disputed between the Gauls and the Cappadocian kings, passed definitely into the possession of Ariarathes about B.C. 164. Basilika Therma (Terzili-Hammam) was well within Cappadocian territory in later time, and the disputed territory perhaps extended from it to the Halys or even as far as Lake Tatta. In the 4th century after Christ, the frontier between Galatia and Cappadocia lay between the Galatian Galea (a village subject to Aspona) and the Cappadocian Andrapa (subject to Parnassos).

The southern limit was, doubtless, always quite vague, running across the level, treeless, sparsely populated plain of the Axylon, south of Amorium, north of Laodiceia-Katakekaumene, and touching or intersecting the large, shallow salt lake Tatta. The limit between Lycaonia on the south and Galatia on the north was probably never fixed very narrowly in this valueless plain; and, moreover, we know that certain large districts were sometimes held by the Gauls, and sometimes separated from their country. A considerable tract of country lying along the west side of Lake Tatta, and stretching west towards Amorium and Laodiceia, is assigned by Ptolemy to Galatia under the name Proseilemmene, i.e. προσειλημμένη (χώρα), the 'Added Territory.' The date when this territory was added to G. is uncertain. The opinion has been expressed doubtfully that it was separated from Lycaonia by Antoninus Pius (or possibly Hadrian) when the triple eparchy, Cilicia-Lycaonia-Isauria, was constituted a Roman province (Ramsay, Histor. Geogr. of As. Min. pp. 251, 377); but that event seems not sufficiently important to have given a new name to the country, and the analogy of the similar name Epiktetos, i.e. ἐπίκτητος Φρυγία, the 'Acquired Phrygia,' suggests that the transference of territory took place as a permanent and real change of rule at a much earlier period. Now, according to Pliny (Nat. Hist. v. 95), the part of Lycaonia that adjoined Galatia was given to it as a tetrarchy. This Lycaonian tetrarchy was certainly close to Ptolemy's Proseilemmene, and probably another name for it. Pliny says that the tetrarchy contained 14 cities, with Iconium as capital, and distinguishes it from Lycaonia Proper (ipsa Lycaonia), which extended along the front of Mt. Taurus. Ptolemy, indeed, does not make Proseilemmene extend so far west as Iconium; but he is incorrect about the extent of all the divisions of this whole region. Lycaonia as a whole had been added to the Pergamenian kingdom by Rome in B.C. 190; but the kings were not strong enough to hold this distant territory, and part of it was probably taken by the Gauls about 160; and this part afterwards passed under the power of the Pontic kings along with Galatia. Hence Eumachus, Mithridates' general, who conquered Pisidia, Isauria, and parts of Cilicia, evidently used Lycaonia as his basis of operations. Another possibility is that the part of Lycaonia held by Amyntas (see II.) was styled by him the Tetrarchy; but that is, for several reasons, less probable. Amyntas' part of Lycaonia, however, must have been nearly the same in extent as the Tetrarchy. In any case, the name Tetrarchy must have originated before the Roman provincial organization was instituted; and thus Iconium had an old connexion with Galatia (Studia Biblica, iv. p. 46 ff.).

As to the relation between the immigrant Gauls and the older Phrygian inhabitants in Galatia, evidence fails; but the analogy of similar conquests and the general facts of this case warrant some probable conclusions. It is not to be supposed that the older population was exterminated or expelled. The Gaulish invaders were few. The total number that first entered Asia under Leonnorius and Lutarius is stated as 20,000, of whom only half were fighting men; the rest were women and children (Livy, xxxviii. 16, borrowing from Polybius). Doubtless, other swarms followed, encouraged by the success of the first; but that was the main army. In the continual wars and marches and raids of the following 46 years, the number of deaths was probably larger than the number of births; and the total Gallic population that was settled in Galatia, when its bounds were fixed by Attalus about 232, cannot have been numerous. In a country nearly 200 miles long, such a population must have been merely a small dominant caste amidst a much larger subject population; and Van Gelder expresses the general opinion of historical investigators, that the Gallic invaders did not live in cities, or become agriculturists, but employed the natives as cultivators of the land, on condition of paying to the Gauls as lords of the soil a proportion of the produce, while the conquerors occupied themselves in war and in pasturage, taking according to the usual practice one-third of the land, and leaving two-thirds to the older population (Cæsar, Bell. Gall. i. 31). As Lightfoot, in his edition of the Epistle, p. 9, rightly declares, the population consisted of Phrygians, Gauls, and Greeks, to whom were afterwards added a considerable sprinkling of Romans and a smaller number of Jews; and Van Gelder rightly points out that the cities were mainly populated by the Phrygians, who practised the arts of peace and conducted all trade, while the Gallic chiefs dwelt in their fortified villages (φρούρια, castella), keeping up a rude barbaric magnificence, and the mass of the Gauls led a pastoral and half-nomadic life when they were not engaged in war. As late as B.C. 189 the priests of the temple of Pessinus were opposed to the Gauls, and welcomed the Roman army of Manlius as deliverers; but that would hardly have been possible, unless the city had been really Phrygian and not Gaulish.* Van Gelder,

* Marquardt, Röm. Staatsalt. i. p. 359, errs in counting Amorium, Aizanoi, and Orkistos as cities of Galatia in the Roman period.

† Wrongly mentioned as perhaps the seat of one of the Churches of Galatia by many scholars

* Körte (Athenische Mittheilungen des Inst. 1897, pp. 16 and 39) shows that Pessinus was not conquered by the Gauls till some year between 189 and 164; and he publishes an inscription of about A.D. 80–90, which shows that of the ten leading priests at Pessinus five were Gauls and five belonged to the original

p. 183, says of such cities as Tavium, Pessinus, Ancyra, 'those cities were in Galatia, but were not Galatian cities; they preserved Phrygian character and Phrygian customs, now affected with a Grecian tinge.' All Jews, Greeks, and resident Romans would certainly be dwellers in the cities. In the governing cities, Ancyra, Tavium, Pessinus, a number of Gaulish families doubtless settled, and formed an aristocracy. Ancyra and Tavium, especially, were Gaulish strongholds from 250 onwards (Manlius occupied Ancyra in 189); but Pessinus was more purely Phrygian. But, even in Ancyra, indubitably, the mass of the lower and trading classes was Phrygian or Greek.

In B.C. 189 the Galatian tribes are pictured by Polybius and Livy as barbarians, devoid of any trace of Greek culture, fighting naked, without order or tactics, armed with swords and large wooden or wicker shields; and their pastoral life, remote from cities and intercourse, long preserved their native customs. As the military power and the vigour of the Gaulish conquerors declined in the 2nd and 1st centuries B.C., they perhaps began to mix more freely with the older population; and the opinion has been expressed that they even adopted the native religion, on the ground that certain Gallic names occur at the great native sanctuaries, implying that Gallic families began to hold priesthoods: in the 2nd century the high priest of Pessinus, bearing the holy official Phrygian title Atis, had a brother Aiorix, and in the 1st century Brogitarus was priest at Pessinus, while Dyteutus, son of Adiatorix, was priest at Comana Pontica under Augustus. But although some Gaulish nobles assumed the place and swayed the enormous power that lay in the hands of the priest-kings of the great native temples,* it does not follow that the mass of the Gaulish people adopted the Phrygian religion.

Further, it has even been asserted by some recent scholars that the Gauls adopted to a large extent the manners and customs of the Græco-Phrygian population, retaining not very much of their Gallic ways and habits in the 1st century after Christ; but this opinion seems contrary to the evidence, and against natural probability.† The Gauls, though readily civilizable, have not been quick to throw off national character and put on foreign characteristics. Moreover, they seem to have long retained the Gallic language, for Strabo mentions that all three tribes spoke the same language and had the same manners; and so late as the 4th century after Christ, Jerome declares that they were bilingual, speaking Greek and a dialect like that used by the Treveri in Gaul (though changes had occurred).‡ Now, it is difficult to believe that a small caste amid a larger population could have adopted entirely the religion and customs of the surrounding population and yet retained their separate language. The first step in Hellenization was always the adoption of the Greek language. Moreover, Strabo, in speaking of their uniformity of character, evidently does not mean that they had all adopted the Græco-Phrygian manners and ways, but distinctly implies that there was a common Gallic character among the various tribes. The ambition of their chiefs, who found that the shortest way to power lay in adopting the civilized methods of Greece and Rome, probably caused the first steps in change to be made. The chiefs connected themselves with the powerful priesthood, became priests themselves, and gradually the freer old Gaulish system was replaced by the tyranny of kings. The general opinion among those scholars who hold the North-Galatian theory seems to be right, that these Gauls, even in A.D. 50, retained much of the Gallic character; and they vainly seek to support that theory by finding Gallic characteristics in the congregations to which St. Paul wrote his Epistle. When Livy (xxxvii. 8) speaks of exoleta stirpe gentis, as the fact of his own time, he refers to the decay of their warlike character rather than to any change of manners and customs.* Lightfoot (p. 12) rightly says, 'the tough vitality of the Celtic character maintained itself comparatively unimpaired.'

No trace remains in local inscriptions (chiefly A.D. 100–250) of Gallic manners or language, and little of Gallic names; but that does not prove that the Gallic manners and language had been lost. A Gaul who received any education learned Greek; and all who wrote, wrote in Greek. The Gaulish language was a proof of barbarism, and a reason for shame (whence the contempt for Galatians which appears in the Cappadocian Fathers, see Ramsay, Historical Geography, p. 288); no one would blazon his want of education to the world, and it may be doubted whether any one could write who spoke only Gaulish. Moreover, the inscriptions almost all belong to the great cities, which were civilized seats of Græco-Roman culture, inhabited by Greeks, Romans, Phrygians, Jews, and Romanized Gauls (the latter forming a small aristocracy). Ancyra was quite a Romanized city, civilized and rich; and Pessinus was so in a less degree. The native languages of Asia Minor, Phrygian, Lycaonian, etc., persisted through the Roman period, until destroyed by the language of the NT, but no traces of them remain in inscriptions (except a few execrations on tombs in the Phrygian language).

In the time of St. Paul, therefore, there was probably a great and marked difference between the rustic Gaulish population of Galatia, who retained much of the old ruder barbarian character, and were probably little affected by Greek manners or language,† and the population of the cities, who spoke Greek, and the majority of whom were not of Gaulish origin.‡ But, while continuing Gauls in feeling, the Galatian tribes in A.D. 50 must have been to some extent affected in habits and standard of life during three centuries spent as a conquering caste amid more civilized peoples. The chief point to notice is that they were an aristocracy among inferiors; and the effect produced by that long experience on a race always proud, free, and bold, must be estimated.

It is not justifiable in any case to select one or two of the long list of vices in Gal 5^{19-21}, and quote some passage in which a similar fault is charged against Gauls; the list in these verses is chargeable against human nature, not specially against Gaulish nature. In $6^{6,7}$ niggardliness is a characteristic of the Galatians, and in 1^{6} they change their religion quickly. It may be doubted whether either fact was characteristic of the Gauls; though fickle in some respects, they never were quick to change their religion, but rather the con-priestly families (Woch. f. klass. Phil. 1898, p. 3); the arrangement was probably made B.C. 189–164. Gordium, a great emporium in 189, must have been Phrygian; later, it was conquered by Gauls, and disappeared from history.

* On the priestly power see Hennig, As. Min. Reges Sacerdotes; Ramsay, Cities and Bishoprics, i. pp. 10 f., 101 f., 130 ff., 292 ff.

† The name Gallogræcia is appealed to as evidence of the Hellenization of the Gauls; but this name is Roman in origin, and had no such implication among its originators.

‡ Mommsen (Röm. Gesch. v. p. 92) accepts the testimony of Jerome, which Perrot and Van Gelder try to discredit.

* The speech of Manlius, xxxviii. 17, is apparently Livy's free invention, and contains a similar sentiment.

† Similarly, Mommsen (Röm. Gesch. v. 92) shows that in Gaul the Gallic language continued in common use at least as late as the 4th century.

‡ Salmon fully recognizes that the Christians of the North-Galatian Churches were not as a rule the Gauls, but the Phrygians; and that the attempt to find Celtic characteristics in those whom St. Paul addresses is a failure (Smith, *DB*² i. p. 1106).

trary ;* greedy to seek money they were said to be, but at the same time the fault to which they tend is to be too apt to spend even to ostentation. The further quality, that the Galatians are 'a superstitious people given to ritual observances,' was peculiarly characteristic of the type of religion widely spread over Asia Minor, with its great seats at places like Pessinus, Pisidian Antioch, Comana, Ephesus, etc. We may say that the characteristics of the Galatian congregations are those of the general native population of Asia Minor, and not those of the Gauls.

After the Roman imperial centre was transferred first to Nikomedia, and afterwards to Constantinople, the Hellenization of Galatia proceeded much more rapidly, for the north side of the plateau then rapidly advanced in civilization and importance (Ramsay, Histor. Geogr. pp. 74, 197 ff.), while the south side, which had previously lain on the line of the greatest routes, declined. Christianity spread the knowledge of Greek in the 4th cent. ; and hence we find expressions like that of Themistius (p. 360), that Galatia is almost wholly Greek. That, however, is a rhetorician's phrase ; Jerome and the contempt expressed by Basil and Gregory show that it is probably exaggerated ; but, even if it be near the truth, it must not be applied to the 1st cent.

Galatia Proper, as it was in the 1st or 2nd cent., was a rough oval in shape, extending about 200 miles in length (east to west), and 100 miles in breadth at the most. It is probably the most monotonous and least picturesque country of Asia Minor, so far as it is known ; but its north-eastern and eastern and southern parts are hardly explored. The climate is severe in the long winter ; and the want of trees over great part of the district (especially near the lines of road, except part of that leading to Constantinople) makes the heat of summer great. There is a considerable extent of fertile soil (with much more pasture land, and barren undulating hilly ground) producing grain, fruits, cotton, tobacco, opium, etc. ; but, owing to difficulties in transport, the only important products for commerce are wool and mohair (the fleece of the beautiful Angora goat). In the Byzantine period, after being ravaged by Persians and Arabs, Ancyra with Galatia in general (west of the Halys) passed into the hands of the Seljuk Turks, was held by the Latins for a short time, taken by Tartars, and finally captured in 1354 by the Turks under Suleiman.

The earliest reference to Christianity in North Galatia is at Ancyra, where the local church (ἡ κατὰ τόπον ἐκκλησία, cf. Ramsay, Cities and Bishoprics of Phr. i. p. 272 f. No. 192) is mentioned about A.D. 192 in an anti-Montanist treatise as having been affected by Montanism and saved by the writer (Euseb. HE v. 16). Many martyrs suffered there under Diocletian, some of whom may have been brought from other parts of Galatia for trial at the capital ; the dates are not recorded, and only the names of most are known, but probably all may be placed in the great persecution (Clemens, Donatus, Papias, etc., 23rd Jan. ; Theodotus, etc., 18th May ; Plato, etc., 22nd July ; Gaianus, Julianus, Rufinus, etc., 31st Aug. ; Marcellus, Silvanus, Gaianus, etc., 4th Sept. ; Seleucus, Valerius, etc., 15th Sept. ; Eusebius episcopus, 16th Sept. ; children, 23rd Sept. ; Theodorus episc., 3rd Nov. or 6th Apr. ; Eutychus, Domitianus, 28th Dec.). Any other early Churches in North Galatia have been overwhelmed in oblivion, and hardly a trace of them survives. At Juliopolis, the martyrs Plato (22nd July, see above), Heuretos, and Gemellus were venerated in the 6th cent., but their connexion is uncertain.* At the Ancyran Council (A.D. 314) a full muster of Galatian bishops might be expected, but only Ancyra and Juliopolis were represented. The following bishoprics also can be traced in the 4th cent. : Kinna, 325 ; Tavium, 325 ; Aspona, 344 ; Pessinus, 403.† But in the 5th cent. there come into our knowledge Mnizos, 451 ; Orkistos, 431 ‡ ; Petenissos, 451 ; Eudoxias, 451 ; Amorion, 431 ; Myrikion, 451 ; and in the 6th or later, Verinopolis, 680 ; Kaloumne, 879 ; Klaneos, 680 ; Germa, 553. We cannot conclude with certainty that a bishopric did not exist in the 4th cent., though it was not represented at the early Councils ; but, remembering that Galatia was situated so conveniently for the early Councils of Ancyra, Nicæa, and Constantinople, we must see in this list, when compared with those of the more distant Byzantine provinces Lycaonia and Pisidia, a proof that Galatia was late in taking its proper rank in the Christian world. Ancyra and the road to Constantinople are the early home of Galatian Christianity ; and from thence it spreads. Above all, it is clear that western and south-western Galatia (where Zöckler and Salmon place the Pauline Churches, and where Zahn, etc., believe that St. Paul preached) are latest of all in being thoroughly christianized, Germa, Klaneos, Myrikion, Eudoxias, Petenissos (only Pessinus, Orkistos, and Troknades [the latter two in Roman Asia] can be traced to the 4th cent.). The inference drawn from the bishops' lists is confirmed by epigraphic evidence, which points to the conclusion that (except in Pessinus, where 4th cent. Christian inscriptions occur) Christianity was late in taking root in south-western Galatia (Zeitschr. f. vergl. Sprachf. 1887, p. 383). There are a considerable number of Christian inscriptions in Tavium and other parts of East Galatia ; but all are of late date.

The Galatian Jews have left few memorials. A rather bold speculation (Ramsay, Cities and Bishoprics of Phr. i. pp. 648 ff., 673) assigns Jewish origin to some noble families of Ancyra ; and a report is spread that a highly important Jewish inscription has been found there, but it is not yet published. Jewish names occur in several late inscriptions, probably of Jewish Christians, e.g. at Pessinus, Matatas (according to Lightfoot, p. 11, but the text is untrustworthy, CIG 4088) ; at Eudoxias (Yürme), Jacob the deacon [δ]ειάκωνος and Esther ; at Tavium, Daniel, etc. CIG 4129, which is Jewish, is wrongly assigned to Galatia by Schürer (Jüd. Volk, i. p. 690), Franz, etc. ; it belongs to Asia, being found near Dorylaion. The decree of Augustus, quoted as giving special privileges to Jews at Ancyra by Lightfoot, Schürer, and many others, depends on an error ; it was addressed to the Koinon of Asia (Studia Biblica, iv. p. 41 f.). The Jews settled in the Seleucid colonies of Phrygia (GALATIA II.) spread gradually to the great cities of Galatia Proper.

II. GALATIA PROVINCIA is a complicated subject, and the mass of details is unintelligible, unless we observe the force which guided all the changes, viz. the Roman frontier policy, which sought to educate barbarous tribes up to the Roman standard by a gradual process, first placing them under a dependent and allied king, who could control them

* They were proverbially credulous of reports or of anything that flattered their vanity ; see Cæsar, Bell. Gall. iv. 5 ; Martial, v. 1, 10.

* On 15th April, martyrs in Taudia Galaciæ probably belong to Gallæcia. A martyr, Dikasios of Tavium, of unknown date, is mentioned ; a Dikasios was bishop there in 325.

† Lagania is added by Le Quien ; but Erechtius, the bishop in question, was more probably of Egdaumana or Glavama, a Lycaonian see on the Galatian frontier, as appears from the forms Damanitanus, Gadanitanus, Gatmaneas, Planathon, etc.

‡ Orkistos in A.D. 331 claimed to be wholly Christian in a petition to Constantine, CIL iii. 7000 : it was at that time subject to Nakoleia in Asia, and could not therefore be a bishopric. Amorion, Orkistos, and Troknades were joined to Galatia about 386–395, Hist. Geogr. As. Min. p. 221.

by his presence and armies (Strab. p. 671), and then receiving them into the Empire as they became civilized and orderly. During the 1st cent. A.D. the province G. embodied the Roman spirit in central Asia Minor, as opposed to the native kingdoms bordering on it; and the history of G. Provincia is the history of Roman policy in its advance towards the Euphrates frontier—a long slow process, in which the Roman genius undoubtedly was exerted to the utmost to influence and impress, to educate and discipline, the population of the various countries taken into the province Galatia (see also GALATIANS).

The South-Galatian theory, then, takes the foundation of the Galatian Churches as an episode in the political and social history of the province; and inasmuch as several questions in Acts turn on the exact boundaries of the province, it is necessary to be minute and accurate as regards its growth (which is nowhere described fully).

Amyntas, formerly a secretary of Deiotarus, was made king of Pisidia by Antony in 39, at the same time as Darius, grandson of Mithridates, was granted the kingdom of Pontus, and Polemon (son of Zenon, the rhetor of Laodiceia) that of a part of Cilicia (i.e. either Ketis, or more probably the whole of Cilicia Tracheiotis). All were dependent on Rome, and paid tribute (Appian, Bell. Civ. v. 75). Amyntas' kingdom included Apollonia and Antioch (a district which had been set free by Rome in B.C. 190, Strab. pp. 569, 577).

In the interval between 39 and 36 Darius died or was disgraced. Polemon was his successor, and in 36, as king of Pontus, accompanied Antony to the Parthian war; and as a reward for his services therein Armenia Minor was added to his kingdom in 35 (Dion Cass. xlix. 33; cf. Plutarch, Ant. 38). Polemon lost his Cilician kingdom early in 36, and probably Pontus was given him in compensation.* Antony, returning from Tarentum, gave all Tracheiotis except Seleukeia to Cleopatra (Strab. pp. 671, 669) as part of a great Asiatic kingdom;† and a Cleopatran era was instituted, of which the year 1 ended 31st Aug. B.C. 36 (Porphyrius, ap. Müller, Fragm. Hist. Græc. iii. 724).

In 36 Amyntas received from Antony a large accession of territory, viz. Galatia Proper with parts of Lycaonia and Pamphylia (Dion Cass. xlix. 32). His kingdom included most of the great plains between Lake Tatta and Taurus (Strab. p. 568). The gift of part of Lycaonia was evidently intended to make his territory continuous, so that the Galatian portion should not be divided from the Pisidian portion by alien territory. Iconium, therefore, was necessarily included in it, as otherwise continuity could hardly be attained.‡

Amyntas and Polemon supported Antony at Actium, B.C. 31, but were confirmed in their kingdoms by Augustus in 30. Amyntas received Tracheiotis in addition, including Isaura (Strab. p. 569), and he was permitted freely to enlarge his kingdom out of non-Roman territory. Part of Lycaonia, including Derbe and Laranda, had been seized by Antipater, once a friend of Cicero (ad Fam. xiii. 73); this was conquered by Amyntas (Strab. p. 569), but he soon afterwards perished, in B.C. 25, in attempting to reduce the Homonades, a people on the borders of Lycaonia, Pisidia, and Isauria (in the country south and east of Bey-Sheher lake).

The kingdom of Amyntas passed with his whole property to the Romans, and a new Roman province was constituted, called Galatia, doubtless because Amyntas had been since 36 currently known to the Romans as king of Galatia (compare ASIA). The sudden death of Amyntas caused great confusion; months must have elapsed before news reached Rome, and instructions came back after deliberation. Lollius was named as first governor of Galatia Provincia. He needed an army to carry out the change. Thus time elapsed, and only in B.C. 20 was the question of frontier and bounds settled. Pamphylia was apparently not included in the new province, though sometimes the old attachment remained (Tacitus, Hist. ii. 9). Tracheiotis was given to Archelaos, king of Cappadocia, being tacked on to Eastern Lycaonia (i.e. Kybistra, etc.)* as an eleventh or 'added' Strategia of Cappadocia (ἑνδεκάτη or ἐπίκτητος, Strab. pp. 535, 537; cf. Appian, Bell. Mithr. 105, 114). Strabo (p. 671) says emphatically that the same extent of Cilicia Tracheiotis was ruled by Archelaos as had been held previously by Cleopatra (36–31) and Amyntas (30–25);† cf. also the inscription CIA iii. 545. Archelaos in A.D. 17 was summoned to Rome and degraded. He had been a weak prince, and when he, a few years previously, became temporarily insane, Augustus had appointed a tutor, and had also taken from him part of Tracheiotis, permitting Ajax about A.D. 11–12‡ to become high priest of Kennatis and Lalassis with right of coinage. Cappadocia became a province in A.D. 17, but apparently Archelaos, son of the old king, was allowed to retain Eastern Lycaonia and part of Cilicia, while M. Antonius Polemon became dynast of Olba, Kennatis, and Lalassis,§ and reigned at least 11 years. In 36 Archelaos II. was king in Tracheiotis, and his attempt to take a census after the Roman style caused a revolt in Ketis, which seems to imply that Antonius Polemon's rule had passed to Archelaos (Tacitus, Ann. vi. 41; Expositor, April 1897, p. 281). In 37 Tracheiotis and Eastern Lycaonia were given to Antiochus, king of Commagene; and though he was disgraced soon, yet Claudius in 41 restored his kingdom.‖ He struck coins with the legend ΑΤΚΑ-ΟΝΩΝ, implying probably that Laranda was added to his kingdom (it had been in the province since

* It is beyond doubt (Raillard, Numismat. Zeitschrift, 1895, p. 23 ff.) that Strabo, pp. 493, 495, 499, 556, 560, 568, 578, is always alluding to the same Polemon, the famous king of his own country Pontus, and the trusted ally of Rome; it is inadmissible to separate one of these allusions from the rest as denoting some otherwise unknown Polemon. Strabo everywhere assumes that his readers recognize the one famous Polemon. But, as Mommsen clearly shows (Ephem. Epigraph, ii. p. 259 ff.), it is impossible to suppose that this Greek king was the Roman M. Antonius Polemon; the coins with that name on them belong probably to the period about A.D. 17–28. See below, note §.

† On the date, see Kromayer in Hermes, 1894, p. 574 f.; Gardthausen, Augustus und seine Zeit, i. pt. 1, p. 293. Plutarch, Ant. 36 (cf. 54), and Dion Cass. xlix. 32. 3–5 (who omits Tracheiotis), are decisive as to the year, and Josephus (who gives 34, Ant. Jud. xv. iii. 5–iv. 1) has made a mere error.

‡ Moreover, Amyntas proceeded to conquer Derbe, implying that he already had Iconium to start from. Previously Polemon's Cilician kingdom had included Iconium (Strab. p. 568); and hence in the Acta Pauli et Theclæ his descendant Tryphaina had estates in the region of which Antioch was the governing centre (Ramsay, Church in Rom. Emp. p. 396), and which included Iconium.

* This Lycaonian strategia, originally extending up to Derbe, was given by Pompey to Ariobarzanes, king of Cappadocia, in B.C. 64; but Antipater seized Derbe and Laranda, defying the Roman policy (apparently in the troubles following 50, Strab. p. 535). The Roman governors of Phrygia and Cilicia, B.C. 60–50, retained the right of passage across by Kybistra from Iconium to Tarsus (Cicero, Fam. xv. ii. 2, iv. 4; Att. v. xviii. 1, xx. 2).

† Ketis must be included in this kingdom, and cannot therefore have been under separate dynasts with right of coinage, as some scholars have thought, at any period between B.C. 36 and the disgrace of Archelaos; but Aba ruled Olba under Cleopatra as overlord till 31 (Strab. p. 672).

‡ Coins of his second year name Augustus, of his fifth year Tiberius (Waddington, Mélanges de Numism. ii. p. 126).

§ He is mentioned by Strabo (p. 556), who makes him grandson of Polemon, king of Pontus; but probably the text is falsely arranged, and Strabo refers to the son of Polemon (who first held rule without title under his mother, queen Pythodoris, after Polemon died, and then about A.D. 17 or 18 was made dynast of Olba; see Ramsay, Church in Rom. Emp. p. 427 f.).

‖ But he gave Olba, Kennatis, and Lalassis to Polemon II. king of Pontus (see below, Waddington, l.c. p. 129).

B.C. 25, but it was the key to Tracheiotis, and necessary for successful administration of the kingdom). Thus Derbe came to be the frontier city of the Roman Province; and it was probably this important position that led to its receiving the honorary title Claudio-Derbe.

G. Provincia had meanwhile been enlarged also on the north-east, and contained, when St. Paul visited it, the following districts in addition to G. Proper (all are mentioned in inscriptions of the 1st century under these names): (1) Paphlagonia, incorporated B.C. 5 (probably on death of Deiotarus Philadelphus).* (2) Parts of Pontus, incorporated at various dates (Sebastopolis, Amaseia, and probably Gazelonitis in B.C. 2–1, Comana in A.D. 34–35), and called as a whole Pontus Galaticus, i.e. Pontus belonging to G. as distinguished from Pontus Polemoniacus, which was governed by Polemon II. (that kingdom was ruled by Polemon II. A.D. 37–63, his mother Tryphæna being associated with him until 54: † in 63 it also was incorporated in Galatia, but retained the distinguishing name Polemoniacus). (3) Phrygia, including Apollonia, Antioch, and Iconium (wh. see): as contrasted with Phrygia Asiana (Galen, π. τρ. δυν. iv. p. 312, vi. p. 515 Kuhn), it would naturally be termed Phrygia Galatica (a title preserved only in a note of martyrdom, Acta Sanctorum, 28th Sept., p. 563, where Galaciæ is printed): see PHRYGIA. (4) Pisidia, Ac 14^{24}. (5) Part of Lycaonia, including the cities Lystra and Derbe, and some other places not yet organized as cities (such as Hyde, Barata, Perta, etc., summed up in Ac 14^{6} as ἡ περίχωρος). In contrast to Lycaonia ipsa (Pliny, NH v. 95), i.e. the non-Roman country governed by Antiochus and styled Lycaonia Antiochiana (CIL x. 8660), it was doubtless called Lycaonia Galatica, like Pontus Galaticus, Phrygia Galatica. (6) Isauria, the territory attached to the city Isaura, and called Ἰσαυρικὴ (χώρα) by Strabo, pp. 568, 569. It has been maintained that the name G. was never employed in correct official usage to denote this large composite province, and that the proper and technical usage was to designate the province by enumerating its component parts. This position is untenable, and has been frankly abandoned by one of its champions, Prof. E. Schürer (Theolog. Litteraturztg. 30th Sept. 1893). The following arguments are decisive against it.

(a) Ptolemy devotes the successive chapters of his Book V. to the Roman provinces of Asia Minor: ch. 1. Πόντου καὶ Βιθυνίας (the official name was strictly double, and so was the constitution in some respects); 2. τῆς ἰδίας Ἀσίας (as distinguished from Asia the continent); 3. Λυκίας; 4. Γαλατίας (containing Paphlagonia, and parts of Pisidia, Lycaonia, and Isauria, with the cities Antioch, Lystra, Isaura); 5. Παμφυλίας (which he says is bounded by Galatia on the north).

(b) Pliny (who often uses G. in the narrower sense of G. Proper) defines in v. 146, 147, Galatia (i.e. the province) as reaching to Cabalia of Pamphylia and to the Milyæ, and as containing Lystra and various cities in the Phrygian, Pisidian, and Paphlagonian territories, altogether 195 peoples.‡

(c) Tacitus (Hist. ii. 9) mentions Galatia and Pamphylia as being governed by Calpurnius Asprenas, implying that the two formed one great continuous district. Eutropius (vii. 10) and Syncellus (i. p. 592) apply the name G. to the whole province formed in B.C. 25; and they simply reproduce an old authority, using G. in a sense which it no longer bore in their time.

(d) A practical people like the Romans would never use as the strictly technical and official title of a province 'Galatia, Paphlagonia, Pisidia, Phrygia, Lycaonia, Pontus Galaticus.' That accumulation of names was used for the sake of clearness on milestones, enumerating the Viæ of the various districts of the province (CIL iii. 312, 318), and on honorary inscriptions to give additional dignity to the governor of so many vast regions. These inscriptions belong to the later years of the century, when the constructive effort was exhausted, and the national spirit was reviving (Hadrian, at last, frankly recognized it).

It is, however, clear that it was not the current and popular Greek usage to designate G. Provincia by the name Galatia. The Greek-speaking natives, so far as evidence survives, called it the Galatic Province (CIG 3991), or enumerated the parts. It was only those who adopted fully the Roman point of view that employed the simple name Galatia; and the use of that name must be taken as a sign that the person who uses it speaks as a Roman, and deliberately follows the Roman provincial divisions, and would destroy those national distinctions which were opposed to the organized Roman unity. It is implied in the South-Galatian theory that St. Paul took that view (see GALATIANS II.). The author of Acts, however, did not take that view; and he never speaks of the province as Galatia, but mentions its parts (see GALATIA, REGION OF, IV.).

No information has been preserved to enable us to sketch the constitution of this vast province, except that it was governed by a prætorian legatus Augusti pro prætore, and had no legions stationed in it. The name Γαλατικὴ Ἐπαρχία, which the people of Iconium employed to designate the province about A.D. 54 (CIG 3991), clearly implies that the intention was to work the province into a unity, like Asia Provincia, and to override the national distinctions of Lycaonian, Phrygian, etc. Undoubtedly, this attempt ultimately proved a failure: the national characteristics were too strong, and revived after a time. But in the period of growth (B.C. 25 to A.D. 63) a vigorous effort was made to impose a Roman unity, expressed by the Roman title G. Provincia, on the various races. If we could trust a rather bold interpretation of an inscription, which seems to make Apollonia a part of the Trokmi (Studia Biblica, iv. p. 53 f.), it would even appear that the attempt was made to enrol the various parts in one or other of the three Gaulish tribes of G. Proper (τὰ τρία ἔθνη), just as Asia with its equally great variety of peoples was 'the nation Asia' (ἡ Ἀσία τὸ ἔθνος, Dion Cass. liv. 30); so the term ἔθνος is frequently applied in inscriptions to designate any entire province, however varied its population was. Unfortunately, inscriptions other than epitaphs are very rare in the province Galatia.

Ancyra was the capital of the province G.; and it is probable that Colonia Cæsareia Antiochia (see ANTIOCH) was a sort of secondary metropolis, being the centre of a system of Roman garrison towns (coloniæ) and military or imperial roads (ὁδοὶ βασιλικαί, Ramsay, Church in Rom. Emp. p. 32), and a place where ceremonies of the provincial cultus were held (op. cit. p. 396). Probably, the various parts of the province retained some separate individuality, though its nature is uncertain. Even after Pontus Galaticus and Pontus Polemoniacus had been merged in G. Provincia, they retained their separate names (in inscriptions and in Ptolemy), which implies that these artificial divisions of purely Roman origin had some real political distinction to preserve their separate existence. So also St. Luke seems to indicate some distinction between the districts of the province (see GALATIA, REGION OF). Metropoleis of various districts are known from coins or inscriptions (Pompeiopolis of Paphlagonia, Laranda of Lycaonia, Sagalassos of Pisidia, Isaura of Isaurica, Amaseia and Neocæsareia of the Pontic divisions); but the titles appear only in the 2nd or 3rd century, and are no argument for the Pauline period. Whether the Koinon of G. was a provincial institution or confined to Galatia Proper, cannot be determined; but the Koinon of Lycaonia (which has been quoted as a similar institution) was not founded till Lycaonia was incorporated (probably by Pius) in the new province of the Three Eparchiai (Ramsay, Histor. Geogr. p. 377).

The number of Roman foundations made in G. Provincia between B.C. 20 and A.D. 50 is an index of the vigour with which the imperial policy was urged on in that region. Augustus founded seven colonies—Germa in North Galatia, and Antioch, Lystra, Parlais, Cremna, Comama, Olbasa in South Galatia, besides a system of roads and milestones measured from Antioch. Nothing comparable in scale to this was done by him in any other part of the East. Under the succeeding emperors, we find several cities remodelled and Romanized in character and name: Pappa-Tiberiopolis, Claudio-Seleuceia, Claudio-Derbe, Claudio-Iconium, all in South Galatia.

Owing to the enormous extent of the Province G., the greatest variety of soil and scenery and products are found in it, from the dead-level plains on the Lycaonian and Cappadocian frontier, with their vast herds of sheep (alike now and in ancient times, Strab. p. 570), to the picturesque mountains and deep glens of Pisidia. On the northern half, see I.; the southern half was a highly cultivated and rich country in the 1st century, containing many great cities, traversed by the two important roads from east to west—one from Cilicia through Iconium and Antioch to Apameia and the Ægean coast, one from Commagene through Cæsareia Capp. and Laodiceia Katakekaumene to Apameia.* All intercourse by land between inner Asia and the west passed through the great Roman cities of South Galatia. Hence the great stream of intercourse backwards and forwards between Rome and the East, which played such an important part in moulding Christian history, affected these cities very strongly and developed them rapidly. Questions of doctrine and ritual were debated there at an early time, and called for decision. Jewish emissaries from Jerusalem (Gal 1^7 4^{17} etc.) would naturally pass through them and affect them first. On the other hand, as Rome was the magnet that attracted all intercourse, it is not so easy to see how Jewish emissaries should affect Ancyra very early; and utterly improbable that they should affect the towns in the western parts of Galatia Proper.

That Jews in large numbers dwelt in the cities of Phrygia Galatica is well known. They were greatly favoured as colonists by the Seleucid kings; and their presence may be confidently looked for in all Seleucid foundations. Seleucus I. and his successors found them loyal and trusty settlers in their garrison cities, such as Antioch, Apameia, etc., cities which served to maintain the Seleucid power in a foreign land. The Jewish colonists had the right of citizenship, along with various special privileges of a kind which their religious ideas required, as regards burial, money grants in place of oil-distribution, etc.; and their privileges and rights seemed to have been summed up in a body of city law, called in an Apamean inscription νόμος τῶν Ἰουδαίων (Ramsay, Cities and Bishoprics of Phrygia, pp. 538 f., 668 f.). Seleucus I. granted them citizenship in all his colonies, implying that there were Jews in all, and his successors carried out the same policy (Jos. Ant. Jud. XII. iii. 1, § 119, 125); and Antiochus the Great about 200 B.C. brought 2000 Jewish families from Babylonia to the cities of Phrygia and Lydia (id. ib. § 148 ff.). These Seleucid colonies were almost all planted on the southern side of the plateau, and chiefly on the great lines of communication leading east and west; and the mass of Jewish colonists are to be expected in the cities along these routes. They penetrated farther north in the course of trade; but their settlement in North Galatia belongs to a period later than their establishment in the south.

The Jewish colonists undoubtedly exercised great influence on the development of Asia Minor in the Roman period; but they have left few conspicuous traces of their presence. They adopted Greek and Roman names (at least in public life), and it is doubtful how far they retained any knowledge of Hebrew; hence they are hardly to be distinguished from the ordinary citizens, and the attempt to do so in ch. xv. (also xiv.) of Cities and Bishoprics of Phrygia is very speculative. But they seem to have taken part in public life, and to have exercised great influence through their wealth and ability, as well as through the power of their peculiar and impressively pure religion. Even the marked analogy which existed in point of ceremonial between the Asianic and the Judaic religion increased the influence of the latter (see GALATIANS II.).

Few Jewish or Jewish-Christian inscriptions can be detected in South-Galatian cities, because the names are usually unrecognizable and few emblems or Jewish formulæ are employed: in Antioch, Sterrett, Epigr. Journ. No. 138 (cf. Cities and Bish. of Phrygia, p. 525 n. 1); and at Apollonia, Bull. Corr. Hell. 1893; in Iconium, CIG 4001*b*, 3998, 3995*b*, 9270; and in Laodiceia Combusta, CIG 3989*d*, and Athen. Mitth. xiii. pp. 241, 254, 255, 258, 260. Among the few known inscriptions of Lystra and Derbe none have any Jewish appearance, except one with the name Mouisas at a village a little west of Derbe (Sterrett, Wolfe Exped. No. 46).

Christian inscriptions are comparatively numerous in Galatic Phrygia and Lycaonia, especially in the country that lies north and north-west of Iconium; and, though none are dated, yet style indicates that some must be as early as the 3rd century. Besides the Jewish-Christian ones just mentioned, others certainly or probably Christian (some perhaps Jewish-Christian) and early (omitting all that are later), are A. E. Mitth. Oesterr. 1896, p. 36 f., Nos. 20, perhaps 19, 24; Sterrett, Epigr. Journ. 142, Wolfe Exped. 555 (see Expositor, Oct. 1888, p. 263), Journ. of Hell. Stud. 1890, p. 165, No. 23 (cross above omitted by editor), Athen. Mitth. xiii. p. 249 ff. Nos. 44, 49, 53, 54, etc., with others unpublished. As is pointed out in Cities and Bishoprics of Phrygia, i. pp. 511, 715 f., epigraphic evidence would suggest that this district is one of those where Christianity took the earliest and strongest hold. Little is known about the later history of the Churches of Galatic Phrygia and Lycaonia. It is suggested that St. Mark carried on evangelization in the eastern districts after about 60 A.D.;* and his name is commoner than any other except Paul and John in the Christian inscriptions of the district (Athen. Mitth. xiii. p. 252 ff. Nos. 55, 56, 61, 92, 99; St. Paul the Trav. p. 351). Round Iconium, Antioch, and to a less degree Lystra, clings a great body of early tradition; but Derbe is as little prominent in tradition as in the narrative of Ac, and the earliest known bishop seems to be Daphnus, 381.

III. In 2 Ti 4[10] Tischendorf with ℵ reads εἰς Γαλλίαν, WH εἰς Γαλατίαν. The former reading would necessitate a new article containing an account of Gaul (Γαλλία): even the latter reading, as many contend, refers to that country (cf. Theod. Mops. ad loc.). Gaul is called Γαλατία by many Greek * writers; and, beyond doubt, that was the current Greek name in the 1st and 2nd cents.; but it may be doubted whether St. Paul, whose usage in names geographical is thoroughly Roman,† would not here also employ the Roman term, if he meant Gaul. Moreover, it could not escape him that Γαλατία would be ambiguous, and would naturally be understood as Galatia by Timothy, who was resident in Asia; and it is highly probable that he would not use that term to signify Gaul without employing some of the various ways of distinguishing. We must conclude that either St. Paul meant the same country which he elsewhere calls Galatia, or the true reading is ΓΑΛΑΤΙΑΝ, which would readily be corrupted into ΓΑΛΑΤΙΑΝ. Manuscript authority, however, is generally considered decisive in favour of Γαλατίαν, though Tischendorf thinks otherwise. Against Tischendorf's reading it has been stated that Γαλλία or Γάλλοι is first used in Greek by Epictetus (or rather Arrian), Dissert. ii. 20. 17 (Lightfoot, Gal. p. 3 note); but Strabo (p. 195) has Γαλλικόν. used in a way suggesting that he recognized it to be the Roman equivalent to the Greek Γαλατικόν.

Fourth century tradition says that Crescens was sent to Gaul; and the Churches of Vienne and Mayence claimed him as their founder; but the latter claim is certainly improbable, and the whole tradition may be founded on a false interpretation of 2 Ti 4[10]. There was a natural desire to connect the Gaulish Church with apostolic times; this would lead to the interpretation of G. in that passage as Gaul; the name Γαλλίαν would be written as a gloss on the margin, and this false reading finally crept into a few manuscripts. Tillemont's argument (Mémoires pour servir etc., i. art. 52, note 81, pp. 133, 263), that the evangelization of Gaul did not take place so early as this supposed mission of Crescens, has never been seriously shaken, and remains the most probable view.

Even more improbable is the view that in 1 Mac 8[2] the reference is to Roman victories in Gaul. At the period in question, about B.C. 160, the Romans had recently conquered Cisalpine Gaul; but there is no reason to think that this not specially important event would produce any effect on the mind of the Jews. On the other hand, the Galatians were a terror in Asia for nearly a century; and even the victories of Attalus had only restrained the range of their power, but not broken it. But Manlius marched at will through their land, and defeated them in the heart of their country; and this event would be noised through the Seleucid dominions, and would naturally suggest to the Jews the desirability of entering into friendly relations with a government that could exercise such power on the Seleucid frontier.

GALATIA, REGION OF, more strictly rendered Galatic Region (ἡ Γαλατικὴ χώρα, Ac 18[23]; ἡ Φρυγία καὶ Γαλατικὴ χώρα, Ac 16[6]), is a phrase difficult to explain, because it takes us into the popular topographical terminology of a district and a period that are utterly obscure.

I. According to the North-Galatian theory, and also according to Zahn, who holds the South-Galatian view in all essentials, this term is merely a synonym for Γαλατία in the common sense of G. Proper. The difficulty in accepting this apparently simple interpretation is that the use of the term Γαλατικὴ χώρα, where Γαλατία should be expected, is not supported by analogy. The only analogy quoted is ἐπὶ Ἀγκύρας τῆς Γαλατικῆς, Arrian, Anab. ii. 4. 1; but this denotes, not 'Ancyra of the Galatic country,' as is assumed, but 'Ancyra the Galatic' as distinguished from Ancyra the Phrygian (τῇ Φρυγιακῇ, Strab. p. 567); Arrian, in describing the period of Alexander the Great, uses the word by anticipation. If the reference in Ac 16[6] 18[23] is to G. Proper, all Greek usage, earlier and later alike, demands that the noun Γαλατία should be used; and this is all the more necessary if (as is maintained on this view) it is coupled with the noun Φρυγία. The defenders of this interpretation can hardly plead that the obscurity of the subject should be accepted as an excuse for their failure to explain the reason of this perplexing and unnecessary deviation from common nomenclature; because the adj. Γαλατικός is used with comparative frequency in the topographical terminology of that period, and always in a well-marked and characteristic way. This point needs careful study. There is a regular tendency to distinguish the scope of the derived adjective in -ικός from the simple word: thus, for example, οἱ Ἀτταλικοὶ βασιλεῖς are the whole dynasty of which the Attali were the most prominent members (Strab. p. 288): ἔργα Γαλατικά are deeds perpetrated by anybody similar to ἔργα τῶν Γαλατῶν: Γαλατικὸς κόλπος, Σικελικὸν πέλαγος, etc., are the bodies of water adjoining or pertaining to Galatia, Sicily, etc.: ἡ Ἰσαυρικὴ χώρα was the whole region of which Isaura was the leading city, but it did not all belong to Isaura. Many examples might be quoted; but the closest parallel to the pair of terms Γαλατικὴ χώρα and Γαλατία is Λακωνικὴ γῆ and Λακωνία. Λακωνία is the old historic land of Lacedæmonia; but Λακωνικὴ γῆ comprises the entire region which had passed under Spartan rule and been added to Laconia, including Messenia and the land near Pylos (Thuc. ii. 25, iv. 41, v. 34; Xen. Hell. vi. 2. 9 and 31). As Spartan power dwindled, γῆ Λακωνική shrank in extent till it practically coincided with Laconia. The distinction is analogous to that between 'British territory' and 'Britain'; the former being enormously wider than the latter. There are cases in which, for some special purpose, the wider term may be used about the smaller country; but in ordinary expression the wider term is used only about the enlarged country. It is not safe to say more than that a tendency exists to observe this distinction; as time goes on, its delicacy often leads to its being blurred.* In the adj. Γαλατικός the distinction is well observed. In an Iconian inscription of A.D. 54, the enlarged Galatia Provincia is Γαλατικὴ ἐπαρχεία (CIG 3991); the part of Pontus included in the province is called Γαλατικός in many inscriptions and in Ptolemy: similarly, the corresponding term Phrygia Galatica once occurs. If St. Luke used Γαλατικὴ χώρα where Γαλατία would have been the simple and clear term, he contradicts all that we know of contemporary usage, and yet attains no conceivable purpose thereby. The Greek-speaking population of Asia Minor ordinarily called Galatia Proper Γαλατία, and Enlarged Galatia Γαλατική (usually with some noun): only when they adopted the Roman point of view, Greek-speaking persons occasionally and for some special purpose used Γαλατία in the Roman sense of the Province. Analogy points to the conclusion that the Greek Luke would use Γαλατικὴ χώρα to indicate the Province, which the Roman Paul calls Γαλατία.

* Γαλατία and Γαλάται are so used in Diodorus. Strabo, Josephus, Plutarch, Appian, Pausanias, Dio. Cass., Athenæus, etc.

II. Lightfoot argued that in Ac 16[6] τὴν Φρυγίαν καὶ Γαλατικὴν χώραν must denote a single territory to which two epithets are applied, 'the region which in ancient time was Phrygian and afterwards Galatian.' This explains why an unusual term was adopted; but such antiquarian lore is quite out of keeping with the style of Acts. We require here a current term in popular speech, for that is the character of Lukan expression. Zahn, who, like many other scholars, holds that Φρυγίαν here must be a noun, demands some case analogous to the double topographical epithet. Lightfoot gave only Lk 3[1]: we add some from Strabo, p. 195, τὸ φῦλον δ νῦν Γαλλικόν τε καὶ Γαλατικὸν καλοῦσι; p. 788 (of the Nile mouths) τὸ μὲν Πηλουσιακὸν καλεῖται, τὸ δὲ Κανωβικὸν καὶ Ἡρακλειωτικόν;† p. 802 (Xois is defined as) ὑπὲρ τοῦ Σεβεννυτικοῦ καὶ Φατνιτικοῦ στόματος, i.e. above the Sebennytic-Phatnitic branch in the upper part, where these two branches are still joined, and which may bear either name; p. 97, τὴν Σκυθικὴν καὶ Κελτικήν, the (northern) zone that may be called either Scythian or Celtic (after the two chief races that inhabit its eastern and western parts); p. 670, τοῦ Κιλικίου καὶ Παμφυλίου τρόπου. The Greek καί is used to connect alternative names (Latin sive, seu, English or, alias);‡ and the grammatical character of Lightfoot's construction seems clearly established by these examples. In Ac 18[23] Γαλατικὴ χώρα on his interpretation must be used needlessly for Galatia Proper.

III. Gifford (Expositor, July 1894, p. 12) accepts Lightfoot's construction, but interprets 'the borderlands of Phrygia and Galatia.' Then Ac 18[23] mentions 'the Galatic Province (Region) and Phrygia.' This view has much to recommend it. It gives in 16[6] a route leading direct from Iconium by Dorylaion to Bithynia, making St. Paul turn direct towards that country when forbidden to preach in Asia; then, when he came to Dorylaion over-against Mysia,* he was forbidden to cross the Bithynian frontier, and turned west. It then becomes, however, almost necessary to suppose that the prohibition 16[6] was given in Iconium or Lystra, and that St. Paul, abandoning his previous intention (15[36]) of going over all the Churches, omitted Antioch. Salmon interprets much in this way, but is clear that Paul went to Antioch, and translates Ac 16[6] as in next section, IV. (Smith's Bib. Dict.[2] i. p. 1105).

IV. Another explanation takes us into the obscure minutiæ of the Galatic Province. The various parts of the province retained a certain distinction (see GALATIA II.), and were probably termed Regiones or χῶραι. The term Regio occurs in one inscription, mentioning a centurion charged with duty in the Regio of which Antioch was centre, i.e. Phrygia Galatica,† while χώρα is understood in Strabo, pp. 568, 569, ἡ Ἰσαυρικὴ (χώρα), and in Ptolemy, v. 6, 17, ἡ Ἀντιοχειανὴ (χώρα).‡

The route taken by St. Paul in Ac 16[1-6] and 18[23] led across two of the regions (χῶραι) of the Galatic Province, viz. the Galatic part of Lycaonia and the Galatic part of Phrygia; the former contained Derbe and Lystra, the latter Iconium and Antioch. In 18[23] two regions are mentioned, τὴν Γαλατικὴν χώραν καὶ Φρυγίαν: here it is grammatically equally possible to take Φρυγίαν as noun and as adj.; for when two different names, expressed by two adjs. agreeing with the same noun, are coupled by καί, the regular usage is to express the noun only with the first (so in Strabo,§ τὴν Ἀκυιτανὴν μερίδα καὶ τὴν Ναρβωνῖτιν, p. 191; τὸ Μενδήσιον στόμα καὶ τὸ Τανιτικόν, p. 802; τοῦ Αἰγαίου πελάγους καὶ τοῦ Παμφυλικοῦ καὶ τοῦ Ἰσσικοῦ, p. 121; in Epiphanius (Hæres. 19), τῆς Ναβατικῆς χώρας καὶ Ἰτουραίας καὶ Μωαβίτιδος καὶ Ἀρηλίτιδος; and others innumerable‖). The two regions intended ought to be the χώρα Λυκαονία and the χώρα Φρυγία. Now, Roman Lycaonia was naturally always designated with reference to the other half, non-Roman Lycaonia. One pair of terms would be Lycaonia Antiochiana (found CIL x. 8660) and Lycaonia Galatica (not actually found, but it may be assumed confidently on the analogy of Pontus Galaticus, Phrygia Galatica); another pair of terms would be Ἀντιοχιανὴ (χώρα) as in Ptolemy, and Γαλατικὴ χώρα as in Ac 18[23]. The latter pair would be naturally used by a person speaking inside the country and not requiring to name it,¶ the former by a person outside the country. The Phrygian region of the Galatic Province was called Φρυγία χώρα by St. Luke, who seems to have always used this form of designating the various regions of the province (but those who prefer to treat Φρυγία as a noun in 18[23] may take the same sense from the noun as from

* So sometimes with γῆ Λακωνική or χώρα A. But in such cases a purpose can often be detected. Aristophanes stands alone in using Λάκωνικαί as 'Laconian women'; but that was undoubtedly an Athenian slang term, perhaps in the sense of 'women of Laconian type' (cf. Λακωνικά, shoes of Laconian style). Such usages as πόλις Γαλατική, city belonging to the Galatæ, i.e. Galatian city, πόλεμος Θεσσαλικός, war in which the Thessali take one side, are of a different class.

† An exactly equivalent form is used by Ptolemy, iv. 5, Ἡρακλεωτικὴν στόμα τὸ καὶ Κανωβικόν (on the sense of τὸ καί in names, see Ramsay, Cities and Bishoprics, i. p. 637 f.).

‡ In Greek, esp. of later period, καί often means 'or,' Thuc. vi. 60, 1; ii. 35. 2; 42, 3; Ar. Eq. 256 (Neil); Aesch. Sept. 414 f., 1058; Eur. Supp. 895; Iph. Aul. 643; Plut. Q. Conv. iv. 2, 655c; Postgate on Propert. v. 6, 51. The Roman sive is often used to connect alternative names, where the Greek form is either ὁ καί or ἐπικλούμενος; see Marquardt, Röm. Privatalterth.[2] p. 27; Cagnat, Manuel d'Épigraphie Lat.[2] p. 57.

* κατά as in Ac 27[7]; Thuc. vi. 65 and 104; Herod. i. 76.

† ἑκτοντάρχην ἐγγεωάριον, Sterrett, Epigraphic Journey, No. 92, who wrongly alters to [λ]εγ.; Prof. O. Hirschfeld accepts the reading given above (and in the copy), see Berlin Akad. Sitzungsber. 1893, p. 421.

‡ In that passage the two parts of Lycaonia (Galatica and Antiochiana) are opposed to each other under the names Lycaonia and Antiochiana; they retained distinct names in the 2nd century, but evidently great variety existed in the way of designating them, and Ptolemy selects an ill-fitting pair of names.

§ Strabo, who very rarely uses the common article to hold two nouns together (an example, however, in p. 388), repeats the article with the second member.

‖ Strabo has two other forms, much rarer, κόλπους τόν τε Ἀδριατικὸν καὶ τὸν Τυρρηνικόν, p. 92; τὸ Κρητικὸν καὶ Σικελικὸν καὶ Σαρδῶον πέλαγος βαθέα ἐστί, p. 59. In the latter class we can usually see the intention to treat the whole as a unity made up of several parts; and the example quoted is so harsh as to be suspicious in text (if correct, the grammar is much worse than Strabo's average).

¶ The author of Ac 18[23] speaks from the point of view of a person in the country, placing himself alongside of St. Paul.

Φρυγία with χώρα understood, for in the inscriptions of Antioch the noun is often used to designate Galatic Phrygia [CIL iii. Suppl. 6818, 6819], and St. Luke may be allowed to speak as the people of Antioch wrote). Ac 18[23], then, implies 'he made a mission tour * through the Galatic region (Derbe and Lystra) and the Phrygian (Iconium and Antioch), stablishing all the disciples (in all the Galatian Churches).' †

Ac 16[6] is more complicated. It describes the journey from Lystra onwards, i.e. through Galatic Phrygia. Had the expression been τὴν Φρυγίαν χώραν, there would have been less doubt; but the author, wishing to bring out with minute accuracy that his meaning was restricted to the Galatic part of the large country of Phrygia, added a second adjective to express 'the Region that is Phrygian and Galatic,' i.e. 'which was geographically Phrygia, but politically Galatia.' ‡ The verse, then, implies 'they made a mission tour * through the Phrygo-Galatic Region (Iconium and Antioch), [but no farther], because they were forbidden to speak the word in Asia (which they entered immediately on going onward from Antioch).'

It is objected that this view is too complicated and artificial; but the complicacy arises from our being forced to write a lost page of history concerning an obscure corner of the empire, before we can interpret the language of an author who assumes that we are as familiar as he was with the terminology of his own time. Asterius, bishop of Amasia in Pontus Galaticus 400 A.D., understood 18[23] exactly in this way, for in paraphrasing it he uses the words, τὴν Λυκαονίαν καὶ τὰς τῆς Φρυγίας πόλεις (Hom. viii., Migne, Patrolog. Græc. vol. xl.). This testimony of a man familiar with the topography of Asia Minor should have great weight; and Zahn is not justified in setting it aside as a false inference, into which Asterius was betrayed by taking Antioch in Ac 18[22] as Pisidian Antioch. Asterius places the journey through Lycaonia and Phrygia immediately before the visit to Asia (Ac 19[1]), and therefore evidently understood τὴν Γαλατικὴν χώραν καὶ Φρυγίαν in that sense. No mere error about Antioch explains such a rendering of 18[23]. We have here a distinct testimony by an ancient authority in favour of the view stated in this section. W. M. Ramsay.

GALATIANS (Γαλάται), used only in Gal 3[1].

I. According to the majority of scholars, it denotes the people of Galatia Proper, a mixed population, consisting of a minority descended from the three Gaulish tribes, and a large majority of the ancient population, Phrygians west of the Halys, Cappadocians east of that river, with an intermixture of Greeks, Romans, and Jews. In the great cities, such as Ancyra, the Phrygians, etc., probably constituted the overwhelming majority, while Gauls were found there only as a small aristocratic caste; but in country parts the Gauls were more numerous. That is the usual sense of the term G., and needs no proof. On the character of these Gauls, their position as a small conquering caste of barbarians among a more numerous and more educated population, and their relation to that older population, see Galatia I.

The general population of North Galatia was summed up as Galatai in ordinary ancient usage. But this term had no ethnological implication; it did not mean that the people so designated were all of Gallic descent, for it is doubtful whether so much as five per cent. of the total population was of Gallic origin, and it is practically certain that, in the great cities, an even smaller proportion of the population was of Gallic descent.* 'The name Galatai meant really no more than 'people of Galatia,' though the usual ethnological fiction crept in, and Phrygians and Greeks were feigned to be of the three tribes, just as the composite province Asia was called an ἔθνος (see p. 87[b]). It is quite unjustifiable to suppose that the Churches addressed by St. Paul, even if they were situated in North-Galatian cities, consisted of persons of Gallic blood to any important extent: the probability is that such Galatian Christians would be to a very large extent free from any mixture of Gallic blood. Only in that form of the North-Galatian theory which is advocated by Dr. Zöckler is it admissible to suppose that the Christian Galatians were to some extent Gauls (see p. 81, 84 f.). The historical review given under Galatia, and the authorities quoted there, furnish the proof of the statements here made.

The origin of the peculiar Greek word Γαλάτης is doubtful; it probably arose among the Greek settlers on the Gallic coast at Massalia or Massilia, and means, according to Holder (Sprachschatz), 'noble,' while Galli means 'warlike.' Three terms occur in Greek writers, and it was only at a later period and in a half-hearted way that a distinction was drawn between Γαλάται as the people of Galatia in Asia, Γάλλοι as the people of Gaul or France, and Κέλται as the generic name of all cognate tribes whether found in these two countries or elsewhere; the last of these distinctions, which is universal among modern writers, can hardly be traced, even in embryo, among the ancients (though the use of Κελτικός in Strab. vii. 5. 2, p. 314, approximates to it); but the Romans began sooner to appreciate the convenience of the distinction between Galli and Galatæ in political usage, and the geographers adopted it from them by degrees (traces of it appear in Strabo).

II. It is maintained by other scholars, that, corresponding to the term Galatia Provincia, there was a Roman term Galatæ, indicating the body of provincials. It was necessary in official and legal usage to have a term designating the entire population of a province; and the term was always the ethnic derived from the official name of the province. Thus all the inhabitants of Africa were Afri (e.g. Juvenal, viii. 120; Pliny, Epist. ii. 11. 2), of Hispania Bætica Bætici (Pliny, Epist. iii. 9. 3, etc.), and so on, even though several nations inhabited each province, some of which, e.g. Carthaginians or Greeks, regarded themselves as far superior to barbarian Afri, etc. The Romans used these generic terms when it was necessary to describe as a class the whole population; but 'the same writer who at one time and from one point of view summed up the population of Sicilia Provincia as Siculi, would at another time and for another purpose pointedly emphasize the Greek character and origin of the people of Syracuse or Messana,' and would distinguish them from the Siculi as a different race.† Similarly, the term Galatæ was for purposes of generalization employed by the Romans to sum up the entire population of the province Galatia; ‡ but its use in this way is determined by the pur-

* On this sense of διῆλθεν, see Expositor, May 1895, p. 385 ff.

† Such is the reading of RV, Tischendorf, Westcott and Hort, etc. But probably Lightfoot was right (Biblical Essays, p. 235), that the TR and AV represent the correct reading here.

‡ This cannot justly be interpreted as describing any other country than the region of Antioch, Apollonia, and Iconium; but Salmon, while translating by these words, interprets them as describing part of Galatia Proper (Smith, DB p. 1105).

* Slaves Sosias, Maiphateis, etc., called Γαλάται in Delphic inscriptions, are by race Phrygian (Expositor, August 1898).

† See Studia Biblica, iv. p. 26 ff., for a fuller discussion (which, according to Zahn [Einleitung, p. 130], 'ausführlich und überzeugend handelt hievon').

pose and views of the speaker. Three points are involved in this use of the term: (1) the speaker or writer is generalizing about a set of inhabitants of the province; (2) he has not in mind any thought of the racial character—as Phrygians, Pisidians, Galatians, etc.—of the persons addressed; (3) he is speaking from the Roman point of view. All these three points are united in Gal 3^1. (1) St. Paul is addressing in a generalizing style people of two cities in Phrygia and two in Lycaonia, viz. the members of the four 'Churches of Galatia.' If it is possible to speak of the 'Churches of Galatia,' it must from the same point of view be possible to classify the members as 'Galatians.' (2) There is here no thought of racial character, only of classifying a group of towns by their common character, and no common characteristic lies so near as their common Roman relation. The policy of Rome was to prevent the subject cities from uniting with one another, and to unite them all closely to herself; and their Roman relationship exists only in virtue of their forming part of a Roman province. Hence analogies from modern divisions, such as English counties, which opponents of this interpretation of the term G. bring forward, are inapposite: a native of an English county does not rank as a Briton in virtue of his belonging to the county, but a native of the province Galatia ranked as a member of the Roman Empire in virtue of his belonging to the province. Similarly, a modern governor might sum up members of a Society with branches in New Brunswick and Ontario as 'Canadians,' though even here the parallel is not complete, for New Brunswick was a part of the British Empire before it was federated with Canada, but Lycaonia was governed by a native prince before it was incorporated in the province Galatia. (3) Paul, the civis Romanus, naturally spoke from the Roman point of view. His whole career shows how thoroughly he accepted the existing political facts and inculcated loyal submission to the reigning power. He classified his Churches according to the provinces, Achaia, Macedonia, Asia, Galatia. Especially after the decision in favour of religious freedom pronounced by Gallio, he recognized, also, that the liberal Roman administration was his ally against the Jews.* But, from the outset, the Pauline teaching was, as a practical force in society, tending to produce certain results, which the Roman policy also aimed at, viz. (1) spread of the Greek language as being used in the Christian books; (2) revolt against the power of the great religious centres with their colleges of priests; (3) education of the people; (4) development of a feeling of unity among members of different nations, i.e. destruction of national separation.†

But would the people of Pisidia and Lycaonia be willing to accept the title Galatæ? It has been maintained that this is incredible, and that the burden of proof lies with those who assert that the names Lycaonian or Pisidian or Phrygian would ever be disowned by natives of that country. But two of the four Churches were in Roman cities, Coloniæ Romanæ; to judge from the analogy of colonia Corinth with its numerous Roman names (see CORINTH, p. 480[b]), there were almost certainly some Romans in the Churches: could these be addressed as Lycaonians? And the non-Roman population of a colonia shared in the honour of their city. The provincials, with Oriental facility, adopted the Roman ideas and titles, and learned to contemn the uneducated barbarians outside the pale of the empire, to pride themselves on being civilized and Romanized, and to adopt as marks of honour Roman names: thus the four Pauline Churches were at Claudio-Derbe, Colonia Julia Felix Gemina Lystra (sometimes with exaggerated Roman feeling, Lustra), Claudio-Iconium,* and Colonia Cæsareia Antiochia. To cities which were proud of titles like these, it is surely beyond dispute that the national names, Phrygian or Lycaonian or Pisidian, were far less honourable than the provincial title. Among the Romans a national designation, Phryx, Afer, Syrus, etc., was a slave's name; and among both Greeks and Romans the Phrygians were known as a race of slaves.† The Roman Empire, moreover, which brought peace and fair government after centuries of war and oppression, was immensely popular in the Asiatic provinces.

Accordingly, the possibility that St. Paul should address a group of Christians in two Roman colonies and two half-Romanized cities of the province Galatia as 'Galatians,' must be admitted. Whether he actually did so, is a matter of interpretation of Gal and Acts.

The general type of religion and manners among the population of the Phrygian and Lycaonian cities seems to have been much the same: it was found also in the great North-Galatian cities like Ancyra and Pessinus (see GALATIA I.); and the Gentiles addressed in Gal, Eph, Col are of that type. A highly elaborate religious system reigned over the country. Superstitious devotion to an artificial system of rules, and implicit obedience to the directions of the priests (cf. Gal 4^{3-11}), were universal among the uneducated native population. The priestly hierarchy at the great religious centres, hiera, expounded the will of the god to his worshippers.‡ Thus the government was a theocracy; and the whole system, with its prophets, priests, religious law, punishments inflicted by the god for infractions of the ceremonial law, warnings and threats, and the set of superstitious minutiæ, presented a remarkable and real resemblance in external type to the old Jewish ceremonial and religious rule. It is not until this is properly apprehended that Gal 4^{3-11} becomes clear and natural. Paul in that passage implies that the Judaizing movement of the Christian Galatians is a recurrence to their old heathen type. After being set free from the bonds of a hard ceremonial law, they were putting themselves once more into the bonds of another ceremonial law, equally hard. In their action they were showing themselves senseless (ἀνόητοι, Gal 3^1), devoid of the educated mind that could perceive the real nature of things. There is an intentional emphasis in the juxtaposition of ἀνόητοι with Γαλάται, for it was the more educated party, opposed to the native superstition, that would most warmly welcome the provincial title; hence the address, 'senseless G.,' already anticipates the longer expostulation (4^{3-11}), 'G. who are sinking from the educated standard to the ignorance and superstition of the native religion.'

Further, the great strength of the Jews in the cities of South Galatia and South Phrygia had produced a peculiar mixed type of religion. The Phrygian religion of Sabazios formed the foundation on which this mixed type was built up.

documque auxilia (Ann. xv. 6); and Syncellus, depending on an older authority, after mentioning the province Galatia, says that Augustus imposed taxes on the G., obviously meaning the whole people of the province.

* From this point of view, the composition of Gal should be placed after the trial before Gallio, rather than (as Zahn, Einleitung, § 12, puts it) before that event: perhaps at Antioch (Ac 18^{22}).

† See Zahn, Einleitung, § 11, A 4 (St. Paul the Trav. p. 130 ff.).

* Created a colonia by Hadrian; older authorities say it was made a colonia by Claudius, and Zahn (Einleitung, p. 136) wrongly follows them.

† As Mommsen points out, the national designation as Lycaonian or Phrygian was the servile designation applied to slaves, horses, and marines (classiarii), who were originally servile (Hermes, 1884, p. 33 ff.).

‡ Cities and Bishoprics of Phrygia, i. 134 ff., 147 ff., 94 ff., etc.

Sabazios was identified with the Jewish Sabaoth; and the Most High God (θεὸς ὕψιστος) was adored in a form strongly influenced by Jewish elements, but yet in many cases indubitably pagan. Purely Jewish references to the θεὸς ὕψιστος also occur, and are to be distinguished from the mixed worship. Considerable sections of the Phrygian people, especially in the centre and south, were affected by the semi-Jewish, semi-pagan cult; and, as M. Cumont observes in his admirable paper, Hypsistos (Supplément à la Revue de l'instruction publ. en Belg. 1897): 'ces milieux, tout pénétrés d'idées bibliques sans être étroitement attachés à la loi judaique, constituaient un terrain fécond pour la prédication chrétienne, et l'on s'explique mieux, en tenant compte de cette situation, que la foi nouvelle, ait opéré plus de conversions en Asie Mineure, que dans toute autre région.' The remark which M. Cumont makes about Asia Minor in general applies with most force to those districts where the Jews were specially strong. GALATIANS, EPISTLE TO THE.—i. AUTHORSHIP.—The Pauline origin of this Epistle has never been called in question by a critic of first-rate importance, and until recently has never been questioned at all. In the early part of the 2nd cent. it formed a part of Marcion's Apostolicon. A little later it was included in the Syr. and Old Lat. VSS, and was recognized by the Muratorian Canon. It is cited as the work of St. Paul by Irenæus (III. vi. 5, III. xvi. 3, V. xxi. 1), by Clement of Alexandria (Strom. iii. 16); and it is quoted by Justin Martyr (Dial. c. 95; Oratio, 5) and by Athenagoras (Legatio, c. 16). And while the echoes of its language which have been detected in Clement, Barnabas, Ignatius, and Hermas, are somewhat dull and doubtful, a clear reference to the Ep. occurs in Polycarp (Phil. 5), εἰδότες οὖν ὅτι ὁ θεὸς οὐ μυκτηρίζεται (Gal 6^7), and almost certainly in the words (c. 3), ἥτις ἐστὶν μήτηρ πάντων ἡμῶν (cf. Gal 4^{26}).

The internal evidence is irresistible. It has been felt that it is a real person who speaks in the Ep., a person engaged with earnestness and vehemence in a critical conflict. A Paulinist of the 2nd cent. would not be likely to dwell upon the fact that his master's apostleship had been called in question, or to represent some of his earliest and most highly prized conquests from heathenism as slipping through his fingers. Esp. does the subject discussed in the Ep. speak for its early date. It is a polemical tract, a contribution to a controversy which was raging at the time of its appearance. As Gloël says, it is not a sermon, it is not a treatise, it is a sword-cut, delivered in the hour of greatest danger by a combatant who is assaulted by determined foes. The question, then, is, When was there any risk of Gentile Christians being compelled to submit to circumcision? It is idle to look for such a danger in any generation subsequent to the year A.D. 70. Before that time there already existed throughout the empire strong Gentile churches of uncircumcised members. And if this letter is part of a conflict against real and not imaginary dangers, a place must be found for it in the earliest years of Gentile admission to the Christian Church. It can surprise no one that this admission should have been won only by conflict. To discard Mosaism might well seem to the Jews to be equivalent to discarding religion. The surprising thing is that the Gentiles were led to liberty by a Hebrew of the Hebrews. But what brought St. Paul to the front was not merely that he had been appointed Apostle and Defender of the Faith to the Gentiles, but much more that he perceived that this was a conflict involving the very existence of Christianity. Was Christ sufficient for salvation, or must other things be added? This was the question which St. Paul saw to be involved in the question of circumcision. To his eye it was an alternative, Circumcision or the Cross. And this Ep. bears upon it the marks of having been written in the very heat of this conflict. But if so, then it can have proceeded from no other hand than that of the man whose life was spent in the service and defence of the Gentiles.

The first assault upon its authenticity was made by Bruno Bauer in 1850 (Kritik der Paul. Briefe). This critic maintained that it was a compilation from Ro and Co, intended to correct the false impression of St. Paul conveyed by the Acts. In 1886 Pierson and Naber published their Verisimilia. Laceram conditionem NT exemplis illustrarunt et ab origine repetierunt (Amstelodami), which has been well rendered 'The NT in Tatters.' They allege that the Epistles known as Pauline were really compiled by Paulus Episcopus (Paul the Bishop), who made use of letters or parts of letters which had already been addressed to Gentile churches by a missionary of reformed and spiritualized Judaism. This theory discredited its authors rather than the Epp. of Paul. (See Steck, Der Galaterbrief; Kuenen, ThT, xx. (1886) 491 ff., included in the Gesammelte Abhandlungen, trd by Budde, 1894, pp. 330–369; Van Manen in the Jahrbücher für Protest. Theol. 1887; Zahn in Zeitschrift f. Kirchliche Wissenschaft, 1889). Loman (Quæstiones Paulinæ, Amsterdam, 1882–86) supposed that the four great Epistles of St. Paul were written in his name to recommend universalistic Christianity in opp. to the original Christianity, which had been a Jewish Messianic movement centring in a mythical Jesus. Paul was not wholly mythical, but the canonical Paul was.

Scarcely more serious or plausible than those assaults was that of Rudolf Steck of Bern, who, in 1888, published at Berlin his small volume, entitled Der Galaterbrief nach seiner Echtheit untersucht nebst kritischen Bemerkungen zu den paulinischen Hauptbriefen. In this publication Steck aimed at proving that the sketch of primitive church history offered by the Tübingen school was as little in correspondence with fact as the outline given in the Bk of Ac, and that the four principal Epp. of St. Paul are as little entitled to be considered genuine as the smaller Epp. Baur had contented himself with saying, 'There has never been the slightest suspicion cast upon these four Epp. They bear on themselves so incontestably the character of Pauline originality that it is not possible for critical doubt to be exercised upon them with any show of reason.' Very good, says Steck, but where does Baur learn the marks of 'Pauline originality'? Is he not perilously near a petitio principii? He rejects Ac as a true picture of Paul's character: whence, then, does he receive the true impression? Accordingly, Steck applies to Gal the Tübingen method, and finds that it is not genuine. Much has been derived from Ro, but it betrays a more fully developed Paulinism; and the borrowed expressions appear in Gal as stones from an old house built into a new wall. The date must be subsequent to A.D. 70, because Jerus. is said to be in bondage (!). The inviting of attention to the large letters in which Paul writes is a manifest attempt to palm off the Ep. as Pauline. This criticism was answered from the Tübingen side by Holsten and Holtzmann; but by far the most effective reply is to be found in Gloël's Die jüngste Kritik des Galaterbriefes auf ihre Berechtigung geprüft (Erlangen, 1890). See also Lindemann's Die Echtheit der Paulinischen Hauptbriefe gegen Steck's Umsturzversuch vertheidigt. Steck was followed by Völter, who attempted to show (Die Komposition d. Paul. Hauptbriefe, Tübingen, 1890) that Gal is spurious and dependent on Ro and 1 and 2 Co. [A full account of these assaults upon the genuineness and integrity of Gal is given by Knowling in his Witness of the Epistles, pp. 133–243. See also Clemen, Die Einheitlichkeit der Paul. Briefe (Göttingen, 1894), pp. 100–125; and, on the other side, van Manen in Expos. Times, Feb., March, April, 1898].

ii. THE PERSONS ADDRESSED.—These are designated (1^2) 'the churches of Galatia.' Alone among the Epp. of St. Paul this is addressed, not to an individual or to any single church, but to a group of churches. Where are we to look for these churches? For the name 'Galatia' has a wider and a narrower application (see GALATIA). Are 'the churches of G.' to be sought for in the geographically limited district inhabited by the Celtic Galatians, or in the wider region comprehended in the Rom. province, G.? The majority of critics hold that as in the Bk of Ac the term G. is used in the narrower sense to denote the district of G. proper, or original, so this Ep. is addressed to the churches of that remote country, which probably existed in the towns of Ancyra, Pessinus, Germa, and Tavium in the N., and not to the churches of Antioch, Iconium, Lystra, and Derbe in the S. Such is the opinion, e.g., of Weiss, Lipsius, Sieffert, Lightfoot, Davidson, and Godet. On the other hand, the claims of provincial G. have been advocated by such critics as Renan and Perrot in France; Mynster, Weizsäcker, Hausrath, Zahn, and Pfleiderer in Germany. And this opinion has recently been reinforced by the adhesion of Prof. W. M. Ramsay, whose personal knowledge of Asia Minor and acquaintance with its history lend great weight to his judgment.

There are three sources from which light upon this question may be sought: the Bk of Ac, the other Pauline Epp., and this Epistle itself. In the Bk of Ac (13^{14}–14^{24}) we possess a pretty full account of the foundation of churches in S. G., although it is to be noted that the writer uses the ethnographical names, Lycaonia and Pisidia, and not the political designation of the district, G. On the other hand, no account is given nor any notice taken of the founding of churches in N. G. And this silence is not sufficiently accounted for by the fact that at the time of the presumed founding of these churches St. Luke was not St. Paul's companion, for other events of which St. Luke was not an eye-witness are fully described. But if St. Luke joined St. Paul immediately after the apostle had been so warmly received and so successfully engaged in N. G., as by the hypothesis he had been, then certainly it is strange that no notice should be taken of so remarkable a mission. No sure conclusion can be based on this silence, but it is more likely that a letter should have been addressed to churches regarding which we have some information than to those of which St. Luke tells us nothing. For it is to be considered that St. Luke must have known the intense interest which St. Paul took in the churches thus addressed, and would naturally have informed himself and others about them.

The passage in the Bk of Ac ($16^{4\text{-}8}$) in which St. Paul's route from Derbe and Lystra to Troas is described, has been claimed both by the advocates of the N. G. and by the upholders of the S. G. theory. According to Ramsay (Church in Rom. Emp. pp. 74–111), this journey was described by one who wrote under the immediate influence of St. Paul himself. It must therefore be accepted as exact and intelligible. Antioch in Pisidia may be taken as the starting-point, for probably it was while in that city, and while he was making arrangements for passing westwards through Asia to Ephesus, that it was made plain to him that he must not at this time proclaim Christ in Asia. Instead of going W., therefore, he turned to the N. 'And they passed through Phrygia and the region of G.,' and so reached Mysia. Now, it is not to be denied that if any one was so minded it was possible to go from Antioch to Pessinus in G., and from Pessinus to Germa, and at that point to form the design of entering Bithynia. But in this case the force of the topographical notice, that it was when they had come over against Mysia that they proposed to enter Bithynia, is entirely lost.

Accordingly, Prof. Ramsay proposes another route, following the road which runs N.W., and not the road which runs N.E. This road would have led St. Paul and his party into Bithynia, but when they came so far N. as to be opposite Mysia, that is to say, as to have it lying to their left, 'the Spirit of Jesus suffered them not' to enter Bithynia, and therefore, turning to the W., they skirted the southern border of Mysia, and so came to Troas. Certainly, this gives a route that has great probability in its favour. For (1) any one proposing to go from Lystra and Derbe to Bithynia would naturally go by the road passing through Dorylaion, and from this road, or any part of it, it would be out of the way to enter G. proper. And (2) to use Prof. Ramsay's words, 'From N. G. no possible route to Bithynia could be said to bring a traveller to a point 'over against Mysia,' still less 'to the frontier of Mysia.' Another strong point in favour of this route and undelayed journey is this, that in vv.$^{6.7}$ (Ac 16) a single definite journey is described. The statement, 'They passed through Phrygia . . . and when they came opposite Mysia,' seems to leave no room for any such mission in G. as is required by the N. Gal. theory. It is not easily credible that had St. Paul intercalated into this journey a digression eastwards of about 300 miles into N. G., so important a mission would have been passed over in silence.

This theory, however, implies a rendering and a construction of Ac 16^{6} to which exception has been taken. This verse, as it stands in modern editions, reads thus: διῆλθον δὲ τὴν Φρυγίαν καὶ Γαλατικὴν χώραν, κωλυθέντες ὑπὸ τοῦ Ἁγίου Πνεύματος λαλῆσαι τὸν λόγον ἐν τῇ Ἀσίᾳ. Prof. Ramsay contends that Φρυγίαν is here an adj., not a substantive, and that the designation τὴν . . . χώραν means 'the country to which the epithets Phrygian and Galatic apply,' 'the Phrygo-Galatic territory.' This country, Phrygia-Galatica, lies in the southern part of the Rom. province G., and includes Iconium, Lystra, and Antioch of Pisidia. But in the only other passages in which St. Luke mentions Phrygia (Ac 2^{10} and 18^{23}) he uses Φρυγία as a substantive. In the latter of these passages the expression τὴν Γαλατικὴν χώραν καὶ Φρυγίαν throws light on 16^{6}. It may be inferred that in both passages he had the same tract of country in view, and that as in 18^{23} Φρυγία is a substantive, so it is in 16^{6}. And as it is grammatically possible to render the disputed phrase 'Phrygia and the Gal. country,' it becomes very doubtful whether Prof. Ramsay's rendering is tenable.

It has also been supposed that the use of the phrase 'the Gal. country,' and the avoidance of the simple 'Galatia,' implies or suggests that St. Luke may have wished thus to indicate that he was speaking of the whole land that could be called 'Galatian,' rather than of the smaller country which originally was known as G. This is plausible. But it may be that the writer wished to indicate that rural districts as well as cities were evangelized by St. Paul (see 14^{6}).

Again, Prof. Ramsay's construction requires a somewhat unusual and difficult relation of the participle κωλυθέντες to the main verb διῆλθον. The natural construction undoubtedly is that which RV has adopted, involving that St. Paul and the rest passed through Phrygia and G. in consequence of having been prevented from preaching in Asia. But Prof. Ramsay maintains that the sequence of the verbs as they stand in the sentence is the sequence of time: '(1) they went through the Phrygo-Galatic land; (2) they were forbidden to speak in Asia; (3) they came over against Mysia; (4) they essayed to go into Bithynia; (5) the Spirit suffered them not; (6) they passed through Mysia; (7) they came to Troas.'

In this uncertainty the suggestion of Dr. Gifford (Expositor, July 1894) is worthy of consideration. He supposes that the Phrygian and Gal. country is the borderland between the two countries, the E. edge of Phrygia and the W. strip of G. Leaving Antioch, St. Paul, instead of going W. to Ephesus in Asia, as apparently he had intended, went northwards through the Phrygian-Gal. borderland with the purpose of entering Bithynia; but when he came opposite Mysia he was compelled to turn W. to the coast.

In the other Epp. of St. Paul we find one significant allusion to 'the churches of G.,' 1 Co 16^{1} 'Concerning the collection for the saints as I gave order unto the churches of G., so do ye.' Now, if by this designation we are to understand the churches of N. G. exclusively, then how is it that the churches of the S., which he so repeatedly visited and cherished, were not included in this great scheme of beneficence? On this allusion to 'the churches of G.' Dr. Plummer has the following just observation: 'We are not entitled to conclude that because St. Luke, when historically relating the course of St. Paul's journeys, describes the places visited by their precise geographical designations, St. Paul may not have used the word G. in a wide sense when in want of a word to include all the churches which he had founded in the Rom. province of G. In fact, if he had wished to include under one designation the churches of Antioch, Iconium, Derbe, and Lystra, together possibly with others in the adjacent district, it is hard to say what other term he could have used. There is . . . no certain evidence that St. Paul founded churches in G. proper; if he did, these, of course, would be included among the churches of G. But the question is whether we are bound to understand St. Paul's use of the word as excluding all churches save those of G. proper? Now, it is not likely either that when he was organizing a collection for the poor Christians of Jerus., he would omit to appeal to the churches in the Gal. province with which his relations were so intimate, or that he would leave those churches unmentioned when writing to Corinth.'

In the Ep. itself ($4^{13\text{-}15}$) there occurs an allusion to the circumstances in which he first preached the gospel to the churches now addressed, οἴδατε δὲ ὅτι δι' ἀσθένειαν τῆς σαρκὸς εὐηγγελισάμην ὑμῖν τὸ πρότερον, which can only mean, 'you know that it was on account of an infirmity of my flesh I formerly preached to you.' This statement implies that he was weak and ill when in the district referred to, and that but for this weakness he would not have preached in it. Prof. Ramsay ingeniously construes the situation thus: While on his first journey St. Paul caught a fever at Perga, and as its natural cure a change to the higher and purer air of Antioch was prescribed. He reached Antioch with traces of illness upon him, and with liability to its recurrence. This is possible; but may not the 'weakness' have been connected with the stoning he suffered at Lystra? It was after this stoning, which must have left very obvious marks upon him, that he preached in Derbe, Lystra itself, Iconium, and Antioch (Ac $14^{19\text{-}23}$). In this case, as in the course of events suggested by Prof. Ramsay, τὸ πρότερον receives its proper sense, 'on the former of my two visits.' *

But whatever the weakness was, and however incurred, the fact remains that it afforded him an opportunity of preaching in a district where he had no intention of preaching: a district, therefore, which lay on the road to some more attractive field of operation. Now, it will scarcely do to say that G. proper lay on the road to nowhere, for, as we have seen, St. Paul had a desire to enter Bithynia, and might, because debarred from Asia, have chosen to pass through the western edge of G. on his way to the more northern province. It seems, therefore, as easy to construe this expression in keeping with the N. Galatian theory as with the S. Galatian.

We find from the Ep. itself that emissaries from Jerus. had appeared among the Gal. churches, and it has been argued that such persons would scarcely have penetrated so far into the interior of Asia Minor as the N. Gal. theory supposes. But this is both to misconceive the accessibility of the region and to underrate the eager propagandism of the Jew and the antipathy to St. Paul. It is more to the purpose to point to 5^{11} and to find in it an allusion to the circumcision of Timothy, which was well known among the S. Gal. churches, and might naturally be used as a handle against St. Paul, and a ground of charging him with inconsistency.

* The Greek interpreters understood the ἀσθενείαν of persecution. Theodoret, e.g., says: καίτοι πολλὴν ἔφερον ἐπὶ τοῦ σώματος ἀτιμίαν, αἰκιζόμενος καὶ στρεβλούμενος καὶ μυρία ὑπομένων δεινά.

The internal evidence which the Ep. bears, that it was addressed to Celts, cannot be regarded as trustworthy Lightfoot and others have collected very interesting notices of the Celtic character, their sensuousness and impulsiveness, and so forth, and have adduced from the Ep. illustrations of these qualities which are certainly striking. But although these might serve as corroborative evidence to an otherwise strong argument, the insecurity of founding upon them is at once apparent when it is considered how difficult it is to grasp national character, and when we reflect that the Celtic character produces types so diverse as the Irish, the Welsh, and the Highlanders of Scotland.

iii. Occasion of the Epistle.—The Galatians had received St. Paul with extraordinary demonstrations of friendliness (4^{15}). They had felicitated themselves on their good fortune in having him for their guest, and they had received his gospel as a message from heaven, or as if Christ Jesus Himself had come among them (4^{14}). Churches had been formed, and they 'ran bravely' (5^{7}). That a second visit had been paid to these churches before this letter was written, is the natural inference from some expressions which occur in it. The τὸ πρότερον of 4^{13} might merely mean 'formerly,' and not definitely 'on the former of two occasions'; neither is the expression of the 16th verse decisive (ὥστε ἐχθρος ὑμῶν γέγονα ἀληθεύων ὑμῖν), for it is possible that in these words he might be merely alluding to the change of feeling towards him produced by the representations of his enemies, or anticipating the resentment this letter itself might occasion. But when he uses such expressions as those which occur in 1^{9} and 5^{3}, and which point to emphatic warnings uttered when he was among them, it would appear that such warnings are incongruous with the circumstances of his first visit, and must be referred to a second, when he perceived symptoms of defection from the gospel he had proclaimed.

The symptoms he had observed rapidly developed. They were moving away from the free standing of faith to the bondage of the law; they were being circumcised, observing days and new moons and other seasons, and returning to the weak and beggarly elements from which St. Paul believed they had escaped (1^{6} $4^{9,10}$ 5^{3}). In this retrograde movement St. Paul sees a renunciation of grace, a virtual renunciation of Christ (5^{4}). He still tried to persuade himself that irreparable damage had not yet been done (5^{10}); but assuredly the evil leaven was working among them, and 'a little leaven leaveneth the whole lump' (5^{9}).

This sad change had been wrought by the Judaizing party, and apparently in great part by one individual. This individual seems to have been a personage of some distinction. He exerted a fascinating power over the Galatians (3^{1}), and apparently claimed to speak with authority (1^{8}). Whether St. Paul actually knew him is doubtful (see 5^{9} ὅστις ἐὰν ᾖ, and 5^{7} and 3^{1}): that he knew him by name may be taken for granted.

No special reason need be sought to account for the Judaizing party having emissaries in G. The question of the relation of Gentile Christians to the Jewish law was sure, sooner or later, to emerge in every church in which there were any Jewish Christians. Must a Gentile enter Christianity through Judaism? and to what extent is the Mosaic law binding on Gentiles?—these questions must be answered, and the battle between legalism and liberty fought through to the end. Superficially, the Judaizers, who maintained that to become a Christian a man must also become a Jew, had a great deal to say for themselves. The law was a divine institution. The promises had been given to Abraham and his seed. The Messiah was the Messiah of the Jews. Jesus Himself had been circumcised, and had kept the whole law. The original apostles did the same. Was not this an obvious and infallible example? Besides, if the Gentile converts were not to keep the law, how were they to escape from the immoralities in which they had been brought up? And who was this Paul who taught them to neglect the law? What claim had he to be considered an apostle? He did not keep company with Christ while on earth, as the others had done; he was not called, as they had been, to the apostolate by the Lord in His lifetime; he had no external authentication of himself, like their letters of commendation from the mother-church at Jerusalem. The Judaizers did not scruple even to speak slightingly of his appearance, and to insinuate that his motives were impure and his conduct inconsistent with his teaching. When it suited him he practised circumcision, as in the case of Timothy. If, therefore, he had not enjoined it on the Galatians, it was through a desire to please men (5^{11} 1^{10}).

All personal abuse and calumny St. Paul could no doubt have overlooked; what he could not overlook was the Judaizing adulteration or subversion of the gospel of Christ. And the very speciousness of the arguments used, and the characteristic zeal for the law displayed by the Judaizers, all the more emphatically inspired St. Paul with the feeling that the crisis was of tremendous moment, and that his life-work among the Gentiles hung in the balance. For not only was he aware that to demand circumcision and impose the whole Mosaic law on the Gentile world, was to undertake a hopeless task, but also he perceived that it would obscure the gospel of Christ. He saw, as apparently no other man of influence saw, that to represent anything else than the cross of Christ as essential to salvation, was really to affirm that the cross alone was not sufficient. St. Paul recognized that it was either the law or Christ; that a man could not be justified by both. 'Behold, I Paul say unto you, that if ye receive circumcision, Christ will profit you nothing' (5^{2}); 'ye are severed from Christ, ye who would be justified by the law: ye are fallen away from grace' (5^{4} κατηργήθητε ἀπὸ Χριστοῦ οἵτινες ἐν νόμῳ δικαιοῦσθε, τῆς χάριτος ἐξεπέσατε). The importance of the crisis cannot be over-estimated. 'It really seemed as if the mighty enthusiasm of Pentecost might sink into respectable legalism, as if Christianity might be strangled in its cradle by the iron hand of the law, as if it might sink into an obscure Jewish sect, and disappear in the national ruin, instead of breaking its fetters, spreading its mighty spiritual pinions, and claiming the universal heaven as its home' (Bishop Moorhouse, Dangers of the Apostolic Age, p. 21).

Date of the Epistle.—The date of the Ep. has been, and still is, contested. It has been assigned by different critics to the beginning, to the close, and to every intermediate stage of its author's epistolary activity. It stands first in the canon of Marcion; but there is reason to believe that this canon was not arranged in chronological order (Tertul. adv. Marcion. v. 2). One or two modern scholars, as Michaelis, Koppe, Zahn, have placed it earliest among the Epp. of St. Paul; while Koehler and Schrader consider it the latest (Davidson, Introd. i. 73). Calvin held that it was written before the Council at Jerus., and that the visit to Jerus., which St. Paul relates in Gal 2, is the same as that which is mentioned in Ac 11^{30}, and is not that of Ac 15. This view has received the powerful advocacy of Prof. Ramsay (Expositor, Aug. 1895), who argues that the account of the journey in Ac 11. 12 is 'in the most singular agreement' with the narrative of Gal 2. Hausrath dogmatically pronounces that the Ep. was written in the autumn of 53, and on the following ingeniously discovered ground: 'As the Gal. are on the point of joining with the synagogue in celebrating the beginning of the sabbatical year (Gal 4^{10}), lasting from Sept. 53 to Sept. 54, the Ep. must date from the autumn of 53, in which St. Paul crossed into Macedonia' (Time of the Apostles, iii. 188. Hausrath, of course, holds the S. Gal. theory). Renan, again, places the Ep. between the second and third missionary journeys, and dates it from Antioch.

The majority of continental critics, however, such as Weiss, Holtzmann, Siefert, Lipsius, and Godet, place it very early in the Ephesian residence, and consequently first of the four great Epp. In this finding they are considerably influenced by the οὕτως ταχέως of 1^6. This expression, it is supposed, involves that no long time can have elapsed between St. Paul's second visit to the Gal. churches and this letter. Lightfoot, however, has shown (Gal. pp. 41, 42) that this conclusion rests on two erroneous assumptions: (1) that 'so soon' means 'so soon after I left you'; whereas it rather refers to the time of their conversion; and (2) that a period so indicated cannot embrace more than a few months; whereas 'quickness and slowness are relative terms,' and the expression might have been used 'though a whole decade of years had passed since they were first brought to the knowledge of Christianity.' Warfield, irrespective of the οὕτως ταχέως, finds reasons for placing the Ep. before the other three which belong to this period, 'only a few weeks at most before 1 Co,' i.e. 'about or somewhat earlier than the passover time of the year A.D. 57.' His strongest argument is drawn from 1 Co 9^2 'If to others I am not an apostle, yet to you at least I am,' in which he finds an allusion to the recent disparagement of St. Paul's apostleship among the Galatians. (Journ. of Exegetical Soc. Paper read in Dec. 1884).

Lightfoot and Salmon bring the Ep. down a few months later, and date it from Corinth early in the year A.D. 58. The resemblances between Gal and 2 Co and Ro are obvious. The ideas suggested in Gal 3 and 4 regarding the Spirit as the promise of the Father, and as the true emancipator and sign of sonship, are elaborated in Ro 8. The impossibility of salvation by works, or of finding anything but a curse in the law, is taken up again in Ro and expounded at large. But neither can there be any doubt regarding the priority of the Ep. to the Galatians. The similarity and dissimilarity between the two Epp. are of that kind which tends to show that the Ep. to the Gal. could not have been written either after or contemporary with the Ep. to the Rom., and that it was not, therefore, a compendium of it; nor is it probable that it was written very long before it. See Jowett, St. Paul's Epp.[1] i. 240 (2nd ed. om.).

The similarity to 2 Co is also apparent. There is the same self-defensive tone and the same invective against those teachers who interfered with his work. In Corinth as well as in G. emissaries from Jerus. were at work; but in the Cor. Ep. no elaborate exposure of their doctrinal error is given. The conflict between himself and the Judaizers has not reached the doctrinal stage. And hence it is argued that the Ep. to the Gal., in which this stage is reached, and in which, together with a defence of his apostolic authority, there is also an elaborate exposure of the error of the Judaizers, must be later than the 2nd to the Corinthians. This conclusion, though not certain, is highly probable.

Recently, however, fresh indications of date have been pointed out by Ramsay and McGiffert. The former in his illuminating papers on the Ep. (Expositor, 1898) argues with much force that it was written from Antioch at the close of the second missionary journey (Ac 18^{22}). It was on that journey St. Paul had circumcised Timothy (Ac 16^{1-3}), and this gave plausibility to the insinuation of the Judaizers that when it suited him he preached circumcision (Gal 5^{11}). It was on that journey also he delivered to the Galatians the decrees ordained at Jerus. (Ac 16^4), and this might seem to give colour to the allegation that he was the mere messenger of the higher officials and not himself an apostle (Gal 1. 2). McGiffert, on the other hand, thinks it is unquestionable that in Gal 2 St. Paul is relating events about which the Galatians had no previous knowledge, at least from him; while it is incredible that he should have visited G. subsequent to these events without speaking of them. On these and other grounds, therefore, McGiffert (Apostol. Age, pp. 227–8) thinks it probable that the Ep. was written from Antioch previous to his departure on the second missionary journey. Subsequently, the Judaizers, while they might, as at Antioch, refuse to eat with the Gentiles, could scarcely urge their circumcision without seeming to break with the mother-church.

CONTENTS OF THE EPISTLE.—The Epistle divides itself into three almost equal portions—a personal, a doctrinal, and a practical. In the first two chapters St. Paul disposes of the insinuations which the Judaizers had made against his authority and standing as an apostle. In the two following chapters he explains the relation of the law to Christ, or of Mosaism to Christianity. And in the closing chapters he refutes the allegation that liberty and licence are the same.

To the disparagement of his apostolic standing, and consequently of the gospel he preached, he makes a threefold reply: (1) He declares himself to be an apostle, not sent merely from a Christian community, or commissioned by a human authority, but by Jesus Christ; and this he proves by a brief narrative of his movements subsequent to his conversion, by which it is made apparent that his gospel could not have been learned from men (ch. 1). (2) It was only after he had been preaching for many years that he went at length to confer with the apostles at Jerus.; and even then, so far from receiving additional light or being reprimanded, he received from them acknowledgment and encouragement (2^{1-10}). (3) Instead of being instructed by the older apostles, or being obliged to occupy a subordinate place, he himself had occasion to rebuke St. Peter and assume the position of instructor (2^{11-21}).

Next, St. Paul examines the dogmatic significance of the demand that the Gentiles should keep the whole law. And first he appeals to their own experience. As Christian men they had received the Spirit. Had this all-comprehending gift become theirs by the observance of the law? They knew it was not so; they had received the Spirit as a gift. Believing God's offer of the Spirit, they had accepted what God gave (3^{1-5}). Nor was this an exceptional or novel experience. It was the same with the typical justified man, Abraham. Whatever he enjoyed of God's favour he had by faith (3^{6-9}). Indeed, so far from the law having power to bless, it has only power to curse, and on this account and from this curse Christ came to redeem us (3^{10-14}). Moreover, hundreds of years before the law was heard of, the promise had been given to Abraham, and could not be made of none effect by any subsequently introduced institution. The promise held the field. It was given irrespective of the law, and could not be annulled by it. And yet the law was not superfluous. It had its use. It was added to instruct the conscience, that men might know their sin to be transgression, and might learn to crave righteousness. It was meant to stimulate men to crave the coming of the Spirit.

And thus it served the purpose of a schoolmaster, or of the guardian who took charge of boys under age. But when the fulness of time is come the guardian is no more needed, the full-grown son having received the spirit of his father (3^{15}–4^{7}). Lastly, out of the law itself St. Paul brings proof that there is a better thing than law, even liberty. This he does by allegorizing the story of Ishmael and Isaac.

In the third division of the Ep. (5. 6) St. Paul proceeds to vindicate Christian liberty against all aspersions. First of all (5^{1-12}), he exhorts the Gal. to stand fast in their liberty, and to beware of coming under bondage to minute observances. On the other hand, he warns them against using this liberty as an occasion to the flesh (5^{13}–6^{10}). In a brief conclusion, written with his own hand in the large characters which distinguished it from the more clerkly writing of his amanuensis, he contrasts his own devotedness and affectionate attitude towards them with the selfish aims of the Judaizers.

Hence, as Godet says, 'This Ep. marks an epoch in the history of man; it is the ever-precious document of his spiritual emancipation.'

DIFFICULTIES RAISED BY THE EPISTLE.—1. Its discrepancy with the Acts of the Apostles.—Baur (Paul, c. v.) maintains that the autobiographical statements made by St. Paul in Gal 2 shed an unfavourable light on the Ac, 'the statements in which can only be looked at as intentional deviations from hist. truth in the interest of the special tendency which they possess.' Weizsäcker (Das Apostol. Zeitalter. p. 87 ff., Eng. tr. i. 102) follows in Baur's steps with pedantic rigour.

(1) The first discrepancy which is discovered by a comparison of the two narratives is that whereas St. Paul says that three years elapsed after his conversion before he returned to Jerus., St. Luke says (Ac 9^{23}), ὡς δὲ ἐπληροῦντο ἡμέραι ἱκαναί (which Weizsäcker inaccurately renders 'nur einige Tage,' 'only a few days'), he was compelled to leave Damascus. To find here a discrepancy damaging to the trustworthiness of Ac, is to neglect the consideration that St. Paul had a reason for giving the exact time, while St. Luke had no occasion to be definite and rigidly exact. (2) A second discrepancy urged by Baur has more weight. St. Luke says (9^{26}) that when St. Paul came to Jerus. he sought to attach himself to the disciples, but they feared him. How was it possible that the Christians of Jerus. should not have heard of his conversion? There was constant communication between the two places, and St. Paul was so outstanding a figure that it is difficult to believe that his adhesion to the Christian Church should not have been known to all Jerusalem. It has been urged that his absence in Arabia may have withdrawn him from attention; that he may not have occupied the outstanding position at that time which subsequent events suggest, and, indeed, although commissioned to Damascus, it seems to have been at his own request, and not because he was selected by the Sanhedrin. Besides, even in St. Paul's own account (Gal 1^{23}), it appears that he was still known rather as the persecutor than as a convert. And, on the other hand, even in Luke's account, it is apparent that some, e.g. Barnabas, knew of his conversion. The introduction by Barnabas has certainly the air of truth. No doubt difficulties remain; but not such as discredit the account in Ac, considering the very different points of view of the two writers. (3) A third discrepancy is found in the statement of St. Paul, that he saw none of the apostles but Peter; whereas St. Luke says that Barnabas 'brought him to the apostles . . . and he was with them going in and going out at Jerus., preaching boldly in the name of the Lord' (Ac $9^{27.28}$). Weizsäcker is here again inaccurate in alleging that St. Paul himself assures us that he got to know no one in the Church, and that he continued for years to be personally unknown to the members. This is not what St. Paul says. He states that he saw no other apostle besides Peter, and that he remained unknown to the Churches of Judæa. Whether he became acquainted with Christians who were not apostles, and whether he preached in Jerus. or not, he does not say. The discrepancy really amounts to this, that in the one account he is represented as being introduced to the apostles as a body, in the other to St. Peter alone. (4) The difficulties which Baur raises, and which Weizsäcker inherits, regarding the visit to Jerus. which Luke interpolates between the two mentioned by St. Paul, are trifling and fictitious. Weizsäcker's ground for rejecting this visit is that 'Paul assures us he was seen by no one in Jerus.' during the fourteen years which elapsed between the first and second visits mentioned in Gal. Where St. Paul makes this statement we do not know. (5) The discrepancies which the Tübingen school at one time found between Gal 2 and Ac 15 have been rather thrown into the background by the living members of that school. Pfleiderer, e.g., says (Hibbert Lect. p. 103, cf. p. 111), 'the agreement as to the chief points is in any case greater than the discrepancies in the details, and these discrepancies can be for the most part explained simply by the difference of the standpoint of the relaters.'

It is further objected that the conduct ascribed to St. Paul in the Ac is inconsistent with the attitude he assumes and the principles he maintains in Gal. In Ac he is represented as circumcising Timothy (16^{3}), as shaving his head in fulfilment of a vow (18^{18}), as attending the Jewish feasts (20^{16}), and as being at charges for four men who had a vow on them ($21^{23.24}$). Such acts of conformity to the law are, it is thought, incompatible with the principle St. Paul lays down in the Ep., 'If ye be circumcised, Christ shall profit you nothing.' The solution is obvious. When St. Paul makes this strong statement, what he means is, If you observe the ordinances of Moses because you believe them to be necessary to salvation, Christ shall profit you nothing. Together with this fundamental principle he held also as an ethical maxim, that it is right to become all things to all men, a Jew to the Jew if need be. And when he observes the Mosaic ordinances in the temple, it is not because he believes they have any virtue for salvation, but because he wishes to give no offence to his Jewish brethren. These Jewish observances have become to him matters of indifference, and only when they are lifted out of their proper position and considered essentials do they become dangerous. 'Neither is circumcision anything, nor uncircumcision' (Gal 6^{15}, cf. 1 Co 7^{18}). That he did not yield when it was demanded of him as a matter of principle that he should circumcise Titus, is perfectly consistent with his circumcising Timothy as a concession to expediency. No doubt St. Paul's principle carried with it the inference that as circumcision and the keeping of the whole ceremonial law were unnecessary for the Gentiles they were unnecessary for Jews also. But if the Jew clung to the temple service, the stated hours of prayer, and other observances, while at the same time he recognized that Christ alone was sufficient for salvation, St. Paul rather defended than denounced his position. So long as the observances of the law were treated as matters of indifference, St. Paul was content to leave the Jewish conscience to the education which time must bring. His attitude towards things indifferent is fully explained in 1 Co 8, 10^{23-33}.

2. Collision with St. Peter at Antioch.—In Gal 2^{11-14} we find a description of a scene which is certainly derogatory to the dignity of St. Peter, and which casts suspicion even on his authority. Naturally, this has quickened in the interpreting mind a desire in some way to shield the great apostle. Clement of Alex. held that the Cephas of Gal 2 was not the apostle, but 'one of the seventy disciples, a man who bore the same name' (Euseb. HE I. xii. 2). Although many persons adopted this view, it was so manifestly untenable that the idea was started that the two apostles arranged the scene for the edification of the people, who might thus more clearly see the folly of Judaizing. The champion of this idea was Jerome, who, however, says that it was first broached by Origen. A somewhat angry correspondence followed between Augustine and Jerome, in which the former found it easy to expose the lameness of the proposed interpretation. He maintained that 'to speak well of a falsehood uttered in God's behalf was a crime not less, perhaps even greater, than to speak ill of His truth' (see Augustine's Letters, esp. 28 and 40). Strangely enough, the idea seemed to attract many minds. Chrysostom advocated it, and Theodore speaks of it as at any rate a possible view ['sive consensu ipsam controversiam inter se simulaverunt pro aliorum utilitate, sunt vere quidem mirandi, eo quod omnia ad aliorum utilitatem facere adquieverunt']. The point is treated with fulness in Lightfoot, Gal., 127–131.

LITERATURE.—The four great Greek commentators, Chrysostom, Theodore of Mopsuestia, Theodoret, and Theophylact, are always lucid and sensible, although the two last named are for the most part reproductions of the two first mentioned. The late Bishop Lightfoot in his Commentary on the Epistle devoted several pages (pp. 223–232) to an account and estimate of the patristic and mediæval writers who have dealt with it. To this nothing need be added except that the com. of Theodore can now be consulted in the convenient ed. of Dr. Swete published by the Camb. Univ. Press in 1880–1882. Among the Latin Fathers, Jerome and Augustine have both left expositions of this Epistle, the former esp. being of value. Among the Reformers, Luther, Calvin, and Beza may be consulted with advantage. Estius, Bengel, and Wetstein contribute much from their special points of view. Among more recent expositions the following are worthy of mention: Usteri, Komm. über d. Gal. (1833); Schott, Epistolæ P. ad Thess. et Gall. (1834); Windischmann (Roman Cath.) *Erklärung d. GALBANUM (חֶלְבְּנָה, ḥelbĕnâh, χαλβάνη, galbanum).—A gum resin, Ferula galbaniflua, Boiss. et Buhse; and F. rubricaulis, Boiss. It is known in Arab. by the name ḳinnah, and in Persian as birzed. It occurs in the form of tears and lumps. The tears are round, yellow to brownish-yellow, translucent, and not larger than a pea. The lump galbanum is more common, and consists of irregular masses of a brownish or brownish-yellow colour, composed of agglutinated tears. Fruits with bits of stem and other impurities are mixed with the resin. The odour is balsamic. Pliny (Nat. Hist. xii. 56) declares it to be a product of a kind of giant fennel, growing in Amanus. There are many species of Ferula, Ferulago, Colladonia, and other large Umbelliferæ in Amanus, but no such gum is now extracted from any of them, and none of the plants reputed to yield galbanum grow there. Pliny (l.c.) and Virgil (Georg. iii. 415) say that its smoke drives away serpents. G. is imported from India and the Levant. It is mentioned only once in the OT (Ex 30^{34}) as an ingredient of the sacred incense, and once in Apocr. (Sir 24^{15}).

GALEED (גַּלְעֵד 'cairn of witness,' LXX Βουνὸς μαρτυρεῖ, E -λου).—The name which, according to Gn 31^{47}, was given by Jacob to the cairn erected on the occasion of the compact between him and Laban. There is evidently a characteristic attempt also to account in this way for the name Gilead. The respective proceedings of Jacob and of Laban are uncertain, for the narrative is not only of composite origin, but has suffered through the introduction of glosses into the text. Kautzsch-Socin remark that even if v.^{47} belonged originally to E (which Wellh. strongly denies, setting it down as a gloss due to pure pedantry), it is certainly introduced by R in the wrong place. A similar remark applies to v.^{48} 'Therefore was the name of it called Galeed,' which probably was derived from J. There is a confusion in the present text due to the attempt to harmonize E's account of the erection of a maṣṣēbāh with the statement of J that it was a 'cairn' (גַּל) that was erected. It is pretty certain that we should read 'Laban' instead of 'Jacob' in v.^{45} (so Wellh., Dillm.). The LXX seeks unsuccessfully to reduce the narrative to order by means of transpositions.

* GALILÆAN (Γαλιλαῖος).—An inhabitant of Galilee. The apostles, who spoke with divers tongues on the day of Pentecost, were said by the crowd to be Galilæans, which made the matter all the more surprising (Ac 2^7); a massacre of Galilæans by Pilate was reported to Jesus (Lk 13^1); Pilate spoke of Jesus as a Galilæan (Lk 23^6); Peter was told, when trying to conceal the fact that he was a Galilæan, that it was useless for him to do so, as his speech* betrayed him (Mk 14^{70}); the attitude of the Galilæans towards Jesus is contrasted with that of the Jerusalemites (Jn 4^{45}). In the article GALILEE some traits of the inhabitants are mentioned, to which very much might be added. They were healthy, brave, and industrious; they developed the resources of their province in a wonderful manner; they were skilful merchants, and added to their wealth by shipping their commodities to other parts of the world; from a religious point of view, they were the most liberal-minded people of Palestine; they were enterprising, intelligent, and possessed a poetical talent of very high order; and in the great struggle with Rome, A.D. 66–70, they were the strongest defenders of liberty of whom the Jewish nation could boast.

* GALILEE (גָּלִיל הַגּוֹיִם, הַגָּלִילָה, גְּלִיל הַגּוֹיִם, Γαλιλαία).—It is singular that a province so well known as Galilee was in NT times, and occupying the place it did in the history of the Jewish nation, is mentioned but six times in OT (Dillm. also in Jos 12^{23}). Three of these being identical (Jos 20^7 21^{32}, 1 Ch 6^{76})—a mere statement of the fact that Kedesh, the city of refuge, was in Galilee—the number is reduced to four. When Kedesh is mentioned (in these three passages), also the invasion of Tiglath-pileser (2 K 15^{29}), and Solomon's present of twenty cities to Hiram (1 K 9^{11}), Galilee is spoken of in the same familiar manner that it is in NT or in Josephus. There remains one instance only which attracts our attention, namely, Is 9^1 'Galilee of the nations.'† This has always been admitted to be a difficult passage. The only biblical commentary is the historical notice of Tiglath-pileser's invasion (2 K 15^{29}), 'he took Ijon, and Abel-beth-maacah, and Janoah, and Kedesh, and Hazor, and Gilead, and Galilee, all the land of Naphtali.' Here Galilee appears to be as well known as Gilead; and no hint is furnished as to its extent or character. The same can be said of the transaction between Hiram and Solomon (1 K $9^{11ff.}$); for whatever meaning the word 'Cabul' may have, it is evident that Solomon considered the twenty cities a proper and ample compensation for the favours he had received from Hiram.

Thus far we have gained little except to learn that the Bible gives us no account of the origin of the word Galilee, of how large an area it embraced at first, or of how it came to be applied to all the northern part of Palestine.

Palestine west of the Jordan was, in the time of our Lord, divided into three provinces, Judæa, Samaria, and Galilee. The latter was the most northern, and occupied in general the territory that had been assigned by Joshua to the four tribes, Asher, Naphtali, Zebulun, and Issachar.

* Alluding probably to a Galilæan habit of confounding the gutturals (Smith, HGHL 423 n.; Dalm., Gram. d. Aram. 5, 42f.).

† The word, which has regularly the art., 'the gâlîl,' appears to mean 'circle' or 'district.' Apparently, Is 9^1 gives the full title.

 Copyright, 1899, by Charles Scribner's Sons

It extended to the Jordan on the E., the Leontes, Litany, on the N., the territory of Tyre, which was then a narrow strip of seacoast, on the W., and below the territory of Tyre it touched the Mediterranean and included Ptolemais (Accho) and Mount Carmel, and on the S. the line, which was irregular, passed near Ginea (Jenin), included Scythopolis or Bethshean to the E., Taanach and Megiddo to the W., and followed the Carmel ridge to the Mediterranean. Its extent in miles was about sixty from north to south, and about thirty from east to west.

Josephus divides the province into Upper and Lower Galilee. Lower Galilee extended east and west from Carmel to the Jordan; the S. line would be that already indicated as passing near Jenin, and the N. boundary included Arbela on the west of the Sea of Galilee, and also Jotapata (Jefat). Tarichea, Tiberias, Sepphoris (the capital of Galilee during a large portion of Christ's life), Cana, and Nazareth were all in Lower Galilee. The boundaries of Upper Galilee are given by Josephus (Wars, III. iii. 1; Life, 37), and were no doubt well understood by his readers; but it is difficult for us to indicate its limits, since the places noted still remain unidentified. The district extended from Bersabe on the S. to Baca on the N., and from Thella, a place bordering on the Jordan, to Meroth on the west.

In the year B.C. 47 Galilee had as military governor a young man then but twenty-five years of age, who subsequently became known to the world as Herod the Great. He had been appointed to this position by his father, Antipater, and proved a successful ruler. After his death, in B.C. 4, his son Antipas was made tetrarch of Galilee, and, since he was not banished by Caligula till A.D. 39, he governed the province during the entire life of our Lord. During the reign of Antipas, Galilee was bounded on the E. by the dominions of his half-brother Herod Philip II. After the removal of Antipas, Galilee came under the rule of Herod Agrippa I., who died in A.D. 44 as described in Ac 12. Although these men ruled by the favour of Rome, they were still native rulers, and in that fact the inhabitants felt a degree of pride, because their dependent state was thereby made less apparent and no doubt far less galling.

In comparing Galilee with other portions of the Holy Land, there are certain respects in which it can claim to be unique. In fact it would be difficult to find anywhere else on the globe another district of equal size whose natural characteristics are so wonderfully diversified as are those of Galilee.

The white dome of Hermon was ever present to the inhabitants as much as if that mountain had risen from their own soil, and the same was true of the wide expanse of the Mediterranean to the west. The long line of seacoast with its cities of wealth and its composite life must be taken into the account, and on the other side the depression of the Jordan Valley, in which, 700 ft. below the level of the Mediterranean, lay the Sea of Galilee. In Lower Galilee the group of Nazareth hills was picturesque; isolated Tabor had a grandeur and a beauty of its own, while in Upper Galilee but a single peak, Jebel Jermuk, reached a height of 4000 ft.; 2000 to 2500 ft. being the general elevation. Nowhere were the mountains rugged, their gradual slopes and the intervening valleys were always attractive. The Esdraelon plain was of inexhaustible fertility, and so was the region about Lakes Merom and Tiberias. The climate was all that could be desired; the temperature was mild on the seacoast, hot in the Jordan Valley, and always cool in the highlands. The air was invigorating, and no doubt it was owing partly to this fact that the Galilæans were always noted for being healthy, hardy, and brave. The forests, meadows, and pastures, the tilled fields and gardens, the vineyards and olive orchards, the broad acres covered with wheat and barley, the fountains, streams, lakes, and rivers, the prosperous cities and towns which dotted the land, made the aspect of the country singularly varied and attractive.

In the Blessing of Moses (Dt 33) upon the tribes occupying this territory there are suggestive hints as to its natural features and the peculiar productions of its fertile soil. Special characteristics of these highlanders are brought out in other portions of OT which are fully confirmed and illustrated by what we learn from other sources, regarding both country and people. The NT, Josephus, the Talmud, and modern research present attractive, not to say fascinating, pictures of this highly favoured land.

How frequently in the Gospels are the 'cities and villages' of Galilee mentioned, leading us to suppose that its surface was thickly covered with flourishing centres of life. While Josephus praises the fertility and populousness of the entire province, he rises to enthusiasm when he describes the Plain of Gennesaret, 'that unparalleled garden of God' (Wars, III. iii. 2, 3; x. 8). 'For sixteen miles about Sepphoris,' says the Talmud, 'the region is fertile, flowing with milk and honey.' 'The land of Naphtali is everywhere covered with fruitful fields and vines, and its fruits are renowned for their wonderful sweetness' (Talm. Bab. Megilla 6[a]). Five of Solomon's commissariat officers were assigned to this region, who furnished for the royal table fine flour, meal, and barley, great numbers of fat oxen, also pasture-fed oxen, sheep, harts, gazelles, roebucks, and fatted fowl (1 K $4^{22.23}$).

In early times the forests of Galilee were extensive, and even in the country's present degradation they are deserving of notice, for there, besides many flowering trees, shrubs, and aromatic plants, we find the vine, the olive, and the fig, the oak, the hardy walnut, the terebinth, and the hot-blooded palm, the cedar, cypress, and balsam, the fir tree, the pine, the sycomore, the bay tree, the mulberry, the almond, the pomegranate, the citron, and the beautiful oleander. And, among other productions of the soil, Galilee can still boast of wheat, barley, millet, pulse, indigo, rice, sugar cane, oranges, pears, apricots, and some other fruits, besides vegetables in great variety (Merrill, Galilee in the time of Christ, pp. 14–21).

But a fine climate, a rich forest growth, great fertility of soil, and a wealth of vegetation presuppose an abundant supply of water, and in this respect Galilee was notably favoured. One might almost say that the lawgiver had this province specially in mind when he promised the Hebrews that they were to enter a 'land of brooks of water, of fountains and depths, springing forth in valleys and hills' (Dt 8^{7}). Lake Merom and Lake Tiberias both belonged to Galilee, and the latter was justly the pride of the nation. The Jordan flowed through them both, and the water of both was sweet and clear.

All of the Jordan north of the Sea of Galilee and one-third of its length to the south of that was reckoned to Galilee. The sources of this river at Banias and Dan are remarkable for their natural features and for the volume of water which in each bursts forth from the ground. From the eastern side of the watershed of Galilee numerous small streams flow into the Jordan, while those on the west side make their way into the Mediterranean. Of the latter one of the most celebrated was the Kishon (Nahr Mukaṭṭa), which took its rise near the foot of Tabor, and after a winding course across the plain of Esdraelon entered the sea near the base of Carmel. This stream had a number of feeders from the north, from Mount Gilboa and the region of En-gannim, and also from the south. This is 'that ancient river' famed in the triumph song of Deborah and Barak (Jg 5).

Near Acre another stream entered the Mediterranean, the Belus (Nahr Naman), regarded as the Shihor-libnath of Jos 19[26], with which is connected the interesting tradition that from its fine sand the Phœnicians first made glass. It is a fact that this sand was so highly prized that numerous ships came here to convey it to the glass shops of Tyre and Sidon, then the most famous in the world. The supply was thought to be inexhaustible (Pliny, HN xxxvi. 65).

All vegetation in Galilee would be affected by the 'dew of Hermon' which is praised in Ps 133[3], and snow from this mountain was carried as a luxury to Tyre and Sidon, and to Sepphoris and Tiberias the capitals of Herod Antipas. Springs and fountains were so abundant in Galilee that it would be next to impossible to count them. In addition to these, notice must be taken of the Hot Springs of this province, which had a world-wide fame as resorts for health and pleasure. Those at Tiberias were probably the most celebrated, and their medicinal advantages were known even in Rome (Pliny, HN v. 15). The benefit to be derived from bathing in this hot sulphur water was so great that not only the common people but people of learning and rank came hither, seeking by this means to restore their health (Jos. Life, 16; Jer. Talmud, Shab. 3[a]). These springs had a rival in those of Gadara, about two hours S.E. of the Sea of Galilee, where still existing ruins of a small theatre, bath houses, paved courts, beautifully carved stone seats or chairs, dressing rooms, etc., indicate the luxurious provision that was made for the guests (Merrill, East of the Jordan, pp. 150–153).

One would hardly expect to find that Galilee, directly under the perpetual snows of Hermon, would be subject to earthquakes; still such is the fact, and several very severe calamities are on record as having visited that country. In 1759 Safed was destroyed by an earthquake, and another in 1837 killed five thousand people out of a total population of about nine thousand. Chasms opened in the earth, and the houses being built on a steep hillside fell one upon another, and the ruin was terrible. Tiberias at the same time was visited in like manner, and half its inhabitants killed. The ravages then caused are still evident in ruined houses and in the cracked and twisted walls of the city, which have never been repaired.

Although there had been a large deportation of its inhabitants by Tiglath-pileser, and no doubt much destruction of life in other wars, Galilee seems to have entirely recovered from these calamities, for there is abundant evidence that in our Lord's time the country was densely populated. The conditions of life there—climate, soil, enterprise, and industry, and a ready market for all products—favoured such a result. The exact number of its inhabitants at any given time may be a matter of speculation; it has been reckoned from two millions to three millions at the beginning of our era; but since it was then customary for people to congregate in cities and towns, we shall be aided in our judgment if we turn our attention briefly to them. When the division of the land took place among the four tribes, sixty-nine cities at least are mentioned by name. Josephus in his account of Galilee mentions by name about forty cities and villages. It is interesting to note that of the nineteen cities assigned to Naphtali sixteen were 'fenced' (עָרֵי מִבְצָר), Jos 19[35]. About the Sea of Galilee there were ten or twelve flourishing towns. Were not this fact corroborated by historical evidence, it might be disputed were one to judge solely by the present ruined condition of that region.

Beginning at Tiberias and going round by the S. we come first to Bethmaus, where was a synagogue, and which consequently ranked as a city. Beyond that was Tarichea, famous for its ship-building and its fisheries, of whose inhabitants six thousand young men were sent by Vespasian to Corinth to work on the Isthmus canal, and thirty thousand more were sold as slaves (Wars, III. x. 10). A fine bridge crossed the Jordan where it leaves the Lake, and beyond that on the E. side was Gergesa, the scene of the demoniacs and the herd of swine (Mt 8[28-34]). On the brow of the mountain E. of Gergesa was Gamala, 'the strongest city in that part' (Wars, II. xx. 4), which withstood a siege of seven months, and was subdued only when Vespasian led against it three of his legions. Near Gamala was Hippos, one of the cities of the Decapolis. At the N.E. corner of the Lake was Julias, which previous to our era bore the name of Bethsaida, and which Herod Philip II. transformed into a beautiful and flourishing city, where he himself in A.D. 34 was buried in a costly tomb. On the W. side we have Chorazin, not far from the Lake, and Capernaum, Bethsaida, and Magdala directly on the shore. Capernaum was called Christ's 'own city' (Mt 9[1]); Bethsaida was the home of Philip, Andrew, and Peter, possibly also of Zebedee and his sons James and John; and Magdala is memorable for the touching story of Mary and her connexion with our Lord. Close to Magdala, just above the famous robber-caves of Wady Haman, was Beth-arbel, a stronghold from the earliest times (Hos 10[14]). We have now reached our starting-point, Tiberias, which was a city of great political importance, having been rebuilt in magnificent style by Herod Antipas not long before Christ began His public ministry, when it became the capital of the province.

No more than a glance at the country itself is needed to convince one that this province possessed an unusual number of large towns, to some of which was attached special historic interest. There may be mentioned Safed, visible from the shore of the Sea of Galilee, 'a city set upon a hill,' one of the sacred cities of the Jews; Hazor, the royal city of king Jabin (Jg 4[2]); Cana, where our Lord's first miracle was performed (Jn 2); Sephoris, the capital of the province till it was removed to Tiberias,—it was a strong place, where was a royal magazine of arms, and where the public archives were kept; Kedesh, one of the cities of refuge, and, under Tyrian rule, a centre of pagan worship; Jotapata, where one of the longest and most desperate sieges during the war with Rome took place; Tabor, conspicuous and beautiful in its position, and strongly fortified from the earliest times; Japha, which 'had very strong walls and a large number of inhabitants' (Jos. Life, 45); Zabulon, whose houses were built after the model of those of Tyre, Sidon, and Beirût, that is, with great elegance and of unusual height; Gabara, mentioned with Tiberias and Sepphoris, as one of the largest cities of Galilee (Jos. Life, 25); Gadara, where Vespasian's first blow was struck in his campaign in Galilee (Wars, III. vii. 1); Bethshean, interesting in its ancient history, and still more famous under its new name Scythopolis; Ptolemais, where the Roman fleet and army gathered that had come to destroy the Jews as a nation; and, finally, Cæsarea Philippi, which under the name Banias was a seat of idol-worship ten centuries before it was known to the Greeks, and by these people in turn transformed into a shrine of Pan under the name Paneas.

adorned by Herod the Great, and still more by his son Herod Philip II., a place visited by Vespasian as the guest of Herod Agrippa II., and later by Titus, wonderfully attractive in its situation, but chiefly interesting to the Christian from its connexion with our Lord. This rapid review, which embraces only a few of the better-known places of Galilee, indicates that wherever we turn our eyes, on hillside or plain, we look upon town, city, or village of prosperous Galilee, and the conclusion is forced upon us that its population was dense.

Among the productions of Galilee, the olive was perhaps the most prominent. In the Blessing of Moses it is said of Asher, 'let him dip his foot in oil' (Dt 33^{24}). The Rabbis said, 'In Asher oil flows like a river,' and 'It is easier to raise a legion of olive trees in Galilee than to raise one child in Judæa.' Both Syrians and Phœnicians, and frequently people from a greater distance, obtained their main supply of oil from this province. Great stores of it existed in Jotapata, so that in the siege of that place by the Romans oil was heated and poured over the soldiers who were crowding up to the walls, and, as it was at the same time set on fire, the effect was terribly disastrous. Of the vast quantity of oil which Solomon gave yearly to king Hiram, 150,000 or 200,000 gallons, a large proportion was supplied from Galilee (2 Ch 2^{10}). It is needless to add that the amount of revenue derived from this source was great.

Next to the oil, the amount of wheat raised in Galilee was equally surprising. For this article the demand of Phœnicia, whose ships went over the world, was enormous. In Ac 12^{20}, when war was on the point of breaking out between Herod Agrippa I. and the people of Tyre and Sidon, the latter succeeded in appeasing Herod's anger, which for them was most fortunate, since without the supplies of various kinds which they derived from his country they could not live.

Not only oil, wheat, and barley, but large quantities of dried figs, grapes, wine, pomegranates, honey, were raised and sent abroad, as well as numberless fatted fowl, sheep, and cattle. Flax also was produced in large quantities, which the weaving establishments and dye-houses of the sea-coast towns transformed into useful or costly and beautiful fabrics.

Moreover, the fisheries of the Sea of Galilee must be mentioned as one of the chief industries of this province. Choice kinds of fish were abundant, and when properly prepared were sent over the world. Both Tarichea and Bethsaida seem to have derived their names from the fish factories for which they were famous.

The Phœnician coast lying so near Galilee, all its industries, manufactures, commerce, and luxurious living would only increase the market facilities of Galilee, of which her industrious inhabitants were ever ready to avail themselves. The prosperity of Galilee was enhanced by the network of roads which covered it (see Smith, HGHL 425 f.). These roads help to explain also the facility with which the ὄχλος assembled, which so often thronged our Lord.

Besides its natural attractions, its varied productions and commercial facilities, its populousness and wealth, Galilee appeals to us more strongly than in any other way by its unique place in the religious history of the world. It was the cradle of the Christian faith. Joseph and Mary belonged to Nazareth, and there Jesus lived the larger part of His life. The peculiar influences of this mountain city, and its wonderful outlook over land and sea, no doubt had their effect upon the mind of Christ during His boyhood and youth. When He desired larger opportunities for reaching His fellow-men, He did not go out of His province to Jerusalem, Rome, or elsewhere, but removed to Capernaum on the shore of the Lake (Mt 9^{1}). A large proportion of the apostles, the men who helped to shape early Christianity, were from Galilee—namely, Peter, Philip, Andrew, James, John, all of whom were from Bethsaida; Matthew from Capernaum; besides Bartholomew or Nathanael, and James the Less, son of Alphæus and Mary, and possibly others, for even those who were not born there could by virtue of residence and labours be classed as Galilæans (Ac 1^{11}). There is a tradition that the parents of the Apostle Paul came from Gischala in Galilee, which is not at all improbable when we remember how large a number of Jews in the days of Herod went forth from Palestine to seek their fortunes in the distant commercial centres of the Roman world. Salome the wife of Zebedee, Anna the prophetess who joined in the welcome to the infant Jesus, furnish hints as to the piety and intelligence of the women of this province.

It is scarcely necessary to look back to the pre-Israelitish period. Still even then the Baal worshippers from the seacoast, who sought out the most attractive spots for their degrading rites, had crowded in and set up their altars in the most beautiful groves and on many of the hills of Galilee—Kedesh, Dan, and Cæsarea Philippi being some of the best-known of these idolatrous centres.

It is a significant fact that the Jews, after the destruction of Jerusalem, should have chosen Galilee as their religious centre. This becomes indeed a matter of great surprise when we consider the relations of the orthodox Jews to the Founder of Christianity and His followers as these are portrayed to us in the Gospels. They must have considered it a congenial atmosphere for their libraries, schools, and learned men, for here these flourished in a remarkable manner. During the long period of three or more centuries many synagogues were erected, and remains of some of these are still found at different places, those at Biram, Chorazin, and Tell Hum being familiar to everybody. Here, before A.D. 200, the Mishna had been compiled, i.e. the oral or traditional law to which Christ so often referred was given a fixed form by being written down, and also the commentary on this, known as the Palestinian Talmud, was made, having been completed about two centuries later. Tiberias, like Safed, became one of the sacred cities of the Jews, and here the great Maimonides and some other of their famous Rabbis were buried.

Among the famous personages of Galilee may be mentioned Barak, one of Israel's heroes; Deborah, the author of a triumph song; the judges Ibzan, Elon, and Tola, who judged Israel forty years; the prophets Hosea (?), Jonah the son of Amittai, and Elisha the successor of Elijah. This was not Elijah's birthplace, still he can be said to belong to Galilee, because this was the scene of a large part of his labours.

The fascinating and inspiring natural objects so abundant in Galilee — vine-clad slopes, plains brilliant with flowers, and the beautiful lake deep within the bosom of the hills—could hardly fail to awaken the spirit of poetry; and besides the well-known examples in proof of this, some eminent scholars, as Gesenius and others, would locate here the Song of Songs.

Not only did our Lord, and also His disciples by birth or residence, belong to Galilee, but it is surprising to find so large a proportion of the Gospels picturing Galilæan scenes and life: places, people, parables, miracles, healing; rulers, soldiers, merchants, beggars; everything so vivid that we seem to be walking with the Master along the shore and from village to village of His native land.

The sermon on the Mount (Mt 5), the raising of the widow's son (Lk 7^{11-15}), stilling the tempest (Mt 8^{26}), feeding the five thousand (Mk 6^{44}), the transfiguration (Mk 9^{2}), the marriage feast (Jn 2^{1}), the custom house (Lk 5^{27}), the draught of fishes (Lk 5^{6}), the mountain refuge for secret prayer (Mt 14^{23}), the little child in the Saviour's arms (Mk 9^{36}), and the marvellous explanation of the bread of life (Jn 6),—these and a multitude of other sayings and incidents which make up the Gospels take us at once to Galilee. The number and variety of natural objects which Christ introduces so frequently in His utterances, illustrate the extent and correctness of His habit of observation. Nothing escapes His notice,—sky, earth, sea, fields, flowers, grass, grain, fruits, trees, fish, birds, and animals,—the salient facts of the world immediately about Him were grasped and made the basis of beautiful lessons. A very exhaustive article on this subject, entitled 'Christ as a Practical Observer of Nature, Persons, and Events,' may be found in the Bibliotheca Sacra, July, 1872, pp. 510–531, by the present writer.

The part played by Galilee in the war with Rome will always command the admiration of the world. It was a life-and-death struggle, and her people rallied with the utmost enthusiasm to the defence of their fatherland. The fact that during the first year of the war Galilee stood alone has not received the attention it deserves. The forces that were, or might have been, gathered in Judæa were not sent to her aid. From their camp at Ptolemais four veteran legions with their engines of war marched towards the hills of Galilee; but it proved to be no holiday expedition on which they had started. The campaign was long and bloody; the highland patriots resisted with almost superhuman energy; the Romans were successful at last, but their victory was a costly one. The hardest fighting of the war was done on the soil of Galilee, and in that terrible year one hundred and fifty thousand of her people perished. From the days of Joshua to those of Bar-Cochba no Jewish army had shown greater valour than did the compatriots of Jesus of Nazareth—the men from the home-land of Christ.

GALILEE, MOUNTAIN IN.—After our Lord's resurrection, the eleven disciples went away from Jerusalem 'into Galilee, unto the mountain where Jesus had appointed them (εἰς τὴν Γαλιλαίαν εἰς τὸ ὄρος οὗ ἐτάξατο αὐτοῖς ὁ Ἰησοῦς).' There the disciples saw and worshipped Him, and received His final commission (Mt 28^{16-20}). No record or hint indicates to us what mountain is meant. For harmonistic reasons the theory that the Galilæan hill was the Mt. of Olives, whose north point is said to have borne the name 'Galilee,' has found favour in some quarters. This opinion scarcely needs refutation (see Keim, Jesus of Nazara, vi. 380 n.).

S. MERRILL.

*GALILEE, SEA OF.—This appears in the Bible under several different names, which must first be noticed. Modern writers not infrequently speak of the 'Lake of Tiberias,' but this term is never used in NT. Moreover, Lk 5^{1} is the only place where the name 'Lake of Gennesaret' (λίμνη Γεννησαρέτ) occurs. In four instances it is referred to as 'the Lake' (λίμνη), Lk 5^{2} $8^{22.\,23.\,33}$, and in several others as 'the sea' (θάλασσα), Jn 6^{11-25}. Twice John employs 'Sea of Tiberias' (θάλασσα τῆς Τιβεριάδος), 6^{1} 21^{1}, but in the first case he had already mentioned in a natural way the Sea of Galilee, and immediately added as an explanation for his Gentile readers that it was the same as the Sea of Tiberias. This reduces the use of the latter name to a single instance. 'Sea of Galilee' (θάλασσα τῆς Γαλιλαίας) would seem to be the best known and most appropriate name, and this is used five times (Mt 4^{18} 15^{29}, Mk 1^{16} 7^{31}, Jn 6^{1}). Glancing at the OT we find for this body of water two names, or properly one name spelled in different ways. The 'Sea of Chinnereth' (יָם כִּנֶּרֶת) appears in defining the boundary of the land (Nu 34^{11}), and again in defining the border of the territory of Gad (Jos 13^{27}). 'Sea of Chinneroth' is given in describing the territory of Sihon that was conquered by Moses (Jos 12^{3}). Chinnereth (כִּנֶּרֶת) is used once alone (Dt 3^{17}) and Chinneroth (כִּנְרוֹת) also (Jos 11^{2}), both referring to the Sea of Galilee. Once Chinneroth is used for a district conquered by Benhadad (1 K 15^{20}), and Chinnereth appears in Jos 19^{35} as a 'fenced city.' It is perfectly consistent with Oriental usage for a city, a district, and a body of water adjoining it to be called by the same name, although it is quite possible that Dt 3^{17} (see Driver, ad loc.), Jos 11^{2} 19^{35} all refer to the city Chinnereth or Chinneroth.

To this brief survey of biblical names for this lake we may add that Gennesar (τὸ ὕδωρ τοῦ Γεννησάρ, RV 'the water of Gennesareth') is given in 1 Mac 11^{67}. Josephus had occasion to refer to this lake many times, and he always uses the name Gennesar (e.g. Ant. XIII. v. 7). The change from the Heb. Kinnereth to Gennesar was a natural one (but see G. A. Smith, HGHL 443 n.). Josephus adhered to the OT name in its changed form, while the NT writers, as we have seen, used the title 'Sea of Galilee.'

As to the meaning of these names, Galilee is obviously derived from the province of that name, and Tiberias from the city on the west shore of the lake. Chinnereth may be from נוֹר, 'harp.' Benzinger (Heb. Arch. 23) thinks this improbable; and Fuerst suggests 'basin.' Gennesaret may have the same meaning as Chinnereth if we allow that it was simply transferred from the Hebrew; or it may be from gan and sâr, 'prince's garden,' applied, of course, to the Land of Gennesaret, from which the Sea of Galilee is once called the 'Lake of Gennesaret' (Lk 5^{1}).

The Sea of Galilee is 13 miles long and a little less than 7 miles wide in its widest part. Its greatest depth is less than 200 ft. It is not quite oval in form, although it appears to be so when looked at from the surrounding heights. It is more properly pear-shaped, having the small end at the south. Its level below the Mediterranean is about 700 ft. On the east side the mountain rises from its shore to an elevation of 2000 ft., the same as that of the great plateau of Bashan beyond. On the west side there is also a mountain wall, but towards the north the slopes are very gradual, and on the south the lake touches the plain of the Jordan Valley. To the eye it is a most attractive object, a beautiful body of water set deep in a vast basin among the hills. Not only the Jews, but people of many other races who were not natives of the soil, have praised the beauty of the Sea of Galilee. 'Although God has created seven seas,' said the Rabbis, 'yet He has chosen this one as His special delight.' They speak of its 'gracefully flowing' or 'gliding waters.' The mountains, the peaceful shore at their base, the blue water overarched by the blue sky, form a landscape picture that has kindled the enthusiasm of many hearts. It is seen at present at its worst estate; but in the time of our Lord this shore was a continuous garden, and even the matter-of-fact Pliny declared that this lake was 'surrounded by pleasant towns' (HN v. 15).

These towns have been described briefly in the article GALILEE, but the list at least may be repeated:—Tiberias, and south of it Bethmaus, Tarichea, Sinnabris, Gergesa, Gamala, Hippos, Julias, Bethsaida, Chorazin, Capernaum, Magdala, and Beth-arbel. On the mountain to the S.E. was Gadara, Safed on its lofty summit to the N.W., and a castle was perched directly above Tiberias almost overhanging the lake. Through Wady Hamam the Horns of Hattin appeared, and to the north rose the magnificent dome of Hermon. This famous mountain is not one of a cluster, it is not hemmed in and dwarfed by surrounding peaks, but it stands alone, revealing its full grandeur. From the shore of the Sea of Galilee, if we add its depression of 700 ft. to the elevation of Mount Hermon, we look up to its summit a sheer height of over 10,000 ft. Among all the mountains of the world, such a view is seldom surpassed.

The hills, which appear to surround the lake, recede from the shore a distance varying from a few hundred yards to half a mile or more, and this belt is generally level, so that, without cutting or filling, a carriage road could readily be constructed entirely round the lake; with a horse and carriage the circuit could be made in four or five hours. At two points, where the recession of the mountain is greatest, two charming plains are formed, namely, el-Batîha on the N.E. of the lake, and Gennesaret on the N.W. They resemble each other, are equally fertile, but it is Gennesaret that has always received the most praise. See GENNESARET (LAND OF).

The river Jordan enters the lake at the northern end, and passes out at the southern end. It brings down so much sediment at times that it appears like a very dirty stream: still the water of the lake itself is always clear; it is also sweet and cool.

The steep mountain wall on the E. side, already referred to, is volcanic, a part of the great lava formation which includes the Bashan plain and the Hauran mountains, where exist a score or more of extinct craters. The hot springs of Gadara, within 5 miles of the S.E. corner of the lake, those at Tiberias on the W. shore, and likewise the earthquakes which visit that region from time to time, are indications that internal fires still exist. The latest recorded earthquake from which Tiberias suffered severely was in 1837, vividly described by the American missionary Rev. Wm. M. Thomson, well known as the author of The Land and the Book. The region to the N. of the lake through which the Jordan passes, extending to Chorazin and Tell Hum, is simply a mass of large basalt boulders, packed so closely that it is next to impossible to get through them.

The hot springs near Tiberias have been famous from the earliest history of the country, and the inhabitants still prize them for their medicinal uses. The volume of water is large, and, could they be properly cared for and managed by other than their present degraded owners, there is no reason why these springs should not become one of the most famous health resorts in the world. Except in midsummer the climate is delightful—in fact, tropical; and when a person is chilled by the strong winds of mountain or tableland, the sensation of going down to the warm, even balmy, atmosphere of the lake shore is one of extreme pleasure.

Equally with the hot baths, the fish of this lake have always been held in highest estimation. Laws traditionally dating from the time of Joshua (Bab. Talm. Baba Kama, 80*b*) regulated this industry, and, with certain limitations, made this fishing ground free to all. There were several choice varieties, and the inhabitants of the region boasted that some of them were the same as those found in the Nile. There seems, moreover, to have been an inexhaustible supply of fish. Bethsaida on the north was a 'house of fish'; Tarichea on the south was 'a fish factory,' and the trade in this commodity had enriched its citizens. On the part of the Jews there was not only a choice in kind but in quality as well, for they distinguished sharply between 'clean' and 'unclean,' a fact no doubt alluded to in our Lord's parable of the net, where the 'good were gathered into baskets, and the bad were cast away' (Mt $13^{47.48}$).

The lake is subject to violent storms, owing partly to the difference of temperature about it from that of the mountains or tableland so far above it, so that the event recorded in Mt 8^{24}, when Christ stilled the waves, was of no infrequent occurrence. From an eminence the writer has several times seen the clouds gather above the lake, a dense black mass, not covering a great area, and sink lower and lower towards the water as if about to smite the surface; and even should they not actually do so, they disturb it so that the waves are strong and boats are placed in great peril.

From the way in which the NT speaks of boats and ships on the Sea of Galilee, we infer that it was covered with them. There seem to have been numbers of them ready at any given point. Given ten or twelve flourishing cities on or near the shore of the lake between which there was constant communication, it could not be otherwise than that the number should be great. These boats were engaged in fishing or traffic, or in carrying travellers or parties of pleasure from shore to shore. Some writers are slow to admit that there were ships of any size on the lake, although the Greek word for ship (πλοῖον) is used in the NT, whether the Sea of Galilee or the Mediterranean is the body of water referred to. So far as this evidence goes, the boats might be as large in one case as in the other. On one occasion during the Jewish war, when a movement was planned against Tiberias, Josephus in a short time got ready two hundred and forty ships from Tarichea and its vicinity alone (Wars, II. xxi. 8; Life, 32). In this city shipbuilding was a lucrative industry. At a later period during that war many of the soldiers and citizens of Tarichea took refuge from the Romans in ships, and four thousand to six thousand of them were slain—showing that the boats, to have held such a multitude, must have been of considerable size. Josephus speaks of 'climbing up into the ships' (Wars, III. x. 5), which implies quite a different craft than would be meant had he said 'they stepped from the shore into their boats.' In Jn 21^{8} is found a reference to the small boat (πλοιάριον) which always accompanies, being frequently towed after, a large ship the same as now. From all that we can learn of the facts, we certainly have a right to picture the Sea of Galilee in Christ's time as dotted with white sails, just as we know that the shore was lined with cities and the whole basin full of life. Between its present state and its former prosperity the contrast is extremely painful.

The Sea of Galilee was praised by the Romans and was the pride of the Jews, but it appeals to the Christian far more strongly than it could possibly have done to them, because of its connexion with Jesus of Nazareth. It is He that has made it immortal. Everywhere about this lake we trace His footsteps, and at every point locate some act of His blessed ministry. The memories of His life linger here as nowhere else in Palestine. He made one of its beautiful cities (Capernaum) His home (Mt 4[13]). Here He called the fishermen Peter, Andrew, James, and John to be fishers of men (Mt 4[18-22]), also for the same purpose Matthew was called from the receipt of custom (Mk 2[13-17]). Here 'multitudes' came to Him 'to be healed of their diseases,' and 'he healed them all' (Lk 6[17-19]). Out of the large number of such cases we readily recall that of the nobleman's son (Jn 4[46-54]), the centurion's servant (Mt 8[5-13]), the raising of Jairus' daughter (Mt 9[18-26]), the paralytic who was let down through the uncovered roof (Mk 2[1-12]), the demoniac in the synagogue at Capernaum (Mk 1[21-28]), the demoniac of Gadara on the eastern shore (Lk 8[26-40]), the blind man at Bethsaida (Mk 8[22-26]), and the curing of Peter's wife's mother of the fever (Mt 8[14-17]). Of another class of incidents which illustrate our Lord's character and His life in Galilee, a few may be mentioned, as His walking on the water and stilling the tempest (Mt 14[22-36]), and His feeding of the five thousand (Mt 14[13-21]). Still another illustrative class comes under the head of conversations, lessons, and warnings. In the leaven of the Pharisees hypocrisy was rebuked (Lk 12[1]); in the innocence of childhood humility was inculcated (Lk 9[46-48]); the feast with Levi showed that social courtesies are to be observed (Mk 2[15]); that both patriotism and religion have their claims upon the individual is made clear in the paying of the tribute money (Mt 17[24-27]); the signs in the sky as well as the sower in the field teach valuable truths (Mt 13[1-15] and ch. 16); and it was here in Galilee that the foundation principles of the New Religion were first promulgated and the nature of the Bread of Life unfolded (Mt 5[1-24], Jn 6). It is to some or all of these facts that Christ Himself alludes as 'mighty works' (Mt 11[20-24]), which would have moved the people of Tyre, or even those of Sodom, could they have witnessed them.

Of the cities about the Sea of Galilee attention should be directed to Capernaum. There was some special reason why our Lord chose this as His residence. Its importance was not wholly commercial; more than any other city of the north, one might say with truth of Palestine, with the single exception of Jerusalem, it was a centre of news. Roads led thence to Damascus and the Euphrates; to the cities of the Mediterranean coast which were in touch with Europe; to the S.W. by Gaza and thence to Egypt; to the S. along the great mountain range to Shechem, Jerusalem, and Hebron; to the Jordan Valley and the rich and populous country of Peræa. Sailors, soldiers, merchants, travellers, messengers, officers, princes, men of many classes and from many parts of the world, passed through this place on business or pleasure. The fame of some startling event, some great healer, some teacher of unusual wisdom, would be carried thence with rapidity and in every direction. While this fact serves to illustrate further the busy life of this lake shore at a single point, we cannot help feeling at the same time that it makes more significant the other fact that Christ took up here His residence. The record is very simple, 'leaving Nazareth . . . he dwelt in Capernaum' (Mt 4[13]). Could it have been said, 'Jesus shut himself up in a cloister,' how widely different would have been the history of Christianity!

Additional Note.—It seems necessary to add the following note on the depth of the Sea of Galilee. In 1875 Lortet made soundings which corresponded in general with those already known and accepted by Palestinian scholars. He also found, as he supposed, near the north end of the lake where the Jordan enters, a hole '250 metres in depth,' which would be over 800 ft. Having crossed the lake at or near this point many times, and made soundings of his own, the present writer was certain that Lortet was wrong. The bottom of the hole would be 100 ft. lower than the surface of the Dead Sea. Moreover, had such a hole ever existed, it would very soon have been filled by mud brought down by the Upper Jordan. These facts were laid before the public. In 1890 another Frenchman, Th. Barrois, made soundings, but found nothing to corroborate Lortet's impossible figures. Soon after, Lortet admitted that he was in error. The mischief having been done, the mistake is perpetuated because people quote Lortet without being aware of the corrections. Lortet's book, La Syrie d'Aujourd'hui, was published in 1884 (see pp. 505, 506), and Barrois' notes may be found in the PEFSt for July 1894, pp. 211–220.

S. MERRILL.

GALL.—The Eng. rendering for two Heb. words. 1. מְרֵרָה mĕrêrâh, or מְרֹרָה mĕrôrâh, denotes 'bitterness,' corresponding to the Arab. mĕrârah. It is used in this sense (Job 13[26]), 'thou writest bitter things against me,' mĕrôrôth. The expression אַשְׁכְּלֹת מְרֹרֹת 'clusters of bitternesses' (AV and RV 'clusters are bitter'), Dt 32[32], is a parallelism with grapes of gall, עִנְּבֵי־רֹאשׁ 'innĕbhê-rôsh, i.e. poppy-heads (see below). This meaning led to its application to the bile (Job 16[13]), and the gall bladder, as its receptacle (Job 20[25], To 6[5] etc.). The ancients supposed that the poison of serpents lay in the gall (Pliny, Nat. Hist. xi. 62; Job 20[14]).

2. רֹאשׁ or רוֹשׁ rôsh.—A plant characterized by its bitterness, 'a root that beareth (rôsh) gall and wormwood' (Dt 29[18]), 'the wormwood and the (rôsh) gall' (La 3[19]). Jer (8[14] 9[15]) speaks of 'water of (rôsh) gall.' Figuratively, one in affliction is described as 'compassed with (rôsh) gall and travail' (La 3[5]). Judgment is said to spring up as hemlock (rôsh) 'in the furrows of the field' (Hos 10[4]), and is said to be 'turned into (rôsh) gall' (Am 6[12]). It is impossible to tell with certainty what plant is intended. Some have supposed the poison hemlock, Conium maculatum, L., but this is not a field plant. Others have supposed the colocynth, Citrullus Colocynthis, L. This, although it has a bitter fruit, is not a plant of ploughed ground. Others, again, have supposed the darnel, Lolium temulentum, L. This, however, is not bitter. The more probable view is that the poppy, Papaver, is intended, perhaps P. rheas, L., or P. somniferum, L., the opium plant. A head of this plant is called in Arab. râs el-khishkhash, 'head of khishkhâsh,' the word ras being the same as the Hebrew rôsh, a head. They are called in Eng. poppy-heads.

What was the (χολή) gall that was mingled with vinegar (Mt 27[34], cf. Ev. Petr. 5, χολὴν μετὰ ὄξους; RV 'wine,' cf. Ps 69[21]), and the myrrh mingled with wine (Mk 15[23] ἐσμυρνισμένον οἶνον)? Both of these evangelists add that, at a later period in the crucifixion day, a man soaked a sponge in vinegar, and put it on a reed, and gave it to Jesus to drink (Mt 27[48], Mk 15[35]). Jesus evidently partook of it. John doubtless alludes to the same (19[29. 30]), showing how our Saviour called for it by saying 'I thirst' (v.[28]). John adds that the sponge dipped in vinegar was 'put upon hyssop.' It is probable that the soldiers who mocked Christ by offering Him vinegar (Lk 23[35]), did so only to aggravate His thirst, and did not give it to Him, and that this refinement of cruelty led to the bonâ fide offer which our Saviour accepted. How was it that He called for this draught after He had refused the one at first offered before His crucifixion? It is well known that a cup of wine with frankincense in it was given to criminals, just before their execution, to alleviate their pain. Myrrh would have properties similar to those of frankincense. It is possible that the gall of Mt was the same as the myrrh of Mk, the word myrrh being of the same root as the Heb. original of gall (Ps 69^{21}), and, like it, signifying primarily bitter. Mt, according to Hengstenberg, gives the word χολή, which agrees textually with the LXX of the psalm, that he may point out the prophetic character of the latter, and its fulfilment in Christ, while Mk gives the name of the substance used. This substance is said by Mt to have been given in ὄξος, which means both sour wine and vinegar, and by Mk in οἶνος, which is the ordinary word for wine. Here again, acc. to Hengstenberg, Mt aims at textual conformity with the psalmist, while Mk gives the more familiar name. Jn also notes the prophecy of thirst (19^{28}, cf. Ps 69^{21}), and its fulfilment in Christ. The motive of our Saviour, in refusing the potent anæsthetic offered before His sacrifice was complete, would seem to have been His desire to endure all that was appointed for Him, in full consciousness of the purpose in view. He only consented to moisten His parched lips and tongue at the last, not to soothe His anguish, but to gain strength enough to enable Him to cry, 'with a loud voice,' 'It is finished,' that is, 'my work is done, and the world is saved,' and then He bowed His head and gave up the ghost. G. E. Post.

GALLANT.—In Is 33^{21} as adj., and in Nah 2^{5m}, Zec 11^{2m} as subst., 'gallant' is employed to tr. the Heb. word אַדִּיר 'addîr, which is also both an adj. and a subst. As an adj. 'addîr signifies magnificent or majestic; and as a subst. a great one, a noble. In Is 33^{21} the adj. is applied to a ship, and it is to be observed that in the same verse the word is used of J" (AV 'glorious,' RV 'in majesty'). In this sense of magnificent the Eng. word 'gallant' is nearly obsolete. Bunyan (Holy War, Clar. Press ed. p. 8) uses it of a country (as 'addîr is applied to a nation in Ezk 32^{18}, EV 'famous'), 'Now, there is in this gallant country of Universe, a fair and delicate town, a Corporation, called Mansoul.' J. Hastings.

GALLERY.—1. AV in Ca 7^{5} reads 'The king is held in the galleries.' The Heb. is רְהָטִים, which, there is no reasonable doubt, means 'in the tresses' (so RV). The king is captivated, that is to say, by the tresses of this 'prince's daughter.' רְהָטִים, prob. of Aramaic origin (Dillm., Siegfried-Stade), is found elsewhere only in Gn 30^{38} and Ex 2^{16}, in the sense of 'watering troughs.' In Ca 1^{17} the Kerê has רַחִיטֵנוּ (AVm 'galleries'), but the Kethibh רַהִיטֵנוּ appears preferable (AV and RV 'rafters'; Siegfried-Stade, and Baethgen in Kautzsch's AT, 'Getäfel,' i.e. 'panelling'). 2. אַתִּיק, a word whose etymology and meaning are both obscure. It is found only in the description of Ezekiel's temple, Ezk $41^{15.16}$ $42^{3.5}$. In the first of these passages the Kethibh has אֲתִיק; Cornill substitutes קִירוֹתֶיהָ 'its walls,' and this meaning, if not reading, appears to be demanded by the context (cf. notes of Davidson and Bertholet, ad ll.citt.). The tr^{n} 'colonnade' (Siegfried-Stade, Säulengänge (?), AVm 'walks with pillars') would suit some of the other passages. See further, under Temple. J. A. Selbie.

GALLEY occurs once in OT (Is 33^{21} AV and RV), where it is said of the (metaphorical) waters defending Jerusalem 'that no galley with oars' shall enter them. The Heb. is אֳנִי שָׁיִט, which would be more correctly tr^{d} 'no fleet [אֳנִי being a collective noun, אֳנִיָּה denoting a single ship] with oars.'

The galley of mediæval times was the successor or representative of the war-galleys (naves longæ) of the Romans, Greeks, and Carthaginians. (See Ships). It consisted of a long narrow open boat worked by oars, but carrying one or two masts with lateen sails to be used when the wind was favourable. There was a short deck at the prow for carrying the fighting men, and another at the stern for the captain, knights, and gentlemen. The largest of these vessels were called galleasses, and were formerly employed by the Venetians, Spaniards, and Portuguese. These last in the Spanish Armada carried each 110 soldiers and 222 galley slaves. The Venetian galleasses were about 162 ft. long above, and 133 ft. by the keel; 32 ft. wide, with 23 ft. length of sternpost. They were furnished with three masts and thirty-two banks of oars; each bank having two oars worked by six or seven slaves, generally chained to the oar. In the prow were three small batteries of cannon, together with guns on each quarter, and the complement reached 1000 or 1200 men. Along with these war-vessels of the largest size were the half-galleys, from 120 to 130 ft. in length, furnished with two masts and sails, to be used as required, and carrying five pieces of cannon. Of a size still smaller were the quarter-galleys, provided with twelve to sixteen banks of oars. Galleys were in use on the Thames down to the beginning of the century; and a common punishment for criminals in England and France was to be 'sent to the galleys' for life or for shorter periods.

The life of galley slaves in mediæval times was miserable in the extreme. They were generally chained to their benches or oars, and compelled to work by boatswains, who occupied a bridge running along the centre of the boat, and were armed with long whips, which they applied mercilessly to the bare backs of the oarsmen. Their food consisted of biscuit, with sometimes a little rice or vegetables; their drink was water often foul, but containing a little vinegar or oil. A galley slave when condemned in perpetuity was, in a civil sense, dead; he could not dispose of his effects, nor inherit; if married, his marriage was null; and his widow could not have any of her dower out of his goods, which were confiscated. Amongst the Mediterranean nations, galley slaves were generally prisoners of war. E. Hull.

GALLIM (גַּלִּים 'heaps').—A place near Jerusalem, 1 S 25^{44}. It is personified, along with Anathoth and other towns, in Is 10^{30}. It is generally placed to the N. of Jerus., but may have been to the S., at the modern Beit Jala, near which are remarkable stone cairns. See SWP vol. iii. sheet xvii.

GALLIO (Γαλλίων, Ac 18).—Son of M. Annæus Seneca, a Roman eques and rhetorician, brother of Seneca the philosopher, and uncle of Lucan the poet. He was born at Cordova, but came with his father to Rome in the reign of Tiberius. Originally called M. Annæus Novatus, he was adopted by, and took the name of, L. Junius Gallio (Dio C. lx. 35). Under Claudius he became proconsul * of Achaia, probably through the influence of Seneca, who was Nero's tutor, and also perhaps, as Renan suggests, on account of his 'haute culture hellénique.' He entered on office at Corinth during St. Paul's first visit to the city, c. A.D. 52–53. An attack of fever, which he attributed to the climate, led to his departure, and to a sea-voyage for his health (Sen. Ep. 104); eventually he returned to Rome (Dio C. lxi. s.f.). Seneca's high position after Nero's accession in 54 would secure for G. a continuance of court favour, and he may be the L. Junius to whom a wax tablet found at Pompeii refers as consul under that emperor. Pliny (HN xxxi. 33) remembered a voyage of G. 'post consulatum,' on account of blood-expectoration. When Nero constrained Seneca to kill himself (A.D. 65), G. begged for his own life (Tac. Ann. xv. 73), and was spared at the time; but afterwards he and his brother Mela (Lucan's father) became victims.* With apparent timidity G. united singular amiability. Seneca (who dedicates to G. his De ira and De vita beata) writes: 'Nemo mortalium uni tam dulcis est quam hic omnibus'; he eulogizes him, also, as free from vice, impervious to flattery, and one whom to love to the utmost was to love too little (Q.N. iv. Pr.). His reputation for wit is attested by Dio, who refers (lx. 35), about 160 years after G.'s death, to a 'jocus urbanissimus' of his† as still current.

* The title indicates that Achaia was a senatorial province, and illustrates the writer's accuracy; for under Tiberius and Caligula it had been imperially governed (Tac. Ann. 76), and under Nero it received temporary 'liberty' in 66 or 67 A.D. (Suet. Nero, 24). Claudius transferred the province to the Senate in 44 A.D.

Soon after G.'s arrival at Corinth, a band of Jews, provoked by the conversion of Crispus, the ruler of their synagogue, and relying, probably, on the new proconsul's complaisance, dragged St. Paul before his tribunal, clamouring for judgment against a man who 'persuaded men to worship God contrary to the (Mosaic) law.' Judaism was a 'religio licita,' and entitled to protection; but G. saw in St. Paul's alleged offence only the outcome of some internal religious disputation among the Jews, and neither a civil wrong done to the complainers (ἀδίκημα) nor an outrage against public morality (ῥᾳδιούργημα πονηρόν). He declined to hear St. Paul's defence in a case which called for no judicial intervention, and contemptuously drove the accusers from his judgment-seat. When the Greek by-standers,‡ without special interest, probably, in the apostle, but readily showing their animus against the unpopular Jews, seized and beat Sosthenes, the successor of Crispus and the ringleader presumably of the disturbance, G. refrained from interposing; the Jews, he doubtless considered, would not be the worse for being thus taught to keep their religious disputes to themselves. To this assault on Sosthenes, not to the Christian faith, the statement 'G. cared for none of these things' directly refers; but it is not likely that he interested himself further in St. Paul or his doctrine; and it is no more than possible that a report about the apostle by G. to Seneca helped afterwards to lead to a personal connexion, itself doubtful, between Seneca and St. Paul (Lightf. Phil. Exc. ii.). G.'s Roman justice protected, but his Roman pride would ignore, the man to whose incidental association with him his own notability is mainly due.

* So Dio C. lxii. 25. Jerome places G.'s death (by compulsory suicide) prior to Seneca's (Add. to Chron. Euseb. p. 161, ed. Scal.).

† When Claudius was poisoned by his wife Agrippina, G., alluding to the deification of emperors, and to the custom of dragging criminals by a hook to the Tiber, spoke of Claudius as 'unco in cœlum raptum.'

‡ The word 'Greeks' is not in the oldest MSS, but is probably a correct gloss. Ewald, however (Hist. Isr. vii. 380), refers to the Jews the assault on Sosthenes, whom he identifies with the Sosthenes of 1 Co 1, and regards as already in sympathy with St. Paul.

GAMAEL (A Γαμαήλ, B Γάμηλος), 1 Es 8[29].—In Ezr 8[2] DANIEL (which see, No. 2).

GAMALIEL (גַּמְלִיאֵל, Γαμαλιήλ = Reward of God). —1. The son of Pedahzur, and 'prince of the children of Manasseh' (Nu 1[10] 2[20] 7[54. 59] 10[23]). 2. 'A Pharisee . . . a doctor of the law, had in honour of all the people,' who intervened in the Sanhedrin on behalf of Peter and the other apostles (Ac 5[34-39]), and the instructor of Saul of Tarsus (Ac 22[3]). This Gamaliel is generally identified with the famous Rabbi Gamaliel, the grandson of Hillel the founder of the more liberal of the two schools into which the Pharisees were divided. He is known in Jewish writings as Gamaliel ha-zākēn, i.e. the older, to distinguish him from his grandson Gamaliel II., and from his high character and learning was the first of the seven Jewish doctors who were honoured with the title of Rabban (our Rabbi or Master). All that we can learn of Gamaliel proves him to have been an open-minded, liberal man, though some of the anecdotes usually cited in support of this, such as the story of the Statue and the Bath quoted by Conybeare and Howson, are now known to refer to his grandson Gamaliel II. How far, however, he was in advance of his times is shown by his studies in Greek literature, which by the narrower Rabbis was put on the same level as Egyptian thaumaturgy, and by various humane enactments. Thus he laid it down that the poor heathen should have the same rights as the poor Jews in gathering the gleanings after harvest, and that the Jews on meeting the heathen should extend to them the customary greeting, 'Peace be with you,' even on their feast days, when they were mostly engaged in worshipping their idols; while to him are also ascribed certain laws to protect wives against unprincipled husbands, and widows against unscrupulous children (see Ginsburg in Kitto's Bibl. Cycl., art. 'Gamaliel'). In view of all this, it is easy to understand the attitude which Gamaliel adopted in the Sanhedrin on the occasion of the apostles' trial; although even there his conduct must be traced rather to a prudential dread of violent measures than to a spirit of systematic tolerance. There is nothing certainly to prove that he had at any time a decided leaning towards Christianity, and the traditions that he was a secret disciple (Clement, Recogn. i. 65), and was baptized by Peter and Paul (Phot. Cod. 171, p. 199), are now universally rejected. He died, as he had lived, a strict Jew; and so great was his reputation that, according to the Mishna (Sota, ix. 15), 'with the death of Gamaliel the reverence for the law ceased, and purity and abstinence died away.' It is right to add that Baur and the Tübingen school find it so difficult to reconcile Gamaliel's attitude in Ac 5 with the persecuting spirit afterwards shown by Saul, then his pupil, that they pronounce the whole passage unhistorical. But do pupils never in later years diverge from their teachers' doctrines? And may not special circumstances have arisen in connexion with the appearance of Stephen which called forth a fanatic zeal in Saul little in accord with his early training?

GAMES do not appear in the Scriptures of the Jewish people with anything like the same frequency as on the monuments and in the ancient literature of Egypt and Greece and Rome. Of public games like those of ancient Greece there is no mention in the OT, although in the Maccabæan period we read that Jason the high priest (2 Mac 4[7-17]), in his zeal for the introduction of Greek customs, obtained the authority of Antiochus Epiphanes to set up a Greek place of exercise, and form a body of youths to be trained therein. His conduct in this is severely condemned, for it is said of him and of the priests under his influence that 'they had no more any zeal for the services of the altar, but, despising the sanctuary and neglecting the sacrifices, they hasten to enjoy that which was unlawfully provided in the palæstra, after the summons of the discus; thinking of no account the honours of their fathers, and thinking the glories of the Greeks best of all' (2 Mac 4[14. 15]).

Of children's games there are but few traces. It is given by the prophet Zechariah as a token of the peace and prosperity that should one day bless Jerusalem, that the 'streets of the city shall be full of boys and girls playing in the streets thereof' (Zec 8[5]). What their games might be the prophet does not say. One of the diversions of Jewish children, we know from the Talmud, was imitating the doings of their elders; and Jesus has made us familiar with children playing at marriages and funerals, 'calling one to another, and saying, We have piped unto you, and ye have not danced; we have mourned to you, and ye have not wept' (Mt 11[17], Lk 7[32]). The children seem also to have amused themselves with living creatures. 'Wilt thou play with him as with a bird; or wilt thou bind him for thy maidens?' is God's remonstrance addressed to Job (Job 41[5]), where He asks the patriarch if he could make a plaything of the crocodile, as the child does of a bird. Dancing was a diversion of children as well as of grown-up people (Job 21[11]). The Talmud speaks of games in which the children played with nuts, and, taking this in connexion with the proverbial Latin expression relinquere nuces, we may have a reference to it in St. Paul's words, 'When I was a child, I spake as a child, I understood as a child, I thought as a child; but when I became a man, I put away childish things' (1 Co 13[11]).

Of manly sports among the Jews the traces are likewise few. Archery seems to have been practised as a sport as well as cultivated for the requirements of war. The uncertainty of the rendering in 2 S 1[18] does not allow us to use it as evidence, but Job seems to have it in mind when he complains (Job 16[12. 13]), 'God hath set me up for his mark; his arrows compass me round about'; and we find the same image in La 3[12] 'He hath bent his bow, and set me as a mark for the arrow.' The use of the sling, which played an important part in the military training of the Israelite (Jg 20[16], 1 S 17[19], 1 Ch 12[2], 2 Ch 26[14]), must have demanded considerable practice, especially in the case of the left-handed Benjamites, who 'could sling stones at an hairbreadth and not miss.' A sport which was common among the youths of Palestine in the time of Jerome is described by him as consisting of raising stones of great weight to the knees, to the shoulders and the head, and above the head, according to their strength, wrestlers being matched against each other according to this test. It has been supposed by Ewald and others that 'the burdensome stone' of Zec 12[3] is to be explained by the practice thus described by Jerome, being something like the 'putting stone' of Highland games in Scotland; but the allusion may be simply to a weight that is too heavy to be borne, and dangerous to those who meddle with it (compare Dn 2[34], Mt 21[44]). The discus, as we have seen, was introduced with other Grecian exercises by Jason the high priest in the Maccabæan times (2 Mac 4[14. 15]). It was a flat, circular slab of stone, or of wood, or of bronze, of considerable weight. A specimen in the British Museum is said to weigh about 12 pounds. The throwing of the discus was one of the essential exercises of the pentathlic contests. It was thrown from a low platform known as the βαλβίς, and the man who threw it the greatest distance was the winner. A skilful athlete, by putting all his weight into the throw, would sometimes hurl it more than a hundred feet. The attitude of the player and the manner of holding the discus is seen in Myron's celebrated statue of the δισκοβόλος, shown in books of Greek antiquities. Their devotion to this sport and the other exercises of the Grecian pentathlon, even to the neglect of the services of the altar, brought great unpopularity to Jason the high priest and his brethren of the priesthood, and Jason has been handed down to us as 'that ungodly man, and no high priest.'

Hunting, as a diversion, was not pursued till the days of Herod, who greatly favoured the introduction of Greek and Roman customs; and the Talmud gives strong warning against it. The theatre, too, was condemned as sternly by the Talmud as by Tertullian; and it was a hope of the days of Messiah that the buildings devoted by the Romans to theatrical representations would be turned into seminaries for the study of the law. Josephus (Ant. XV. viii. 1), speaking of the theatre and the amphitheatre built by Herod at Jerusalem, declares both of them to be in direct antagonism to the sentiment of the Jewish people.

Music and song fall to be treated rather in connexion with worship, but they were largely cultivated, as was also the dance, as a source of enjoyment. At the vintage merrymakings (Jg 9[27] 21[21]), at the gatherings of the young men in the city gate (La 5[14]), at triumphal processions (Jg 11[34], 1 S 18[6]), at celebrations of victory (Ex 15[20f.]), at the accession of kings (1 K 1[40]), and at domestic rejoicings (Jer 31[4], Lk 15[25]), music and singing, and oftentimes dancing, were called in to give expression to the gladness of such occasions.

Story-telling and riddles were a common diversion of the ancient Hebrews, as they are of the Arabs to this day (Jg 14[12], Ezk 17[2], 1 K 10[1]). Feasts and wedding-parties were enlivened by such amusements. Samson's riddle (Jg 14[12]), with his wager that the guests will not be able to answer it within a week, is a specimen of the kind of thing that was common. As to games of chance and of skill, the Jews seem not to have known them till they learned them from the Greeks. The soldiers who, perhaps by means of the dice, cast lots for the seamless robe of Jesus, were Roman soldiers. There was a game among the ancient Greeks (see Liddell and Scott under κολλαβίζω), in which one person covered his eyes and guessed which of his companions struck him; and a similar game among the ancient Egyptians (Wilkinson, ii. 59), in which a man knelt with his face to the ground and had to guess who struck him on the back. Was this the idea of the insult offered, when the men that held Jesus blindfolded Him, and struck Him on the face and blasphemously asked Him, 'Prophesy, who is it that smote thee?' (Lk 22[64]).

In NT, especially in the Acts and in the Epistles of St. Paul, the allusions are almost exclusively to the games and athletic contests of ancient Greece. We do read in the Epistle of St. James of 'the crown of life which the Lord hath promised to them that love him' (Ja 1[12]), but the allusion can be explained from Jewish ideas without reference to Greek games. In the Epistle to the Hebrews (12[1. 2]) we have the imagery of the assembly (νέφος μαρτύρων), of the contest (ἀγών), of the race (τρέχωμεν), of the training (ὄγκον ἀποθέμενοι πάντα), of the absorbed and eager racers (ἀφορῶντες), all most vividly set before us. It is in connexion with St. Paul, however, that these allusions are most frequent and distinct. Wherever the great apostle travelled among the cities of the Greeks, at Corinth, at Ephesus, at Athens, the athletic contests in which all the kindreds of the Grecian people took such pride met his eye, and furnished him with his aptest and most effective illustrations of the Christian life. The gymnasium or place of training, and the stadium or racecourse, were conspicuous and familiar in every considerable city.

The foot-race occupies the largest place in the imagery of the apostle, as it was the contest which of all the Grecian games aroused the deepest interest and the keenest excitement. In his addresses reported in the Acts of the Apostles, St. Paul alludes to the foot-race,—describing John the Baptist as 'fulfilling his course' (δρόμος, Ac 13^{25}), and speaking of himself as counting not even life dear unto him that he may finish his course (δρόμος) with joy (Ac 20^{24}). In his Epistles the image occurs again and again. In his very first Epistles he asks the prayers of the Thessalonians that the word of 'the Lord may run (τρέχῃ) and be glorified' (2 Th 3^{1} RV). In his last, when the crown is full in view, he writes to Timothy, saying, 'I have fought the good fight (τὸν καλὸν ἀγῶνα); I have finished the course' (τὸν δρόμον) (2 Ti $4^{7.\ 8}$). His whole career as an apostle and as a follower of Christ, and that of his converts, is a race; he is anxious 'lest by any means he should run, or had run, in vain' (Gal 2^{2}); he hopes to rejoice 'in the day of Christ that he had not run in vain' (Ph 2^{16}); 'ye did run well,' is his remonstrance to the Galatians; 'who hath hindered you, that ye should not obey the truth?' (Gal 5^{7}).

In the Epistles to the Philippians and the Corinthians his employment of the imagery of the games reaches its highest point: 'Not as though I had already attained, either were already perfect; but this one thing I do, forgetting those things which are behind, and reaching forth (ἐπεκτεινόμενος) unto those things which are before, I press (διωκῶ) toward the mark (σκοπόν), for the prize (βραβεῖον) of the high calling (τῆς ἄνω κλήσεως) of God in Christ Jesus' (Ph 3^{12-14}); 'Know ye not that they which run in a race (οἱ ἐν σταδίῳ τρέχοντες) run all, but one obtaineth the prize? So run, that ye may obtain. And every man that striveth in the games (πᾶς ὁ ἀγωνιζόμενος) is temperate in all things (ἐγκρατεύεται πάντα). Now they do it that they may obtain a corruptible crown, but we an incorruptible (φθαρτὸν στέφανον . . . ἄφθαρτον). I therefore so run, as not uncertainly; so fight I (πυκτεύω, passing from the racer to the boxer), as not beating the air: but I buffet (ὑπωπιάζω) my body, and bring it into bondage (δουλαγωγῶ); lest by any means, after that I have preached to others (κηρύξας, having summoned others to the contest), I myself should be rejected (ἀδόκιμος, driven in disgrace from the games as not having contended in accordance with the rules)' (1 Co 9^{24-27} RV). The imagery in these passages is unusually full and rich. The strenuous, exciting, and definite purpose of the racer, the self-control imposed during the period of training, with the punishment of the body to make it more fit, the prize, the crown, the reward of the victor, the call to the contest, and the proclamation of the conditions, the chance of final disgrace if these are not properly observed (compare 2 Ti 2^{15}), are all set forth with a vividness that must have brought home powerfully and impressively, to those who were familiar with the Isthmian and Olympian games, the lessons of Christian instruction which the apostle wished to convey.

In other passages there are allusions to the onlookers (1 Co 4^{9}), to the umpire or judge (Col 3^{15} βραβευέτω; cf. καταβραβευέτω of Col 2^{18} and notes of Lightfoot and Abbott; 2 Ti 4^{8} ὁ δίκαιος κριτής), to the joy of victory (Ac 20^{24}). To the gladiatorial spectacles of the amphitheatre, St. Paul makes what we may take to be a figurative reference (1 Co 15^{32} ἐθηριομάχησα ἐν Ἐφέσῳ). At Ephesus St. Paul came in contact with the directors of the games held in the city of Diana. The Asiarchs (Ac 19^{31} τινὲς καὶ τῶν Ἀσιαρχῶν ὄντες αὐτῷ φίλοι) mentioned as friendly to the apostle have long been one of the puzzles of commentators, but it is now certain (see Hicks in his Ancient Greek Inscriptions in the BM, iii. 2, p. 81; and Ramsay, The Church in the Roman Empire, ch. vii., and art. ASIARCH) that those officials were the high priests of the worship offered to the Roman emperors within the province of Asia. The cities of the province joined together in an association for the worship of the emperors, and the head of the association was styled high priest and Asiarch. In this capacity he had to furnish every year funds for the celebration of the provincial games in honour of the reigning Cæsar, and it appears that as the cult of the Cæsars and the worship of Diana were in close alliance, the games in honour of both would coincide, and be held in the month Artemision—the month of May, sacred to Diana.

GAMMADIM (גַּמָּדִים).—A term of very doubtful meaning, occurring in Ezk 27^{11} 'The Gammadim (AV -ims) were in thy towers.' No place of the name of Gammad is known, but a proper name is what the context seems to demand. Probably, Cornill's conjecture גִּמְרִים (Zemarites, Gn 10^{18}) is as good as any. Lagarde (Onom. Sacr. ii. 95) proposes גִּמְרִים (they of Gomer, Cappadocians [?]). RVm 'valorous men,' although supported by Gesenius (Thes. 292), has not commended itself to the majority of scholars. LXX has φύλακες; Symm. appears to have read גַּם מָדִים, 'and also Medes.'

GAMUL (גָּמוּל 'weaned').—A chief of the Levites, and head of the 24th course of priests, 1 Ch 24^{17}. See GENEALOGY.

GARDEN (גַּן, properly 'enclosure'; גַּנָּה, const. גִּנַּת in Ca 6^{11}, Est 1^{5} $7^{7.\ 8}$; κῆπος).—These terms appear to have been practically equivalent to the Armenian pardes (פַּרְדֵּס Neh 2^{8}, Ca 4^{13}, Ec 2^{5} [all]), which in Asia Minor to-day is applied equally to flower and vegetable gardens, orchards, parks, and pleasure grounds. The garden planted eastward in Eden (Gn 2^{8}) combined the features of all; and these were present in the Jewish idea of paradise, παράδεισος (Lk 23^{43}), which in rabbinical language was גִּנַּת עֵדֶן. They figure again in Mohammed's descriptions of el-Janneh, 'the garden,' the Moslem paradise, wherein flowing fountains, full rivers, shady trees, and abundant fruits are constantly named as attractions to 'the faithful.'

Gardens are usually enclosed by hedges, dry-stone dykes with a layer of thorns built in near the top, or by walls of compressed mud, dried in the sun, as are the celebrated gardens that encircle Damascus. The cactus, or prickly pear, is a common hedge in the warmer districts. Its multitudinous sharp spines offer a splendid defence against intruders; but it is apt soon to become a harbour for venomous things. If one break through such a fence, he need not be surprised if a serpent bite him (Ec 10^{8}). A mud-built hut, or booth of wattled twigs, is erected for the watchman within the enclosure. The nâtûr, or 'watchman,' is the modern representative of the נֹצֵר (Job 27^{18}). He is not the gardener, but one who guards the fruits and vegetables from pillage. The gardener is named only once directly in Scripture, κηπουρός (Jn 20^{15}). But gardening as a means of livelihood has always been a popular calling in the East.

Patches of land thus enclosed were cultivated by most families in ancient times. Now, in Palestine, they are found only in the environs of larger towns. In some parts of Asia Minor every house has its own garden.

Kings and men of wealth had extensive and beautiful gardens adjoining or near to their residences. 'The king's gardens' at Jerusalem (2 K 25[4], Neh 3[15]) lay in the fat valley S.E., close by the Pool of Siloam. Recent excavation shows that the western wall of the pool may have been the parapet of 'the stairs that go down from the city of David,' Neh 3[15] (PEFSt, Jan. 1897, p. 13; Oct. 1897, p. 264). The gate Gennath (Jos. BJ v. iv. 2) possibly took its name from the fact that it led to the gardens outside the city. It seems to have stood some distance E. of the Jaffa gate, where Uzziah once erected a tower of defence (2 Ch 26[9]). With the exception of the rose gardens, which had existed from the days of the prophets (Is 35[1]), no gardens were found in later Jerusalem, on account of the evil odour arising from decaying weeds and the manure employed. They crept up, however, close to the walls. Titus, incautiously venturing near to view the city, was surprised by the Jews, and escaped with difficulty, being entangled among the garden trenches and hedges which ran out from the walls (Jos. BJ v. ii. 2). Kohcleth speaks of planting great gardens and making pools for watering them (Ec 2[5]). Tradition locates these in Wady Artâs, S. of Bethlehem. Three gigantic reservoirs, lying in the head of the vale, are supplied by a series of springs. From these the gardens below were watered; a supply also being carried to Jerusalem in conduits. These seem to be indicated by Josephus (Ant. VIII. vii. 3) when he speaks of a place Etham, about 50 furlongs from the city, with fine gardens, abounding in rivulets of water, whither Solomon used to drive in state in the early morning. The floor of the valley is still cultivated by the villagers of Artâs, and yields richly, but the surrounding slopes are rocky and bare. Possibly, there is a trace of the ancient delights of this neighbourhood in the name of a contiguous height, called by the Arabs Jebel el-Fureidis, 'Mount of the little Paradise.' From the Targum on Ec 2[5] we learn that Solomon indulged his splendid tastes by cultivating in these gardens foreign trees and plants, 'which the goblins and demons brought out of India.' But the Targumist seems to identify these with 'the king's gardens' mentioned above. 'The boundary,' he says, 'was from the wall that is in Jerusalem, by the bank of the waters of Siloam.' The growing of exotics is paralleled by the monks of Sinai, but for a different reason. They are Greeks, not Arabs. And so, as Dean Stanley says (Sinai and Palestine, p. 52), one 'sees in the gardens the produce, not of the desert or of Egypt, but of the isles of Greece; not the tamarisk, or the palm, or the acacia, but the olive, the almond tree, the apple tree, the poplar, and the cypress of Attica and Corcyra.'

Ahasuerus is said to have entertained all the notables of his empire with many and varied splendours, for seven days, in the garden attached to his palace (Est 1[1-8]). For the pleasure of his queen, the king of Babylon constructed the renowned 'hanging gardens,' the κρεμαστὸς παράδεισος of Berosus (quoted by Jos. c. Ap. i. 19). Joakim, a rich Jew of the Captivity, 'had a fair garden joining unto his house' (Sus [4]), in the seclusion of which were all conveniences for bathing (v.[15]). Of gardens on this princely scale there is an excellent illustration in el-Bahjeh, the palace built for himself by Abdullah Pasha near Acre. It is surrounded by a great extent of ground, beautifully laid out, wherein are reservoirs of water, and multitudinous conduits to all parts of the enclosure. Flowers of every hue brighten the soil; fruit trees vie with each other in season, offering their tempting burdens; the homelier vegetables also have their place. The pleasant pathways, and retired and shady nooks, under embowering greenery, make a very paradise amid the exposed plain.

Egypt was compared to 'a garden of herbs,' watered 'with the foot'; Palestine was a land 'which drinketh water of the rain of heaven' (Dt 11[11]). Gardens could be made in Egypt wherever water could be led from the river. The ground was divided into compartments by little banks of earth, along which ran the water channels. One side of the bank was broken down with the foot, allowing the water to flow into the division: the breach repaired with the foot, the stream was led into the next division, and so on until all were refreshed. This process may be seen to-day. In Palestine, for the most part, the presence of a spring, or a capacious cistern, was essential to the existence of a garden. In the Jordan Valley the river afforded abundant streams, which, carrying beauty and fertility with them, made the plain as 'the garden of the LORD' (Gn 13[10]). But such gardens as those of Hebron, Nablûs, and Jenîn—wherein we have a reminiscence of old En-gannim (Ca 4[15])—are created by the springs that gurgle up from under the mountains. The luxuriant groves around Jaffa depend upon deep wells, whence the water is raised by a chain of buckets revolving on a wheel, turned usually by a span of mules. The wheels are of rude construction, the pinions often being formed of broken branches, and the creaking they make is not charming. The water is stored in a large tank, connected with the gardens by a network of cemented channels. Towards evening the outflow is opened, and throughout the orchards is heard the musical ripple of running water, and light figures dart among the trees, guiding the streams whither they will. This familiar scene is reflected in the proverb, 'the king's heart is in the hand of the LORD as the watercourses. He turneth it whithersoever he will' (Pr 21[1]). Wisdom in her beneficent power is compared to a 'stream from a river,' and 'a conduit into a garden' (Sir 24[30]). Gardens, with plentiful supplies of water, were to the Oriental suggestive symbols of prosperity. Balaam likens the spreading tents of Israel to 'gardens by the river side' (Nu 24[6]). The house of Jacob restored to favour shall be 'like a watered garden' (Is 58[11], Jer 31[12]). By foul idolatries the sap of manhood is dried up, and men become 'as a garden that hath no water' (Is 1[30]).

Cucumbers, melons, leeks, onions, and garlic, so common in Egypt (Nu 11[5]), and probably also lettuce and endive, were grown in Palestine, together with such plants as coriander (Ex 16[31], Nu 11[7]), caper (Ec 12[5] RV), camphire or henna (Ca 1[14]), cummin (Is 28[25. 27], Mt 23[23]), mustard (Mt 13[31. 32]), anise (Mt 23[23]), and rue (Lk 11[42]). Vines clung to almost every hillside. In olden times the mulberry, olive, fig, pomegranate, almond, and walnut (Ca 6[11]) were well known. The tappûaḥ (Ca 2[3. 5] 7[8]) was probably the apricot. To these the Mishna adds the quince, the citron, the medlar, and the service (Chilaim, i. 4). To-day the orange, lemon, and peach grow luxuriantly in the groves, e.g. at Jaffa, Sidon, and Damascus. The banana flourishes at Sidon; while apples and pears are cultivated with moderate success. The egg plant, the tomato, and the potato, together with the homely cabbage, are found in almost every garden. See further under FOOD.

The gardens, with their shady foliage, have always been a favourite retreat for the people during the hotter seasons. It was reckoned a token of public peace and security, when a man could sit without fear under his vine and fig tree, the two often growing together (Mic 4^4, Zec 3^{10}). Many family meals are eaten under the shelter of spreading fig and mulberry. In the cool of the day companies assemble in the gardens; as darkness falls, the light of a lamp swung on a bough twinkles through the greenery; and sounds of laughter and song, accompanied by the twanging of the oud, or the shrill voice of the pipe, are borne far upon the quiet air. When the fruits are ripening, and until they are safely gathered, many make their beds under the fruit trees.

The secluded recesses among clustering trees and bushes made the gardens a popular resort for purposes of devotion. They were often the haunts of idolatrous worship (Is 1^{29} 65^3 66^{17}). Baruch (6^{70}) compares the idols, 'gods of wood,' set up in the gardens, with the 'scarecrow,' προβασκάνιον, 'in a garden,' which 'keepeth nothing.' An abiding charm clings to the slopes of Olivet, because Jesus 'ofttimes resorted . . . with his disciples' to a garden there (Jn 18^2, Lk 22^{39}), where linger the deathless memories of GETHSEMANE. The Moslem who spreads his little carpet, and solemnly prays to Allah under the shade of the trees he tends, is true heir to the ancient tradition of the Orient.

The garden sometimes contained the family tomb or burial-cave. In the garden of Uzza both Manasseh and his son Amon found sepulture (2 K 21^{18} 21^{26}). Nor can we forget that in the place where Jesus 'was crucified there was a garden, and in the garden a new tomb, wherein was never man yet laid. There . . . they laid Jesus' (Jn $19^{41\text{-}42}$). GAREB (גָּרֵב).—One of David's 'Thirty' (2 S 23^{38}, 1 Ch 11^{40}). Like Ira, in the same verse, he is described as an Ithrite (הַיִּתְרִי), i.e. a member of one of the families of Kiriath-jearim (1 Ch 2^{53}). In notices of this kind, however, it is more usual to give the name of the locality to which the warrior belonged, and we should probably read with Wellh., in both cases, 'of Yattir' (הַיַּתִּרִי), a town in the hill-country of Judah (Jos 15^{48} 21^{14}, cf. 1 S 30^{27}). See IRA. J. F. STENNING.

GAREB (גָּרֵב).—A hill near Jerusalem, Jer 31^{39}. Its situation is uncertain, being located by some, e.g. Riehm and Graf, to the S.W., while others place it to the N. of the capital. At the present day there is a Wady Gourab to the W. of Jerusalem. (See Neubauer, Géog. du Talmud, p. 150).

GARLAND.—See CROWN.

GARLIC (שׁוּם shûm, τὰ σκόρδα, allia).—The bulblets of Allium sativum, L., still known in Arabic by the cognate thûm. It is now, as in the days of the ancient Egyptians (Nu 11^5), a favourite addition to the complex stews and the roasts of the Orientals. It is cultivated everywhere in the East. Too often the natives reek with its stale, penetrating odour. G. E. POST.

GARMENT.—See DRESS.

GARMITE (הַגַּרְמִי).—A gentilic name applied in a totally obscure sense to Keilah in 1 Ch 4^{19}. The text in the LXX is hopelessly confused (cf. Swete's ed., and see Kittel's note in Haupt's Sacred Bks. of OT).

GARNER.—Garner, which is now archaic if not obsolete, and granary, the form now in use, both come from Lat. granaria, a storehouse for grain (itself from granum, a grain, corn), the former through the Fr. gernier, a variant of grenier, the latter directly. Garner occurs in plu. Ps 144^{13} (גָּרְנִים, the only occurrence); Jl 1^{17} (אוֹצָרוֹת, a common word, used both of stores of any kind and of storehouses for any purpose; the Eng. word 'garner' is narrower in meaning); and Sir 1^{17} (τὰ ἀποδοχεῖα [B^{ab} א, -εια B^{*c}]; a word peculiar to Sir, where it occurs also 39^{17} EV 'receptacles,' Cowley and Neubauer 'treasure'; and 50^3 EV 'cistern': it is also of wider use than 'garner,' being applied in the last two cases to receptacles for water). In NT 'garner' is used in the sing., Mt 3^{12} = Lk 3^{17} (ἀποθήκη, elsewhere in NT tr^d 'barn,' Mt 6^{26} 13^{30}, Lk $12^{18.\ 24}$). Chaucer (Prol. to Cant. Tales, 592) says of the Reve, 'Wel coude he kepe a gerner and a binne'; and T. Adams, Works, i. 87, says, 'The Lord sends grain, and the devil sends garners.'

RV retains the subst. in all those occurrences, and introduces the verb, Is 62^9 'They that have garnered it shall eat it' (מְאַסְפָיו; AV 'gathered,' which RV uses for the verb מְקַבְּצָיו, which occurs in the same verse). J. HASTINGS.

GARRISON.—See WAR.

GAS (Γάς, AV Gar), 1 Es 5^{34}.—His sons were among the 'temple servants.' The last nine names in this list, of whom Gas is one, have no corresponding names in the lists of Ezra and Nehemiah. The AV form is derived from the Aldine text.

GASHMU (גַּשְׁמוּ, Γόσεμ, Neh 6^6).—A form of the name GESHEM (which see), probably representing the pronunciation of N. Arabian dialect. Proper names with the termination u (ו) are found in Nabatæan inscriptions. The words 'and Gashmu saith' do not occur in the older MSS of LXX (AB א*). H. A. WHITE.

GATAM (גָּעָתָם).—The son of Eliphaz (Gn 36^{11} = 1 Ch 1^{36}), and 'duke' of an Edomite clan (Gn 36^{16}) which has not been identified.

GATE.—1. שַׁעַר, root שָׁעַר 'cleave,' 'divide' (?); a gate or entrance of a camp (Ex 32^{26}), city (Jos 20^4), palace (Est 2^{19}), or temple (2 Ch 23^{20}); πύλη, porta. 2. תְּרַע Aram., only in Daniel. A gate or mouth as of a furnace (3^{26}). Gate of the King or Royal Court (2^{49}). Corresponding terms in Arabic and Turkish are used of the califs and Turkish emperors, and of the Persian court (Gesen.); cf. θύρα, fores. תָּרַע 'porter,' 'doorkeeper' (of the Temple), occurs in Ezr 7^{24}. The usual Heb. term is שׁוֹעֵר. 3. פֶּתַח, root פָּתַח 'open.' The entrance of the gate of a city (Jos 20^4, Jg 9^{35}). 4. דֶּלֶת, root דָּלָה 'hang down'; the leaf of a door, dual, folding doors such as the gates of a city; κλισίας, valva. For Doorway and Door, and distinction between דֶּלֶת and שַׁעַר, see HOUSE.

City gateways among the Greeks and Romans in later days appear to have been principally used for making secure the city, but in early times among the Greeks and at all times in Syria they have been used for many public purposes, and were important positions in the economy of the state. Jerome says that as the Hebrews were for the most part employed in labouring in the field, it was wisely provided that assemblies should be held at the city gates, and justice administered there in a summary manner, that those labouring men who were busy at their work might lose no time, and that the country people might not be obliged to enter and spend their time there (Cruden, Conc. s. 'Gate').

The gate of the city in the early dawn of civilization was the ordinary place of public resort for the transaction of business and administration of justice, and for discussing the news, just as the doorway of the house was the place where private business was despatched and friendly greetings exchanged. It was also the place of the markets, where goods were exposed for sale.

Gesenius gives the foll. explanation (s.v. שַׁעַר). 'At the gates of cities there was the forum (רְחוֹב), where trials were held, and the citizens assembled, some of them for business and some to sit at leisure to look on and converse (Gn 19^{1}, Ru 4^{11}, Pr 31^{23}, La 1^{4}); whence "in the gate," often for "in the forum," "in judgment," Dt 25^{7}, Job 5^{4} 31^{21}, Ps 127^{5}, Pr 22^{22}, Is 29^{21}, Am $5^{10.\ 12.\ 15}$.' Cf. further Driver on Am 5^{10}. The word רְחוֹב is rendered by Gesenius —(1) a street, (2) open place, forum, i.e. an ample space at the gate of Oriental cities where trials were held, and wares set forth for sale, 2 Ch 32^{6}; cf. Neh $8^{1.\ 3.\ 16}$, Ezr 10^{9}. In RV 'broad place' has been substituted in several instances for 'street'; the tr^{n} proposed in QPB is 'public place.'

In the earliest days the city gate is mentioned as the place of public resort, where people met for business and to discuss news. Gn 19^{1} 'And Lot sat in the gate of Sodom'; Gn 23^{10} 'Ephron the Hittite answered Abraham in the audience of the children of Heth at the gate of his city'; Gn 34^{20} 'And Hamor and Shechem his son came unto the gate of their city, and communed with the men of their city'; 1 S 4^{13} 'Eli sat upon his seat by the side of the gate watching the way'; 2 S $15^{2.\ 6}$ 'Absalom stole the hearts of the men of Israel at the gate of the city'; Neh 8^{1} 'Ezra the scribe read the law to the people gathered together into the broad place (forum) before the water gate.'

The gate was also used for administration of justice, deliberation, and audience for kings, etc. Dt 21^{19} the stubborn and rebellious son is to be brought before the elders of the city at the gate; Dt 25^{7} if the man does not like to take his brother's wife, she shall go up to the gate unto the elders; Jos 20^{4} the manslayer shall declare his cause before the elders of the city of refuge at the entering in of the gate; Ru 4^{1} Boaz consulted the elders at the gate concerning Ruth's property; 2 S 19^{8} king David sat in the gate, and the people came before him; 1 K 22^{10} the kings of Israel and Judah sat in an open place at the entrance of the gate of Samaria, and all the prophets prophesied before them; Jer 38^{7} king Zedekiah sat in the gate of Benjamin; La 5^{14} 'The elders have ceased from the gate'; Am 5^{12} 'Ye that afflict the just, that take a bribe, and that turn aside the needy in the gate from their right'; Zec 8^{16} 'Judge truth and the judgment of peace in your gates'; Ps 69^{12} 'They that sit in the gate speak against me.'

Until the battering-ram was perfected with its machinery, so as to be serviceable against heavy stone walls, the gate was the only point in a well-built city wall where a successful assault could be made, and there is constant reference in the Bible to 'war in the gates' (Jg 5^{8}), and to them that turn the battle to the gate (Is 28^{6}), and shall speak with the enemies in the gate (Ps 127^{5}, where, however, the enemies are perhaps only forensic).

In the account of the assault on Abel-beth-maacah in the time of David, EV says that the people that were with Joab 'battered the wall to throw it down' (2 S 20^{15}); but the meaning of the Hebrew מַשְׁחִיתִים לְהַפִּיל הַחוֹמָה is doubtful. See Driver, Text of Sam. 265. Mention is made in Deuteronomy ($20^{19f.}$) of building bulwarks (צוּר, lit. 'siege,' i.e. siegeworks) against a city in war; yet, even as late as the final taking of Jerusalem by the Assyrians (B.C. 588), the battering-ram was used against the gates (Ezk 21^{22}), though Ezekiel (4^{2}) also appears to speak of the ram being used round about, against the walls. Among the Macedonians the ram first became an important military engine in the time of Philip and Alexander the Great (cf. Thuc. ii. 76).

At the siege of Rabbah (c. B.C. 1000) the garrison made a sortie, and the army of Israel was 'upon them even unto the entering of the gate' (2 S 11^{23}). In the attack on the strong tower within the city of Thebez (c. B.C. 1170), Abimelech went hard unto the door of the tower to burn it with fire (Jg 9^{52}). Nehemiah (B.C. 444) also speaks of the city gates being burnt with fire (Neh 1^{3} $2^{3.\ 13.\ 17}$); and Jeremiah prophesies that the high gates of Babylon shall be burned with fire (Jer 51^{58}). The breaking of gates of brass and cutting in sunder the bars of iron is spoken of (Ps 107^{16}, Is 45^{2}).

City gateways, in order to be secure against these various forms of attack, required flanking towers (2 Ch 14^{7} 26^{9} 32^{5}, Ps 48^{12}, Ca 8^{10}, Ezk 26^{4}) to protect the entrance, and galleries above (2 S $18^{24.\ 33}$), from which the defenders could throw boiling pitch and oil upon the assailants: there were probably two sets of gates, one to each entrance, with a courtyard or barbican between. 'And David sat between the two gates, and the watchman went up to the roof of the gate unto the wall' (2 S 18^{24}). There was a chamber over the gate (2 S 18^{33}). Possibly, at the outer entrance there was a portcullis or cataracta, which is described by Vegetius as an uncient contrivance; and it has been suggested ('Cataracta,' in Smith's Dic. Gr. and Rom. Antiquities) that it is alluded to in the passage, 'Lift up your heads, O ye gates; and be ye lift up, ye everlasting doors' (Ps $24^{7.\ 9}$; cf. Jer 20^{2} 51^{58}).

Rooms would be required for the guard of the gate, for the porters, and for the watchmen, and the entrance gateway would require to be of considerable dimensions, where the people of the city could readily congregate. Being of so great importance from a defensive point of view, the chief officer of the city would naturally take great interest in its secure condition; and being on the high road from the country the traders would bring their wares there, and would be detained there before entry for examination and toll. Thus the vicinity of the gate would naturally become the public place of resort for business and pleasure, where also justice could be administered and punishment meted out.

As civilization and luxury increased, the gateways seem to have been less used among the Greeks and Romans, the Agora or Basilica, or forum and portico, being placed near the royal palace, or, in a seaport town, near the harbour; and the markets were divided up according to the articles sold there (Polyb. ix. 47, x. 19). Some articles, such as salt fish, seem to have been sold outside the gates (Aristoph. Equit. 1246). But even in late days among the Greeks and Romans the gates were surmounted by towers (Virg. Aen. vi. 552), and Polybius (xv. 29) calls a building at Alexandria 'the gatehouse at the palace used for the transaction of public business.' The entrances to military camps (castra) were, when necessity arose, defended by towers (Cæsar, B. G. viii. 9). The gateway at Treves, so late as the time of the emperor Constantine, was built in such a style as shows that it was intended to be used during peace for the object of civil government.

In Syria the vicinity of the gate has always been the focus of business transactions, but as Greek and Roman influences prevailed, no doubt the gate did not occupy, for a time, so important a position in the social life of the people; and markets were constructed in various parts of the city apart from the gates. In the latter days of Jerusalem the upper city is called by Josephus (Wars, v. iv. 1) the Agora or market place; the sheep market was on the north side of the temple, near the pool of Bethesda (Jn 5^{2}); and a place is mentioned outside the second wall where were the merchants of wool, the braziers, and the market of cloth (Jos. Wars, v. viii. 1). In early days, however, the markets were probably close to the gates, 'To-morrow about this time shall a measure of fine flour be sold for a shekel, and two measures of barley for a shekel, in the gate of Samaria (2 K 7^{1}; cf. Neh $13^{16.\ 19}$).

In the Assyrian cities the gateways were either arched or had flat stone lintels, with flanking towers and overhead galleries, as at Khorsabad (Layard, Nineveh, ii. 388, 395, and bas-relief in British Museum, 'Assyria,' 25, 26, 49). Herodotus (i. 179) and Ctesias state that the walls of Babylon were furnished with 100 brazen gates, with lintels and sideposts of the same material, and with 250 towers to protect the weaker parts. Jeremiah ($51^{53.\ 58}$) speaks of burning these gates. In Nebuchadrezzar's account of Babylon, stamped on the bricks, the great gates are described as made of cedarwood covered with copper, with thresholds of bronze.

In the later Egyptian temples the gates appear to have been fortified (Wilkinson, Anc. Egyp. i. 409). At Pompeii may be seen a gateway protected by a portcullis, with a barbican, within which again were gates of wood and iron.

Besides the open space or forum at the entrance of the city gate, there was evidently an open place of assembly near the entrance to the temple and before the gate of the royal palace. At Jerusalem there was the broad place before the water gate, which appears to have been on the south side of the outer court of the temple (Neh $8^{1ff.}$). At Shushan, Mordecai went to the broad place of the city before the king's gate; and queen Esther made her petition to king Ahasuerus at the king's gate (Est 4^{6} 5^{2}; cf. Herod. iii. 120, 140). Daniel sat in the gate of the king (Dn 2^{49}). It is not improbable that in Est and Dn 'gate' is used by metonymy for 'palace' or 'king's court.' Cf. the modern 'Sublime Porte.'

The gates were closed and guarded by night. Jos $2^{5.\ 7}$ 'About the time of the shutting of the gate, when it was dark'; Neh 7^{3} 'Let not the gates of Jerusalem be opened till the sun be hot: and while they stand on guard let them shut the doors, and bar ye them'; Is 60^{11} 'Thy gates also shall be open continually, they shall not be shut day nor night'; Rev 21^{25} 'And the gates thereof shall in no wise be shut by day (for there is no night there)'; Neh 13^{19} 'When the gates of Jerusalem began to be dark before the sabbath, I commanded that the doors should be shut.' The gateways of palaces and temples were highly ornamented—those of Nimroud (B.C. 884), Persepolis, and Khorsabad (Fergusson, Archit. pp. 154, 160, 174) were flanked by colossal figures of animals, winged bulls at Nimroud and Khorsabad. The doors of city gates were usually plated with iron or copper, to prevent their being easily burnt or broken (Ps 107^{16}, Is 45^{2}). In the temple of Solomon (1 K 6^{31}) the doors leading to the Holy of Holies were of olive wood, with carvings of cherubim and palm trees, and overlaid with gold. The doors to the temple were of cypress wood, carved in like manner, and overlaid with gold, with doorposts of olive wood (1 K $6^{34f.}$, 2 K 18^{16}, Ezk $41^{23f.}$). Josephus (Wars, v. v. 3) speaks of nine of the gates of the temple courts being covered with gold and silver, while the east gate of the inner court (the Beautiful Gate of Ac 3^{2}) was of Corinthian brass, and greatly excelled the others. These gates were 30 cubits high and 15 broad, while the doors of the east gate were 40 cubits high and required 20 men to close them, and had bolts fastened deeply into the solid stone threshold (Jos. Wars, v. v. 3, vi. v. 3).

The bars, bolts, locks, etc., of doors of gateways were the same as those used for doors of houses, but larger in proportion (see HOUSE).

In some cities of Syria the doors were made of massive pieces of stone. Buckingham (Arab Tribes, p. 221) describes ponderous doors of stone in the Hauran, 15 in. thick, closed on the inside with bars. Burckhardt (Syria, p. 90) mentions doors of the city gate at Kuffir, 10 ft. high, of single pieces of stone; he also mentions doors at Ezra, of one piece, 4 in. thick, some upwards of 9 ft. in height, turning upon hinges worked out of the stone.

Maundrell (Early Travels, p. 447, A.D. 1697) mentions large stone doors to tombs at Jerusalem, 6 in. thick, turning on hinges of the same piece with the door. Schumacher (Northern Ajlûn, p. 71) gives a sketch of a basalt door to a tomb at Umm Ḳeis (Gadara), 4 ft. high, 7 in. thick, with stone hinges, and a lock and bolt which can be pushed home and withdrawn from the outside. Gates of single precious stones are mentioned poetically (Is 54^{12}, Rev 21^{21}).

At the present day the people of the East have reverted to their primitive customs regarding the uses of the gate, and many business and social duties are carried out there. Thomson (Land and the Book, i. p. 31) mentions having seen at Jaffa the Ḳâdi and his court sitting at the entrance of the gate, hearing and adjudicating all sorts of cases in the audience of all that went in and out thereat. At Suakin in 1886 the present writer found it necessary to sit at the gate to transact official business in order that the public might freely approach and relate their grievances. Bertrandon de la Broquére (Early Travels, p. 349, A.D. 1433) gives an interesting account of his reception at the court of the Turks, the 'Sublime Porte,' at Constantinople. The ambassadors were received at the gate of the palace, and all business was transacted there. Chardin relates (vii. 368) that the principal gate of the royal palace of Ispahan was held sacred, and used by criminals as a place of refuge. The present writer conducted all his business transactions with the governors of Al-Arish, Nukl, and Akabah in 1882 at the gate, where there were arched roofs giving protection from the sun and rain, and seats for the administration of justice. At Nukl the council chamber was immediately over the gate. The city gateways of the present day have usually flanking towers and overhead galleries, with an arched passage within, so that a second set of gates may be erected inside the barbican or courtyard. 'Frequently in the gates of cities, as at Mosul, these recesses are used as shops for the sale of wheat and barley, bread and grocery' (Layard, Nineveh and Babylon, p. 57 note). Morier (Second Journey through Persia, p. 189) speaks of the market for mules, asses, and camels held every morning outside the gate of Teheran, and also states that temporary shops and tents of sellers of all sorts of goods were erected there. Denham and Clapperton (Discoveries in Africa, i. 216, 217) speak of the markets for slaves, sheep and cattle, wheat, rice, etc., outside one of the principal gates of a town. At Jerusalem there is an extensive temporary market outside the Jaffa gate on a Sunday morning, and here also is the principal place of public execution.

The gate of a city is necessarily the place for the collector of local customs to sit to receive the moneys due for commodities entering the city (Mt 9^{9}).

These gateways are often very highly ornamented, sentences from the Korân being inscribed on the doorways and on the doors (cf. Dt 6^9, Is 54^{12}, Rev 21^{21}). Maundrell (Early Travels, p. 488, A.D. 1697), speaking of Damascus, says, 'In these walls you find the gates and doors adorned with marble portals, carved and inlaid with great beauty and variety.' The city gates of the present day are usually two-leaved, of wood studded with iron nails, and often covered with iron or copper plates. As in olden times, the gates of walled cities, such as Jerusalem, Damascus, Cairo, etc., are closed at night (Robinson, BRP iii. 455; Lane, Mod. Egyp. i. 25).

Burying places were outside the gate (Lk 7^{12}); so was the προσευχή at Philippi (Ac 16^{13}); Jesus suffered 'without the gate,' He 13^{12} (cf. Lv 24^{14}, Nu 15^{36}, 1 K $21^{10.\ 13}$ etc.).

The word 'gate' is used, in a figurative sense, in a variety of ways. It is used, esp. in Dt, to denote the city itself, 'And thy seed shall possess the gate of his enemy' (Gn 22^{17} 24^{60}, Dt 12^{12}). We read also of the gate of heaven (Gn 28^{17}); the gate of the Lord (Ps 118^{20}); the gates of death (Ps 9^{13}); the gates of the grave (Is 38^{10}); the gates of Hades (Mt 16^{18}). The gate from its importance and defensive strength becomes the synonym for strength, power, and dominion. 'Thou shalt call thy walls Salvation, and thy gates Praise' (Is 60^{18}); 'The Lord loveth the gates of Zion' (Ps 87^2); 'Lift up your heads, O ye gates' (Ps 24^7); in time of calamity the gates howl and languish, lament and mourn (Is 14^{31} 3^{26}, Jer 14^2). By metonymy 'the gates' meant those who administered justice at the gates and held government (Hom. Il. ix. 312; cf. Mt 16^{18}).

To keep and watch over the temple, city, and palace gates were porters (doorkeepers) and watchmen (שֹׁעֵר, θυρωρός, πυλωρός, portarius, janitor). In the temple of Jerusalem the duties of keeping the gates ultimately devolved upon the Levites (1 Ch $9^{18ff.}$ $15^{23f.}$, 2 Ch 31^{14}, Jer 35^4). In the time of the Chronicler 4000 of the Levites were porters (doorkeepers) about the temple (1 Ch 23^5), and the porters waited at every gate (2 Ch 35^{15}). The location of the porters at the gates is given in 1 Ch 26.

In the palace of Shushan (Est 2^{21} 6^2) the king's chamberlains kept the door. In the time of our Lord it is mentioned that a maid kept the door of the court of the high priest at Jerus. (Jn 18^{16}, cf. Ac 12^{13}). There were also porters and watchmen to the city gates. David sat between the two gates at Mahanaim, and the watchman went up over the gate and called unto the porter (2 S 18^{25}). The lepers called to the porters of the city of Samaria (2 K 7^{10}). Nehemiah on rebuilding the walls of Jerusalem speaks of appointing the porters, and appointing watches of the inhabitants (Neh $7^{2f.}$); he also set his servants over the gates when they were shut on the Sabbath (Neh 13^{19}). There were also guards to the gates (2 K 11^6) and guard chambers (1 K 14^{28}). Keepers of prison doors are spoken of (Ac 5^{23} 12^6).

The porter or doorkeeper (θυρωρός) of a fold is spoken of as opening to the shepherd (Jn 10^3). In private houses there were doorkeepers to watch the entrance (Mk 13^{34}). In Greek and Roman houses there was a small room (θυρών, cella) for the porter and also for his dog, which was usually kept in the hall to guard the house (Aristot. Oecon. i. 6; Plato, Protag. p. 314; Aristoph. Equit. 1025; Tibull. i. l. 56). C. WARREN.

GATH (גַּת 'wine-press'; LXX Γέθ; Jos. Γίττα; Vulg. Geth), one of the five royal cities of the Philistines (Jos 13^3, 1 S 6^{17}), the site of which is still uncertain, though its position can be located, within a radius of a few miles, from the various references to it in Scripture. The preponderance of opinion is in favour of its identity with the village of Tell es-Sâfi, the Blanchegarde of the Crusaders; while some authorities give reasons for identifying it with the village of Beit Jibrin, which is also identified as Eleutheropolis. These two sites are about 8 miles apart, within that portion of the Shephelah or undulating country which was allotted to the tribe of Judah, and is recognized as being within the border of the Philistines. According to Josephus, however (Ant. v. i. 22), Gath was in the territory of Dan, and is coupled with Jamnia as though in its vicinity on the southern border of the territory.

Gath is not mentioned in Jos as having been allotted to either the tribe of Judah or Dan, but all the references to it indicate that it was close to the border separating these two tribes: in common with Ashdod and Gaza, it remained in possession of the Anakim after Joshua had destroyed them out of all the other cities of Palestine (Jos 11^{22}).

Gath was a fenced city of considerable importance, and was constantly the scene of struggles between the Philistines and Israelites, and was taken and retaken by either side (1 S 7^{14} $17^{4.\ 52}$, 2 S 21^{20}, 2 K 12^{17}, 1 Ch 7^{21} 8^{13} 18^1 20^6, 2 Ch 11^8 26^6).

The journey of the ark of God from Ashdod to Gath (1 S 5), and thence by Ekron to Beth-shemesh and Kiriath-jearim, indicates the site of Gath to have been near the boundary-line between Dan and Judah. The account of the flight of the Philistines on the death of Goliath, 'by the way to Shaaraim, even unto Gath and unto Ekron' (1 S 17^{52}), gives the same indication.

Gath remained a stronghold of the Philistines during the reigns of Saul and David, and the latter twice (but see DAVID, i. 564a) took refuge there: first, when he fled from Saul at Gibeah (1 S 21^{10}) he went to Achish the king of Gath, and being discovered, feigned himself mad in their hands; secondly, when he again fled from Saul at the head of 600 men, he dwelt with Achish at Gath, and formed a friendship with him (1 S 27^5) and with the Gittites, 600 of whom came after him from Gath when he reigned in Jerusalem, and accompanied him under Ittai the Gittite on his flight from Jerusalem over Jordan (2 S $15^{18ff.}$), when his son Absalom conspired and stole the hearts of the men of Israel.

Rehoboam fortified Gath (2 Ch 11^8), but it seems to have fallen again into the hands of the Philistines, as Uzziah 'brake down the wall of Gath' (2 Ch 26^6) when he went forth and warred against the Philistines. Amos about this time speaks of 'Gath of the Philistines' (Am 6^2; see Driver's note). The last reference to Gath as an existing (?) city is in the Bk. of Micah (1^{10}), in the days of Hezekiah king of Judah, 'Declare ye it not at Gath.' Both Ashdod and Ekron are referred to in the times of Josiah (Zeph 2^4) and after the Exile (Zec 9^5), but Gath has disappeared from history. It may have been destroyed when Hezekiah smote the Philistines even unto Gaza (2 K 18^8), or when Sennacherib 'came up against all the fenced cities of Judah and took them' (2 K 18^{13}), as it plays no further part in history.

Little is learned concerning the site of Gath by reference to Eusebius and Jerome. Gath is stated to have been 5 Roman miles north of Eleutheropolis towards Diospolis (Lydda), while Gath-rimmon, a Levitical city in the tribe of Dan, is stated as about 12 miles from Diospolis towards Eleutheropolis: this would in each case indicate a site close to Tell es-Sâfi, which is situated within the boundary of the tribe of Judah, and is nowhere near the site which Gath-rimmon is supposed to have occupied in Dan, not far from Joppa and Lydda. It may, then, be assumed that both these references are to the royal Gath of the Philistines and not to Gath-rimmon (Onomast s. 'Gath'). Jerome in another work (Comm. in Mic 1^{11}) states that Gath, one of the five cities of the Philistines, was situated near the borders of Judah on the way from Eleutheropolis to Gaza, and was then a very large village. There is obviously a mistake in the word 'Gaza,' as the way indicated does not go near the borders of Judah. Eusebius further mentions the Gath to which the ark was taken from Ashdod on the way to Ekron as lying between Antipatris (Ras el-'Ain) and Jamnia (Yebna); this line lies within the tribe of Dan, and the Gath thus located appears to be Gath-rimmon and not the royal Gath.

The Crusaders considered Gath to be identical with Jamnia (Yebna), and erected there the castle of Ibelin, which Benjamin of Tudela (Early Travels, p. 37) identifies with Jabneh, now Yebna (Will. Tyr. 15. 24. 25).

The view that Gath, Bethgabra, Eleutheropolis, and Beit Jibrîn are all one and the same city is based by Thomson (Land and Book) and Canon Tristram (Bible Places) on the ground that Bethgabra and Beit Jibrîn may be rendered 'house of the giants' (Anakim), and on the finding of the name Kherbet Gat among the ruined heaps at Beit Jibrîn, and also on the assumption that Mareshah was a suburb of Gath (2 Ch 11^{8}, Mic 1^{14}), from the connexion of the words in those two passages. As, however, the word Gath in Hebrew signifies 'wine-press,' and as the Anakim at one time occupied all the territory round about, this proposal cannot be pressed home.

The view generally accepted is that proposed by Porter in 1857, viz. that Gath is represented by the site of the modern village of Tell es-Sâfi. The position generally satisfies all the geographical references so far as they go, and for a fenced city it is naturally a very strong site, having precipitous sides towards the west. The only difficulty is that the sites of Ekron, Ashdod, Ashkelon, Gaza, and other Philistine fenced cities do not present any natural features capable of defence; they are simply mounds on the undulating plain, and it may be that Gath may yet be discovered as a mound somewhere near Tell es-Sâfi. If it had such pronounced natural features for defence as the hill in question has, it is difficult to understand how its existence can have so completely disappeared from history after the time of king Hezekiah.

Tell es-Sâfi (BRP[2] ii. pp. 29–32) is an isolated oblong hill or ridge stretching from north to south between the Shephelah to the east and the plains of Philistia to the west, Wady es-Sunt (the valley of Elah) passing by on the north. It stands out conspicuously towards the north, south, and west, about 300 ft. above the plain and 700 above the Mediterranean; and, presenting on three sides many hundred feet of white precipices, would as a fenced city have been remarkably strong. There are many caves and excavations on the northern scarps; water is obtained to the west at the foot of the hill. The name signifies 'the white hill,' and it can be seen at several hours' distance to north and west.

On the top is a modern village of mud huts with a sacred wely. There are still remains of drafted stones visible, remnants of the old castle of Blanchegarde (Alba Specula), erected in A.D. 1144 by Fulke of Anjou as a check against the incursions of the Saracens from Ashkelon. It was taken by Saladin in A.D. 1191 and dismantled, but was again fortified by Richard of England in the following year. It continued for some centuries as a place of importance in the hands of the Moslems. (See, in addition to the authorities cited above, G. A. Smith, HGHL 194 ff.; Gautier, Souvenirs de Terre-Sainte, 93).

GATH-HEPHER (גַּת חֵפֶר 'wine-press of digging'; in Jos 19^{13} with ה locale גִּתָּה חֵפֶר which AV mistakenly tr. Gittah-hepher).—The home of the prophet Jonah (2 K 14^{25}), and on the border of Zebulun and Naphtali near Japhia and Rimmon (Jos $19^{12.\ 13}$), which have been identified in the villages of Yâfa and Rummâneh.

There is a general concurrence in the identification of Gath-hepher with the present village of el-Meshhed (SWP i. pp. 363–367), the site of one of the many Moslem tombs of Neby Yûnas, the prophet Jonah. This village is regarded by both Christians and Moslems as being the home of the prophet Jonah, and there appears to be a chain of tradition supporting this view. About 2½ miles to the west of el-Meshhed is the village of Seffûrieh, where there are still the remains of a castle and church identified by Robinson (BRP ii. 345) as the site of the Sepphoris of Josephus, the Tsippori of the Rabbins, a place not mentioned in Scripture, but afterwards called by the Romans Diocæsarea. Jerome says (Procem. in Jonam) that the house and tomb of the prophet Jonah were shown at a small village 2 miles from Sepphoris or Diocæsarea on the road to Tiberias. Benjamin of Tudela in the 12th cent. states that the tomb of the prophet Jonah was shown in his time near Sepphoris (Early Travels in Palestine, p. 89). Isaac Chelo in the 14th cent. states that the name of Gath-hepher was Meshad (Carmoly, Itin. p. 256). The rabbinical writers state that the tomb of Jonah the prophet was shown at Gath-hepher on a hill near Sepphoris. The wely or makân has two domes, and is very conspicuous, dominating the plain on the north at a height of 1250 ft. above the Mediterranean.

GATH-RIMMON (גִּתְּרִמּוֹן).—There are perhaps two places mentioned of this name.

1. A Levitical city in the territory of Dan (Jos 21^{24}, 1 Ch 6^{69}), situated near Jehud, Bene-berak, and Me-jarkon, not far from Joppa (Jos 19^{45}). The site has not been ascertained. This is probably the Gath mentioned by Eusebius as lying between Antipatris and Jamnia (Onom. s. 'Gath'). A Gath-rimmon is mentioned as lying between Diospolis and Eutheropolis, but this reference is probably to the royal city of Gath. See GATH.

2. A town of Manasseh, west of Jordan (Jos 21^{25}), assigned to the Levites. It is only once mentioned, with no indication whatever of its situation within the tribe of Manasseh. It follows immediately after Gath-rimmon of Dan in the previous verse; and as the LXX has Ἰεβαθά (B) or Βαιθσά (A), and the parallel passage in 1 Ch 6^{70} has Bileam (בִּלְעָם), it is possibly an error of the transcribers. Oxf. Heb. Lex. would read in Jos 21^{25} יִבְלְעָם, and identify this with the place referred to in 1 Ch 6^{70} (so also Bennett in SBOT on Jos ad loc.). See further IBLEAM.

GAULANITIS (Γαυλανῖτις).—The name of a district east of the Sea of Galilee, and frequently mentioned by Josephus, together with Trachonitis, Auranitis, and Batanæa. It is from Gaulōn, Γαυλών, which is the Gr. form of the Heb. word Golan, גּוֹלָן, of which the modern Arab. representative is Jaulân. Could we locate with certainty Golan, which was the northernmost of the three cities of refuge east of the Jordan, we should have the central or chief city of the district in question, and thus be able, no doubt, to determine its geographical limits more definitely.

After the death of Herod the Great, Gaulanitis fell to his son Philip, and during his long reign was a portion of his dominions (Ant. XVIII. iv. 6). It was divided into two parts, Upper and Lower, and belonged to Agrippa II., from whom it revolted to the Romans in A.D. 66–70 (Josephus, Life, 37; Wars, III. iii. 5, IV. i. 1). The province could not have been of great extent; it was free from hills, having some portions rocky and others exceedingly fertile. It is a part of the great east-Jordan plateau, and rises some 2000 ft. above the sea-level. Judging from existing ruins, this region was once densely populated. See on the whole subject Schumacher, The Jaulân. S. MERRILL.

GAULS (Γαλάται) are mentioned in 1 Mac 8^2 as conquered by the Romans, and in 2 Mac 8^{20} as defeated in Babylonia by the Jews (RVm in the second passage and AV in both read 'Galatians'). The historical allusions are doubtful, although probably the former passage refers to the victories of Manlius in Asia Minor (B.C. 189). See further under GALATIA, p. 89[a].

GAZA (עַזָּה Gn 10^{19}, Dt 2^{23}, Arab. Ghŭzzeh).—One of the five chief cities of Philistia, situated on a slight eminence amidst trees and gardens at a distance of 2 miles from the shore of the Mediterranean, and on the high road from Egypt to Jaffa and the East (lat. 31–30° N.; long. 34–33° E.). Between the present town and the coast rises a high range of sandhills,* which protects the town from the westerly winds of winter, but is a constant source of danger and loss, as the sands, impelled by the winds from the sea, are ever advancing inland; and it is supposed, with much probability, that the city of the time of the judges (c. B.C. 1100) is buried beneath these immense mounds. To the east of the town rises a ridge, 270 feet high, called el-Muntâr, or 'the watch-tower,' supposed to be the mount, 'in the direction of Hebron,' to which Samson carried the gates of the city (Jg 16^3); and on the coast are some traces of ruins, Tell et-Tîneh and el-Mineh, which are considered to mark the position of the former harbour. There is, however, no natural harbour, or safe anchorage, at any part of this coast for many miles from Gaza, and the place could never have been a seaport town. One of the most interesting objects about Gaza is the forest of ancient olive trees extending for 3 miles along the Jaffa road, somewhat resembling a forest of ancient oaks in the gnarled and wrinkled character of their bark, and the girth of their corrugated trunks.† The country around is rich and well cultivated, or else laid out in pasturage for sheep, goats, and herds of cattle; and the Arabs from the neighbouring desert assemble here in the market-place to buy and sell commodities. They belong to the Azazimeh and Terabîn tribes inhabiting the districts to the N. and S. of the Wady es-Seba (here called the Wady Ghŭzzeh), and stretching southwards into the sterile region of the Badiet et-Tih.

History.—Gaza is one of the most ancient cities named in the Bible. We find it mentioned, along with the cities of the plain, as lying along the border of the Canaanites (Gn 10^{19}),‡ and it was captured, but not retained, by the tribe of Judah on the invasion of Pal. by the Israelites (Jg $1^{18.\ 19}$). The special interest of its early history is connected with the exploits of Samson during the wars between Israel and the Philistines (Jg 13–16), at which time G. seems to have risen to a position of great importance, and to have become the capital of the Philistine confederacy; a position which it retained down to the time of Alexander the Great. In the year B.C. 710, when joined in alliance with Sabako king of Egypt, and ruled by Hanno, it was attacked by Sargon and the army of Assyria. A great battle was fought at Raphia (the modern Rafeh), about half-way between Gaza and the Wady el-'Arîsh ('River of Egypt'), in which the allies were defeated by Sargon. Hanno was deprived of his crown, and carried captive to Assyria by the conqueror. This was the first trial of strength between the two great powers of Egypt and Assyria.* Still later (B.C. 332) G. was strong enough to resist for a period of two months a siege by Alexander the Great, after the battle of Issus, but was ultimately taken by storm. The city at this time is described as 20 stadia distant from the sea, and very difficult of access owing to the height of the sandhills. The city itself was wide, and placed on a lofty hill and strongly fortified by a wall.†

But the ultimate decay of G. foretold by the prophets (Jer 47, Am 1^6, Zeph 2^4, Zec 9^5) was hastening towards fulfilment. G. suffered greatly (1 Mac $11^{61.\ 62}$ 13^{43}) in the wars between Ptolemy IX. and Alexander Jannæus, a prince of the Maccabæan line (B.C. 105–78). By Augustus it was assigned to the kingdom of Herod along with the neighbouring maritime cities. This brings us to the first event recorded in NT history in which the name of G. comes prominently into view, namely, the conversion and baptism of the Ethiopian eunuch, which took place near the city (Ac 8^{-6}). The precise spot where he was baptized by Philip cannot be determined with certainty; but it may be inferred to have been at the crossing of either the brook Wady el-Hessy or Wady el-Ḥalib by the road from Jaffa to Gaza.‡

Henceforth G. almost disappears from the page of history, till in A.D. 634 it was captured by the generals of the first calif, Abu Bekr. During the crusades it was garrisoned by the Knights Templars, but finally fell into the hands of Saladin after the disastrous battle of Hattin (A.D. 1170). Since then it has remained a Mohammedan city. (For a full account of Gaza and its history see G. A. Smith, HGHL 181 ff., and cf. Gautier, Souvenirs de Terre-Sainte, 116 ff.; Clermont-Ganneau, Arch. Researches in Pal. (1896), p. 279 ff.). E. HULL.

GAZARA (Γαζάρα, Γάζαρα, Γαζηρά, Γάσηρα).—An important stronghold often mentioned during the Maccabæan struggle, 1 Mac 4^{15} 7^{45} 9^{52} 13^{53} (in this last all MSS have Γάζαν, Gaza, but the context and the parallel passage in Jos. Ant. XIII. vi. 7 show that the correct reading is Γαζάραν, see RVm) 13^{53} $14^{7.\ 34}$ 15^{28} 16^1, 2 Mac 10^{32}. In Ant. XII. vii. 4, XIV. v. 4, Wars, I. viii. 5, it is called Gadara. There seems to be no doubt that it is the OT GEZER (which see). See further, Schürer, HJP I. i. 261 f., 372, and G. A. GAZELLE (צְבִי ṣĕbhî, δορκάς).—AV renders ṣĕbhî in the poetical books, and in 2 S 2^{18} 1 Ch 12^8 by roe. RV gives the same rendering, but adds in the marg. in all but three places (2 S 2^{18}, Ca 3^5 7^3) gazelle. In the lists of animals used as food AV renders ṣĕbhî by roebuck, while RV renders it inconsistently with itself in the other passages, gazelle. The latter is undoubtedly the correct rendering for all, instead of roe and roebuck. The Arabic word ẓabî, the exact counterpart of ṣĕbhî, is one of the names of the gazelle in that tongue;

* Survey Map of Palestine.

† One of these trees was found to be 19 feet in circumference at 4 feet from the ground when measured by the present writer in 1884; and many of them may be a thousand years of age and upwards.

‡ It does not necessarily follow that Gaza was in existence at that time, but only in the time of the writer of the Book of Genesis.

* Rawlinson, Anc. Mon. vol. ii. 144.

† Arrian, ii. 26, where an account of the siege is given. During its progress Alexander received a wound in the shoulder.

‡ The Hessy is crossed by the road at a distance of 12 miles from Gaza, the Ḥalib at 5 miles. Either of these spots fits in with the narrative. The ruins of el-Mineh on the seacoast mark the site of a town and episcopal see of the 5th cent. called 'Constantia' or 'Limena Gazæ.'

the other is ghazâl, from which our word gazelle is derived. It was expressly permitted as food (Dt 12^{15} 14^{5} 15^{22}). It was daily served on Solomon's table (1 K 4^{23}). Asahel and the Gadites were as fleet as ṣĕbhîs (2 S 2^{18}, 1 Ch 12^{8}). The ṣĕbhi was much hunted (Pr 6^{5}, Is 13^{14}). It is frequently alluded to in Ca ($2^{7.\ 9.\ 17}$ 3^{5} 4^{5} 7^{3} 8^{14}). The fem. form צְבִיָּה ṣĕbhîyyâh became (by law of interchange) Aram. ṭabîtha, which was translated δορκάς = gazelle (cf. Ac 9^{36}).

The gazelle, Gazella Dorcas, L., is one of the most beautiful of the antelopes. It is abundant throughout the country, but especially in the remoter mountain districts and in the deserts. It is often met with in herds, which sometimes number as many as a hundred. The general colour is fawn, with white and dark stripes down the face, and a white mark on the hind quarters. A local variety, called the ariel gazelle, Gazella Arabica, Ehr., is found in Gilead. It is of a darker fawn colour than the type.

Gazelles are hunted by lying in wait for them at the springs, or by chasing them with greyhounds and falcons. They are very fleet, however, and often 'deliver themselves from the hand of the hunter' (Pr 6^{5}). They are often taken in large numbers by driving them into an enclosure, with a pitfall at either side. As many as fifty may thus be taken at one time. When taken young the gazelle is easily tamed, and becomes very affectionate. G. E. Post.

GAZERA (A Γαζηρά, B Καζηρά), 1 Es 5^{31}.—His sons were among the 'temple servants.' In Ezr 2^{48} Gazzam.

GAZEZ (גָּזֵז, Wellh., de gent. et fam. Jud. 26, would write גְּזוֹ).—1. A son of Ephah, Caleb's concubine, 1 Ch 2^{46}. 2. In same verse a second G. is mentioned as a son of Haram, who was another of Ephah's sons. Smith's DB^{2} incorrectly states that this second G. is omitted in B. The latter MS reads both times Γεζοῦε; Luc. has in second instance Γαζάς.

GAZINGSTOCK.—Men are no longer punished by being exposed to public gaze, whether in the stocks or otherwise, and 'gazing-stock' has gone out of use. It is one of several compounds of 'stock' which have become obsolete. We find 'mocking stock' in 2 Mac 7^{7}; and Tindale uses 'gestyngestocke' in Dt 28^{37} for EV 'byword.' The only compound still in use is 'laughing-stock.'

Gazingstock (1611 'gazing stocke') occurs Nah 3^{6} 'I . . . will set thee as a gazingstock'; Heb. כְּרֹאִי [in pause], lit. 'as a sight' (from רָאָה 'to look upon'); the word is found also in Gn 16^{13} (אֵל רֳאִי, AV 'Thou God seest me,' RV 'Thou art a God that seeth,' RVm 'God of seeing'—which is probably nearest the mark, rŏî being a subst. here); in 1 S 16^{12} of David (EV 'goodly to look to'); and in Job 33^{21} (מָרְאֶה, of the wasting away of Job's flesh, EV 'that it cannot be seen'). For the thought of Nah 3^{6} Davidson refers to Ezk $28^{17.\ 18}$, Mt 1^{19}, 1 Co 4^{9}; to which may be added the other example of 'gazingstock,' He 10^{33} (cf. also Moab. Stone, l. 12, 'a g. to Chemosh and to Moab'). Here the ptcp. θεατριζόμενοι is tr^{d} in AV 'whilst ye were made a gazingstock,' in RV 'being made a g.,' a tr. which comes from the Bishops' Bible; Wyc. and Rhem. having 'spectacle,' after Vulg. spectaculum facti. This is the only occurrence of the Gr. verb, but θέατρον γίνομαι is found in 1 Co 4^{9}, already referred to, in a precisely similar meaning, EV 'We are made a spectacle unto the world,' which is Wyclif's and the Rhem. tr., again after Vulg. spectaculum facti. Tindale's word here is 'gasyngestocke,' and he is followed by the other versions. Shaks. uses 'gaze' for 'gazing-stock' in Macbeth, v. viii. 24—

> 'Then yield thee, coward,
> And live to be the show and gaze o' the time;
> We'll have thee, as our rarer monsters are,
> Painted upon a pole, and underwrit,
> "Here may you see the tyrant."'

GAZITES (הָעַזָּתִי[ם]).—The inhabitants of Gaza (wh. see), Jos 13^{3} (AV Gazathites), Jg 16^{2}.

GAZZAM (גַּזָּם).—A family of Nethinim who returned with Zerub. (Ezr 2^{48}, Neh 7^{51}), called in 1 Es 5^{31} Gazera. See Genealogy.

GEBA.—1. (גֶּבַע, in pause גֶּבַע = Gaba, a 'hill') A city of Benjamin—one of those assigned under Joshua to the Levites (Jos 21^{17}, 1 Ch 6^{60}). It was situated on the N.E. border of Benjamin (Jos 18^{24}). It is abundantly clear from the history of the two kingdoms that Geba is to be identified with the modern Jeba. The latter lies some 7 miles to the N. of Jerusalem, the road to which joins the main road between Bethel and Jerusalem, just N. of Tell el-Fûl (Gibeah). It is situated on the S. side of the steep defile of the Wady Suweinît, facing Michmash (Mûkhmās) on the other side (1 S 14^{5} 'The one crag rose up on the north in front of Michmash, and the other on the south in front of Geba'). It was from this spot that Jonathan (1 S $14^{1f.}$), accompanied only by his armour-bearer, started to descend the precipitous cliffs of the pass, and, in so doing, purposely revealed himself to the garrison of the Philistines on the opposite height. The words of the latter merely served to confirm the two warriors in their resolve, while the very audacity of their undertaking ensured its success. Climbing up on their hands and feet (v.^{13}), they fell upon the astonished Philistines with undiminished vigour, and, by their daring, initiated a panic, which quickly spread throughout the Philistine forces, and caused the complete discomfiture of the latter at the hands of Saul. Saul, with but a scanty remnant of his forces, would seem to have been encamped at Gibeah (13^{16} Geba must be a mistake for Gibeah; cf v.^{15}), some 3 miles to the S., so that Jonathan could start on his daring errand without awakening the suspicions of his countrymen as to the object of his expedition. In the reign of Asa king of Judah, this important position on the frontier was fortified with 'the stones of Ramah (er-Rām) and the timber thereof, wherewith Baasha (king of Israel) had builded' (1 K 15^{22} = 2 Ch 16^{6}). From this period onwards G. appears to have marked the N. limit of the kingdom of Judah. Hence we find the old formula, 'from Dan to Beersheba,' which denoted the extent of the united kingdom, altered into 'from Geba to Beersheba' (2 K 23^{8}, cf. Zec 14^{10}). The position of Geba, its strategic importance, and its distinction from the similar-sounding Gibeah (for the latter point cf. Jos $18^{24.\ 28}$), are once more clearly shown in Isaiah's dramatic picture of the march of Sennacherib's army against Jerusalem from the N. (Is $10^{28\text{-}32}$, see Gibeah, 2 (4)); while in the times of Ezra and Nehemiah it was still a well-known spot (Neh 11^{31} 12^{29}; cf. 7^{30}, Ezr 2^{26}, 1 Ch 8^{6}).

In the following passages the Hebrew text wrongly gives Geba for Gibeah: Jg $20^{10.\ 33}$, 1 S $13^{3.\ 16}$; for further details see Gibeah, 2. In Jg 20^{31} (see above) Geba is to be restored in place of Gibeah, while in 2 S 5^{25} it seems probable that we should restore Gibeon for Geba, in accordance with the parallel passage 1 Ch 14^{16}.

2. (Γαιβαί) About 3 miles N. of Samaria. It was the southernmost of the three fortresses which commanded the road leading up from Esdraelon, through the pass of En-gannim (Jenîn), into Samaria. It was between this fort and Scythopolis that Holofernes pitched his camp preparatory to attacking Judæa (Jth 3^{10}).

GEBAL.—1. גְּבָל, Γαιβάλ or Γεβάλ, Ps 83^{8} [Eng. 7]. A mountainous district south of the Dead Sea, which still bears the name of Jebâl (Robinson, BR ii. 154). Josephus regards Γοβολῖτις as a part of Idumæa (Ant. II. i. 2, cf. IX. ix. 1), and Jerome explains Seir by Gebalena (Euseb. Onomast. 'Seir'). In Ps 83^{8} Gebal is named, together with Ammon, Amalek, and other nations, as forming a confederacy against Israel. The date and occasion of the psalm are unknown, but many commentators connect it with the events described in 1 Mac 5.

2. גְּבָל, (οἱ πρεσβύτεροι) Βυβλίων, Ezk 27^{9}. Gebalites הַגִּבְלִים, AV Giblites, but in 1 K 'the stonesquarers,' Jos 13^{5}, 1 K 5^{18}. A Phœnician city, situated on rising ground near the sea, at the foot of Lebanon, and about 20 miles N. of Beirût. The name is found frequently in Phœnician (CIS 1) and Assyrian inscriptions in the forms Gubal or Gubli (cf. Schrader, COT i. 174 and Gloss.), and also on the Tel el-Amarna tablets; while to the Greeks the town was well known as Byblus (Βύβλος or Βίβλος, cf. Strabo, xvi. p. 755). The modern name is Jebeil. The city was celebrated for the worship of Adonis and Astarte, while its maritime importance is attested by Ezekiel, who speaks of the 'elders and wise men of Gebal' as being the carpenters or 'calkers' of the ships of Tyre (27^{9}). According to Jos 13^{5} the land of the Gebalites (AV Giblites) was included within the ideal boundaries of Israel; but it was never occupied by the Israelites, and it seems doubtful whether it could in any sense have been regarded as belonging to the Promised Land. Moreover, the passage is syntactically incorrect (וְהָאָרֶץ הַגִּבְלִי), and the widely different reading of LXX points to an early corruption of the text. It is better to read 'as far as the border of the Gebalites,' עַד גְּבוּל הַגִּבְלִי, omitting the preceding words הָאֱמֹרִי וְהָאָרֶץ, and to suppose that the territory of Gebal extended inland in a southeasterly direction (see Dillm. ad loc.). The Gebalites are mentioned again in 1 K 5^{18} [Heb.^{32}], where they are said to have fashioned the stones for the building of the temple along with the builders of Solomon and the builders of Hiram. But here, too, the text is probably faulty. Thenius reads, 'and Solomon's builders . . . fashioned them (the stones), and made a border for them' (וַיְגַבְּילוּם for וְהַגִּבְלִים, LXX ἔβαλον). H. A. White.

GEBER (גֶּבֶר 'man' or 'mighty man,' Γαβέρ A, om. B Luc. 1 K 4^{19}).—One of Solomon's twelve commissariat officers, whose district lay to the E. of Jordan, and perhaps S. of that of the officer mentioned v.^{13}. At the end of v.^{19} comes a sentence referred by AV and RV to this Geber, and rendered 'and he was the only officer which was in the land.' This is usually thought to mean that in this large district more than one officer might have been expected, but that this was not the case, probably because the country was rugged and thinly populated. Such a rendering, however, together with the interpretation put upon it, can by no means be extracted from the Hebrew, which is certainly corrupt. Klostermann by a clever emendation obtains the statement 'and one officer was over all the officers who were in the land,' the reference being, not to Geber, but to Azariah son of Nathan, mentioned v.^{5} as 'over the officers.' Cf. the interpretation of Jos. (Ant. VIII. ii. 3) ἐπὶ δὲ τούτων εἷς πάλιν ἄρχων ἀποδέδεικτο.

C. F. Burney.

GEBIM (הַגֵּבִים 'the trenches'). —A place N. of Jerusalem, the inhabitants of which are graphically pictured by the prophet as saving their goods by flight upon the approach of the Assyrian army, Is 10^{31} only. In Eusebius (Onomast. s. 'Gebin') a Geba 5 Roman miles from Gophna, on the way to Neapolis (Shechem), is noticed. This is the modern Jebîa, which, being near the great northern road, is a possible site for Gebim. See SWP vol. ii. sh. xiv. C. R. Conder.

GECKO (אֲנָקָה 'ănâḳâh, μυγαλή, mygale).—The AV (Lv 11^{30}) renders 'ănâḳâh, ferret. This animal, however, is not found in the Holy Land, and is not at all likely to be the one intended here. The LXX μυγαλή signifies the shrew mouse, of which several kinds are met with in the Holy Land: (1) Sorex araneus, De Selys, Arab. fâr el-khalâ, in the hilly districts of N. Galilee; (2) S. tetragonurus, Desm., in Lebanon; (3) S. pygmæus, De Selys, about one-third as large as the first; (4) S. crassicaudus, Licht., a silver-grey species, in the S. deserts; (5) S. fodiens, Schreb., the water shrew, by streams in Cœlesyria and Antilebanon. Notwithstanding the above tr^{n} of the LXX and the notion of the Rabbins that the hedgehog was the animal intended, the position of 'ănâḳâh among the lizards has inclined scholars to regard it as one of them. The RV has adopted gecko (so Pesh.). This rendering, however, must be regarded as purely conjectural. There are several of the Geckonidæ in the Holy Land. The commonest of all is the common gecko, Ptyodactylus Hasselquistii, Schneid., which is found everywhere among rocks and in ruins and about houses. It has a fan-shaped foot (whence its generic name), with suckers by the sides of the toes, so that it can walk on smooth walls, and even run inverted like a fly. It moves noiselessly. But it can emit a rapid clucking sound, by vibrating the tongue against the palate. The name gecko is an attempted imitation of this sound. There is a popular superstition in the country, that a gecko, crawling over the body, will produce leprous sores; hence its name abu bureis, 'father of leprosy.' This opinion, which is probably ancient, would add to the lacertine form of the animal a reason for considering it unclean. It has a flattish-triangular head, covered with scales, a wide mouth, large eyes and small teeth, and a broad tail, nearly as long as the body. The general colour is black, but the whole body is spotted with rows of rounded warts or prominences. It is the most repulsive-looking of the lizards in Palestine. G. E. Post.

GEDALIAH (גְּדַלְיָה, גְּדַלְיָהוּ 'J" is great').—1. Son of Ahikam, who had protected Jeremiah from the anti-Chaldæan party (Jer 26^{24}), and probably grandson of Shaphan, the pious scribe (2 K 22). G. naturally shared the views of Jeremiah. This commended him to Nebuchadnezzar, who made him governor over 'the poor of the people that were left in the land.' His two months' rule and treacherous murder are detailed in Jer 40, 41 (2 K 25^{22-25}). At Mizpah in Benjamin the scattered elements of the national life gathered round G. First came Jeremiah, then the remnant of the army, and finally the Jews that had been dispersed in the adjacent countries. At G.'s bidding they began to settle in the deserted towns, and to gather in the now ownerless crops. Meanwhile Baalis, king of the Ammonites, resolved, by the assassination of G., to destroy 'the remnant of Judah' (Jer 40^{15}). He found a tool in Ishmael 'of the seed royal,' formerly a high officer under Zedekiah, but now a bandit in the service of Ammon (41^{10}). Disbelieving the warnings which he received, G. entertained Ishmael and ten followers at Mizpah. G. and the small garrison of Jews and Chaldæans were slain, probably while at table (Jos. Ant. X. ix. 4), and their bodies cast promiscuously (41[9]) into the ancient cistern of Asa. The plot of Baalis succeeded but too well; for the Jewish captains, fearing lest they might be held responsible for the audacious murder of the great king's representative (41[2. 18]), fled into Egypt, carrying with them Jeremiah and 'all the remnant of Judah.' 'It seemed to be the revocation of the advantages of the Exodus' (Stanley). The anniversary of G.'s murder—the third day of the seventh month, Tisri (Zec 7[5] 8[19])—has been ever since observed as one of the four Jewish fasts. Grätz (see Cheyne on Jer 41[1]) argues that G.'s government lasted five years, but his reasons do not seem conclusive.

2. 1 Ch 25[3. 9] eldest 'son' of Jeduthun, leader of the second course of temple musicians. 3. Ezr 10[18] (1 Es 9[19] Joadanus), a priest 'of the sons of Jeshua,' who 'had married a strange woman.' 4. Jer 38[1] son of Pashhur (Jer 20[1-6]), a prince in the reign of Zedekiah. 5. Zeph 1[1] grandfather of the prophet Zephaniah. N. J. D. WHITE.

GEDDUR (A Γεδδούρ, B Κεδδούρ), 1 Es 5[30].—In Ezr 2[47] Neh 7[49] GAHAR. גחר was perhaps read גדור.

GEDER (גֶּדֶר). — An unidentified Canaanitish town, whose king was amongst those conquered by Joshua, Jos 12[13] (only). While LXX A has Γαδέρ, B has Ἀσεί. It is very probably identical with Beth-gader of 1 Ch 2[51]. In 1 Ch 27[28] Baal-hanan, who had charge of David's olives and sycomores, is called the Gederite (הַגְּדֵרִי), which may be a gentilic name derived from Geder, although some prefer to derive it from GEDERAH (wh. see).

GEDERAH. — AV of 1 Ch 4[23b] reads, 'Those that dwelt among plants (RVm plantations) and hedges,' but RV gives 'the inhabitants of Netaim and Gederah,' and this is probably the correct tr[n] of יוֹשְׁבֵי נְטָעִים וּגְדֵרָה. In that case the Gederah referred to would probably be the city of that name located by Jos 15[36] in the Shephelah, the modern Jedîreh (SWP vol. iii. sh. xx.) and the Gedour of Eusebius (Onomast. p. 254, Lagarde, 2nd ed.). The gentilic name Gederathite (הַגְּדֵרָתִי) occurs in 1 Ch 12[4]. J. A. SELBIE.

GEDEROTH (גְּדֵרוֹת, in 2 Ch 28[17] חֲגֵ).—A town of Judah in the Shephelah, Jos 15[41], 2 Ch 28[18], noticed with Beth-dagon, Makkedah, and Naamah. It appears to be the modern Katrah near Yebna, where a Jewish colony is now established. Possibly it is also the Kidron of 1 Mac 15[39. 41] 16[9]. See SWP vol. iii. sh. xvi. C. R. CONDER.

GEDEROTHAIM (גְּדֵרֹתַיִם) occurs in Jos 15[36] as one of the fourteen cities of Judah that lay in the Shephelah. There are, however, fourteen cities without it, and it is probable that the name has arisen by dittography from the preceding Gederah (Nöldeke, Krit. d. AT, 101). The names of the cities in the LXX show several divergences from the MT; in v.[36] Adithaim is omitted, and after Γαδηρά we read καὶ αἱ ἐπαύλεις αὐτῆς, which is evidently intended to be the tr[n] of גְּדֵרֹתַיִם ('sheep-folds'). Both the Oxf. Heb. Lex. and Siegfried-Stade are surely in error in stating that the name is omitted in the LXX. The subterfuge of the AVm 'Gederah or Gederothaim' is, of course, not permissible. J. A. SELBIE.

GEDOR (גְּדוֹר, גְּדֹר).—1. A town of Judah, named along with Halhul and Beth-zur, Jos 15[58]; cf. 1 Ch 4[4. 18] 12[7] (in this last חֲגְדוֹר, Baer and Kittel הַגְּדוּד). It is generally identified with the modern Jedûr (Robinson, BRP[2] ii. 13) north of Beit Sur. 2. The district from which the Simeonites are said to have expelled the Hamite settlers, 1 Ch 4[39ff.]. The LXX, however, reads Γέραρα (Gerar), and Gerar 'suits admirably as to direction' (Kittel in SBOT). This reading is adopted also by Ewald (Gesch. Isr. i. 344), Bertheau (Chron. 51), Hitzig (on Mic 1[15]), Graf (Der Stamm Simeon, 25), Oxf. Heb. Lex., Siegfried-Stade, etc.

GEDOR (גְּדוֹר, גְּדֹר 'wall').—1. A Benjamite, an ancestor of king Saul, 1 Ch 8[31] 9[37]. 2. 3. The eponym of two Judahite families, 1 Ch 4[4. 18]. See GENEALOGY.

GE-HARASHIM (גֵּי חֲרָשִׁים), 'valley of craftsmen,' 1 Ch 4[14], Neh 11[35]. In the latter passage it occurs with Lod and Ono. The name may survive at the ruin Hirsha, E. of Lydda. See SWP vol. ii. sh. xiv.

GEHAZI (גֵּיחֲזִי, except in 2 K 5[25] 8[4. 5], where it is גֵּחֲזִי, 'valley of vision'; LXX Γιεζεί, Vulg. Giezi) is four times called the servant (נַעַר, lit. 'boy') of Elisha, a term which indicates a lower kind of service than Elisha's 'ministry' to Elijah. He may, however, be the person called in 2 K 4[43] Elisha's minister (מְשָׁרֵת), the word which is applied to Elisha himself in 1 K 19[21]. Gehazi is one of those Bible characters—Achan, Judas, Ananias, Demas, etc.—whose crimes and apostasy point the moral that the love of money is a root of all kinds of evil. What is known of him is told in three narratives.

1. In the story of the lady of Shunem (2 K 4[8-37]) he appears as a man of shrewd practical sense, but incapable of understanding the impulses of deep feeling. His moral quality is scarcely defined. Elisha having failed to persuade his benefactress to ask any favour, turns in perplexity to consult his servant (4[14]). G. has penetrated the good lady's thoughts, and tells the prophet of her secret longing for a son. Elisha perceives that his servant's insight has surpassed his own, and, recalling the Shunammite, promises that the desire of her heart will be granted. In the sequel to the story, when the lady, bereft of this child of promise, comes in haste to the retreat at Carmel and casts herself at the prophet's feet in a passion of grief, G.'s commonplace mind is shocked at this liberty taken by a woman. He would rudely thrust her away; but the prophet, pitying her unknown sorrow, reproves his servant for adding to the bitterness of her soul. When she has told the cause of her grief, G. is directed to hasten to Shunem, saluting no man by the way (cf. Lk 10[4]), and lay the prophet's staff on the face of the child.

2. In the story of Naaman G. appears as a finished example of covetousness (2 K 5[20-27]). His baseness is in startling contrast to the high-mindedness of his master. In vain does Naaman press his treasure on the acceptance of Elisha; he has to depart with it intact (5[16]). To the sordid mind of G. this situation of affairs presents a temptation which he cannot resist. His passion for gain, probably long nourished in secret, suddenly overmasters him. The voice of reason and religion is stifled, and blasphemy, lying, sacrilege, and fraud come to serve his master passion. Elisha's refusal to take the stranger's gold seems to him madness. 'As J" liveth,' he will secure a portion of it for himself—thus lightly does he use the same oath with which Elisha solemnly refused the filthy lucre (5[16-20]). Running to overtake the Syrian cavalcade, G. invents a clever story of two poor young sons of the prophets having just come to Samaria, whose wants Elisha has bethought himself of supplying out of the treasure which he had refused for himself. G. begs for them a talent of silver (£400!) and two changes of raiment.

Plausible though the story was, it could hardly fail to lower the prophet in the estimation of the Syrians. They would reflect that he was like other men, after all. But G.'s request is at once granted, and two of Naaman's servants return to Samaria laden with the changes of raiment and twice as much silver as had been asked. When they come to the hill (עָפֶל, LXX εἰς τὸ σκοτεινόν, to the secret place, from a reading אֹפֶל; Vulg. jam vesperi) G. dismisses the men and conceals his prize. He then boldly presents himself before his master, and in answer to a question assures him with an air of innocence that he has been nowhere. But the prophet has at last discovered his servant's true character, and with searching interrogations lays bare his guilt, and reads the very thoughts and intents of his heart. G. is utterly confounded. Pale and speechless he hears the curse of Naaman's leprosy entailed, with awful appropriateness, on himself and his family for ever, and goes from Elisha's presence a leper, white as snow.

3. In the third narrative (2 K 8^{1-6}) G. appears engaged in conversation with king Jehoram, who has called him to recite the story of Elisha's wonderful deeds. G. is telling of the restoration of the Shunammite's son to life, when the lady herself comes on the scene to petition the king to reinstate her in the house and land which she had lost in a recent famine. The difficulty of imagining the king talking to a leper and G. glorifying Elisha has led some critics to suppose that this narrative is misplaced, and should appear before 2 K 5. But it reads quite naturally as it stands. Conversation with lepers was not forbidden. The story certainly shows G. in a more favourable light than the previous narrative. The notice taken of him by the king, and the truthfulness and respect with which he recounts the deeds of his former master, may be charitably taken to indicate that affliction had at last made him a wiser and better man.

Elisha's choice of this covetous man to be his follower presents a difficulty of the same kind, though not so great, as Christ's choice of a covetous disciple. It appears that the prophet's insight, though often marvellous, was sometimes quite ordinary (2 K 4^{14}). He confesses his inability to read the mind of the Shunammite: 'J" hath hid it from me, and hath not told me' (4^{27}). In the same way he was evidently mistaken with regard to the character of his servant. He probably chose him for his ready wit and practical sense; and if he detected in him a love of money, he may have hoped that the force of example would wean him from it. But to minds steeped in avarice the means of grace are often a savour of death rather than of life, and a holy example may not change the heart. 'Happy was it for Gehazi,' says Bishop Hall, 'if, while his skin was snow-white with leprosy, his humbled soul was washed white as snow with the water of true repentance.'

J. STRACHAN.

GEHENNA. — The word Gehenna, Γέεννα in Tischendorf and WH (or Γεέννα according to other scholars, on the ground of its derivation from the Aram. גֵּהִנָּם), is derived ultimately from the Hebrew expression גֵּי הִנֹּם = 'valley of Hinnom,' Jos 15^{8} 18^{16}, Neh 11^{30}, which is an abbreviated form of גֵּי־בֶן הִנֹּם = 'valley of the son of Hinnom,' Jos 15^{8} 18^{16}, 2 Ch 28^{3} 33^{6}, Jer $7^{31.\ 32}$ $19^{2.\ 6}$, or in the Kethib of 2 K 23^{10} גֵּי בְּנֵי־הִנֹּם. But this place became so notorious through its evil associations that it was simply called 'the valley' κατ' ἐξοχήν, Jer 2^{23} 31^{40}, and the gate of Jerusalem leading to it 'the valley-gate,' 2 Ch 26^{9}, Neh $2^{13.\ 15}$ 3^{13}. This valley lay to the S. and S.W. of Jerusalem (Robinson, BRP ii. 273, 274). The derivation of הִנֹּם is quite uncertain. In the LXX this name appears variously as φάραγξ Ὀνόμ (B: Ἐννόμ A), Jos 15^{8}; (B) νάπη Σοννάμ (B: υἱοῦ Ἐννόμ A), Jos 18^{16}; Γαίεννα (B: Γαὶ Ὀννόμ A), Jos 18^{16}; Γαιβενθόμ (B: Γηβεεννόμ A), 2 Ch 28^{3}; γὲ βανὲ Ἐννόμ (B: γη Βεεννομ A), 2 Ch 33^{6}. Elsewhere we find generally φάραγξ (υἱοῦ) Ἐννόμ.

This term is used in a variety of meanings in the course of Israelitish and Jewish history. These we shall consider separately according as they appear in OT, Apocalyptic literature, the NT, or in later Judaism.

I. ITS USE IN THE OT falls under three heads. (a) It is used in a merely topographical sense. Thus it formed the boundary between Judah and Benjamin, Jos 15^{8} 18^{16}, and the northern limit of the district occupied by the tribe of Judah after the Captivity, Neh 11^{30}, and lay in front of the gate Harsith of Jerusalem, Jer 19^{2}. See further under HINNOM (VALLEY OF).

(b) It is used in a religious significance as implying a place of idolatrous and inhuman sacrifices. These were first offered by Ahaz and Manasseh, who made their children to 'pass through the fire' to Molech in this valley, 2 K 16^{3}, 2 Ch 28^{3}, and 2 K 21^{6}, 2 Ch 33^{6}. These sacrifices were probably made on the 'high places of Topheth, which is in the valley of the son of Hinnom,' Jer 7^{31}; cf. Jer 32^{15}. In order to put an end to these abominations, Josiah polluted it with human bones and other corruptions, 2 K $23^{10.\ 13.\ 14}$. But this worship of Molech was revived under Jehoiakim, Jer 11^{10-13}, Ezk 20^{30}. In consequence of these idolatrous practices in the Valley of Hinnom, Jeremiah prophesied that one day it would be called the 'Valley of Slaughter,' and that they should 'bury in Topheth till there be no place to bury,' Jer 7^{32} 19^{11}. Many scholars have accepted the statement of Kimchi (c. 1200 A.D.) on Ps 27: 'Gehennam fuit locus spretus, in quem abjecerunt sordes et cadavera, et fuit ibi perpetuo ignis ad comburendum sordes illas et ossa; propterea parabolice vocatur judicium impiorum Gehennam.' But this is denied by Robinson, i. 274, who writes that 'there is no evidence of any other fires than those of Molech having been kept up in this valley' (Rosenmüller, Biblisch. Geogr. II. i. 156, 164).

(c) It signifies the place of punishment for rebellious or apostate Jews in the presence of the righteous. Gehinnom or Gehenna is not actually mentioned with this signification in the OT, but it is it and no other place that is implied in Is 50^{11} 'in a place of pain shall ye lie down,' and 66^{24} with this new connotation. Both these passages are very late, and probably from the same hand—not earlier than the 3rd cent. B.C. (see Cheyne, Introd. to the Bk. of Isaiah, p. 380; Smend, Alttestamentliche Religionsgeschichte, p. 506). Further, the punishment of the apostate Jews in Is 66^{24} is conceived as eternal: 'They shall look upon the carcases of the men that have transgressed against me; for their worm shall not die, neither shall their fire be quenched, and they shall be an abhorring to all flesh.' The punishment of Gehenna is implied also in Dn 12^{2} 'some to shame and everlasting abhorrence.' We should observe that the same word דִּרָאוֹן 'abhorrence' occurs in these two passages, and in these only, and the reference in both is to Gehenna.

II. ITS MEANING AND FURTHER DEVELOPMENT IN APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE.* In this literature

* There is no actual mention of the word Gehenna in biblical Apocryphal literature; but in Jth 16^{17}—

> οὐαὶ ἔθνεσιν ἐπανισταμένοις τῷ γένει μου.
> Κύριος Παντοκράτωρ ἐκδικήσει αὐτοὺς ἐν ἡμέρᾳ κρίσεως, > δοῦναι πῦρ καὶ σκώληκας εἰς σάρκας αὐτῶν,
> καὶ κλαύσονται ἐν αἰσθήσει ἕως αἰῶνος—

the reference to Gehenna is undeniable. In Sir 7^{17}, however, the text ἐκδίκησις ἀσεβοῦς πῦρ καὶ σκώληξ is probably corrupt, being without the support of the Syriac Version and the best MSS of the Ethiopic. Sheol, moreover, has become synonymous with Gehenna in the Similitudes. Thus: 'Sheol will devour the sinners in the presence of the elect,' 56[8], cf. 63[10].

this conception underwent further development. (a) Thus Gehenna was conceived as a place of corporal and spiritual punishment for apostate Jews in the presence of the righteous for ever. (See Eth. En. $27^{2.3}$ $90^{26.27}$). In the Similitudes of that book, i.e. chs. 37–70, there is a slight modification of the above idea. Thus, though the punishment is everlasting, only its initial stages will be executed in the presence of the righteous. On the expiration of these, the wicked will be swept for ever from the presence of the righteous, 48^{9} $62^{12.13}$.

(b) A place of spiritual punishment for apostate Jews in the presence of the righteous. Heretofore Gehenna was always conceived as a place of both corporal and spiritual punishment. This new development is attested in the Eth. En. 91–104 (c. 134–95 B.C.). Thus in 98^{3} 'their spirits will be cast into the furnace of fire.' Cf. also 103^{8}. From 99^{11} $103^{7.8}$ it is clear that Sheol and Gehenna have become equivalent terms in this writer also. See also 100^{9}. The same conception is found in an Essene writing, i.e. Eth. En. 108^{6} and in the Assumpt. Mos. 10^{10}. In the latter passage Gehenna or rather 'the valley' is mentioned by name (see Charles, Assumption of Moses, pp. 43, 44). It is noteworthy that in all these books only a blessed immortality of the souls of the righteous is taught.

(c) A place of corporal and spiritual punishment for all the wicked in the presence of the righteous. We arrive at this stage of development in 2 Es 7^{36-38} 'Et apparebit locus tormenti, et contra illum erit locus requietionis: clibanus gehennæ ostendetur, et contra eum jocunditatis paradisus. Et dicet tunc Altissimus ad excitatas gentes—— "Videte contra et in contra; hic jocunditas et requies, et ibi ignis et tormenta."'

III. Its Meaning in the NT.—In the NT Gehenna is always the final place of punishment into which the wicked are cast after the last judgment. It is a place of torment both for body and soul. Thus Mt 5^{29} 'It is profitable for thee that one of thy members should perish, and not thy whole body go into Gehenna.' So also in 5^{30}. Some have argued that Christ has here only the living in view; but this limitation appears unwarranted. It is not till after the final judgment that the wicked are cast into Gehenna. At the resurrection, soul and body are united. Both are punished in Gehenna. Gehenna as the last punishment was conceived also as the worst. It slew both soul and body—not, indeed, in an absolute sense, but relatively. Thus Mt 10^{28} 'Fear him which is able to destroy both soul and body in Gehenna.' Cf. Lk 12^{5}. This final stage of retribution is carefully distinguished in Eth. En. 22^{11-13}. There the souls in the third division of Sheol are raised in order to be delivered over to their worst penalty, but of the sinners in the fourth division it is said: 'Their souls will not be slain on the day of judgment, nor will they be raised from thence.' For the phrase 'slaying of the soul' in this connexion, compare also Eth. En. 108^{3-6}. Gehenna is conceived as a fire, Mt 5^{22} 18^{9}; an unquenchable fire, Mk 9^{45}; as a place where 'their worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched,' Mk 9^{48}; a 'furnace of fire,' Mt $13^{42.50}$; 'the outer darkness,' Mt 8^{12} 22^{13} 25^{30}. It is the 'lake of fire' in Rev 19^{20} $20^{10.14.15}$ 21^{8}. Hades is finally cast into it, Rev 20^{14}. In the NT Hades and Gehenna seem never to be confused together.

IV. In later Judaism.—Here Gehenna is conceived as a Purgatory for faithless Jews, who were afterwards to be admitted into paradise, but still remained the place of eternal perdition for the Gentiles (cf. Weber, Jüdische Theologie[2], pp. 341, 342; Driver, Sermons on OT, 79 f., 87, 89 f., 97).

GELILOTH (גְּלִילוֹת, Γαλιαώθ, A Ἀγαλλιλώθ).—One of the places mentioned in Jos 18^{17} as defining the S. boundary of Benjamin. The border, it is said, after leaving the valley of the son of Hinnom, 'went out' first to En-shemesh (probably 'Ain Ḥaud, about 2 miles E. of Jerusalem), and afterwards to G. 'in front of the ascent of Adummim,' and so passed on into the Jordan Valley. The 'ascent of Adummim' is in all probability the ascent, some 5 miles long, leading up from the plain of Jericho to Tala'at ed-Dumm, about 6 miles E.N.E. of Jerusalem, on the regular route between Jerusalem and Jericho. The place G. has not, however, been identified; and all that can be said about it is that it was some spot on the boundary between Benjamin and Judah, conspicuous as a landmark to a traveller climbing up this steep ascent. In Jos 15^{7}, where the N. boundary of Judah (in the opposite direction) is described, the place, similarly described, is called Gilgal (הַגִּלְגָּל, LXX B Ταγάδ, A Γαλγάλ). We have no means of determining which is the true reading; the idea that the Gilgal between Jericho and the Jordan can be intended is, of course, quite out of the question; the border, at the point in question, must, as is evident from the terms employed ('went up,' $15^{6b.7a}$; 'went down,' $18^{17b.18b}$), have been above the plain.

Geliloth, in the sense, as it seems, of circuits or districts, appears also (in the Heb.) as the technical name of the administrative districts of the Philistines (Jos 13^{2}, Joel 3 (4)[4]; cf 1 Mac 5^{15})—perhaps, of those ruled by their five 'lords' (Jos 13^{3}). It occurs likewise in the obscure and uncertain expression (Jos $22^{10.11}$), 'districts of Jordan' (גְּלִילוֹת הַיַּרְדֵּן), which describes the locality in which the altar 'Ed' was built by the $2\frac{1}{2}$ tribes.

GEM.—See Stones (Precious).

GEMALLI (גְּמַלִּי 'camel-owner,' or 'my rewarder').—Father of the Danite spy, Nu 13^{12} P.

GEMARA.—See Talmud.

GEMARIAH (גְּמַרְיָהוּ, גְּמַרְיָה 'J" hath accomplished').—1. A son of Shaphan the scribe, from whose chamber Baruch read the prophecies of Jeremiah in the ears of all the people. He vainly sought to deter king Jehoiakim from burning the roll (Jer $36^{10.11.12.25}$). 2. A son of Hilkiah who carried a letter from Jeremiah to the captives at Babylon (Jer 29^{3}).

GENDER (a clipt form of 'engender,' which comes from Lat. ingenerare, through Old Fr. engendrer, the d being excrescent after n as in 'tender' from tener) is used in AV both transitively and intransitively, both literally and figuratively. The trans. and lit. sense 'to beget' is common in Wyclif, as Mt 1^{2} (1380) 'Abraham gendride, or bigate, Ysaac'; and Ec 6^{3} (1388) 'If a man gendrith an hundrid fre sones, and lyveth many yeris, and hath many daies of age, and his soule usith not the goodis of his catel, and wantith biriyng; Y pronounce of this man that a deed borun child is betere than he.' It is from Wyc. (1388) that the AV tr. of Job 38^{29} comes, 'The hoary frost of heaven, who hath gendered it?' (יְלָדוֹ, Gen. 'ingendred'; RVm 'given it birth'). In Zec 13^{3} Wyc. uses the word of mother as well as father, 'his fader and moder that gendriden hym,' and in the same verse he speaks of 'his fadir and modir, gendrers of hym'; and then in Gal 4^{24} he employs the word of the mother alone = bear, bring forth children, 'gendringe in to seruage.' This has passed into AV (in Tindale's form 'which gendreth unto bondage') through all the intermediate versions (Gr. εἰς δουλείαν γεννῶσα, RV 'bearing children unto bondage').

The Gr. verb γεννάω, like the Eng. verb 'gender,' properly refers to the father, but is used of the mother in Lk $1^{13.\ 57}$ 2^{329}, Jn 16^{21}, and in this passage. The meaning of the passage is well brought out by Lightfoot, 'for these women are (represent) two covenants; one of them, which was given from Mount Sinai, bearing children unto bondage; inasmuch as she (ἥτις) is Hagar.' Add Gwynne's explanation, 'As Hagar, the bondwoman, brought forth children unto bondage,—for the children follow the condition of their mother,—so likewise did the Sinaitic covenant bring forth children unto bondage; the one is a fit representative of the other.'

This trans. verb is used metaph. in 2 Ti 2^{23} 'But foolish and unlearned questions avoid, knowing that they do gender strifes' (γεννῶσι μάχας; Wyc. 'gendren chidingis,' Tind. 'gendre stryfe,' Rhem. 'ingender braules').

The intrans. examples (='copulate,' 'breed') are Lv 19^{19} and Job 21^{10}, with which cf. Shaks. Othello, IV. ii. 62—

> 'Or keep it as a cistern, for foul toads
> To knot and gender in.'

GENEALOGY.—Under this title will be considered—A. Biblical Genealogy in general; B. The Genealogical Lists of the Tribes of Israel and a few other lists of names; C. Lists of persons and families associated with the labours of Ezra and Nehemiah.

A. 1. Definition.—The word genealogy (sing. and plur.) occurs in OT as a tr. of the Heb. noun יִחֻשׂ (ἅπ. λεγ. Neh 7^{5}) and of the denom. verb יָחַשׂ (only Hithp. in 1 and 2 Ch, Ezr, and Neh), with the meaning of a family register or a registration by families (1 Ch 4^{33} $5^{1.\ 7.\ 17}$ etc.). In connexion with these registrations are often given lines of descent (cf. 1 Ch 1–9), and occasionally the pedigrees of individuals (1 Ch $2^{10-13.\ 36-41}$ et al.). Tables of genealogical descent also appear in OT as an expansion of the word תּוֹלְדוֹת, 'generations' (cf. Gn 5^{1} 10^{1} 11^{10} etc., also Mt 1^{1} βίβλος γενέσεως Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ, LXX for סֵפֶר תּוֹלְדוֹת, 'The genealogy of Jesus Christ,' RVm). Genealogies appear in two forms—one giving the generations in a descending scale (Gn 5, Ru 4^{18-23} etc.), the other in an ascending scale (1 Ch 6^{33-43}, Ezr 7^{1-5} etc.).

2. The registration of families and individuals.—Just when the Hebrews began to preserve family registers it is impossible to determine. Lists of families and of citizens for official purposes must have been made very early, in connexion, for example, with the census of David (2 S 24). Familiarity with such enrolments is implied in the reference to 'the book of J"' (Ex 32^{32}, Ps 139^{16}), 'the book of life' (Ps 69^{28}, cf. Is 4^{3}, Dn 12^{1}), and they seem to be directly mentioned in Jer 22^{30}, Ezk 13^{9}. At the time of the giving of the Deuteronomic law there must have been some way of determining whether one was of pure Isr. descent (Dt 23^{2-8}). But in the earlier centuries of the pre-exilic period, when marriages probably were freely made with the old Can. inhabitants, and when these inhabitants were being gradually incorporated and amalgamated into Israel, a motive for carefully preserving lines of individual descent is not apparent, and we have no reason to believe that such records were generally made. An exception, which is only probable, may have occurred in the case of royalty, nobility, and perhaps the priesthood. (The laws of inheritance seem not sufficiently complicated to have required the preservation of family genealogies). After the restoration, however, when Israel had become a church, and a sharp line of separation was drawn between the Jews and the other peoples of Palestine, and union with them by marriage had become a grievous trespass (Ezr 9^{1-4}), the case was far different. Hence, from the time of reforms introduced by Ezra and Nehemiah (c. B.C. 444), the preservation of family genealogies, or records of the descent of individuals, became a matter of special importance. Already, at that time, certain families were debarred from the office of priests because they could not produce genealogical registers (Ezr 2^{61-63}, Neh 7^{63-65}). From then onwards care was doubtless exercised for their preservation. Their value is shown by the repeated allusion to them in 1 and 2 Ch, Ezr, and Neh. To become a priest, a prime requisite was an evidence of proper pedigree. From the statement of Josephus that his pedigree was given in the public records (Vita, 1; cf. c. Ap. i. 7), it is probable that family genealogies were thus kept from their importance in reference to inheritance, marriage, redemption of lands, and service in the temple. Many families at the time of Christ evidently had genealogical registers (Mt 1^{1}, Lk 2^{36} $3^{23ff.}$, Ac 4^{3}, Ro 11^{1}, Ph 3^{5}).

'Davididæ, or descendants of the house of David, were found among the Jews in the Persian, Grecian, and even as late as the Roman period (comp. Zunz, Analekten, No. 5, p. 46, note 18). But, in consequence of the exterminating wars and the Dispersion, the records of old families were lost as early as the first centuries, and even the families of the priests did not remain unpolluted (Jerus. Kiddushin, iv. 1)' (Zunz in Asher's Itinerary of Benj. Tudela, ii. p. 6). Julius Africanus (Ep. Aristides, v.) gives a tradition that Herod I. destroyed the genealogical lists which were kept at Jerus., to deprive Jewish families of the knowledge of their descent. This story is doubtful, though received by some. (See Sachs, Beiträge, Heft ii. pp. 155 ff.).

3. Figurative and artificial genealogies.—These appear frequently in OT. In Gn 5 an unbroken line of descent of ten generations—from Adam to Noah inclusive—furnishes a chronology for the antediluvian period; in Gn 11^{10-26} a similar line from Shem to Terah inclusive furnishes the chronology of the period from the Deluge to the birth of Abraham. In Gn 10 is a table of nations, presenting the geographical and political relationships in the form of a genealogy or family tree from the three sons of Noah. From Terah, Abraham, and Isaac is traced the descent of the peoples with whom Israel recognized a close racial union, i.e. the Aramæans of N. Mesopotamia (Gn 22^{20-24}), the tribes of Arabia (Gn 25^{1-18}), the Ammonites and Moabites (Gn $19^{37f.}$), and Edomites (Gn 36). These peoples, both as wholes and in their various subdivisions, are mentioned as descendants from individual ancestors bearing generally tribal or geographical names, as though peoples and tribes grew out of single households. The same principle is applied to Israel, who is represented as the father of twelve sons, bearing the names of the twelve tribes, from whom in like manner sprang the various clans and families of these tribes (cf. Gn 46^{8-27}, Nu 26).

This form of representation is not peculiar to OT writers. It is the usual way in which primitive peoples explain their origin and tribal relationships. The Greeks traced their descent from Hellen, who had three sons, Dorus and Aeolus, who gave their names to the Dorians and Aeolians, and Xuthus, who through his two sons, Ion and Achæus, became the forefather of the Ionians and Achæans. But especially is this the method of Sem. people, as is illustrated among Israel's kinsmen, the Arabs. According to their writers, the inhabitants of Arabia are 'patriarchal tribes formed by the subdivision of an original stock on the system of kinship through male descendants. A tribe was but a larger family; the tribal name was the name or nickname of a common ancestor. In process of time it broke up into two or more tribes, each embracing the descendants of one of the great ancestor's sons, and taking its name from him. These tribes were again divided and subdivided on the same principle.' 'Between a nation, a tribe, a sept or sub-tribe and a family, there is no difference on this theory, except in size and distance, from a common ancestor' (W. R. Smith, Kinship and Marriage in Early Arabia, pp. 3 f.). This likewise seems to have been the view in Israel, and is especially worked out in P. (Most of the genealogical tables and tribal and family lists in the Hex. belong to this document).

While in some instances tribes, clans, or families take their name from historic persons,—some Arabic clans are thus named (Kinship, p. 15; Sprenger, Mohammed, iii. p. cxxxvi, Jour. Bibl. Lit. vol. xi. 1892, p. 120),—in genealogical lists the founders of tribes, clans, and families are usually to be regarded as eponymous heroes, for countries and cities are frequently mentioned as parents (Mizraim Gn 10[13], Canaan 10[15], Gilead Jg 11[1], Hebron 1 Ch 2[43], et al.). Under the form of family experience are given events of tribal life (Gn 38. See G. A. Smith, Hist. Geog. p. 289; Stade, Gesch. i. pp. 157 f.; Moore on Jg 1[14-15]). Elder sons prob. represent earlier or more powerful tribes and families; marriages their coalitions, the weaker being perhaps the wife, and an inferior a concubine; untimely deaths their disappearances; different relationships of the same person political or geographical changes or different traditions (cf. Stade, Gesch. i. p. 30). But many genealogical stories and relationships originated evidently in folk-tales, and hence they present a mingling of fact and fancy, and the relationships of father, mother, wife, son, daughter, etc., cannot be interpreted upon any uniform theory in respect to the precise meaning of each.

Where pedigrees for generations of remote antiquity are given (Gn 5. 11[10-26], 1 Ch 2[9-12] 6[1-48] et al.), they probably do not rest upon authentic records, but are artificial.

'Life in the Orient is much too unsafe, and the changes much too great, for one to expect to find family records of several centuries. Moreover, in the desert [and so generally under nomadic conditions which Israel for centuries experienced] family archives are unimaginable, and it is sheer nonsense to believe that all the branches of a family tree could be preserved by memory' (Sprenger, Mohammed, iii. p. cxli).

This statement, made in view of Arabian genealogies, is equally applicable to those of early mankind and Israel. These, too, when they present a continuous line of descent from father to son, are the conjectures of later ages (see CHRONOLOGY OF OT). They are, however, not the fruit of a spirit of deception, but of good faith with poetic imagination in vindicating family rights and privileges, and religious institutions, or in glorifying the family and national and religious heroes. The impulse for the formation of such pedigrees is synchronous with the stress laid upon purity of descent and the actual keeping of family genealogies. The names introduced were not usually inventions, but taken from legend and story, representing often historical persons, families, and conditions.

These artificial pedigrees abound in Arabic genealogies (see Sprenger), and also occur in Jewish writings — for example, the Seder Olam sutta. (Zunz, Gottesdienstliche Vorträge, Berlin, 1892, pp. 142 ff.; Asher, Itiner. of Benj. of Tudela, vol. ii. pp. 6 ff.).

B. THE GENEALOGICAL LISTS OF THE TWELVE TRIBES.—These lists are found almost exclusively in Gn 46[8-24], Ex 6[14-26], Nu 26[5-62], 1 Ch 1-9. They exhibit different sources, and have suffered much in transcription, especially those in Chronicles, so that we often have little more than a confused mass of names, which defy any proper genealogical treatment. The genealogies are partially figurative and artificial, and partially genuine family records; but where the exact line is to be drawn between those due to fancy or theory and those due to records cannot always be determined. In some instances there may be a commingling of both elements. The whole history behind these genealogies is very obscure; hence the explanatory notes, when they depart from a recital of mere facts, must be received as tentative. The lists are prepared also primarily for the purpose of locating OT proper names in this Dictionary, and many names are given which probably represent no real persons or families, but have arisen from textual errors.

N.B. The tribes are indicated by Rom. numerals. The various lists under each tribe, grouped by generations, pedigrees, or other classifications given in OT, are numbered with Arabic numerals, providing a means of cross-reference. Heavy (Clarendon) type indicates the father of the person or persons whose name or names immediately follow. Italics indicate a son of the preceding and the father of the succeeding (a continuous line of descent from father to son is indicated by a succession of names in italics). The child or children of the person named in heavy type or italics immediately preceding are given in ordinary type. Mothers' names are placed in brackets before their children. The following abbreviations are used: d. daughter, f. father or father of, m. mother, s. son of, ss. sons of.

Since these lists are found mainly in 1 Ch, the following abbreviations are used referring to its literature:

Be. = E. Bertheau in Kgf. Handb. 1873; Ke. = C. F. Keil in Bible Comm. [1872]; Ki. = R. Kittel in the Sacred Books of the OT, a critical edition of the Heb. Text, 1895; Kau. = E. Kautzsch in Die Heilige Schrift d. a. T. übersetzt und herausgegeben, 1894; Oe. = S. Oettli in Kgf. Komm. 1889; Sm. = R. Smend, Die Listen der Bücher Ezra und Nehemiah, 1881; We. = J. Zoeckler in Lange's Commentary, 1876. [Unfortunately, Gray's Studies in Heb. Proper Names and Hommel's Anc. Heb. Tradition both appeared too late for use in the present article].

Jacob: (m. Leah) Reuben (I.), Simeon (II.), Levi (III.), Judah (IV.), Issachar (V.), Zebulun (VI.), d. Dinah; (m. Rachel) Joseph (Manasseh and Ephraim) (VII.[ab]), Benjamin (VIII.); (m. Bilhah) Dan (IX.), Naphtali (X.); (m. Zilpah) Gad (XI.), Asher (XII.), Gn 35[22b-26], cf. 29[31]–30[24] 35[18] 46[8-25] 49[2-27], Ex 1[1-5] etc.

This genealogy is a reflection of a more or less artificial division of Israel into twelve tribes (cf. the twelve sons of Ishmael, Gn 25[13-16]). The history and the sentiment which occasioned such a motherhood, as well as the order of birth of these tribes, and the placing of a daughter among them, is only partially clear (see ISRAEL, and Stade, Gesch. i. 145 ff.).

I. 1. REUBEN: Hanoch, Pallu (2), Hezron, Carmi, Gn 46[9], Ex 6[14], Nu 26[5f.], 1 Ch 5[3].

2. Pallu (1): Eliab, Nemuel, Dathan, Abiram, Nu 26[8f.].

3. —— Joel (4)?, Shemaiah, Gog, Shimei, Micah, Reaiah, Baal, Beerah, 1 Ch 5[4f.].

4. —— Joel (3)?, Shema, Azaz, Bela, 1 Ch 5[8].

5. —— Jeiel, Zechariah, 1 Ch 5[7].

Hanoch, Pallu, Hezron, and Carmi are names of clans (Nu 26[5]), of which we know nothing further. Hanoch appears also as a clan of Midian (Gn 25[4]), and Hezron as one of Judah (Nu 26[21]); Nemuel is mentioned only in this connexion. For Dathan and Abiram see KORAH. The relation of Joel to any of the four sons of Reuben is not given. Ki., after Sam. and Arab. VSS, removes Joel and inserts Carmi, but the Joel of vv.[4] and [8] may be the same (Be.); Shema (v.[8]) = Shemaiah or Shimei. Beerah (1 Ch 5[6]) was a prince of the Reubenites, carried away by Tiglath-pileser. Bela, with whom Jeiel and Zechariah are associated, represented a powerful clan, occupying a wide extent of territory (1 Ch 5[8f.]).

II. 1. SIMEON: Jemuel,* Jamin, Ohad,† Jachin,‡ Zohar,§ (m. Canaanitess) Shaul (2), Gn 46[10], Ex 6[15], Nu 26[12-14], 1 Ch 4[24].

2. Shaul (1): Shallum, Mibsam, Mishma, Hammuel, Zaccur, Shimei, sixteen sons and six daughters, 1 Ch 4[25-27].

3. [A list of princes], Meshobab, Jamlech, Joshah, (s. Amaziah) Joel, Jehu, (s. Joshibiah, s. Seraiah, s. Asiel) Elioenai, Jaakobah, Jeshohaiah, Asaiah, Adiel, Jesimiel, Benaiah, Ziza, (s. Shiphi, s. Allon, s. Jedaiah, s. Shimri, s. Shemaiah) 1 Ch 4[34-38].

4. —— Ishi, Pelatiah, Neariah, Rephaiah, Uzziel, 1 Ch 4[42].

The descent of Shaul from a Canaanitess mother (Gn 46[10], Ex 6[15]) implies a clan of mixed Isr. and Can. elements. Nothing further than their mention is known of the other clans. (On the early disappearance of Simeon see SIMEON). Mibsam and Mishma (2) are names also of Ishmael's descendants (Gn 25[14], 1 Ch 1[29]), and suggest a mingling of Simeonites with the Arabians. The princes (3) represent families of shepherds which, in the reign of Hezekiah, had conquered for themselves a dwelling-place near Gerar (1 Ch 4[39-41], Gedor MT, Gerar LXX, Ki.). The sons of Ishi are captains who went to Mt. Seir, and, smiting the Amalekites, abode there (1 Ch 4[42. 43]).

We. (Prol. pp. 212 f.) doubts the historicity of the Chronicler's notices of the continued existence of the tribes of Reuben and Simeon during the Heb. monarchy; Stade also, that of Simeon (Gesch. i. p. 155). On the other hand, Graf thought that the tribes had not entirely died out, and saw historical movements of their remnants in the Chronicler's statements (Der Stamm Simeon, pp. 22 ff.). This is more probable.

III. 1. Levi: Gershon (2) (3),* Kohath (9), Merari (31), Gn 46^{11}, Ex 6^{16}, Nu 3^{17} 26^{57}, 1 Ch $6^{1.\ 16}$ 23^{6}.

2. Gershon (1) (3): Libni (6), (Ladan (7)), Shimei (8), Ex 6^{17}, Nu 3^{18}, 1 Ch 6^{17} 23^{8}.

Libni and Ladan (1 Ch $23^{7\text{-}9}$ 26^{21}) evidently represent the same clan. Libni is derived from the priestly city Libnah. Why Ladan (לַעְדָּן) should be its equivalent is not clear. Possibly Laadah (לַעֲדָה) (1 Ch 4^{21})—if a town—and Libnah were identical, and Ladan (לַעְדָּן) is to be connected with the former. Or Ladan may have been a pure clan or family name, and Libni one taken from place of residence.

3. Gershon (1) (2): Jahath, Shimei, Zimmah, Ethan, Adaiah, Zerah, Ethni, Malchijah, Baaseiah, Michael, Shimea, Berechiah, Asaph, Zaccur (4), Joseph, Nethaniah, Asharelah,† 1 Ch $6^{39\text{-}43}$ 25^{2}.

The pedigree of Asaph the singer (see Asaph). His four sons, acc. to the Chronicler, were appointed by David for the service of song in the house of the Lord (1 Ch $25^{1\text{f.}}$). See also (6), and see notes under (22^{ab}).

4. Zaccur (3):‡ Micaiah,§ Mattaniah (5), Shemaiah, Jonathan, Zechariah, Neh 12^{35}.

The pedigree of Zechariah, a musician who, with his brethren, i.e. fellow musicians, Shemaiah, Azarel, Milalai, Gilalai, Maai, Nethanel, Judah, Hanani, took part in the dedication of the wall of Jerus. (Neh $12^{27\text{-}36}$); Mattaniah in this pedigree evidently corresponds to the M. who was 'chief to begin the thanksgiving in prayer' (Neh 11^{17}); mentioned also as a resident of Jerus. (1 Ch 9^{15}).

5. Mattaniah (4): Hashabiah, Bani, Uzzi, Neh 11^{22}.

The pedigree of Uzzi, an overseer of the Levites at Jerus. (Neh 11^{22}), whose descent is given thus from Mica (Micaiah) (4), of the sons of Asaph. Another line of descent from a Mattaniah of the ss. Asaph is given in 2 Ch 20^{14}, viz. Mattaniah: Jeiel, Benaiah, Zechariah, Jahaziel. Jahaziel was the Levite who encouraged, by divine inspiration, Jehoshaphat and his people, prior to the battle with the children of Ammon, Moab, and Mt. Seir (2 Ch $20^{14\text{ff.}}$).

6. Libni (2): Jahath, Zimmah, Joah, Iddo, Zerah, Jeatherai, 1 Ch $6^{20\text{f.}}$.

Jeatherai (יְאָתְרַי), otherwise unknown, is evidently Ethni (אֶתְנִי) (v.^{26}), and (6) is a fragment of a pedigree of Asaph (3). (Cf. the similar names; so Be.; Zoe. rejects this assumption). Iddo (עִדּוֹ) prob. = Adaiah (עֲדָיָה); Joah (יוֹאָה), perhaps through textual corruption = Ethan (אֵיתָן).

7. Ladan (2): Jehiel, Zetham, Joel, (ss. Shimei) Shelomoth, Haziel, Haran, 1 Ch $23^{8\text{f.}}$, cf. 26^{22}.

8. Shimei (2): Jahath, Zina,‖ Jeush, Beriah, 1 Ch 23^{10}.

These 'sons' (7) and (8) of Ladan and Shimei, acc. to the Chronicler, represented Levitical houses of the time of David. Zetham and Joel (7), as the sons of Jehieli, were placed over the treasuries of the house of the Lord (1 Ch 26^{22}). The introduction of ss. Shimei (7) as subordinate to Ladan (1 Ch 23^{9}) is difficult of explanation. Probably genealogies varied; cf. Jahath s. Libni in (6), and Shimei s. Jahath in (3).

9. Kohath (1): Amram (10), Izhar (21), Hebron (27), Uzziel (28), Ex 6^{18}, Nu 3^{19}, 1 Ch $6^{2.\ 18}$ 23^{12}.

10. Amram (9): (m. Jochebed) Aaron (11), Moses (18), Miriam, Ex 6^{20}, Nu 26^{59}, 1 Ch 6^{3} 23^{12}.

11. Aaron (10): Nadab, Abihu, Eleazar (12), Ithamar, Ex 6^{23}, Nu 26^{60}, 1 Ch 6^{3} 24^{1}.

12. Eleazar (11): Phinehas, Abishua, Bukki, Uzzi, Zerahiah, Meraioth, Amariah, Ahitub, Zadok, Ahimaaz, Azariah, Johanan, Azarioh, Amariah, Ahitub, Zadok, Shallum, Hilkiah, Azariah, Seraiah, Jehozadak,¶ 1 Ch $6^{4\text{-}14}$, cf. Ezr $7^{1\text{-}5}$ i.e. (14).

Eleazar, with whom this pedigree starts, was, according to P, Aaron's successor (Nu 20^{28}), and priest at the time of the conquest of Canaan (Jos 14^{1}). Phinehas is mentioned as his son and successor (Jos 24^{33}, Jg 20^{28}). Seraiah the f. Jehozadak, with whom this pedigree closes, was chief priest at the fall of Jerus. (B.C. 586), and was taken captive and put to death at Riblah (2 K $25^{18\text{-}21}$), while Jehozadak went into captivity (1 Ch 6^{15}).

Hence this pedigree, according to the Chronicler's view (that of P) of the origin of Israel's religious institutions, was designed to furnish a list of high priests from the entrance into Canaan until the Captivity.* As such a list, this line of descent presents certain striking features. (1) There is no mention of the line of priesthood, Eli: Phinehas, Ahitub, Ahimelech, Abiathar (1 S 14^{3} 22^{20}), unless Ahitub f. Zadok (v.^{8}) is identical with Ahitub f. Ahimelech. This, however, is improbable, since the removal of Abiathar, in whose place Zadok was established, is regarded as a fulfilment of the prophecy of the disestablishment of the house of Eli (1 K $2^{27.\ 35}$).†

(2) Jehoiada (2 K 11^{9}, 2 Ch 22^{11}, etc.), and Urijah (2 K $16^{11\text{ff.}}$), are not mentioned, and the order of the priests appears incorrect. Amariah was chief priest in the reign of Jehoshaphat (2 Ch 19^{11}). The next priests mentioned in the historical books are Azariah in the reign of Uzziah (2 Ch 26^{20}), and Hilkiah in the reign of Josiah (2 K 22^{4}, 2 Ch 34^{9}). In this list, however, there is no Azariah between Amariah and Hilkiah.

(3) The number of priests, including Aaron, from the Exodus to the Captivity, is exactly 23. Allowing forty years, or a generation, for each, this gives $40\times12+40\times11$ years. Now, according to the artificial chronology of P, Jg, 1 and 2 K, 1 and 2 Ch (see Chronology of OT), 480 years elapsed from the Exodus to the founding of Solomon's temple (1 K 6^{1}), and 480 years from thence to the founding of the second temple, and the Captivity occurred in the eleventh generation of this second period. Hence these 22 names seem chosen to fit exactly into this chronological scheme. This is still further seen in the statement—transferring 10^{b} to 9^{b} (Be. Oe. Zoe.)—that Azariah the 13th priest (including Aaron) ministered in Solomon's temple.

(4) There is a surprising number of names occurring more than once. Such repetition, while possible in a genuine pedigree, has decidedly a suspicious look, as though the names were used simply to represent so much time.

Hence, in view of these facts, it is evident that th's list of names, covering many centuries, does not rest entirely upon historical records, but, as a whole, is artificial. This accords with the modern critical view of the late origin of the Levitical law and institutions (OTJC, Lect. ix.–xiii.; LOT^{6} pp. 126–159). The explanation of Josephus mentioned is not based upon facts, but is a mere surmise. That this list should not be in harmony with statements elsewhere in 1 and 2 Ch shows that it probably did not originate with the author of Chronicles, but represented a notion about the line of priests, varying from that which he elsewhere followed. Ki. assigns it to the subsequent additions of 1 and 2 Ch. (On this list see We. Prol. pp. 222 ff.).

13. Jehozadak (12): Jeshua, Joiakim, Eliashib, Joiada, Jonathan, Jaddua, Ezr 3^{2}, Neh $12^{10\text{f.}}$.

This genealogy brings the list of high priests down to the time of Alexander the Great (Josephus, Ant. xi. viii. 4).

14. Aaron (10): Eleazar (11), Phinehas (12), Abishua, Bukki, Uzzi, Zerahiah, Meraioth, Azariah, Amariah, Ahitub, Zadok, Shallum, Hilkiah, Azariah, Seraiah, Ezra, Ezr $7^{1\text{-}5}$.

This ancestry of Ezra, the priest and scribe (see Ezra), is evidently the same as that of Jehozadak (12) given in a shorter form. Ezra appears to have been a descendant, probably a great-grandson, of Seraiah f. Jehozadak, through a younger brother. Of similar descent is Azariah (Seraiah, Neh 11^{11}) s. Hilkiah, s. Meshullam (= Shallum), s. Zadok, s. Meraioth, s. Ahitub, mentioned among the priests residing in Jerus. (1 Ch 9^{11}, Neh 11^{11}). Seraiah is probably the correct reading, since the substitution of Azariah might be suggested by 1 Ch 6^{13}, but not the converse. The two names appear, however, elsewhere interchanged (cf. Ezr 2^{2} with Neh 77). This Seraiah represented a division of the post-exilic priests in Jerus. (Neh $11^{11\text{f.}}$). That he should belong to the high priest's family has been thought striking (Sm. p. 8).

15. Jehoiarib, Jedaiah, Harim, Seorim, Malchijah (16), Mijamin, Hakkoz, Abijah, Jeshua, Shecaniah, Eliashib, Jakim, Huppah, Jeshebeab, Bilgah, Immer (17), Hezir, Happizzez, Pethahiah, Jehezkel, Jachin, Gamul, Delaiah, Maaziah, 1 Ch $24^{7\text{-}18}$.

* The observation on Azariah in v.^{10} also shows this.

† The Jewish explanation of these facts, given by Josephus, is that the family of Phinehas s. of Aaron, represented in (12), at first held the high priesthood, and afterwards it was transferred in Eli to the family of Ithamar s. Aaron, who held the priesthood until Zadok's establishment, which restored it again to the family of Phinehas, which had in the meantime been in private life (Jos. Ant. v. xi. 5, viii. i. 3). This explanation has usually been received. (Ke. thinks that after the slaughter of the priests at Nob the tabernacle was moved to Gibeon, and the high priesthood intrusted to Zadok's father, and thus, during the reign of David, Zadok was priest at Gibeon [1 Ch 16^{39}], and Abiathar at Jerusalem). The Chronicler evidently held to this double line of priests, for he says that both Eleazar and Ithamar executed the priest's office, and places Zadok as the representative of the former and Ahimelech (evidently Abiathar's Ahimelech) as representing the latter at the time of David (1 Ch $24^{1\text{ff.}}$).

Jehoiarib, Jedaiah, and Jachin appear also among the priests or priestly families of the post-exilic inhabitants of Jerus. (1 Ch 9^{10}, Neh 11^{10}).

16. Malchijah (15): Pashhur, Jeroham, Adaiah, 1 Ch 9^{12}.

17. Immer (15): Meshillemith, Meshullam, Jahzerah, Adiel, Maasai, 1 Ch 9^{12}, cf. Neh $11^{12f.}$.

Adaiah (16) and Maasai (עֲמַשַׁי = מַעֲשַׂי Amashsai, Neh 11^{13}) (17) are among the post-ex. priests or priestly families of Jerusalem. In Neh $11^{12f.}$ the pedigrees are slightly different, i.e. Malchijah, Pashhur, Zechariah, Amzi, Pelaliah, Jeroham, Adaiah; Immer, Meshillemoth, Ahzai, Azarel, Amashsai.

18. Moses (10): Gershom (19), Eliezer (20), Ex $18^{3f.}$, 1 Ch 23^{15}.

19. Gershom (18): *Shebuel, Jehdeiah, 1 Ch 23^{16}, 24^{20}.

20. Eliezer (18): Rehabiah, Isshiah,† Joram, Zichri, Shelomoth, 1 Ch 23^{17} 24^{21} 26^{25}.

Of these descendants of Moses, who, acc. to the Chronicler, represented Levites of the time of David, Shebuel (19) and Shelomoth (20) were rulers of the treasuries. A certain confusion appears in the different lengths of descent assigned to each, and in the fact that Jehdeiah (19) and Isshiah (20) appear as their contemporaries (see ref.). The LXX obviates this by reading Eliezer, Rehabiah, Isshiah, Joram, Zichri, Shelomoth (1 Ch 26^{25}).

21. Izhar (9): Korah (22^{ab}), Nepheg, Zichri, Ex 6^{21}.

22^{a}. Korah (21): Assir, Elkanah, Ebiasaph (24), Assir, Tahath, Uriel, Uzziah, Shaul [Elkanah], Amasai, Ahimoth (ss. Elkanah), Zophai, Nahath, Eliab, Jeroham, Elkanah, Samuel (LXX), Joel (Syr. RV), Abiah, 1 Ch 6^{22-28}.

Korah in this list appears as the son of Amminadab (see below).

22^{b}. Korah (21): Ebiasaph (24), Assir, Tahath, Zephaniah, Azariah, Joel, Elkanah, Amasai, Mahath, Elkanah, Zuph, Toah, Eliel, Jeroham, Elkanah, Samuel, Joel, Heman (23), 1 Ch 6^{33-38}.

These two lines of descent (22^{a}) and (22^{b}) are evidently the same (Be. Zoe. Oe.), as may be clearly shown by placing the names in parallel columns side by side.

In respect to the variations: Amminadab appears in Ex 6^{23} as the father-in-law of Aaron, and may have been placed for Izhar in (22^{a}) through an oversight. Assir and Elkanah are either redundant in (22^{a}) through a similar cause or have fallen out from (22^{b}). Uriel and Zephaniah are difficult to explain as equivalents. The names Uzziah and Azariah are interchangeable (as in the case of the well-known king of Judah). The differences between the other corresponding names have probably arisen through transcription. The context clearly demands the addition of 'Samuel his son' in v.^{27} and 'Joel' in v.^{28}.

This pedigree is clearly artificial. A portion of its construction comes from 1 S 1^{1}, where Elkanah is mentioned as s. Jeroham, s. Elihu, s. Tohu, s. Zuph. Zuph is probably a district, and Tohu (Toah Nahath) a family (cf. Tahath 1 Ch 7^{20}; We. Prol. p. 220). The story of Samuel shows distinctly that he was not a Levite, for then he would have belonged to the Lord without the gift of his mother (1 S $1^{27f.}$). He is made a Levite by the Chronicler according to the notions of his own times respecting Samuel's service at the sanctuary.

The motive for this pedigree of Heman, and also those of Asaph (3) and Jeduthun (Ethan) (35), is very apparent. At the time of the Chronicler there were three guilds of singers, named after Asaph, Heman, and Ethan (1 Ch $6^{31ff.}$) or Jeduthun (1 Ch 25^{1}), reckoned as belonging to the three great Levitical houses of Gershon, Kohath, and Merari. The Chronicler assumes that this organization of singers dated from David, but in reality it was quite modern, for, according to Ezr 2^{41} Neh 7^{44}, ss. Asaph and singers were equivalent, and the singers were distinct from the Levites. (This distinction is held by Sm. p. 26; OTJC^{2} p. 204; Baudissin, Gesch. des A. T. Priesterthums, p. 142 ff.; Nowack, Heb. Arch. ii. p. 111; on the other hand, Torrey claims that no such distinction can be found in Ezr and Neh., Comp. and Hist. Value of Ezr and Neh, p. 22 f.). Gradually, however, singers were evolved into Levites and the three guilds. Remains of steps of this evolution and fluctuating traditions appear in the Levitical genealogies. In Ex 6^{21} the three ss. Korah are Assir, Elkanah, and Abiasaph (= Ebiasaph), i.e. f. Asaph, and hence we should expect to find Asaph a descendant of Korah, but, according to (3), he is not. Also we find Assir and Elkanah placed not co-ordinate but following each other (21^{ab}). Different genealogists certainly worked over these names. (22^{a}) (22^{b}) are assigned by Ki. to different sources; (22^{a}) to the older. The ss. Korah appearing in the titles of the Ps (42. 44–49. 84. 85. 87. 88) probably mark a step in this evolution earlier than the formation of the three guilds. Korah in 1 Ch 2^{43} is associated with Tappuah as a son of Hebron. This indicates either a place or Judæan family of that name from whose Levites originated the Levitical Korahites (We. Is. und Jud. Gesch. p. 151 f.).

23. Heman (22^{b}): Bukkiah, Mattaniah, Uzziel,* Shebuel,† Jerimoth, Hananiah, Hanani, Eliathah, Giddalti, Romamti-ezer, Joshbekashah, Mallothi, Hothir, Mahazioth, 1 Ch 25^{4}.

These fourteen sons of Heman were appointed by David, acc. to the Chronicler, for the service of song in the house of the Lord (1 Ch $25^{6.\ 9-31}$). This list of names is most interesting, since prob. from Hananiah (חֲנַנְיָה חֲנָנִי אֵלִיאָתָה), certainly from Giddalti (גִּדַּלְתִּי וְרֹמַמְתִּי עֶזֶר יָשַׁבְקָשָׁה כִּלּוֹתִי הוֹתִיר מַחֲוִיאֹת), they are a fragment of a hymn or psalm which perhaps originally read: 'Be gracious to me, J"; be gracious to me! thou art my God. I have magnified and exalted the help of him sitting in distress, I have declared abundantly visions' (חָנֵּנִי יָהּ חָנֵּנִי אֵלַי אַתָּה גִּדַּלְתִּי וְרֹמַמְתִּי עֶזֶר יֹשֵׁב קָשָׁה כִּלּוֹתִי הוֹתִיר מַחֲוִיאֹת). There is some doubt about the exact rendering and construction of these lines (cf. Ewald, Ausführ. Lehrbuch d. Heb. Sprache, p. 680; ZAW, 1886, p. 260; We. Prol. p. 219; Oe. Kau. Ki. in loco), but none about the names, at least the last six, being fashioned out of such a prayer or meditation.

24. Ebiasaph (22^{ab}): Kore, Shallum, Meshelemiah ‡ (25), 1 Ch 9^{19} 26^{1}.

25. Meshelemiah ‡ (24): Zechariah, Jediael, Zebadiah, Jathniel, Elam, Jehohanan, Eliehoenai, 1 Ch $26^{2f.}$.

In (24) (25) we have families of porters or door-keepers assigned by the Chronicler to the time of David. It is possible that Shallum and Meshelemiah or Shelemiah represent the same person or family (Be. Oe.). M.'s descent is given through Kore from Asaph (1 Ch 26^{1}), evidently to be read Ebiasaph (LXX B, Ki. RVm). With Shallum are associated Akkub, Talmon, and Ahiman (1 Ch 9^{17}). Akkub and Talmon appear as porters in post-exilic Jerus. (Neh 11^{19}). Zechariah (25) is mentioned 1 Ch 9^{21}.

The Chronicler doubtless designed also that Obed-edom the door-keeper, with his sons Shemaiah, Jehozabad, Joah, Sacar, Nethanel, Ammiel, Issachar, and Peullethai, and the ss. Shemaiah, Othni, Rephael, Obed, Elzabad, Elihu, and Semachiah, should be enrolled among the Korahites (1 Ch $26^{4-7.\ 19}$) (Ke. Zoe.), although Obed-edom's descent from Jeduthun (1 Ch 16^{38}) would suggest that he belonged to the Merarites. That this Obed-edom is intended to represent Obed-edom the Gittite (2 S $6^{10f.}$, 1 Ch 13^{13}), transformed, like Samuel (22^{ab}), into a Levite, is most probable, although the contrary has been maintained. (Ke. also distinguishes between the singer Obed-edom and the door-keeper Obed-edom (1 Ch $15^{21.\ 24}$)).

26. ——: Shelomoth,§ Jahath, 1 Ch 24^{22}.

These are mentioned as Izharites of the time of David. Their descent is not given more specifically.

27. Hebron (9): Jeriah, ‖ Amariah, Jahaziel, Jekameam, 1 Ch 23^{19} 24^{23}.

These Hebronites are mentioned as serving in the house of the Lord at the time of David (1 Ch 23^{24}). In the family of Hebron we may have a perpetuation of the old line of priests, subordinated into Levites, who originally ministered at the sanctuary of Hebron; at any rate the name must be associated with Levites residing in Hebron. Jeriah (Jerijah) is mentioned in 1 Ch $26^{31ff.}$ as the chief whose brethren were appointed by David overseers of the Reubenites, Gadites, and the half-tribe of the Manassites 'for every matter pertaining to God and for the affairs of the king.' A Hashabiah of the Hebronites, with his brethren, is given a similar position of 'oversight of Israel beyond Jordan westward' (v.[30]). Eliel is mentioned as the chief of the Hebronites at the removal of the ark (1 Ch 15[9]).

* Shubael, 1 Ch 24^{20}. † Jeshaiah, 1 Ch 26

* Azarel, 1 Ch 25^{18}. † Shubael, 1 Ch 25^{20}.
‡ Shelemiah, 1 Ch 26^{14}. § Shelomith, 1 Ch 23^{18}.

28. Uzziel (9): Mishael, Elzaphan, Sithri, Ex 6[22]; Micah (29), Isshiah (30), 1 Ch 23[20] 24[24f.].

Sithri is mentioned only in Ex 6[22]. Mishael and Elzaphan in Lv 10[4] are commanded to carry out of the camp the bodies of Nadab and Abihu. Elizaphan (=Elzaphan) in Nu 3[30] is appointed prince of the families of the Kohathites. As a family name it appears in 1 Ch 15[8], 2 Ch 29[13]. To Micah and Isshiah is assigned general Levitical service along with the Hebronites (27) (see above).

29. Micah (28): Shamir, 1 Ch 24[24].

30. Isshiah (28): Zechariah, 1 Ch 24[25].

Nothing special is assigned to these Uzzielites (29) (30), who are given among ss. Levi of the time of David (see ref.). An Amminadab was the chief of the Uzzielites at the time of the removal of the ark (1 Ch 15[10]).

31. Merari (1): Mahli (3[2]) (35[ab]), Mushi (34), Jaaziah? (38), Ex 6[19], Nu 3[20], 1 Ch 6[19] 23[21] 24[26].

It is possible that the family Mushi (מוּשִׁי) derived their name from Moses (מֹשֶׁה) (We. Is. und Jüd. Gesch. p. 151 f.). On the appearance of Jaaziah, among ss. Merari, mentioned in 1 Ch 24[26], see below (38).

32. Mahli (31): Eleazar, Kish (33), 1 Ch 23[21].

33. Kish (32): Jerahmeel, 1 Ch 24[29].

34. Mushi (31): Mahli (35), Eder, Jerimoth, 1 Ch 24[30].

These Merarites (31)–(34) are recorded as in general Levitical service at the time of David (see ref. and 1 Ch 23[24] 24[31]).

35[a]. Mahli (34): *Shemer, Bani, Amzi, Hilkiah, Amaziah, Hashabiah, Malluch, Abdi, Kishi, Jeduthun (Ethan) (36) (37), 1 Ch 6[44-47].

Instead of Jeduthun we have the name Ethan in 1 Ch 6[47], but both names are undoubtedly designed to indicate one and the same person (Be. Ke. Oe. Zoe.). Cf. on this pedigree the remarks on 22[ab].

35[b]. Mahli (31) or (34): Libni, Shimei, Uzzah, Shimea, Haggiah, Asaiah, 1 Ch 6[29f.].

The pedigree of an otherwise unknown Asaiah. Be. regards it as a fragment, in spite of the great difference of names, representing originally the same line of descent as that seen in the first members of 35[a]. Ke. Zoe. and Oe. reject this hypothesis.

36. Jeduthun (35[a]): Gedaliah, Zeri,† Jeshaiah, Hashabiah, Mattithiah, Shimei, 1 Ch 25[3].

These six sons (Shimei is derived from 1 Ch 25[17]), with their father, were assigned by David, acc. to the Chronicler, to the service of song in the house of the Lord (ref.).

37. Jeduthun (35[a]): Galal, Shemaiah,‡ Obadiah, § 1 Ch 9[16], Neh 11[17].

Obadiah is mentioned among the Levites residing in Jerus. after the Exile (ref.).

38. Jaaziah (31), Beno? Shoham, Zaccur, Ibri, 1 Ch 24[27].

Beno (בְּנוֹ 'his son,' LXX, Vulg. RV) arises from a clear misunderstanding of the Heb. text, and should be struck out of the list of sons. It is the common noun (בֵּן) with the pronominal ending, and should be rendered 'his son,' i.e. Jaaziah is the son of Merari. The MT is difficult and probably corrupt (see Be. Oe. Ki.). Ke. and Zoe. regard the references to Jaaziah and his sons as a gloss. The name Ibri (עִבְרִי) 'Hebrew,' is noticeable, and shows at once that we are in a post-exilic or relatively late period of Israel's history.

39. Hosah: Shimri, Hilkiah, Tebaliah, Zechariah, 1 Ch 26[10f.].

Hosah of the ss. Merari (closer descent is not given), with his sons and brethren, all of whom numbered 13, is recorded among the door-keepers of the house of the Lord of the time of David. To him and Shuppim (שֻׁפִּים) was given the charge of the gate 'Shallecheth' westward. The name Shuppim, however, is a dittography from the preceding הָאָסֻפִּים 'the storehouse,' and is to be struck out (Ki.) (1 Ch 26[10-16]).

Additional Lists of Levites.

40. Of the reign of David: a. Uriel (ss. Kohath), Asaiah (ss. Merari), Joel (ss. Gershom), Shemaiah (ss. Elizaphan), Eliel (ss. Hebron), Amminadab (ss. Uzziel), 1 Ch 15[5-11].

b. Zechariah, Ben, Jaaziel,* Shemiramoth, Jehiel, Unni, Eliab, Benaiah, Maaseiah, Mattithiah, Eliphelehu, Mikneiah, Obed-edom, Jeiel, Azaziah, 1 Ch 15[18-21].

c. Shebaniah, Joshaphat, Nethanel, Amasai, Zechariah, Benaiah, Eliezer, 1 Ch 15[24].

d. Chenaniah, Berechiah, Elkanah, 1 Ch 15[22f.].

The Levites (a b c d) are mentioned in connexion with David's removal of the ark to Jerusalem. List a were chiefs of the Levitical families; list b, the singers or musicians with psalteries and harps under the direction of Heman, Asaph, and Ethan; list c, priestly trumpeters. Chenaniah (d) was the leader of the song or the carrying up of the ark, and Berechiah and Elkanah were door-keepers, also an Obed-edom and Jehiah (1 Ch 15[24]).

41. Of the reign of Jehoshaphat. Teachers of the law. (a) Priests: Elishama, Jehoram. (b) Levites: Shemaiah, Nethaniah, Zebadiah, Asahel, Shemiramoth, Jehonathan, Adonijah, Tobijah, Tobadonijah, 2 Ch 17[8].

42. Of the reign of Hezekiah: a. Mahath s. Amasai, Joel s. Azariah (ss. Kohath), Kish s. Abdi, Azariah s. Jehallelel (ss. Merari), Joah s. Zimmah, Eden s. Joah (Gershonites), Shimri, Jeuel (ss. Elizaphan), Zechariah, Mattaniah (ss. Asaph), Jehuel, Shimei (ss. Heman), Shemaiah, Uzziel (ss. Jeduthun), 2 Ch 29[12-14].

These Levites are mentioned as employed by Hezekiah in cleansing the temple after its defilement in the reign of Ahaz.

b. Rulers: Conaniah, Shimei (his brother). Overseers: Jehiel, Azaziah, Nahath, Asahel, Jerimoth, Jozabad, Eliel, Ismachiah, Mahath, Benaiah, 2 Ch 31[12f.].

During the reign of Hezekiah, acc. to the Chronicler, the people contributed abundantly of tithes and firstfruits, and these men had charge of the tithes and oblations brought into the chambers of the temple (2 Ch 31[5-13]).

c. Kore s. Imnah, Eden, Miniamin, Jeshua, Shemaiah, Amariah, Shecaniah, 2 Ch 31[14f.].

Kore was the porter at the E. gate of the temple, and had charge of the free-will offerings and the distribution of the portions of the priests. Under him were the others named above, stationed in the cities of the priests to distribute the portions of the priests (2 Ch 31[15-17]).

43. Of the reign of Josiah: a. Shaphan s. Azaliah, Maaseiah, Joah s. Joahaz, Jahath, Obadiah (ss. Merari), Zechariah, Meshullam (ss. Kohathites), 2 Ch 34[8. 12].

These persons are all mentioned in connexion with the repair of the temple. The first three, of whom Shaphan was the scribe, Maasciah was governor of the city, and Joah (or his f. Joahaz) the recorder, seem to have had general superintendence of the work, while the other four oversaw the workmen. The first three were not necessarily Levites, and are grouped here merely for convenience of reference (2 Ch 34[8-13]).

b. Rulers of the Temple: Hilkiah, Zechariah, Jehiel, 2 Ch 35[8].

c. Chiefs of the Levites: Conaniah, Shemaiah, Nethanel, Hashabiah, Jeiel, Jozabad, 2 Ch 35[9].

These had charge of the distribution of the offerings at the celebration of the passover kept by Josiah (2 Ch 35[1-19]).

IV. 1. Judah: (m. Shua, Gn 38[2-5]) Er, Onan, Shelah (2) (3); (m. Tamar, Gn 38[6-30]), Perez (4), Zerah (59), Gn 46[12], Nu 26[19f.], 1 Ch 2[3f.].

Er and Onan are represented as dying in Canaan (Gn 38[7-10] 46[12], Nu 26[19]), implying that two of the ancient and original clans of Judah early disappeared. The Canaanite mothers, Shua and Tamar (Gn 38[2. 6f.]), indicate a union with Canaanites (see art. Judah).

2. Shelah (1): Er f. Lecah, Laadah f. Mareshah. Families of Ashbea, Jokim, men of Cozeba, Joash, Saraph, Jashubi-lehem?, 1 Ch 4[21f.].

* Jahaziel, 1 Ch 16[6]

Er here appears as the son and not the brother of Shelah. A remnant of the clan Er may have united with, and become subordinate to, that of Shelah. Mareshah is the name of a city (see MARESHAH), probably also Lecah. Whether Ashbea is the name of a place or family cannot be determined. Cozeba (כֹּזְבָא) may be Chezib (כְּזִיב Gn 38⁵). Jashubi-lehem has arisen from a misunderstanding of the text, וַיָּשֻׁבוּ בֵית לָחֶם = וַיֵּשְׁבוּ לָחֶם 'and they returned to Bethlehem.' The Vulg., following evidently an old Jewish Midrash, renders v.²² et qui stare fecit solem, virique mendacii, et Securus et Incendens, qui principes fuerunt in Moab, et qui reversi sunt in Lahem. The whole passage (vv.²¹⁻²³) is very obscure, and probably preserves the family traditions and relationships of certain weavers and potters of the post-exilic times. The ref. to Moab and a return suggests some story similar to that of Ruth. Ki. assigns the verses to the later additions to Chronicles.

3. Shelah fam.: Zechariah, Joiarib, Adaiah, Hazaiah, Col-hozeh, Baruch, Maaseiah, Neh 11⁵.

This is the genealogy of Maaseiah (מַעֲשֵׂיָה), representing a family of the inhabitants of Jerus. after the Return (Neh 11⁴). In 1 Ch 9⁵ the name is Asaiah (עֲשָׂיָה).

4. Perez (1): Hezron (5), Hamul, Gn 46¹², Nu 26²¹, 1 Ch 2⁵.

5. Hezron (4): Jerahmeel (6), Ram (16), Chelubai (Caleb) (29) (35), 1 Ch 2⁹.

Ram as a second son of Hezron is suspicious: (1) Because OT knows of no Judæan clan Ram co-ordinate with Caleb and Jerahmeel. (2) The descendants are given, not in families and cities, but simply in a pedigree of David. This pedigree in 1 Ch 2¹⁰⁻¹⁵ appears taken from Ru 4¹⁸⁻²², where Ram may have stood for Ram the son of Jerahmeel (6), the father's name being omitted (We. p. 17 f.). Yet, while the pedigree of David may be conjectural, the Chronicler is clearly nearer the truth in deriving his descent from Ram s. Hezron than from Ram s. Jerahmeel, since, according to the narrative of 1 and 2 S, David cannot have been a Jerahmeelite. That the Chronicler's Judæan genealogies should principally consist of Calebite and Jerahmeelite families, as we shall see, is probably due to the fact that family names and traditions, along with family or clan life, are held more tenaciously among rural and pastoral peoples than the inhabitants of cities or more highly organized communities.

6. Jerahmeel (5): Ram (7), Bunah, Oren, Ozem, Ahijah? (m. Atarah), Onam (8), 1 Ch 2²⁵ᶠ.

Ahijah (אֲחִיָּה) is either to be struck out, having arisen from a misinterpretation of an original אֲחִיו or אֲחִיהוּ 'his brother' (LXX, Ki. אֲחָיו 'his brothers,' We. p. 15), or held to be the mother of the preceding sons (Be. Ke. Zoe. Oe.), the original text having been 'Ozem (and his brothers) from Ahijah' (אֹצֶם מֵאֲחִיָּה). The former is preferable.

7. Ram (6): Maaz, Jamin, Eker, 1 Ch 2²⁷.

8. Onam (6): Shammai (9), Jada (14), 1 Ch 2²⁸.

9. Shammai (8): Nadab (10), Abishur (13), 1 Ch 2²⁸.

10. Nadab (9): Seled, Appaim (11), 1 Ch 2³⁰.

11. Appaim (10): Ishi, Sheshan (12), Ahlai, 1 Ch 2³¹.

12. Sheshan (11): Jarha (son-in-law), Attai, Nathan, Zabad, Ephlal, Obed, Jehu, Azariah, Helez, Eleasah, Sismai, Shallum, Jekamiah, Elishama, 1 Ch 2³⁵⁻⁴¹.

This pedigree of the otherwise unknown Elishama—for he is not to be identified with others of the same name mentioned elsewhere in OT—was derived evidently from another source than that of the preceding, and (in our lists) following descendants of Jerahmeel (Ki. We. p. 18). To remove the discrepancy between the mention of Ahlai (11) and the statement (v.³⁴) that Sheshan had no sons, ignoring the fact of different sources, it has been assumed that Ahlai was a daughter (Ke. Zoe. et al.). Jarha is said to have been an Egyptian servant (v.³⁴). Some family represented by Elishama, probably near the time of the Chronicler, evidently traced their descent from the family or clan of Sheshan and an Egyp. individual or family who united with it. The free intercourse between Canaan and Egypt serves to confirm this statement.

13. Abishur (9): (m. Abihail) Ahban, Molid, 1 Ch 2²⁹.

14. Jada (8): Jether, Jonathan (15), 1 Ch 2³².

15. Jonathan (14): Peleth, Zaza, 1 Ch 2³³.

This (15) completes the list of the descendants of Jerahmeel (1 Ch 2²⁵⁻³³). It is evidently a record of the families of the Jerahmeelites, who are mentioned in 1 S 27¹⁰ as inhabiting a Negeb or south country distinct from that of Judah (see JERAHMEEL). The binary form of descent suggests an artistic construction. The names Bunah, Oren, Maaz, Eker, Abishur, Ahban, Molid, Seled, Appaim, Sheshan, and Zaza, occur only in this connexion, also Ozem, except as that of a brother of David mentioned only in 1 Ch 2¹⁵. Onam is the name of a family of Edom (Gn 36²³); Jamin of Simeon (Gn 46¹⁰); Jether an Ishmaelite name (1 Ch 2¹⁷), or Midianite (Ex 4¹⁸ RVm). (It is equivalent to Jethro). These names suggest a close relationship with these neighbours. The m. Atarah of Onam (6), the most widely extended family, probably arose from their inhabiting Ataroth or protected places (We. p. 15). The Jerahmeelites do not appear in connexion with the restoration, and the 13 generations between Sheshan and Elishama show that their families were thought of as living at least some 500 years before the time of the Chronicler. The list is probably of pre-exilic origin, and historical.

16. Ram (5): Amminadab, Nahshon, Salma, Boaz, Obed, Jesse*; Eliab,† Abinadab, Shimea,‡ Nethanel, Raddai, Ozem, David (17), d. Zeruiah (27), d. Abigail (28), 1 Ch 2¹⁰⁻¹⁶, cf. Ru 4¹⁸⁻²².

Acc. to 1 S 17¹² Jesse had eight sons (cf. 1 S 16²⁶ᶠ.); Syr. has in our passage eight sons, Elihu (cf. 1 Ch 27¹⁸) being the seventh.

In addition to the descendants of Jesse recorded in (17)–(28) we have Jesse, Eliab, d. Abihail (f. Jerimoth), d. Mahalath (f. Rehoboam), Jeush, Shemariah, Zaham, 2 Ch 11¹⁸ᶠ.; or Jesse, Eliab, d. Abihail (f. Rehoboam), Jeush, Shemariah, Zaham, 2 Ch 11¹⁸ RVm. Cf. (18) note.

17. David (16): (m. Ahinoam) Amnon, (m. Abigail) Chileab, (m. Maacah) Absalom (see below), (m. Haggith) Adonijah, (m. Abital) Shephatiah, (m. Eglah) Ithream, (m. Bathsheba) Shammua, Shobab, Nathan (see below), Solomon (18), (m. unknown) Ibhar, Elishua, Nepheg, Japhia, Elishama, Eliada, Eliphelet, 2 S 3²⁻⁵ 5¹⁴⁻¹⁶, cf. 1 Ch 3¹⁻⁹ 14⁴⁻⁷.

The names of the ss. David in 1 Ch 3¹⁻⁹ 14⁴⁻⁷, owing in the main to erroneous transcription, are somewhat diff. from those in the earlier and more authentic source (2 S) given in (17): Daniel (3¹) for Chileab (see DANIEL), Shimea (3⁵) for Shammua (perhaps mere variation of spelling שִׁמְעָא, שַׁמּוּעַ), Elishama (3⁶) for Elishua; Eliphelet (3⁶), or Elpelet (14⁵), Nogah (3⁷ 14⁶), two additional names developed, one from the preceding, and the other from the following names (Ki.); Beeliada (14⁷) for Eliada. The former probably is correct (see BEELIADA). Bath-sheba, written Bathshua, is mentioned as the m. in 1 Ch 3⁵.

Jerimoth, f. Mahalath wife of king Rehoboam is mentioned as a s. David (2 Ch 11¹⁸) (16 note). Since he does not appear elsewhere, he is thought to have been s. a concubine, unless Jerimoth (יְרִימוֹת) is a corruption of Ithream (יִתְרְעָם).

Besides the line of Solomon (18), descendants of David are given in the line of the ancestry of Joseph f. Christ traced back to Nathan (Lk 3²³⁻³¹), see GENEALOGY OF CHRIST; and in Maacah d. (evidently grand d.) of Absalom (1 K 15², 2 Ch 11²²). Since Absalom's ss. must have died without posterity (2 S 14²⁷, 18¹⁸), her mother probably was Tamar d. Absalom and father Uriel of Gibeah (2 Ch 13²). She was a wife of king Rehoboam and m. of king Abijam (see (18) note).

18. Solomon (17): Rehoboam, Abijah, Asa, Jehoshaphat, Joram, Ahaziah, Joash, Amaziah, Azariah, Jotham, Ahaz, Hezekiah, Manasseh, Amon, Josiah, Johanan, Jehoiakim (19), Zedekiah, Shallum,§ 1 Ch 3¹⁰⁻¹⁵.

Of these ss. Josiah (1 Ch 3¹⁵) Johanan is mentioned nowhere else. It looks as though he were designed to stand for Jehoahaz, Josiah's immediate successor (2 K 23³⁰), who was followed by Jehoiakim (2 K 23³⁴), and the latter, after the 3 months' reign of his son Jeconiah, by his brother Zedekiah (2 K 24¹⁷). Jehoiakim, however, was older than Jehoahaz (2 K 23³¹⁻³³), while Zedekiah was much younger than either of them, and Shallum was another name for Jehoahaz (Jer 22¹¹). Hence their order of birth is incorrectly given (1 Ch 3¹⁵), and probably the writer made the further mistake, after identifying Johanan with Jehoahaz, of taking Shallum for another son; although it is possible that the eldest s. Josiah was a Johanan who may have died before his father, or with him at the battle of Megiddo.

To (18), which represents the kings of Judah in order of succession from Solomon to Josiah inclusive, the following genealogical particulars may be added:—

(a) Mothers of Kings.—Of Rehoboam, Naamah the Ammonitess (1 K 14²¹. ³¹, 2 Ch 12¹³); of Abijah,‖ Maacah d. Absalom (1 K 15², 2 Ch 11²⁰). In 2 Ch 13² she is called Micaiah d. Uriel of Gibeah, hence, as the intervening time requires, she was a grand d., at least, of Absalom (see (17) note); of Asa—no mother is given, only grandmother Maacah (1 K 15¹⁰, 2 Ch 15¹⁶); of Jehoshaphat, Azubah d. Shilhi (1 K 22⁴², 2 Ch 20³¹); of Joram, Athaliah d. (grand d.) Omri, king of Israel (2 K 8²⁶, 2 Ch 22²); of Joash, Zibiah of Beersheba (2 K 12¹, 2 Ch 24¹); of Amaziah,

* Salmon, Ru 4²⁰ᶠ.

† Elihu is mentioned as a brother of David, 1 Ch 27¹⁸. Ki. reads Eliab.

‡ Shammah, 1 S 16⁹; Shimeah, 2 S 13³.

§ 2 K 23³⁰ Jehoahaz, cf. Jer 22¹¹; but see note above.

‖ Abijam, 1 K 15².

Jehoaddin,* of Jerusalem (2 K 14[2], 2Ch 25[1]); of Azariah,† Jecoliah† (2 K 15[2], 2 Ch 26[3]); of Jotham, Jerusha d. Zadok (2 K 15[33], 2 Ch 27[1]); of Ahaz, the name is not given; of Hezekiah, Abi‡ d. Zechariah (2 K 18[2], 2 Ch 29[1]); of Manasseh, Hephzibah (2 K 21[1]); of Amon, Meshullemeth d. Haruz of Jotbah (2 K 21[19]); of Josiah, Jedidah d. Adaiah of Bozkath (2 K 22[1]); of Jehoahaz and Zedekiah, Hamutal d. Jeremiah of Libnah (2 K 23[31]); of Jehoiakim, Zebidah d. Pedaiah of Rumah (2 K 23[36]); of Jeconiah (19), Nehushta d. Elnathan of Jerusalem (2 K 24[8]).

(b) Additional Sons of Kings.—Of Rehoboam, (m. Mahalath or Abihail, see (16) note c) Jeush, Shemariah, Zaham, (m. Maacah) Attai, Ziza, Shelomith (2 Ch 11[18-20]); of Jehoshaphat,—Azariah, Jehiel, Zechariah, Azariah(?), Michael, Shephatiah (2 Ch 21[2]). Nothing further is known of these princes. For a d. Joram, see JEHOSHEBA.

19. Jehoiakim (18): Jeconiah§ (20), Zedekiah, 1 Ch 3[16].

Some hold this Zedekiah to be identical with s. Josiah (19), the Chronicler's error or form of statement having arisen because Z. was Jeconiah's successor on the throne (We. Prol. p. 216).

20. Jeconiah (19): Assir (RVm)? Shealtiel, Malchiram, Pedaiah (21), Shenazzar, Jekamiah, Hoshama, Nedabiah, 1 Ch 3[17. 18].

Assir as a proper name arose from a misunderstanding of the adj. 'assir (אָסִיר), meaning captive (see RVm and art. ASSIR).

21. Pedaiah (20): Zerubbabel (22), Shimei, 1 Ch 3[19a].

In Ezr 3[2. 8] 5[2], Neh 12[1], Hag 1[1. 12. 14] 2[2. 23], cf. Mt 1[12], Lk 3[27], Zerubbabel (wh. see) is called the son of Shealtiel. Pedaiah probably was his real father; but Zerubbabel succeeding Shealtiel, of whom no sons are mentioned, as the head of the family of David or house of Judah, is called his son.

22. Zerubbabel (21): Meshullam, Hananiah, d. Shelomith, Hashubah, Ohel, Berechiah, Hasadiah, Jushab-hesed, 1 Ch 3[19b. 20].

23. Hananiah (22): Pelatiah, Jeshaiah, ss. Rephaiah, ss. Arnan, ss. Obadiah, ss. Shecaniah (24), 1 Ch 3[21].

This list has been interpreted in two ways: (a) Hananiah was the father of six sons, whose names follow, before four of whom 'sons' was written because they were founders of distinguished families of the time of the writer (Be.); (b) From 'sons of Rephaiah' (21[3]) to the end of the chapter is a genealogical fragment representing branches of the family of David, whose connexion with Zerubbabel was unascertainable (Ke.); LXX, Vulg. and Syr. read instead of בְּנֵי 'sons' בְּנוֹ 'his son,' and the genealogy (23) (24), then, is as follows: Hananiah, Pelatiah, Jeshaiah, Obadiah, Shecaniah, Shemaiah, Hattush, Igal, Bariah, Neariah, Shaphat. This is preferred by Ki. et al. and brings the descendants of David down to nine generations after Zerubbabel.

24. Shecaniah (23): Shemaiah, Hattush, Igal, Bariah, Neariah (25), Shaphat, 1 Ch 3[22].

25. Neariah (24): Elioenai (26), Hizkiah, Azrikam.

26. Elioenai (25): Hodaviah, Eliashib, Pelaiah, Akkub, Johanan, Delaiah, Anani, 1 Ch 3[24].

This completes the list of the descendants of David.

27. Zeruiah (16): Abishai, Joab, Asahel, 1 Ch 2[16].

28. Abigail (16): (f. Jether) Amasa, 1 Ch 2[17].

29. Caleb (5): Mesha f. Ziph, ss. Mareshah f. Hebron (30), d. Achsah, 1 Ch 2[42. 49b].

Caleb represents the powerful clan of the Calebites of S. Judah (see CALEB), The record in (29) is obscure; LXX has Mareshah for Mesha (also Ki. who thinks an enumeration of ss. Mareshah must have stood at the end of v.[42]). Better We. that ss. M. is written to distinguish the gentilic name Mareshah from that of the city. On Achsah see art. (cf. Jg 1[14. 15]).

30. Hebron (29): Korah, Tappuah, Rekem (31), Shema (32), 1 Ch 2[43].

31. Rekem (30): Shammai, Maon f. Bethzur, 1 Ch 2[44b f.].

32. Shema (30): Raham f. Jorkeam, 1 Ch 2[44].

33. Jahdai (?): Regem, Jotham, Geshan, Pelet, Ephah, Shaaph (34), 1 Ch 2[47].

The connexion of Jahdai with the foregoing is not given. His name evidently has fallen out of the text.

* Jehoaddan, 2 Ch 25[1].
† Uzziah and Jechiliah, 2 Ch 26[3].
‡ Abijah, 2 Ch 29[1].
§ Usually called Jehoiachin, 2 K 24[6ff.].

34. Shaaph (33) f. Madmannah: Sheva f. Machbena, and f. Gibea, 1 Ch 2[49a].

Vv.[46] and [48] are from another source, and to be separated from vv.[45. 47. 49] (We. Ki.), since Ephah, in v.[46] the name of a concubine of Caleb, in v.[47] is the name of a s. Shaaph. Their contents appears in (35). V.[49] is an evident continuation of v.[47]. Instead of 'and she bare' (וַתֵּלֶד) we should read (וַיֹּלֶד) 'and Shaaph begat.'

In the foregoing lists (29)-(34) Hebron, Tappuah, Maon, Ziph, Bethzur, Madmannah, and Gibea are well-known cities of Judah within the probable early domain of the Calebites. To these probably should be added Shema (שֶׁמַע) = Shema (שֶׁמַע) (Jos 15[26]), Jorkeam (יָרְקְעָם) = Jokdeam (יָקְדְעָם) (Jos 15[56]), Pelet (פֶּלֶט) = Bethpelet (בֵּית פֶּלֶט) (Jos 15[27]), Machbena (מַכְבֵּנָא) = Cabbon (כַּבּוֹן) (Jos 15[40]). These towns suggest the transfer of gentilic names to localities or the converse. While some of the other names occur elsewhere (Mesha, a king of Moab, 2 K 3[4]; Shammai, 1 Ch 4[17]; Jotham, Jg 9[5] et al.; Sheva? 2 S 20[25]), they throw no light on the history behind these genealogies or the families or places recorded; unless Korah a s. Esau and district of Edom (Gn 36[5. 14. 16]); Rekem, a king of Midian (Nu 31[8]); Ephah, a Midianite tribe;—all serve to confirm the indications found elsewhere of a close affinity between Caleb and the Edomites and adjoining peoples. Raham (רַחַם), a noun kindred with Jerahmeel (יְרַחְמְאֵל),—Jahdai, Regem, Geshan, and Shaaph are found only in this connexion.

35. Caleb (5): a. (m. Azubah) d. Jerioth, Jesher, Shobab, Ardon, 1 Ch 2[18].

b. (m.c. Ephah) Haran, Moza, Gazez, 1 Ch 2[46].

c. (m.c. Maacah) Sheber, Tirhanah, 1 Ch 2[48].

d. (m. Ephrathah) Hur (36) (42), (Ashhur f. Tekoa), 1 Ch 2[19. 24].

Caleb in (35) as in (29) represents the clan, and the descendants given in (35)-(39) unquestionably embody traditions or convey historical information respecting the families and localities of the clan during different periods of its history. They are taken from late material in 1 Ch (Ki.). During the pre-exilic period the Calebites dwelt in S. Judah (see CALEB). During the post-exilic period, owing to the aggression of the Edomites, they seem to have moved farther north (or if taken into captivity were thus located on their return), and thus dwelt in the districts of Bethlehem and Kiriath-jearim. This, the supposition of We., seems clearly proved from the geographical localities mentioned and indicated in 1 Ch 2[50-55], viz. Bethlehem, Kiriath-jearim, Netopha, Bethgader, Zorah, Eshtaol, Atroth-beth Joab (We. p. 28ff.) (see also (39)). The children of Azubah (their names may be enigmatical) represent the families that belonged to the older place of residence, hence perhaps the mother's name Azubah (עֲזוּבָה), 'abandoned.' Ephah and Maacah as concubines represent alien or inferior elements which coalesced with the clan. Ephrathah represents the district of Bethlehem (see EPHRATHAH). The meaning and text of 1 Ch 2[18] is uncertain. Jerioth is regarded as another name for Azubah (Be.) or another wife with Azubah (Oe.), or a daughter of Azubah (Vulg. Ki. Ke. Zoe.), or the mother of Azubah, i.e. Azubah was her daughter (בַּת יְרִיעוֹת) (We. p. 33).

The MT of 1 Ch 2[24], which yields an Abiah, wife of Hezron and m. of Ashhur, is plainly corrupt. A few slight changes give the appropriate rendering, 'And after the death of Hezron, Caleb came unto Ephrathah, the wife of Hezron his father, and she bare unto him Ashhur.' The meaning seems to be: The pre-exilic inhabitants of Ephrathah were Hezronites, represented under E. the wife of Hezron. The later settlement of the Calebites is represented under the union of C. with Ephrathah. Ashhur (אַשְׁחוּר = אִישׁ חוּר, We. p. 15) is evidently identical with Hur, the firstborn of Ephrathah (1 Ch 2[24]). On Gazez (35[6]) see art.

36. Hur (35[d]) (Uri, Bezalel, 1 Ch 2[20]): Shobal (37) f. Kiriath-jearim (38), Salma (39) f. Bethlehem, Hareph f. Bethgader, 1 Ch 2[50f.].

The genealogy Hur, Uri, Bezalel is an evident insertion from Ex 31[2], and is out of place in a series of gentilic and geographical names or relationships.

37. Shobal (36): Haroeh (Reaiah, 2 Ch 4[2]), half Menuhoth, 1 Ch 2[52].

Haroeh (הָרֹאֶה) is prob. textual error for Reaiah (רְאָיָה) s. Shobal in 1 Ch 4[2]. On half Menuhoth see note on (39). Of these families nothing further is known.

38. Kiriath-jearim families (36): Ithrites, Puthites, Shumathites, Mishraites, Zorathites, Eshtaolites, 1 Ch 2[53].

The Puthites, Shumathites, and Mishraites are not mentioned elsewhere. To the Ithrites belonged two of David's heroes, Ira and Gareb (2 S 23[38], 1 Ch 11[40]). The Zorathites and Eshtaolites are properly the gentilic names of the inhabitants of Zorah and Eshtaol. These are placed subordinate to the Mishraites or the other families (1 Ch 2[53]). Zorah is mentioned in Neh 11[29], and its people as Zorites again apparently in 1 Ch 2[54] (39).

39. Salma (36): Bethlehem, Netophathites, Atroth-beth-Joab, half Manahathites, Zorites, Tirathites, Shimeathites, Sucathites, 1 Ch $2^{54f.}$.

Salma is evidently identical with the reputed f. Boaz (16). The Netophathites (Neh 12^{28}) were inhabitants of Netophah (Ezr 2^{22}, Neh 7^{26}), probably a village near Bethlehem. Atroth-beth-Joab is probably the same as the valley of the craftsmen (Neh 11^{35}). Of the Manahathites nothing is known. They (מְנֻחֹתִי) are probably the same as the Menuhoth (37) (מְנֻחוֹת) (Ki. has מנחתי in v.^{52}). The statement that the Tirathites (תִּרְעָתִים), Shimeathites (שִׁמְעָתִים), and Sucathites (שׁוֹכָתִים) were families of scribes which dwelt at Jabez (v.^{55}), clearly proves that we have post-ex. material in our lists, for scribes are unknown before this period. The Vulg. saw in the families three different classes of religious functionaries: canentes, resonantes, et in tabernaculis commorantes. Be. allows a similar derivation, except that he regards the first class as door-keepers (Aram. תְּרַע =Heb. שַׁעַר door or gate). We. (p. 30 f.) finds underlying the three names תִּרְעָה a technical term for sacred music, שִׁכְעָה the Halacha or sacred tradition, and שׁוּכָה, which he connects with Vulg., and Be. with סֻכָּה 'booth,' cf. Lv 23^{34}. Ges. Lex.^{12} derives the last two names from unknown places. Ke. interprets as descendants from Tira, Shimei and Suchah. For their connexion with Kenites see KENITES.

40. Reaiah (37): Jahath, Ahumai, Lahad, 1 Ch 4^{2}.

The lists (40)–(55) from 1 Ch 4^{1-23} 'look almost like a gathering of genealogical pebbles rolled together from various quarters, consisting of older and younger parts that are kept together only by the common connexion with the tribe of Judah' (Zoe.). Several of the leading 'fathers' are Calebites, i.e. Shobal, Hur, Ashhur, Chelub, Kenaz, Othniel, and Caleb. Hence the lists represent members of that clan, and Caleb should be substituted for Carmi in v.^{1} (We. Ki. Zoe.). Whether the names and relationships reflect pre-exilic conditions or post-exilic is difficult to determine. Ki. regards the passage, with the exception of v.^{1} and a few phrases noted below, as from the older sources of Ch. along with $2^{26\text{-}33.\ 42\text{-}45.\ 47.\ 49}$. We.'s view is similar, that in the main pre-ex. conditions are reflected. Be. held, on the other hand, from the mention of a number of the names in the history given in Ezr and Neh, that we have a classification of the tribe of Judah actually made in the time between Zerubbabel and Ezra, so that these apparently broken and incoherent genealogies were plain to the readers of the time of the Chronicler. The view of We. and Ki. is more probable. We have, then, an old list of Calebites edited to bring it into greater harmony with the later times. Reaiah, cf. (37), occurs in a Reubenite pedigree 1 Ch 5^{5}, and as a family name among the returned with Zerubbabel Ezr 2^{47}, Neh 7^{50}. Jahath is a frequent Levite name (1 Ch $6^{20.\ 43}$ $23^{10f.}$ 24^{22}, 2 Ch 34^{12}). Ahumai and Lahad are mentioned only here. These are all called families of the Zorathites (v.^{2b} acc. to Ki. is from a later hand), cf. (38), 1 Ch 1^{53}.

41. Hur? f. Etam: Jezreel, Ishma, Idbash, d. Hazzelelponi, Penuel f. Gedor, Ezer f. Hushah, 1 Ch $4^{3f.}$.

The MT of v.^{3a} is defective (אֵלֶּה אֲבִי עֵיטָם 'these are f. of Etam'). RV supplies 'sons,' i.e. Jezreel, etc., are ss. of father of Etam. Ki. inserts 'sons of Hur' (בְּנֵי חוּר), but the 'sons of Hur' (v.^{4b}) must include (40) as well as (41). LXX (also Kau.) has, 'These are the sons of Etam' (οὗτοι υἱοὶ Αἰταμ). Etam is a village near Bethlehem; possibly another place of the same name may be found near Hebron (see art. ETAM). Jezreel and Gedor are towns of S. Judah (Jos $15^{56.\ 58}$). Two heroes of David's guard are mentioned as Hushites (2 S 21^{18} 23^{27}, 1 Ch 11^{29} 20^{4} 27^{11}), but the location of Hushah is unknown. Penuel, a personal or gentilic name, is otherwise unknown. It cannot be associated with the Penuel E. of the Jordan. Ezer may be the same as Ezrah (53). Of Ishma and Idbash and Hazzelelponi, mentioned only here, nothing is known. The last should be rendered 'the Zelelponites' (צְלֶלְפּוֹנִי =הַצְּלֶלְפּוֹנִי with art.). The words in v.^{4b} 'firstborn . . . Bethlehem' are according to Ki. from a later hand.

42. Ashhur (Hur) f. Tekoa (35^{d}): (m. Naarah) Ahuzzam, Hepher, Temeni, Haahashtari, (m. Helah) Zereth, Izhar (Zohar, RVm), Ethnan, 1 Ch $4^{5\text{-}7}$.

On Ashhur (=Hur) see under (35^{d}). F. of Tekoa, acc. Ki. is an annotation, cf. 1 Ch 2^{24} (35^{d}). Tekoa is near Bethlehem (see TEKOA). Naarah, evidently not this one, was a town on the borders of Ephraim and Benjamin (Jos 16^{7}), but no such locality has yet been identified with Judah. Hepher, mentioned in connexion with Tappuah (Jos 12^{17}) and Socoh (1 K 4^{10}), evidently belonged to S. Judah. Temeni (תִּימְנִי) properly means Southerner, i.e. of S. Judah. Cf. Teman (תֵּימָן) patronymic (תֵּימָנִי) of Edom (Gn 36^{11} et al.). Ethnan (אֶתְנִי) is prob. identical with Ithnan (יִתְנָן, Jos 15^{23}), a city of S. Judah. For Izhar (יִצְהָר Kt.) must be read Zohar (וְצֹהַר 'and Zohar'). This was the family name of Ephron of Hebron (Gn 23^{8} 25^{9}), and also of a s. Simeon (Gn 46^{10}). The other names in (42) occur only in this connexion. For Haahashtari (הָאַחַשְׁתָּרִי =הָאֲחַשְׁתָּרִי with art.) should be 'the Ahashtarites.' If this word is of Pers. derivation (Be. Oxf. Heb. Lex.), it must be an explanatory gloss referring to the preceding families.

43. Hakkoz (Koz): Anub, Zobebah, families of Aharhel s. Harum, 1 Ch 4^{8}.

Koz (wrongly Hakkoz AV and RV, Heb. קוֹץ without art.) is a post-ex. family name (1 Ch 24^{10}, Ezr 2^{61}, Neh $3^{4.\ 21}$ 7^{63}; in all these passages the name has the art. הַקּוֹץ Hakkoz). The names of his children occur only here. Anub (עָנוּב) is prob. identical with Anab (עֲנָב), a town near Debir (Jos 15^{50}). Jabez, described in vv.$^{9f.}$, prob. was connected in some way with Koz.

44. Chelub (b. Shuhah): Mehir f. Eshton (45), 1 Ch 4^{11}.

Chelub (כְּלוּב) is clearly another form of the clan name Caleb (כָּלֵב); cf. Chelubai (1 Ch 2^{9}) (5). It is possible that for Shuhah (שׁוּחָה) we should read Hushah (חוּשָׁה v.^{4}) (41). Of Mehir and Eshton, names occurring only here, nothing is known.

45. Eshton (44): Beth-rapha, Paseah, Tehinnah f. Ir-nahash (city of Nahash, RVm), 1 Ch 4^{12}.

Beth-rapha is otherwise unknown; a Benjaminite Rapha is mentioned 1 Ch 8^{2}, and Rapha 'giant' or the pl. Rephaim 'giants' 1 Ch 20^{4}. But these throw no light on Beth-rapha. Paseah is a post-ex. family name of the Nethinim, Ezr 2^{49}, Neh 7^{51}, and is mentioned also in Neh 3^{6}. The other names do not occur elsewhere. These ss. of Eshton are called 'the men of Recah' (v.^{12b}), a place also otherwise unknown. The LXX has Rechab.

46. Kenaz: Othniel (47), Seraiah (49), 1 Ch 4^{13a}.

Kenaz was an Edomite tribe (Gn $36^{11.\ 15.\ 42}$, 1 Ch $1^{36.\ 53}$). Caleb, acc. to Nu 32^{12}, Jos $14^{6.\ 14}$, was a Kenizzite. Othniel was the son of Kenaz acc. to Jg 1^{13}, where Kenaz is also designated either as the f. or b. of Caleb. These statements clearly prove a close relationship between the Calebites and the Edomites. This is further reflected in Shobal f. Manahath, occurring in the list of Edomites, Gn 36^{23}, cf. (37). Othniel, like Caleb, prob. is a clan name. Whether the clan derived its name from a distinguished hero Othniel, or whether Othniel is a purely eponymous character, cannot perhaps be determined (see OTHNIEL). The close relationship between the clans of Caleb and Othniel is brought out in the story of Jg $1^{12\text{-}15}$ (see Moore in loco). Seraiah, a not infrequent name from the time of David onwards, as the brother of Othniel, is mentioned only here. It smacks so strongly of an individual, and the later period of Israel's history, that it is prob. an artificial link inserted among these names. It is among the names of the companions of Zerubbabel, Ezr 2^{2}.

47. Othniel (46): Hathath, 1 Ch 4^{13b}.

48. Meonothai: Ophrah, 1 Ch 4^{14a}.

Hathath occurs nowhere else. Perhaps Meonothai should be joined as another s. of Othniel. It also is not found elsewhere, but probably represents the inhabitants of Maon of S. Judah. Of Ophrah, the name also of a city of Benjamin (Jos 18^{23}, 1 S 13^{17}) and of one of Manasseh (Jg 6^{11}), nothing is known.

49. Seraiah (46): Joab f. Ge-harashim, 1 Ch 4^{14b}.

See (39). Acc. to Ki. 'f. Geharashim, craftsmen' v.^{14} is from a later hand.

50. Caleb s. Jephunneh: Iru, Elah (51), Naam, 1 Ch 4^{15a}.

On Caleb s. of Jephunneh see CALEB. This additional list of descendants of Caleb shows that the Chronicler's lists contain different groups of Calebites not reduced to a perfect genealogical system, but arranged somewhat independently of each other, reflecting, as already intimated, enumerations of different times, localities, and sources. Many writers (the older commentators generally) wishing to harmonize all of the OT notices of Caleb, and regarding each Caleb as representing an individual, have seen several Calebs in 1 Ch 2 and 4. Neteler (Die Bücher der biblischen Chronik, p. 34) gives the following line of descent: Judah, Perez, Hezron, Caleb Ben-hezron, Hur, Caleb Ben-hur, Salma, Kenaz, Jephunneh, Caleb Ben-jephunneh. A somewhat similar explanation is given in Zoe. (Eng. ed., p. 46) by the editor and translator, J. G. Murphy. For Iru Elah (עִירוּ אֵלָה), Ir and Elah (עִיר וְאֵלָה) may be read (Ki.). We. (p. 39) finds the name Iru equivalent to Iram, a duke of Edom (1 Ch 1^{54} עִירָם=עִירוּ). One is tempted to join Ir (עִיר) 'city' with Elah (אֵלָה=אֵילַת Dillmann, Gn 36^{41}), and find reference to the city Elath (see art.). At all events Elah is an Edomitic name (Gn 36^{41}), and may be seen also in El-paran (אֵיל פָּארָן), the wilderness south of Judah. Naam is otherwise unknown.

51. Elah (50): Kenaz, 1 Ch 4^{15b}.

Kenaz as s. Elah is surprising (assuming that the genealogy is not of persons), unless Elah is the name of the district of Elath or El-paran, which might have been the early home of the Kenizzites, or the name of a tribe to which Kenaz became subordinate. Perhaps a transposition should be made in the Heb. text, and instead of וּבְנֵי אֵלָה קְנַז we should read אֵלֶּה בְּנֵי קְנַז 'And these are the sons of Kenaz,' referring to (46)–(50) (vv.13-15).

52. Jehallelel: Ziph, Ziphah, Tiria, Asarel, 1 Ch 4^{16}.

Jehallelel only here, and as a personal or family name of ss. Merari, 2 Ch 29^{12}. Ziph, the name of a city of S. Judah; Ziphah, fem. form of the same occurs only here. Tiria and Asarel are not mentioned elsewhere.

53. Ezrah: Jether, Mered (54), Epher, Jalon, 1 Ch 4^{17a}.

Ezrah possibly is the same as Ezer (41). Jether is not an uncommon name, cf. (14). Mered occurs only in this connexion. Epher is the name of a son of Midian (Gn 25^4, 1 Ch 1^{33}), and also of an individual or family of the half-tribe of Manasseh (1 Ch 5^{24}). Jalon is found only here.

54. Mered (53): (m. Bithiah) Miriam, Shammai, Ishbah f. Eshtemoa, (m. the Jewess) Jered f. Gedor, Heber f. Soco, Jekuthiel f. Zanoah, 1 Ch $4^{17f.}$.

The present text of v.17f. gives no complete sense. Usually the clauses are rearranged. The statement, 'And these are the ss. Bithiah d. Pharaoh which Mered took' (18^b), is placed immediately after Jalon (17^a) (Be. Ke. Zoe. Oe. Kau.); this gives (54). LXX (in 17^b) had a different text (Καὶ ἐγέννησεν Ἰεθέρ), which Ki. follows, emending וְיֶתֶר הוֹלִיד to אֶת־מִרְיָם וְיֶתֶר, 'And Jether begat Miriam,' etc. This places Jether as the progenitor of the ss. given in (54), and assumes that the ss. Mered and Bithiah, originally enumerated, have fallen out of the text. Miriam, elsewhere in OT only of Moses' sister, is here evidently a man's name. Shammai, also the name of a Jerahmeelite, cf. (8). Ishbah and Jekuthiel occur only here, and also Jered, except as the name of the antediluvian patriarch (Gn $5^{15ff.}$). Heber is not uncommon. In (41) Penuel is given as f. Gedor. Possibly, the posterity of two families or individuals were the reputed founders of the city. Eshtemoa, Gedor, Soco, and Zanoah are all towns in S. Judah or near Hebron (see arts.). Of the connexion here mentioned of Mered or Jether with Bithiah d. Pharaoh nothing is known. Instead of 'the Jewess,' RVm transliterates, Hajehudijah, and AV Jehudijah.

55. Hodiah: (m. sister of Naham) f. Keilah the Garmite, Eshtemoa the Maacathite, 1 Ch 4^{19}.

Hodiah is a common name of the time of Ezra and Neh. (AV here wrongly a woman's name, 'his wife Hodiah'). Before Eshtemoa probably f. has fallen out. Keilah and Eshtemoa are the names of Judæan towns (see art.). Maacathite (הַמַּעֲכָתִי) shows probably a connexion with Maacah (מַעֲכָה) (35c). Garmite and Naham occur only here.

56. Shimon: Amnon, Rinnah, Ben-hanan, Tilon, 1 Ch 4^{20a}.

57. Ishi: Zoheth, Ben-zoheth, 1 Ch 4^{20b}.

There is nothing to throw light on these names, most of which are mentioned only in this connexion. Ishi is in (11). Probably a name has fallen out before Ben-zoheth, i.e. s. Zoheth.

58. Perez fam.: a. Bani, Imri, Omri, Ammihud, Uthai, 1 Ch 9^4.

b. Mahalalel, Shephatiah, Amariah, Zechariah, Uzziah, Athaiah, Neh 11^4.

The pedigrees of the post-exilic Perezites Uthai (cf. Ezr 8^{14}) and Athaiah of the inhabitants of Jerusalem.

59. Zerah (1): Zimri (Zabdi (60), Jos 7^1), Ethan (61), Heman, Calcol, Dara, 1 Ch 2^6.

Ethan, Heman, Calcol, and Dara (Darda) are probably the names of famous men of the family of Zerah (cf. 1 K 4^{31}) (see arts.). Whether Ethan and Heman are to be connected with the Levitical singers of those names is uncertain.

60. Zabdi (59): Carmi, Achan, Jos 7^1; cf. 1 Ch 2^7.

Pedigree of Achan the trespasser (Achar, 1 Ch 2^7), see ACHAN.

61. Ethan (59): Azariah, 1 Ch 2^8.

Azariah the Ethanite is otherwise unknown. For another Zerahite see note at end of XXI.

V. 1. ISSACHAR: Tola (2), Puah,* Jashub,† Shimron, Gn 46^{13}, Nu $26^{23f.}$, 1 Ch 7^1.

2. Tola (1): Uzzi (3), Rephaiah, Jeriel, Jahmai, Ibsam, Shemuel, 1 Ch 7^2.

* Puvah (פֻּוָה) (Gn 46^{13}).

† Iob (יוֹב) (Gn 46^{13}), a txt. err. (Ball, SBOT, in loc.).

3. Uzzi (2): Izrahiah, Michael, Obadiah, Joel, Isshiah, 1 Ch 7^3.

Of the names in the genealogy of Issachar's descendants, Tola appears as that of one of the minor judges, 's. Puah, s. Dodo, a man of Issachar' (Jg $10^{1f.}$). This implies that traditions varied in respect to the relationship of the clans of Tola and Puah. Puah may have been the more ancient, but Tola was undoubtedly the principal clan of Issachar, whose seat seems to have been centred at the unknown Shamir (Jg $10^{1f.}$). Of the other persons and families recorded nothing further is known, beyond that those of (2) and (3) are called 'mighty men of valour' and 'chief men,' and assigned apparently to the time of David, 1 Ch 7^{2-5}.

VI. 1. ZEBULUN: Sered, Elon, Jahleel, Gn 46^{14}, Nu 26^{26}.

Nothing further than their mention is known of these clans. Elon, probably an eponym from the clan, is one of the minor judges of Israel, who was buried in a place of the same name whose locality is unknown (Jg $12^{11f.}$, cf. Moore, in loc.). No genealogy of Zebulun is given by the Chronicler.

VII.[a] 1. MANASSEH: a. Machir, Abiezer (7), Helek, Asriel, Shechem (5), Hepher (6), Shemida (5), Jos $17^{1f.}$.

b. Machir, Gilead, Iezer, Helek, Asriel, Shechem, Shemida, Hepher, Nu 26^{29-33}.

c. (m. Aramæan concubine) Machir (f. Gilead); Zelophehad (6), d. Hammolecheth (7), 1 Ch $7^{14f.\ 18}$.

2. Machir (1^{abc}): (m. Maacah) Peresh, Sheresh (3), 1 Ch 7^{16}.

3. Sheresh (2): Ulam (1), Rakem, 1 Ch 7^{16}.

4. Ulam (3): Bedan, 1 Ch 7^{17}.

5. Shemida (1^{ab}): Ahian, Shechem (1^{ab}), Likhi, Aniam, 1 Ch 7^{19}.

6. Hepher (1^b): Zelophehad (1^c), dd. Mahlah, Noah, Hoglah, Milcah, Tirzah, Nu 26^{33} 27^1.

7. Hammolecheth (1^c): Ishhod, Abiezer (1^a), and Mahlah, 1 Ch 7^{18}.

The genealogy of the tribe of Manasseh appears in different forms. Of the clans enumerated (1^{abc}), Machir is by far the most important. In the Song of Deborah he stands for the tribe of Manasseh (Jg 5^{14}), and his home at that time seems to have been W. of the Jordan (cf. v.17). But he was especially known and remembered as the f. or conqueror of Gilead (Nu 26^{29} 32^{39}, Jos 17^1, Dt 3^{14}). Acc. to many authorities this conquest was made from W. Palestine (Smend, HWB, ed. Riehm; Stade, Gesch. i. p. 149; Budde, Richt. u. Sam. p. 34 ff.; Moore on Jg 5^{15}; but G. A. Smith, Hist. Geog. p. 577 n., regards the argument as inconclusive). From his pre-eminence and earlier development Machir, then, was regarded as the firstborn of Manasseh, or as the only son. In this latter scheme (1^a) the other clans of Manasseh are recorded, not as descendants of Machir simply, but also of Gilead, as though their home was E. of the Jordan. But the clan Iezer, i.e. Abi-ezer (Gideon's clan), belonged to the district W. of the Jordan (Jg $6^{11.\ 34}$ 8^2). Tirzah, the city, a d. Zelophehad s. Hepher (7), was likewise situated W. of the Jordan (see TIRZAH), and Jos $17^{1ff.}$ plainly implies that all of the ss. Manasseh (1^a) except Machir dwelt W. of the Jordan. To the author of (1^b) the name Gilead then either had lost its geographical meaning, or, what is more probable, holding that Gilead was first conquered, as represented in the Hex., he regarded the W. Manassites as offshoots of the E. Manassites. The genealogical scheme of (1^c) (2) (3) (4) (5) (7), given in 1 Ch 7^{14-19}, is clearly different from (1^a) or (1^b), although not without points of connexion. The passage from which (1^c) is derived is corrupt, and in its present state unintelligible, forbidding any satisfactory reconstruction (Ki.; see attempts in Be. Oe). Asriel (אַשְׂרִיאֵל), 1 Ch 7^{14}, is plainly a dittography out of the following words (אֲשֶׁר יָלָדָה). The statement that the m. of Machir was an Aramæan appears likewise in the LXX of Gn 50^{23}. The reference to Huppim and Shuppim and the sister (v.15) is entirely obscure. In Maacah, the wife of Machir, we may possibly see some connexion between Machirites and their neighbours, the Maacathites (see MAACAH). In 1 Ch 2^{21} Hezron s. Perez s. Judah is represented as begetting through a d. of Machir, Segub, who begat Jair, 'who had twenty-three cities in the land of Gilead.' Segub (שְׂגוּב), who is not mentioned elsewhere, probably has arisen in transcription from Argob (אַרְגֹב), the district given as inhabited by Jair the s. Manasseh (Dt 3^{14}). Why Hezron, a clan of Judah (IV. 3), should be connected at all with Machir is entirely obscure. The statement probably has arisen through some misunderstanding

Hepher (1^b) (6) may be connected with Hepher, the city and district mentioned in Jos 12^{17} and 1 K 4^{10}. According to Kuenen, Zelophehad was originally the name of a city (Dillm. on Nu 26^{33}). The Jewish law of female inheritance is represented as traced to the petition of his daughters (Nu 27^{1-11}, 36^{1-12}). The d. Tirzah, as assumed above, is the well-known city, and perhaps the names of the others should be sought in towns or villages. Of the other names introduced in these lists beyond what has been mentioned we know nothing. Perhaps Likhi (לִקְחִי) (5)=Helek (חֶלֶק) (1b) and Aniam (אֲנִיעָם) (5)=Noah (נֹעָה) (6) (Be.).

8. Epher, Ishi, Eliel, Azriel, Jeremiah, Hodaviah, Jahdiel, 1 Ch 5^{24}.

These are mentioned as 'mighty men of valour, famous men, heads of their fathers' houses,' of the half-tribe of Manasseh dwelling E. of the Jordan (ref.). Nothing further of them, indicating when they lived or for what they were famous, is given.

VII.b 1. Ephraim: a. Shuthelah (12), Becher, Tahan, Nu 26^{35}.

b. Shuthelah, Ezer, Elead, Beriah, d. Sheerah, Rephah, Resheph (4), 1 Ch 7^{21-25}.

2. Shuthelah (1): Eran, Nu 26^{36}.

3. Shuthelah (1b): Bered, Tahath, Eleadah, Tahath, Zabad, Shuthelah, 1 Ch $7^{20f.}$.

4. Resheph (1b): Telah, Tahan, Ladan, Ammihud, Elishama, Nun, Joshua, 1 Ch 7^{25-27}.

The genealogy of Ephraim (1b) (3) (4), preserved in 1 Ch 7^{20-27}, is of uncertain construction. From the Heb. text it is not clear whether Ezer and Elead are the ss. of Shuthelah (No. 2) (3) or of Ephraim; or Sheerah and Rephah, the children of Beriah or Ephraim. The latter rendering in each case, as in (1b), is the better. In the first instance the context clearly demands it. Of special interest is the notice of the slaughter of Ezer and Elead on a cattle raid by the men of Gath (v.21). To the older commentators, who regarded Ephraim and his children as historical individuals, this episode was difficult of explanation, because it belonged evidently to the period of the sojourn in Egypt. It was usually interpreted as a foray out of Goshen (Zoe. Oe.)—against the use of the word יָרַד 'go down,' Ew. placed the event in the pre-Egyptian period (Hist. i. p. 380). Sayce refers to it as historical, and of the Egyptian period (Patriarchal Palestine, p. 202). There is little doubt, however, if an historical collision between Ephraimitic clans and Gittites underlies this notice, that the foray was from Mt. Ephraim (Be.). In the original story, Ephraim mourning (v.22) probably was no more thought of as an individual than Rachel in Jer 31^{15}. The ss. of Ephraim slain then were two Ephraimitic clans, destroyed in some Phil. war. The connexion of Beriah, another clan, with the event arose either from a play upon the word, Beriah being regarded as the equivalent of 'in evil' (בְּרִיעָה = בְּרֹעָה) (v. 23), or, in addition to the play upon the name, since Beriah is mentioned as a Benjam. family of Aijalon, who routed the inhabitants of Gath (1 Ch 8^{13}), it is possible that this Benjam. Beriah, having driven back Gittite invaders, received the former home of Ezer and Elead, and thus became incorporated into the tribe of Ephraim (Be.). We. regards the entire episode as of late fabrication (Prol. p. 214).

The list of names given in this genealogy has a suspicious look. They appear like a repetition of the same elements. Not only is Shuthelah repeated (4), but there is a striking similarity between the other names.

לערן of Eran.
לערן Laadan.
אלעדה Eleadah.
אלעד Elead.
שׁותלח Shuthelah.
ותלח and Telah.
תחת Tahath.
תחן Tahan.
בכר Becher.
וברד and Bered.
זבד Zabad.

Tahan (1a) (4) and Tahath (3) are without doubt the Tohu (1 S 1^{1}) and the Tahath, Nahath and Toah (III. 22^{4b}). Sheerah was the reputed builder of Bethhoron, whose name appears in Uzzen-sheerah (wh. see) (v.24). Elishama s. Ammihud (4) appears as the prince of the tribe of Ephraim in Nu 1^{10}, whence it is easy to see how the pedigree of Joshua was constructed.

VIII. 1. Benjamin: a. Bela (2), Becher (4), Ashbel, Gera, Naaman, Ehi, Rosh, Muppim, Huppim, Ard, Gn 46^{21}.

b. Bela (2), Ashbel, Ahiram, Shephupham, Hupham, Nu $26^{38f.}$.

c. Bela (2), Becher (4), Jediael (5), 1 Ch 7^{6}.

d. Bela (2), Ashbel, Aharah, Nohah, Rapha, 1 Ch 8^{1}.

We have thus four different lists of ss. Benjamin. Bela is common to all; Ehi, Rosh, Muppim, and Huppim (1a) are clearly equivalent to Ahiram, Shephupham, and Hupham (1b); cf. the Heb. text, אחי ראש מפים חפים, with אחירם שפופם חפם. Hence Rosh (1a) should be struck out and Ahiram substituted for Ehi (1a), and also probably for Aharah (אַחֲרַח) (1d). Gn 46^{21} LXX reads Benjamin, Bela, Becher, Ashbel; Bela, Gera, Naaman, Ehi, Rosh, Muppim, and Huppim. This corresponds with (2a) (3) (see below), where Gera, Naaman, and Ard are ss., Bela and Shuppim and Huppim grandsons. Hence the original text of Gn 46^{21} may have read Benjamin, Bela, Becher, Ashbel; Bela, Gera, Naaman, Ahiram, Shephupham, Huppim, Ard (Ball, in loco, SBOT).

In (1c) Jediael (יְדִיעֲאֵל) appears as the equivalent of Ashbel (אִישׁ־בָּעַל = אֶשְׁבֶּל) either by corruption or substitution. Whether a textual corruption or an independent tradition underlies Nohah and Rapha (1d) it is impossible to determine. The names as Benjaminites occur only here.

2. Bela (1abcd): a. Ard, Naaman, Nu 26^{40}.

b. Ezbon, Uzzi, Uzziel, Jerimoth, Iri (3), 1 Ch 7^{7}.

c. Addar, Gera, Abihud, Abishua, Naaman, Ahoah, Gera, Shephuham, Huram, 1 Ch $8^{1f.}$.

The list (2b) appears to be entirely independent of the others. The list (2c) corresponds closely with the restored text of Gn 46^{21} (see above), since Addar (אַדָּר) = Ard (אַרְדָּ); Gera and Abihud probably were originally one and the same person, i.e. Gera f. Ehud (cf. Jg 3^{15}); the second Gera is plainly a dittography; Huram (חוּרָם) probably = Huppim (חֻפִּים); and hence the only additional names are Abishua and Ahoah (אֲחוֹחַ); and the latter may be a variation or corruption of Ahiram (אֲחִירָם) or Aharah (אַחֲרַח), repeated in transcription from the previous generation (1d).

3. Iri (2b): Shuppim, Huppim, 1 Ch 7^{12}.

In the text the name is Ir (v.12). Shuppim and Huppim seem identical with Shephupham and Hupham, given elsewhere as ss. Benjamin (1b) and ss. Bela (2c). Nothing further than their appearance in the genealogical lists is known of these individuals or families. In the text v.12 appears like an appendix (see also (6) below).

4. Becher (1ac): Zemirah, Joash, Eliezer, Elioenai, Omri, Jeremoth, Abijah, Anathoth, Alemeth, 1 Ch 7^{8}.

The names of these ss. Becher (4), Joash, Eliezer, Elioenai, Omri, Jeremoth, and Abijah occur frequently in the OT; Jeremoth again as a Benjaminite in 1 Ch 77 8-4. Anathoth and Alemeth are names of Benjaminite towns (see arts.). Zemirah occurs only in this connexion.

5. Jediael (1c): Bilhan, Jeush, Benjamin, Ehud, Chenaanah, Zethan, Tarshish, Ahishahar, 1 Ch 7^{10}.

This list (5) is striking in having Benjamin as a subordinate family or personal name, and likewise, in this connexion, Ehud, elsewhere s. Gera (cf. Jg 3^{15}). Bilhan and Jeush are also Edomite names (Gn $36^{5.\ 14.\ 18.\ 27}$), and Jeush, moreover, that of a Levite or Levitical family (1 Ch $23^{10c.}$), and of a son of Rehoboam (2 Ch 11^{19}), and again of a Benjaminite (1 Ch 8^{39}). (For refs. on Jeush as an Arab. name of a deity, see Gesenius-Buhl). Chenaanah (כְּנַעֲנָה) suggests the incorporation of a Can. family with the Benjaminites (Be.). In 1 K 22^{24} it is the name of the f. Zedekiah the false prophet. Zethan and Ahishahar are found only here. The latter, however, perhaps appears in the cuneiform inscriptions as the name of a king of Minnai (see Gesen.-Buhl). Tarshish, besides being the name of the well-known city, stands elsewhere for a precious stone, derived from Tarshish (Ex 28^{20} 39^{13} et al., RV 'beryl'), and is the name of a Persian prince (Est 1^{14}).

These Belaites, Becherites, and Jediaelites (2b) (4) (5) are all called heads of fathers' houses and mighty men of valour, but there is no indication of the period of Israel's pre-ex. history to which they were intended to be assigned (1 Ch 7^{7-11}).

6. Aher: Hushim, 1 Ch 7^{12b}.

This genealogical fragment is enigmatical. Hushim (חֻשִׁים) in Gn 46^{23} is a s. Dan. There Dan also stands between Benjamin and Naphtali. The Chronicler has given no genealogy of Dan unless it is found here, between the genealogy of Benjamin, vv.6-11, and that of Naphtali, v.13. Hence Dan has been found hidden in Aher (אַחֵר, 'another'), which occurs nowhere else as a proper name. The tribe of Dan was believed thus to have been indicated, owing to its opprobrium on account of its idolatry (Jg 18). Its name does not appear with the other tribes in 1 Ch 6^{54-81}. Cf. also its omission in Rev 7^{5-8}. (The name Dan, however, does appear in 1 Ch 2^{2} 12^{35} 27^{22}, and the genealogy of Zebulun is missing in 1 Ch as well as that of Dan). If the above hypothesis is accepted, the remainder of v.12 may be a gloss, Shuppim and Huppim suggested by their similarity to Hushim as the ss. of Benjamin intended (Dan not being recognized in Aher, and these ss. being missed in the preceding vv.). Ir (עִיר), then, from the influence of v.7, may have been later developed out of Ard (אַרְדָּ), which follows Muppim and Huppim in Gn 46^{21} (see 1a) (Be.).

If, however, as we have assumed, Hushim is a Benjam. family or individual, Aher may be identical with Ahiram (1b) (RVm) or with the Benjaminite Shaharaim (8) (שַׁחֲרַיִם), who had a wife Hushim (1 Ch $8^{8.\ 11}$).

7. Ehud: Uzza, Ahihud, 1 Ch $8^{6f.}$.

The verses from which (7) is taken are difficult of interpretation. Probably the text is corrupt (see Comm. in loco). The connexion of Ehud (אֲחִוּד) with the sons of Benjamin is not given. It is likely, however, that ח = ה, and that reference here also is to clan Ehud (אֲהִוּד), s. Gera or s. Jediael, cf. (5). The ss. Ehud (possibly not those given above, but those whose names have fallen out of the text) were heads of families of the inhabitants of Geba (v.6) (see note on 23).

8. Shaharaim: (m. Hodesh) Jobab, Zibia, Mesha, Malcam, Jeuz, Shachia, Mirmah, (m. Hushim) Abitub, Elpaal (9) (13?), 1 Ch 8^{8-10}.

The connexion of Shaharaim with any of the ss. Benjamin is also not given. He is said to have begotten children in the field of Moab after he had sent away two wives, Hushim and Baara (v.8). These allusions are entirely obscure. The sons whose m. was Hodesh are said to have been heads of families. Their residence is not given, unless by implication it is the country of Moab.

9. Elpaal (8): Eber, Misham, Shemed,* 1 Ch 8^{12}.

To Shemed is attributed the building, evidently the rebuilding, of Lod and Ono, for these cities were very ancient, appearing prob. in the list of the places conquered by Tahutmes III. (RP (New Series), vol. v. pp. 25–53).

10. —— Beriah (11), Shema (12), Ahio? Elpaal? (13), Shashak (14), Jeremoth (15), 1 Ch $8^{13f.}$.

The connexion of these Benjaminites, as in the cases of (7) and (8), with ss. Benjamin is not given. Their brotherhood is obtained by reading in v.14, after the analogy of the LXX, אָחִיו 'his brother' (Kau.), or אֲחֵיהֶם 'their brothers' (Ki.), instead of אֲחִיּוֹ Ahio, a proper name (a reading certainly to be rejected), and by adding the name Elpaal required by v.19 (Kau. Ki.). Whether for Jeremoth (יְרִמוֹת) we should read Jeroham (יְרֹחָם), after v.27, or there substitute Jeremoth, it is impossible to determine. Both names clearly refer to one person; also Shema (שֶׁבַע) (v.13) and (שִׁמְעִי) (v.21).

Beriah and Shema are called 'heads of fathers' houses of Aijalon who put to flight the inhabitants of Gath,' v.13. This flight is otherwise unknown, although it has been connected with the slaughter of the ss. Ephraim (1 Ch 7^{21}), and Beriah has been identified with Beriah s. Ephraim (1 Ch 7^{23}, cf. note on VII[b]. 4). Nothing further is stated concerning these five reputed founders of the families mentioned below.

11. Beriah (10): Zebadiah, Arad, Eder, Michael, Ishpah, Joha, 1 Ch $8^{15f.}$.

12. Shimei (Shema) (10): Jakim, Zichri, Zabdi, Elienai, Zillethai, Eliel, Adaiah, Beraiah, Shimrath, 1 Ch 8^{19-21}.

13. Elpaal (10): Zebadiah, Meshullam, Hizki, Heber, Ishmerai, Izliah, Jobab, 1 Ch $8^{17f.}$.

14. Shashak (10): Ishpan, Eber, Eliel, Abdon, Zichri, Hanan, Hananiah, Elam, Anthothijah. Iphdeiah, Penuel, 1 Ch 8^{22-25}.

15. Jeroham (Jeremoth) (10): Shamsherai, Sheharaiah, Athaliah, Jaareshiah, Elijah, Zichri, 1 Ch $8^{26f.}$.

These lists (11)–(15) represent five clans or families of post-exilic Jerus. (see note below on 23), each member mentioned 'the head of a father's house, a chief man' (1 Ch 8^{28}). Nothing further is known of them, although some of their names, representing other persons, occur elsewhere in the OT. Be. identifies Elpaal (13) with the Elpaal (9), and Eber (עֵבֶר), Misham (מִשְׁעָם), and Shemed (שְׁמֶד) (9), with Heber (חֶבֶר), Meshullam (מְשֻׁלָּם), and Ishmerai (יִשְׁמְרַי) (13).

16. Jeiel: (m. Maacah) Abdon, Zur, Kish (17), Baal, Ner (23), Nadab, Gedor, Ahio, Zechariah,† Mikloth (24), 1 Ch 8^{29-31} 9^{35-37}.

17. Kish (16): Saul, Jonathan (18), Malchi-shua, Abinadab, Eshbaal, 1 Ch 8^{33} 9^{39}.

18. Jonathan (17): Merib-baal, Micah, Pithon, Melech, Tahrea,‡ Ahaz (19), 1 Ch 8^{34} 9^{40}.

22. Eshek (20): Ulam, Jeush, Eliphelet, 1 Ch 8^{39}.

23. Ner (16): Abner?, 1 Ch 8^{33} 9^{39}.

24. Mikloth (16): Shimeam,* 8^{32} 9^{38}.

This genealogy of the house of Saul (16)–(23) is given twice, the original texts being in each case the same (1 Ch 8^{29-38} and 9^{35-44}). While the latter passage is perhaps in the better state of preservation, and has been mainly followed above, both have suffered some corruption. In v.39 Abner has clearly fallen out of the text and should be restored, cf. (23) (Kau. Ki.). In v.41 Ahaz should be added to the ss. Micah, as in 8^{35}. In v.44 instead of Bocheru (בְּכֹרוֹ) we should read 'his firstborn' (בְּכֹרוֹ); another name must be supplied to complete the six sons of Azel (21). In (16) the f. Kish and Ner is Jeiel f. Gibeon. This differs from 1 S 9^{1} 14^{51}, where Abiel is f. Kish and Ner. The motive for the introduction of this genealogy clearly arose from the fact that at the time of the Chronicler certain Jewish families claimed descent from Saul. The genealogy furnishes a line of 15 generations. Allowing 12 from the founding of Solomon's temple to that of Zerubbabel (see note on III. 12), these descendants belonged to near the time of Ezra and Nehemiah.

Looking at these lists (7)–(24) as a whole, they evidently were based upon post-ex. conditions, for the following reasons:—(a) The places of residence (not mentioning Jerus.) are towns recurring in the post-ex. history,—Geba (v.6), cf. Ezr 2^{26}; Lod and Ono (v.12), cf. Ezr 2^{33}; Gibeon (v.29), cf. Neh 7^{25}. (b) Many of the names belong also to that period, viz.: Meshullam (13[1]), Hanan, Elam, Hananiah, Anthothijah (Anathoth) (14), cf. Neh $10^{10.\ 14.\ 19.\ 20.\ 23.\ 26}$. (c) The coincidence between the residence in or connexion with Moab (v.8) and the name Pahath-moab representing an important family among the post-ex. Jews (Ezr 2^{6} 8^{4} etc.). (Be. conjectures that the birth of this Pahath-moab, 'prince of Moab,' is referred to in v.8). (d) The Benjaminites had a considerable part in the post-ex. community along with the children of Judah and the Levites. (e) The close union between 1 Ch 8 and 9, which latter from its identity with Neh 11 is recognized at once as describing post-ex. conditions.

25. —— Jeshaiah, Ithiel, Maaseiah, Kolaiah, Pedaiah, Joed, Meshullam, Sallu, Neh 11^{7}, cf. 1 Ch 9^{7}.

Sallu represents a post-ex. family of Jerus. (see ref.). In 1 Ch 97 the descent is, Sallu s. Meshullam, s. Hodaviah, s. Hassenuah.

IX. 1. Dan: Hushim,† Gn 46^{23}, Nu 26^{42}.

Only one clan is recorded as having belonged to Dan. The difference of name in Gn and Nu has arisen from the transposition of letters, Hushim (חֻשִׁים), Shuham (שׁוּחָם). Dan is passed over by the Chronicler, unless a reference to the tribe is concealed in 1 Ch 7^{12}; cf. VIII. 6, above. Nothing more than the genealogical record is known of Hushim. On a single son or clan representing the tribe, see Dan.

X. 1. Naphtali: Jahzeel,‡ Guni, Jezer, Shillem,¶ Gn 46^{24}, Nu $26^{48f.}$, 1 Ch 7^{13}.

These ss. or clans of Naphtali are not mentioned in any other connexion in OT, neither do their names occur elsewhere, except that of Guni, which is also the name of a Gadite (XI. 4). No further descendants of Naphtali are given.

XI. 1. Gad: Ziphion,§ Haggi, Shuni, Ezbon,§ Eri, Arodi,§ Areli, Gn 46^{16}, Nu 26^{15-17}.

2. —— Joel, Shapham, Janai, Shaphat, 1 Ch 5^{12}.

3. —— Buz, Jahdo, Jeshishai, Michael, Gilead, Jaroah, Huri, Abihail, Michael, Meshullam, Sheba, Jorai, Jacan, Zia, Eber, 1 Ch $5^{13f.}$.

4. —— Guni, Abdiel, Ahi, 1 Ch 5^{15}.

Joel, Shapham, Janai, Shaphat (2), Michael, Meshullam, Sheba, Jorai, Jacan, Zia, Eber (3), all represent families of the tribe of Gad, registered according to the Chronicler in the days of Jotham king of Judah, and Jeroboam king of Israel (1 Ch 5^{17}). Their connexion with any of the ss. Gad (1) is not given. Indeed, those clans are not mentioned in 1 Ch. Ahi (4) is given as 'chief of their fathers' houses.' We know of nothing further of value that can be said respecting this genealogy.

XII. 1. Asher: Imnah, Ishvah,‖ Ishvi,‖ Beriah (2), d. Serah, Gn 46^{17}, Nu 26^{44}, 1 Ch 7^{30}.

2. Beriah (1): Heber (3), Malchiel f. Birzaith,¶ Gn 46^{17}, Nu 26^{45}, 1 Ch 7^{31}.

3. Heber (2): Japhlet (4), Shomer (5), Hotham (6), d. Shua, 1 Ch 7^{32}.

4. Japhlet (3): Pasach, Bimhal, Ashvath, 1 Ch 7^{33}.

* Shimeah, 1 Ch 8^{32}. † Shuham, Nu 26^{42}.

§ Zephon, Ozni, Arod, Nu $26^{15ff.}$.
‖ The two names Ishvah (יִשְׁוָה) and Ishvi (יִשְׁוִי) prob. represent a dittography. Nu 26^{44} omits the former.
¶ F. Birzaith only in 1 Ch 7^{31}.
 Shemer (v.34), preferred by Ki. The two names represent the same person.

5. Shomer (3): Ahi, Rohgah, Jehubbah,* Aram, 1 Ch 7[34].

6. Helem (Hotham)† (3): Zophah, Imna, Shelesh, Amal, 1 Ch 7[35].

7. Zophah (6): Suah, Harnepher, Shual, Beri, Imrah, Bezer, Hod, Shamma, Shilshah, Ithran (8), Beera, 1 Ch 7[36f.].

8. Jether (Ithran) † (7): Jephunneh, Pispah, Ara, 1 Ch 7[38].

9. Ulla (——?)†: Ara, Hanniel, Rizia, 1 Ch 7[39].

Nothing further than their registration is known of these clans and families of Asher. Ishvah, Serah (1), Malchiel, Birzaith (2), Japhlet, Shua (3), Pasach, Bimhal, Ashvath (4), Rohgah, Hubbah (5), Zophah, Imnah, Shelesh, Amal (6), Suah, Harnepher, Beri, Imrah, Hod, Shilshah, Beera (7), Pispah, Ara (8), Ulla, and Rizia occur as prop. names only in this connexion. The occurrence of the others elsewhere throws no light upon their appearance here. It is an interesting fact that the names of the two clans Heber (Habiri) and Malchiel (2) appear also together in the Amarna tablets, representing, it may be, clans of the ancient seat of Asher (see Journ. of Bib. Lit. vol. xi. 1892, p. 12[0]). Birzaith (2) is probably the name of a place (בִּרְזַיִת = בְּאֵרוֹת, i.e. 'Olive-well'). Local names may be seen also in Harnepher, Bezer, Beera (7), and perhaps some other names (Be.).

XIII. ‡ 1. David's Recruits at Ziklag.

(a) Of Benjamin: Ahiezer and Joash ss. Shemaah the Gibeathite; Jeziel and Pelet ss. Azmaveth, Beracah, Jehu the Anathothite; Ishmaiah the Gibeonite, Jeremiah, Jahaziel, Johanan, Jozabad the Gederathite, Eluzai, Jerimoth, Bealiah, Shemariah, Shephatiah the Haruphite; Elkanah, Isshiah, Azarel, Joezer, Jashobeam Korahites; Joelah and Zebadiah ss. Jeroham of Gedor, 1 Ch 12[3-7].

In the text these are given as Benjaminites. It seems not improbable, however, that the Chronicler may have fused some Judæans among them, since the Korahites can hardly be others than warriors from the Judæan city or family Korah (1 Ch 2[43]). Gedor and Gederah are likewise found among Judæan towns (Jos 15[36. 58], 1 Ch 4[39]). In v.[16], evidently misplaced, it says, 'and there came of the children of Benjamin and Judah to the hold unto David.'

(c) Of Manasseh: Adnah, Jozabad, Jediael, Michael, Jozabad, Elihu, Zillethai, 1 Ch 12[20].

All of these recruits are mentioned as mighty men of valour. Those of Gad are said to have had faces like the faces of lions, and to have been as swift as the roes upon the mountains (1 Ch 12[8]).

2. David's Mighty Men.

2 S 23[8-39].	1 Ch 11[11-47].
8. Josheb-basshebeth a Tahchemonite.	11. Jashobeam s. a Hachmonite.

29. Heleb s. Baanah the Netophahite. Ittai s. Ribai of Gibeah.	31. Ithai.
30. Benaiah a Pirathonite. Hiddai of the brooks of Gaash.	32. Hurai.
31. Abi-albon the Arbathite. Azmaveth the Barhumite.	33. Abiel.
32. Eliahba the Shaalbonite. Ss. Jashen, Jonathan.	34. Ss. Hashem the Gizonite. Jonathan s. Shage the Hararite.
33. Shammah the Hararite. Ahiam s. Sharar the Ararite.	s. Sacar.
34. Eliphelet s. Ahasbai s. the Maacathite. Eliam s. Ahithophel the Gilonite.	35. Eliphal s. Ur.
35. Hezro the Carmelite. Paarai the Arbite.	36. Hepher the Mecherathite. Ahijah the Pelonite.
36. Igal s. Nathan of Zobah. Bani the Gadite.	37. Naarai s. Ezbai.
37. Zelek the Ammonite. Naharai the Beerothite.	38. Joel the brother of Nathan. Mibhar s. Hagri.
38. Ira the Ithrite. Gareb the Ithrite.	39.
39. Uriah the Hittite.	40.
	41. Zabad s. Ahlai. Adina s. Shiza the Reubenite.
	43. Hanan s. Maacah. Jehoshaphat the Mithnite.
	44. Uzzia the Ashterathite. Shama and Jeiel ss. Hotham the Aroerite.
	45. Jediael s. Shimri. Joha his brother, the Tizite.
	46. Eliel the Mahavite, Jeribai and Joshaviah ss. Elnaam. Ithmah the Moabite.
	47. Eliel, Obed, and Jaasiel the Mezobaite.

The first twelve mighty men, as recorded in 1 Ch 11, appear again also in 1 Ch 27[1-15] as captains, each in course, month by month, commanding a monthly levy of 24,000 soldiers, beginning in the first month with Jashobeam, who is called s. Zabdiel, and reckoned as belonging to ss. Perez (IV. 1). The captain of the second month is Dodai, 'Eleazar s.' evidently having fallen from the text. With him is mentioned Mikloth as ruler. With Benaiah was associated Ammizabad his son; with Asahel, Zebadiah his son. Shammoth appears as Shamhuth and an Izrahite. Helez is called of Ephraim; Sibbecai, of the Zerahites (IV. 1); also Maharai; Benaiah, the eleventh captain, a Pirathonite of Ephraim; Heled appears as Heldai (1 Ch 27[15]), and of Othniel (IV. 46).

The names Zabad to Asiel (1 Ch 11[41b-47]) do not appear in 2 S, and were evidently derived from another source. A comparison of the two lists shows that the names vary in several instances, but it is frequently impossible to determine which form is original, or whether both may not be corrupt. The following observations are confined mainly to the variations which appear in 1 Ch, since the names of the list of 2 S are treated elsewhere (see arts.).

Notes on vv.[11-47]: 11. Jashobeam (s. Zabdiel, 1 Ch 27[2]) (יָשָׁבְעָם) was originally Jishbaal (יִשְׁבַּעַל) or Ishbaal (אִישְׁבַּעַל) (Ki. et al.). The reference in Hachmonite is not known. 12. Dodai (דּוֹדַי) of 2 S is to be preferred to Dodo (דּוֹדוֹ), cf. 1 Ch 27[4]. Ahohite may be a patronymic of the family or clan Ahoah of Benjamin (VIII. 2[e]). 27. For Shammoth (שַׁמּוֹת) Ki. reads Shamhuth (שַׁמְהוּת), after LXX and 1 Ch 27[8]. Harodite (חֲרֹדִי) is preferable to Harorite (חֲרוֹרִי), and the reference may be to Harod (Jg 7[1]), (see HAROD). In 1 Ch 27[8] he is called an Izrahite (יִזְרָחִי), but the true reading prob. is Zarhite (זַרְחִי), i.e. of ss. Zerah (IV. 1). Instead of Pelonite (פְּלֹנִי) read Paltite (פַּלְטִי) (2 S) (Ges. Lex.[12] Buhl, Ki.), and the reference then, acc. to Driver (Text of Sam. p. 283), is to Beth-pelet in S. Judah (Jos 15[27]); but acc. to 1 Ch 2[710] Helez belonged to Ephraim. 28. Sibbecai is generally acknowledged to be the true reading. 29. Ki. combines, on the support of LXX, the readings of 2 S and 1 Ch, and obtains Aliman (עַלְיְמָן). 30. 31. Heled or Heldai (1 Ch 27[15]) is probably correct, and Ithai is equally as defensible as Ittai of 2 S. 32. Ki. emends Hurai to Hiddai, but Budde (Crit. Text, 1 and 2 S) in 2 S emends Hiddai to Hurai. Abiel is probably correct. 33. For Baharumite (בַּחֲרוּמִי) read Bahurimite (בַּחוּרִימִי), i.e. of Bahurim (wh. see). 34. The corresponding text of 2 S is clearly defective. Probably we should read Jashen the Gunite, Jonathan s. Shammah the Hararite (Ki. Driver, Budde). On Gunite see XI. 1. The reference in Hararite is not known. 35 f. Sharar and Eliphelet (2 S) are probably correct (Ki.). Ur and Hepher probably have arisen from the name of the f. Eliphelet. Ahasbai (2 S) is suspicious (Driv.). For Mecherathite (מְכֵרָתִי) read Maacathite (מַעֲכָתִי), and follow 2 S (v.[34b]) for [36b]. 37. Which of the two readings is to be preferred cannot be determined. 38. The choice here seems to be in favour of 2 S. Joel, however, might stand. Mibhar (מִבְחָר) has arisen apparently from 'of Zobah' (מִצֹּבָה). 44. Ashterathite = from Ashteroth, a city of Bashan, cf. 1 Ch 6[71]. 46. Mahavite (מַחֲוִים) is suspicious. Be. reads Mahanaimite, i.e. of Mahanaim (מַחֲנַיְמִי) (Ges. Lex.[12] Buhl). 47. A corruption also underlies Mezobaite (מִצֹּבָיָה).

* Jehubbah (יְחֻבָּה) = and Hubbah (וְחֻבָּה).

† Helem (הֵלֶם) clearly = Hotham (הוֹתָם); Jether (יֶתֶר) = Ithran (יִתְרָן); and Ulla (עֻלָּא) probably is a corruption of one of the previous names, perhaps Shual (שׁוּעָל) (7) or Beera (בְּאֵרָא) (7).

‡ Under XIII. have been grouped, for the sake of reference, certain lists of names found chiefly in 1 and 2 Ch.

3. David's Officers over the Twelve Tribes of Israel—

Of Reuben, Eliezer s. Zichri.
,, Simeon, Shephatiah s. Maacah.
,, Levi, Hashabiah s. Kemuel.
,, Aaron, Zadok.
,, Judah, Elihu * brother of David.
,, Issachar, Omri s. Michael.
,, Zebulun, Ishmaiah s. Obadiah.
,, Naphtali, Jeremoth s. Azriel.
,, Ephraim, Hoshea s. Azaziah.
,, W. Manasseh, Joel s. Pedaiah.
,, E. Manasseh, Iddo s. Zechariah.
,, Benjamin, Jaasiel s. Abner.
,, Dan, Azarel s. Jeroham, 1 Ch 27[16-22].

4. Rulers of David's substance—

Azmaveth s. Adiel, over the king's treasuries.
Jonathan s. Uzziah, over treasuries in cities, castles, villages, and fields.
Ezri s. Chelub, over tillers of the ground.
Shimei the Ramathite, over the vineyards.
Zabdi the Shiphmite, over wine cellars.
Baal-hanan the Gederite, over olive and sycomore trees.
Joash, over cellars of oil.
Shitrai the Sharonite, over herds in Sharon.
Shaphat s. Adlai, over herds in the valleys.
Obil the Ishmaelite, over camels.
Jehdeiah the Meronothite, over asses.
Jaziz the Hagrite, over the flocks, 1 Ch 27[25-31].

On Chelub, v.[26], see IV. 44 note. Shiphmite occurs only here, and cannot be more closely defined. Meronothite refers to Meronoth, a place which seems to have been in the neighbourhood of Gibeon and Mizpah, cf. Neh 3[7]. By a Hagrite we understand a descendant of Hagar or an Arabian tribe (cf. 1 Ch 5[10. 19f.]). On the other appellatives see arts.

5. Princes under Jehoshaphat appointed to teach the Law.—Ben-hail, Obadiah, Zechariah, Nethanel, Micaiah, 2 Ch 17[7].

6. Captains under Jehoshaphat.—Adnah, Jehohanan, Amasiah s. Zichri, Eliada, Jehozabad, 2 Ch 17[14-18].

The first three of these captains were of Judah, the other two of Benjamin. Each is said to have commanded from 180,000 men (Eliada) to 300,000 (Adnah).

7. Captains under the priest Jehoiada.—Azariah s. Jeroham, Ishmael s. Jehohanan, Azariah s. Obed, Maaseiah s. Adaiah, Elishaphat s. Zichri, 2 Ch 23[1].

These were associated with Jehoiada in the overthrow of Athaliah and enthronement of Joash. See ATHALIAH, JEHOIADA, JOASH.

8. Heads of ss. Ephraim.—Azariah s. Johanan, Berechiah s. Meshillemoth, Jehizkiah s. Shallum, Amasa s. Hadlai, 2 Ch 28[12].

These are mentioned as opposing, in the reign of Pekah, the bringing of Judæan captives to Samaria, and are said to have clothed and fed the captives, and then sent them home (2 Ch 28[12-15]).

2. Eliezer, Ariel, Shemaiah, Elnathan, Jarib, Elnathan, Nathan, Zechariah, Meshullam (chief men); Joiarib, Elnathan (teachers), Ezr 8^{16}.

These chief men and teachers (2), apparently of the company, were sent by Ezra from the encampment near Babylon (see Ahava) unto Iddo, the chief of a colony of Levites at Casiphia (wh. see), to secure Levites and Nethinim to accompany them to Jerus. for service in the temple. They secured Ishsechel (RVm) and Sherebiah of ss. Mahli, with 18 sons and brethren, and Hashabiah and Jeshaiah ss. Merari, with 20 sons and brethren, and 220 Nethinim. Unto Sherebiah and Hashabiah and ten brethren along with 12 chiefs of the priests, was given the care of the offerings of silver, gold, and brass which were being taken to Jerusalem. On the arrival these gifts of bullion and vessels were delivered unto Meremoth s. Uriah the priest, and Eleazar s. Phineas, Jozabad s. Jeshua, and Noadiah s. Binnui, Levites, Ezr 8$^{15-35}$.

XVIII. THE SIGNERS OF THE COVENANT.

Neh 10[1-27].

1. The Governor:—Nehemiah s. Hacaliah.

2. Priests (vv.[2-7]):—Zedekiah, Seraiah, Azariah, Jeremiah, Pashhur, Amariah, Malchijah, Hattush, Shebaniah, Malluch, Harim, Meremoth, Obadiah, Daniel, Ginnethon, Baruch, Meshullam, Abijah, Mijamin, Maaziah, Bilgai, Shemaiah.

3. Levites (vv.[9-13]):—Jeshua s. Azaniah, Binnui of the ss. Henadad, Kadmiel; Shebaniah, Hodiah, Kelita, Pelaiah, Hanan, Mica, Rehob, Hashabiah, Zaccur, Sherebiah, Shebaniah, Hodiah, Bani, Beninu.

4. Chiefs of the People (vv.[14-23]):—Parosh, Pahath-moab, Elam, Zattu, Bani, Bunni, Azgad, Bebai, Adonijah, Bigvai, Adin, Ater, Hezekiah, Azzur, Hodiah, Hashum, Bezai, Hariph, Anathoth, Nobai, Magpiash, Meshullam, Hezir, Meshezabel, Zadok, Jaddua, Pelatiah, Hanan, Anaiah, Hoshea, Hananiah, Hasshub, Hallohesh, Pilha, Shobek, Rehum, Hashabnah, Maaseiah, and Ahiah, Hanan, Anan, Malluch, Harim, Baanah.

XIX. PRIESTS, LEVITES, AND PORTERS.

1. Priests who returned with Zerubbabel and Jeshua:—Seraiah, Jeremiah, Ezra, Amariah, Malluch, Hattush, Shecaniah, Rehum, Meremoth, Iddo, Ginnethoi, Abijah, Mijamin, Maadiah, Bilgah, Shemaiah, Joiarib, Jedaiah, Sallu, Amok, Hilkiah, Jedaiah, Neh 12[1-7].

2. Levites:—Jeshua, Binnui, Kadmiel, Sherebiah, Judah, Mattaniah, Bakbukiah, Unno, Neh 12[8. 9].

3. Priests and Priestly Houses in the days of Joiakim s. Jeshua:—Of Seraiah, Meraiah; of Jeremiah, Hananiah; of Ezra, Meshullam; of Amariah, Jehohanan; of Malluchi, Jonathan; of Shebaniah, Joseph; of Harim, Adna; of Meraioth, Helkai; of Iddo, Zechariah; of Ginnethon, Meshullam; of Abijah, Zichri; of Miniamin, —— ; of Moadiah, Piltai; of Bilgah, Shammua; of Shemaiah, Jehonathan; of Joiarib, Mattenai; of Jedaiah, Uzzi; of Sallai, Kallai; of Amok, Eber; of Hilkiah, Hashabiah; of Jedaiah, Nethanel, Neh 12[12-21].

4. Chief Levites:—Hashabiah, Sherebiah, Jeshua s. Kadmiel, Neh 12[24].

5. Porters:—Mattaniah, Bakbukiah, Obadiah, Meshullam, Talmon, Akkub, Neh 12[25].

These 'chief Levites' (4) who were over the service of song (ref.) and the 'porters' (5) belonged also to the time of Joiakim (Neh 12[26]).

XX. 1. Priests and Levites, Participants in the Promulgation of the Law.

a. Mattithiah, Shema, Anaiah, Uriah, Hilkiah, Maaseiah, Pedaiah, Mishael, Malchijah, Hashum, Hashbaddanah, Zechariah, Meshullam, Neh 8[4].

b. Jeshua, Bani, Sherebiah, Jamin, Akkub, Shabbethai, Hodiah, Maaseiah, Kelita, Azariah, Jozabad, Hanan, Pelaiah, Neh 8[7].

c. Jeshua, Bani, Kadmiel, Shebaniah, Bunni, Sherebiah, Bani, Chenani, Jeshua, Kadmiel, Bani, Hashabneiah, Sherebiah, Hodiah, Shebaniah, Pethahiah, Neh 9[4f.].

List a stood at the right and left of Ezra upon the platform; list b read and explained the law; list c gave responses on the fast-day in connexion with the reading of the law (see ref.).

2. Princes, Priests, and Levites, Participants in the Dedication of the Wall.

a. Hoshaiah, Azariah, Ezra, Meshullam, Judah, Benjamin, Shemaiah, Jeremiah, Neh 12[32-34].

b. Zechariah (see III. 4), Shemaiah, Azarel, Milalai, Gilalai, Maai, Nethanel, Judah, Hanani, Neh 12[35f.].

c. Eliakim, Maaseiah, Miniamin, Micaiah, Elioenai, Zechariah, Hananiah, Neh 12[41].

d. Maaseiah, Shemaiah, Eleazar, Uzzi, Jehohanan, Malchijah, Elam, Ezer, Jezrahiah, Neh 12[42f.].

All the names under a have been taken as those of princes of Judah (Crosby, Lange, Comm., Eng. ed. in loco). Probably, however, only Hoshaiah was a prince of J., and Judah and Benjamin represent members of those tribes, and the other names different classes of priests (Oe. in loco). The names under b are those of Levitical musicians, and under c and d of priestly musicians (see ref.).

XXI. Residents of Jerusalem, Neh 11[4-19], 1 Ch 9[3-17]. (The names are those of Neh; for variations, see ref.).

1. Of Judah—
   Athaiah * (see IV. 58[b]).

   Joiarib.
   Jachin.
   Seraiah (see III. 14).
   Adaiah (see III. 16).
   Amashsai (see III. 17).
   Zabdiel * s. Haggedolim (the overseer).
4. Levites—
   Shemaiah s. Hasshub, s. Azrikam, s. Hashabiah, s. Bunni * of ss. Merari.†
   Shabbethai.
   Jozabad.
   Bakbakkar.†
   Heresh.†
   Galal.†
   Mattaniah (see III. 5).
   Bakbukiah.
   Abda § s. Shammua,§ s. Galal, s. Jeduthun.
   Berechiah † s. Asa, s. Elkanah.
   Uzzi, Neh 11[22] (see III. 5).
5. The Porters—
   Shallum (see III. 24).
   Akkub.
   Talmon.
   Ahiman.

In connexion with these residents of Jerus., Pethahiah s. Meshezabel of ss. Zerah is mentioned as being 'at the king's hand,' i.e. agent of the Persian king, in all matters concerning the people, Neh 11[24].

GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST.—The only genealogies of the NT are those of Mt 1[1-17] and Lk 3[23-38], two independent pedigrees, each purporting to give the descent of Joseph, reputed father of Jesus. The occasion of their insertion is the desire of the evangelists to set forth Jesus as actual heir-apparent to the throne of David. The attempt to vindicate their simultaneous accuracy by harmonistic devices has been abandoned by nearly all writers of authority as a violation of the text, or of historical credibility. Hence the light which modern research seeks from them falls rather on the century after than the centuries before the birth of Christ—on the history of the doctrine of his Davidic sonship rather than His actual descent.

i. Treatment of the Question by Jesus and the Apostles.—If the progress of critical and exegetical science has shown, on the one side, the futility of all harmonistic theories for rescuing the authority of the pedigrees, it has more than compensated for the loss by establishing with equal certainty the acceptance of the fact of the Davidic descent of Jesus by Himself, His contemporaries, and His immediate followers. That Davidic descent was then considered a prerequisite to the establishment of Messianic claims is apparent from a number of NT passages. The use of the title 'Son of David' in Mt 15^{22} $20^{30.31}$ (=9^{27}) 21^{9} and parallels is official, implying no knowledge of Jesus' birth or descent, but only the conviction that He is the Messiah. It indicates, however, that Davidic descent was popularly assumed as an attribute of the Christ. This is much more distinctly implied in Mt 12^{23}, and by the question put by Jesus to His Pharisaic opponents in the temple, Mt 22^{41-46} 'What think ye of Christ? whose son is he?' Such a question by one whose claims to Davidic descent were open to suspicion would have put a weapon in the hands of His foes. Jesus, on the contrary, is not merely confident that they will answer 'David's son,' but is at least equally confident of their inability to disprove His Davidic descent, though He refuses to base His claims upon it. The same tacit assumption of this as an undisputed fact characterizes the rare allusions of St. Paul, Ro 1^{3}, 2 Ti 2^{8} (cf. He 7^{14}), the ascriptions of Rev 3^{7} 5^{5} 22^{16}, and, finally, the distinct appeal to prophecy of Ac 2^{30} 13^{23}. The last two passages, as emanating from the same source as one of the pedigrees, and the passages Mt 2^{5}, Lk 2^{4}, where Bethlehem as the birthplace of David is regarded as the necessary birthplace of the Messiah, should perhaps not be cited as independent witness to the existence of the popular assumption; but the great number of OT passages pointing to this, especially Ps 132^{11}, which cannot date more than a few centuries before NT times, and the Messianic petition of Ps.-Sol 17^{23}, written not more than 50 years B.C., 'Raise up unto them, O Lord, their king the Son of David,' should suffice to show that Messianic pretensions absolutely devoid of evidence of Davidic descent could not have passed unchallenged, as those of Jesus seem to have done.*

The continued existence in the family of Jesus of claims to Davidic descent, such as could hardly have originated in His own time, is evidenced by Hegesippus (ap. Eus. HE III. 20 and 32), who tells of repeated attempts to involve His collateral descendants in trouble with the Roman authorities on this account. But the suspicions of even a Domitian were disarmed when two grandsons of Jude, the Lord's brother, were brought before him, confessed their Davidic descent (explaining, however, that the kingdom of Christ was 'not temporal or earthly, but heavenly and angelic, to appear at the end of the world'), gave account of their property,—an undivided 39 acres of land, valued at 9000 denarii,—and showed their hands calloused by labour.

It is a fair inference from these facts that the Davidic descent of Jesus was in His own day practically undisputed, at least among His personal followers. What the evidence was on which this assumption rested, whether mere oral family tradition, or public records, and to what extent the basis was trustworthy, is a wholly different question, which can be settled only by the careful scrutiny of the sources.

ii. Treatment in the Ecclesiastical Period.—There can be no doubt that from near the beginning of the 2nd cent., when our first and third Gospels began to come into general circulation, the Church believed itself in possession of conclusive documentary evidence. Even the collateral descendants of the Lord, the so-called δεσπόσυνοι, to whom Julius Africanus, the contemporary of Origen, applied on this subject, had no other authority to appeal to than the genealogies of Mt and Lk, though they added an ancestress or two of doubtful historicity, and omitted the names Matthat and Levi, Lk 3^{24}. Had the two Gospels been in agreement, the record would perhaps never have been disputed, but the discrepancy was too glaring to be ignored. Even before the time of Africanus and Origen the incompatibility of the pedigrees (ἡ διαφωνία τῶν γενεαλογιῶν) had been an occasion of derision to many an earlier opponent of Christianity, whom Celsus, according to Origen (Opera, ed. Delarue, i. p. 413), might have named had he been better informed. It is no wonder, then, that from the earliest period to which it can be traced, down to recent times, the Church has treated this subject only defensively, and from the harmonistic standpoint.

The first known harmonist of the Gospels is Tatian, a pupil of Justin Martyr. His Diatessaron, however, avoided the difficulty by omitting the genealogies altogether. Half a century later the problem was courageously confronted by Africanus, a careful scholar, for many years bishop of Nicopolis (previously Emmaus) in Palestine. His Letter to Aristides (see Spitta, Der Brief des Jul. Africanus, Halle, 1877; Routh, Rel. Sac. ii. pp. 228–237; Ante-Nicene Fathers, vi. p. 125; and Eus. HE i. 7) proposed a solution of the difficulty which quickly gained general acceptance in the Church, and for 12 centuries retained undisputed supremacy. The theory was not derived, as Eusebius wrongly inferred, from the desposyni, but is expressly stated by Africanus himself (§ 5) to be 'unsupported by testimony.' It assumes a levirate marriage (Dt $25^{5.6}$) in the case of either Jacob or Heli, Joseph's father according to Mt and Lk respectively, the son of the widow by his surviving brother being reckoned a son of the deceased in one or the other genealogy. This explanation requires the further assumption that the brothers Heli and Jacob had different fathers. The objections are overwhelming.

1. The theory does not exonerate the evangelists, since one pedigree or the other uses terms of filial relationship in a fictitious and illegal sense. 2. Granting, against all probability, the possible continuance of the levirate law, in the case here presupposed—that of uterine brothers—it would not apply (Maimonides, Jabom Ve Chalitza, c. 1). 3. Granting even the applicability of the assumption in the case of Joseph, it cannot reasonably be introduced a second time to account for the fact that Shealtiel, f. of Zerubbabel, is at the same time s. of Jechonias (Mt) and of Neri (Lk). Yet this expedient (so W. H. Mill, Pantheistic Principles, p. 165) is less absurd than to assume, with Augustine (followed by Hottinger and Voss), that at the same period of Jewish history there were two (Hottinger three) different fathers of Davidic lineage, each bearing the rare name Shealtiel, and having each a son bearing the rare name Zerubbabel. 4. If our own certainly more accurate text* be followed, instead of that of Africanus, and Matthan and Matthat, paternal grandfather of Joseph according to Mt and Lk respectively, be identified, as is probable, the expedient of a levirate marriage by uterine brothers must be introduced, not twice only, but three times over.

Under the weight of such inherent and extreme improbabilities the Africanian theory of harmonization, after suffering various modifications at the hands of later harmonists, has long since broken down, and is to-day universally abandoned.

The alternative harmonistic theory owes its currency to Annius of Viterbo, c. A.D. 1490, and

* See WH, Gr. Test. App. p. 57.

* Even the passage Jn 7^{42} is no exception to the rule that the objection that He is not of Davidic descent is never raised in NT times to Jesus' Messianic claims. The speakers (at Jerus. according to 7^{37}) are strangers to Jesus (8^{48}), and merely infer, from His speech or otherwise, that He is a Galilæan. This is, indeed, contrary to their notion of Davidic origin, but the author presupposes the birth in Bethlehem.

was widely accepted in the time of the Reformation. It has still an adherent of high repute in the person of the veteran NT scholar B. Weiss, who in his Leben Jesu (i. 205, 2nd ed.) puts it in its most favourable light. It assumes that the pedigree of Lk is that, not of Joseph, but of Mary, overcoming the sense of Lk 3^{23} ὢν υἱός, ὡς ἐνομίζετο, Ἰωσὴφ τοῦ Ἡλεί, κ.τ.λ., by various expedients. Thus the clause was rendered 'being the son (as was supposed of Joseph) of Heli,' i.e. being supposed to be the son of Joseph, but being in reality the grandson of Heli; or the τοῦ was translated 'son-in-law' (so Holmes, 'Geneal. of Jesus Christ' in Kitto's Encycl.[3]; Robinson, Harmony of Gospels, pp. 183–185, et al.), or 'adopted son' (so Wetstein, Delitzsch, et al., following Augustine). Weiss (following F. Gomar, de Geneal. Christi; J. Lightfoot, Hor. Hebr. vol. iii. p. 54 [ed. Gandell]; G. J. Voss, de J. Chr. Geneal.; and Yardley, The Genealogies of Christ) proposes to regard the names as parallel, not consecutive. The list then would be, not a pedigree at all, but a huge parenthesis between ὢν υἱός (v.[23]) and τοῦ θεοῦ (v.[38]).

The chief objection to this theory in all its forms can hardly be more convincingly expressed than by citing the naïve admission of its advocate, Holmes (in the art. above mentioned, p. 96), of the fatal weakness of 'all theories,' meaning harmonistic theories: 'If it be objected that this table [Lk] is made out as literally as the other, in Joseph's name,* and that we violate the literal statement of the evangelist if we transfer the line to Mary, we answer, that as Joseph cannot have had two fathers, which yet the genealogies seem literally to assign to him (Mt 1^{16}, Lk 3^{23}), some explanatory accommodation is necessary to all theories.'

The confession of violence to the text is not without reason. It is incredible that υἱός can mean both 'son' and 'grandson' in the same breath, as in the first of the proposed renderings;† equally incredible that in the same connexion τοῦ should stand once for 'son-in-law' and the other 75 times for 'son'; while the suggestion that the genealogy is not intended for a genealogy, but merely a list of names of persons of whom Jesus might have been considered the son, though in reality the Son of God, will convince no candid thinker.

But the proposed theory labours under further difficulties. As Plummer well says (op. cit. p. 103): 'It would have been quite out of harmony with either Jewish or Gentile ideas to derive the birthright of Jesus from his mother. In the eye of the law Jesus was the heir of Joseph: and therefore it is Joseph's descent which is of importance.' This doubtless accounts for its general rejection by ancient writers. As early as Justin Martyr and Protevang. Jacobi, Mary, for obvious reasons, is represented as also descended from David; but with two exceptions no attempt is made to claim for her either of the pedigrees. Protev. Jac., in fact, makes her the daughter of Joachim and Anna. Irenæus (III. xxi. 5, 9) regards the pedigree of Mt as a line expressly excluded from the Messianic succession (Jer $22^{24\text{-}30}$ $36^{30.\ 31}$); but this is Joseph's. Jesus is the Son of David only through Mary, whose pedigree is given by Luke. Victorinus (c. 300) curiously inverts this theory by adopting as Mary's the genealogy of Mt.‡ Cod. D boldly cuts the knot by substituting in Lk $3^{24\text{-}31}$ the line of Mt, following, however, a text seemingly older than our Mt (see Resch, T. u. U. x. 5, pp. 182–201; and Graefe in SK, 1898, ½).

Confessed violence to the text which he assumes to vindicate is the suicide of the harmonist. Hence the only treatment which to-day can come into consideration is the critical.

iii. Treatment by Modern Criticism.—Reconciliation of discrepant sources by suppositions within the limits of loyalty to the text and to historical probability is, per contra, the first duty of rational criticism. It being admitted, therefore, that both genealogies are given as Joseph's, and that explanation by resort to the levirate law is impracticable, the theory presented by Lord A. C. Hervey (Genealogies of our Lord, and art. 'Geneal. of Jesus Christ' in Smith's DB[2]) has much in its favour, and is, in fact, the prevailing view among English divines. It is also widely accepted in modified form among German commentators. According to this view it was not the intention of both evangelists to give an actual pedigree, but only of Lk (Meyer, Holtzmann, et al., would say 'the source followed by Lk in his opening chs.'). Mt (better, 'the source from which our evangelist derived his genealogy') does not trace the order of actual descent, but only of throne-succession (so already Grotius). Thus Solomon, although not the true ancestor of Joseph, is mentioned first as heir of the throne of David; then Shealtiel for the same reason, though he was not actually son of Jechoniah, but of Neri (Lk 3^{27}); then Eliakim, and finally Jacob, though neither was a real ancestor of Joseph. By thus throwing all the burden of inaccuracy upon Mt we may rescue at least the possibility of accuracy for Lk.

In favour of this view it must be allowed that Mt's genealogy is extremely defective, since it omits the names Ahaziah, Joash, Amaziah between Joram and Uzziah, and gives but six generations as against thirteen in Lk between Ἀβιούδ (=Ἰούδα [Lk] =חוֹדַוְיָהוּ [1 Ch 9^{7}]) and Matthan (=Matthat [Lk]). Barely are the names thus made to cover a period of more than 500 years. It is also manifest that its author simply follows in an uncritical manner the royal succession of the OT from David down to the last poor shadow of a Davidic king, 'Zerubbabel son of Shealtiel' (1 Ch 3^{19}, Ezr 2^{2} etc., Neh 7^{7} etc., Hag $1^{1.\ 12.\ 14}$ etc., Zec $4^{6.\ 7.\ 9.\ 10}$). But it cannot be allowed that our evangelist by his ἐγέννησεν means anything else than actual physical descent. Of what significance his edifying comment on Bathsheba as the mother of Solomon, if the reader is not to infer that she is thus an ancestress of the Messiah? That he has embodied in his Gospel a current throne-succession not of his own manufacture is not only à priori probable, but is evident from the apparent blunder in vv.[11. 12], by which the 'tesseradecad' from the carrying away into Babylon unto Christ contains not, as stated, 'fourteen generations,' but thirteen. It is, indeed, easy to cite examples from contemporary literature for the counting of a name twice to make out the hebdomad or decad into which genealogies were usually divided (see Mill, op. cit., quoted by Hervey, op. cit. p. 886); but in this case more than enough of names were available in 1 Ch $3^{17\text{-}19}$ to make the count correspond to that of the first two sections of the table. It is probable, therefore, as was already pointed out by Jerome, that we have here an instance, on the part of the evangelist, of the confusion common in both Gr. and Lat. writers (Clem. Al., Ambrose, Africanus, Epiphanius, also 1 Es $1^{37.\ 43}$) between Jehoiakim and Jehoiachin; for Jehoiachin had no 'brethren' (Mt 1^{11}), but Jehoiakim had three, two of whom did succeed to the throne (Jer 22^{11}). The few texts, however, which insert the clause Ἰεχονίας δὲ ἐγέννησε τὸν Ἰεχονίαν, are certainly corrupt, since the reading is later than Porphyry, who had derided this flaw in the genealogy. We must therefore distinguish between the evangelist, who finds edifying significance in the common genealogical device of double heptads (cf. the genealogies of Gn 4–11 and Budde, Bibl. Urgeschichte, p. 90), or in the names of Rahab and Bathsheba (so Rabbinic authorities cited by Wetstein, in loc.; cf. He 11^{31}, Ja 2^{25}), and his unknown authority. The former certainly supposed himself to be giving an actual and complete pedigree of Joseph (see v.[17] πᾶσαι), not a mere throne-succession; whether the latter so believed, or not, must be left in doubt. The list of ten names which he inserts between Joseph and Zerub., beginning with the last generation mentioned by Ch in much altered form, may represent a current throne-succession, carrying down the line from Zerub. towards the Maccab. period,* taken up without more ado as ipso facto belonging to Jesus. Our judgment as to the probable historical value of such current lists must be formed in the light of ancient testimony (see below).

The genealogy of Lk has every appearance of resting on more carefully prepared data, as we should expect from the evangelist's painstaking method (Lk 1^{1-4}); but it is even more certain in this case that our author is adapting earlier material to his own uses. The pedigree, like the story of the infancy to which it probably belonged, must have been derived from Pal. sources. To the occidental mind, it is true, there would seem to be a certain incongruity between the account of the miraculous generation and the introduction of a pedigree of Joseph. This feeling is apparent in the evangelist's qualifying insertion in 3^{23} ὡς ἐνομίζετο. It has been argued that even the sources used in these preliminary chapters are themselves in conflict on this point, the references to Joseph as the 'father' of Jesus ($2^{33.\ 43}$), and the genealogy, indicating a point of view different from that of the main course of the story. But recent research has suggested that, to the contemporary Jewish mind, there was no incompatibility. Joseph might be not merely the putative or adoptive, but the real father of Jesus, at the same time that the birth was due solely to 'the power of the Highest' (1^{35}). Isaac, in like manner, was spoken of as 'God-begotten' (cf. Ro $4^{17-20.\ 24}$, He 11^{12}), without any idea of denying the reality of his relation to Abraham. The ὡς ἐνομίζετο is therefore to be attributed to the evangelist as against the source.

It is also a fair inference, from the very object of the pedigree, that the source did not carry it back beyond Abraham. Hence the extension back to Adam is due to the humanitarian bent of the evangelist, which is even more apparent in the curious addition τοῦ θεοῦ, by which the divine sonship of the race is indirectly taught. Moreover, the text followed for these earliest 20 generations (10 from Creation to Noah, 10 from the Flood to Abraham) is manifestly the LXX, which alone gives the second Cainan (3^{36}), whereas the source in 1^{17} cites from an Aramaic version.

Finally, there is a curious indication in 3^{27} that the evangelist has not only (as is probable) changed the place of the genealogy, but inverted its order. On 3^{27} we have the following comment from Plummer (Comm. p. 104): 'Rhesa, who appears in Lk, but neither in Mt nor in 1 Ch, is probably not a name at all, but a title, which some Jewish copyist (?) mistook for a name. "Zerubbabel Rhesa," or "Zerubbabel the prince," has been made into "Zerubbabel (begat) Rhesa."' This correction brings Lk into harmony with both Mt and 1 Ch. For (1) the Gr. Ἰωανάν represents the Heb. Hananiah (1 Ch 3^{19}), a generation omitted by Mt; and (2) Lk's Ἰούδα is the same as Mt's Ἀβιούδ (Jud-a = Ab-jud). Again, Ἰούδα or Ἀβιούδ may be identified with Hodaviah (1 Ch 3^{24}); for this name is interchanged with Judah, as is seen by a comparison of Ezr 3^{9} and Neh 11^{9} with Ezr 2^{40} and 1 Ch $9^{7.\ 11}$. To have caused the mistake, the original form of the genealogy must of course have been a simple list of names in the order Zerubbabel, Rhesa, Joanan, etc., and not, as now, Ἰωανὰν τοῦ Ῥησὰ τοῦ Ζοροβάβελ, κ.τ.λ.

Taking this list of names in the most original form to which we can restore it, we observe at once that its form is of the same mnemonic type as Mt's, only, as in the series from Zerub. to Jesus in Mt, the commoner system of (double) decads is followed. There are precisely 40 names in all between David and Christ, of which 20 are pre-exilic and 20 post-exilic. The former series begins with Nathan s. of David, the latter with Salathiel (= Shealtiel) f. of Zerub., ending with Joseph f. of Jesus. The list from Adam to Abraham likewise consists of 20, that from Abraham to David being, of course, a tesseradecad.

Twenty generations is not, indeed, an improbable number for the period from David to the Exile (c. 400 years); but a comparison of Lk 3^{27} with 1 Ch 3^{17-24} will show that at least four * generations have been omitted between Joanan and Joda; hence the number of generations at least is artificial.

Do the names themselves give any indication of being drawn from trustworthy sources? Allowance must be made for a probable disposition on the part of 1st cent. scribes to assimilate the older names to those in current use (e.g. Ἰουδά = יְהוֹדָה, Ἰωανάν = יְהוֹחָנָן), and possibly (so Hervey, Genealogies, pp. 36, 90 ff.) for a disposition in certain families to form names by variations of a common root, though this might, with equal plausibility, be attributed to the pedigree-makers. Nevertheless, it must be admitted that this list of names presents phenomena unparalleled in any authenticated OT pedigree. There is no indication in the names of the OT of the practice referred to in Lk 1^{61} (cf. Gray, Heb. Prop. Names, 2 ff.). Nor can the practice of giving 'Scripture' names, so manifestly common in Maccab. times and later, have existed to any extent in the earlier period. Hence, while there may be nothing strange in the names Levi and Joseph, as third and sixth ancestor of Joseph f. of Jesus, the series Joseph, Juda, Simeon, Levi, as contemporaries of Ahaziah, Joash, Amaziah, and Uzziah, is surprising. Add to these the names Matthat (bis), Mattathias (bis), and Mattatha, variants upon the root of 'Nathan,' the names Na[h]um, Amos, and the fact that out of the total of 42 names in Mt and Lk not directly taken from the OT there are but 16 which have not more or less demonstrable affinity with the later 'scriptural' type, and the result cannot be considered favourable to the historical trustworthiness of the sources.

iv. External Evidence.—In the absence of other evidence, the seemingly late character of the names of the supposed Davididæ of Mt and Lk might perhaps be insufficient to justify doubt. But the careful investigations of Africanus (op. cit.), when compared with the earliest NT treatment of the subject, and the further knowledge obtainable from Eus. (Qu. ad Steph. iii. 2), and the later Jewish theology (see Delitzsch in Ztschr. f. Luth. Theol. 1860, iii. p. 460) as to current attempts to determine the Davidic descent of the Messiah, shed a light upon the question of the origin of our pedigrees which should not be less welcome because somewhat unfavourable to their historical trustworthiness.

Africanus' informants were in possession of the pedigrees of Mt and Lk, but could give him neither the means of reconciling their discrepancies nor of establishing the fact requiring to be proved, because of the non-existence of public records. That such had been kept down to the time of Herod the Great they firmly believed, accounting for their disappearance by a demonstrably apocryphal tale of Herod's burning them in order to conceal his own base lineage.† They frankly confessed that the pedigrees in their possession were made up ἐκ τε τῆς βίβλου τῶν ἡμερῶν [καὶ ἐκ μνήμης].‡ The βίβλος τῶν ἡμερῶν is doubtless the Heb. דִּבְרֵי הַיָּמִים, i.e. Book of Days (= Chronicles); but 'memory' in the time of Herod, and later, would hardly be of great service to determine the descendants of Nathan ben David. The industry of pedigree-making appears as flourishing then as to-day, and basing itself upon the same foibles. 'A few of the more careful,' says Africanus, immediately after the story of Herod's escapade, 'having procured private records of their own, either by remembering the names, or by getting them in some other way from the registers, pride themselves on preserving the memory of their noble extraction. Among these are those already mentioned, called Desposyni, on account of their connexion with the family of the Saviour.'

If the current pedigrees were indeed of this character, we can readily understand the attitude

* According to LXX, adopted by Kittel in Haupt's critical text, nine, i.e. one entire decad, including Hodaviah.

† Herod's lineage was not base, as represented (Afric. ad Arist. § 4), but noble (Jos. Ant. xiv. vii. 3). Moreover, the public records (which, however, related only to Aaronic families) were still in existence in Josephus' time (Vita, § 1; cf. c. Ap. i. 7).

‡ The bracketed words are supplied from the tr. of Rufinus, 'partim memoriter, partim etiam ex dierum libris,' in accordance with the context (τε and the statement that the desposyni were among those who made up their pedigree in this way See text).

of Jesus and the older NT writers toward the question of His Davidic descent. He Himself, in Mt 22^{41-46} and parallels, expressly declines to base His Messianic claims on any such trivial and external, if not indeed unsafe, foundation. To be considered one of the Davididæ was an honour which He shared with his elder and younger contemporaries, Hillel and Gamaliel; but Jesus and His first followers (including St. Paul) on the one side, His opponents on the other, are equally content to let the question of descent fall into the background, which would not have been possible had documentary proof either for or against His heirship been accessible to either side. The earliest of our Gospels, and that which though latest is most loftily apostolic in tone, pass by the question of Jesus' descent. One is tempted to find a trace of the same disposition in the ἀρχιερεὺς ἀγενεαλόγητος of He 7^{3}. It is the Palestinian sources of the latter part of the century, on which the infancy chapters of Mt and Lk are based, which first show traces of the assumption that a formal Davidic pedigree is needful to the demonstration of His Messianic claims. But we have already observed that in these sources there is no consciousness of incongruity between tracing the pedigree of Jesus through Joseph and the story of His miraculous birth. Not until the times of Justin Martyr do we find on the side of the orthodox a disposition to claim on this account Davidic descent for Mary, and on the part of the Ebionites to reject the narrative of Jesus' miraculous birth, not from incredulity, but to rescue the doctrine of His Davidic descent.

It is among the Jewish Christians of Palestine in the sub-apostolic age, perhaps among the two branches of the desposyni themselves, one of whose seats was at Cochaba, near the centre of Ebionism (Epiphan. xxx. 2, 16), the other at Nazara, perhaps the centre of the other Jewish Christian sect of 'Nazarenes,' that we must look for the origins of our two genealogies. Nor have we far to seek for the explanation of their discrepancy. Among the current Rabbinic disputes of the 1st cent. was the question whether Messiah's descent would be of the royal line, through Solomon and his successors on the throne (Jer 23^{5} 30^{9} $33^{15.17}$); or, on account of the denunciation and rejection of Jechoniah and his seed (Jer $22^{28.30}$ 36^{30}), through Nathan (Euseb. Qu. ad Steph. iii. 2). The first of our pedigrees represents the older and simpler idea. The second, the later reflection that Messiah's line could not include the series of ungodly kings. Of the component elements of each we can know no more until we have more intimate acquaintance with the methods of the pedigree-makers of the time. We may, however, infer something as to the date of our evangelists' work from the manifest interval between their construction and their final adoption into the story, and from the further fact of their construction in decads framed with either Joseph or Jesus in view, implying their origin in Christian circles. That origin is certainly later than when Jesus and His immediate followers were doing all in their power to detach current expectation from these externalities and fix it upon His spiritual Messianic claim,—to subordinate the title 'Son of David according to the flesh' to that of 'Son of God with power according to the Spirit of Holiness' (Ro $1^{3.4}$).

B. W. Bacon.

GENEALOGY.—Timothy is warned (1 Ti 1^{4}) not to give heed to fables and endless genealogies (μηδὲ προσέχειν μύθοις καὶ γενεαλογίαις ἀπεράντοις), and Titus (3^{9}) to avoid foolish questions and genealogies (μωρὰς δὲ ζητήσεις καὶ γενεαλογίας). What were these 'genealogies'? Some Fathers towards the end of the second century understood the word to refer to the emanations of æons and of angels which formed part of the gnosis, or secret knowledge claimed by the Gnostics of their own day (see Gnosticism). But a parallel phrase in Polybius (IX. ii. 1, περὶ τὰς γενεαλογίας καὶ μύθους) refers to the mythological stories which earlier historians gathered round the birth and descent of their heroes. Similar legends are found in Philo, Josephus, and the Book of Jubilees, regarding the Jewish patriarchs and their families. And if, with Hort (Judaistic Christianity, 135 ff.), we may suppose that such genealogical tales had begun to creep from the Jewish into the Christian communities of Asia Minor, the necessity for such a warning to Timothy and Titus will be sufficiently understood.

GENERAL.—1. Once AV uses 'general' to translate שַׂר, 1 Ch 27^{34} 'The general of the king's army was Joab.' The most usual tr^{n} is 'captain,' which RV prefers, after Gen. and Bishops'. Cov. has 'chefe captayne.' See Captain.

2. As an adj. 'general' means 'common to all,' 'universal,' as Ad. Est 15^{10} (κοινός); 2 Mac 3^{18} 'Others ran flocking out of their houses to the general supplication' (ἐπὶ πάνδημον ἱκετίαν, AVm 'to make general supplication'; RV 'to make a universal supplication'). Latimer (Sermons, ed. 1584, p. 182) says, 'The promises of God our Saviour are general; they pertain to all mankind. He made a general proclamation, saying, Whosoever believeth in me hath everlasting life. . . . Also consider what Christ saith with his own mouth: Come to me, all ye that labour and are laden, and I will ease you. Mark here he saith, Come all ye; wherefore then should any man despair to shut himself from these promises of Christ, which be general, and pertain to the whole world?' In He 12^{23} the Gr. word πανήγυρις is tr^{d} in AV 'general assembly,' and RV retains the rendering. The sense is again 'universal assembly,' the adj. 'general' being intended to represent the πᾶς, 'all,' in the word.

The word πανήγυρις (from which comes 'panegyric,' a speech at a festival) is found only here in NT. In LXX it stands for מוֹעֵד Ezk 46^{11} (EV 'solemnities,' RVm 'appointed feasts'), Hos 2^{11} (EV 'season') 9^{5} (AV 'solemn,' RV 'solemn assembly'); and for עֲצָרָה Am 5^{21} (EV 'solemn assemblies'). In classical literature it is in frequent use to denote a national or general gathering for festive (and especially festive and religious) purposes, as at the Olympic, Isthmian, and Nemean games. The ἐκκλησία was also an assembly of the people, but not so distinctively national, and rather for political than festive purposes; while ἑορτή signified a feast or festal gathering, but had no national character attached to it. It is surprising, therefore, that מוֹעֵד, which is a general religious assembly, and even עֲצָרָה, which is a religious though not a national gathering, are not more frequently rendered by πανήγυρις in LXX. Cremer suggests that heathen customs were too closely associated with this Greek word, and he thinks it would not have been used where it has been but for the accumulation of Heb. synonyms in those four passages (see Cremer, Bibl. Theol. Lex. s.v., and Trench, NT Synonyms^{8}, p. 5, § 1).

The choice of this word by the writer of the Ep. to the Hebrews is an element in the determination of the meaning of the passage in which it occurs, one of the most difficult problems in the Epistle.

There is practically no difference of reading, μυρίων ἀγίων D_2* and μυριάδων vg., for μυριάσιν, being probably suggestions to simplify the construction. The difficulty lies in the punctuation. There are five possible arrangements—

1. καὶ μυριάσιν, ἀγγέλων πανηγύρει; καὶ ἐκκλησίᾳ πρωτοτόκων ἀπογεγραμμένων ἐν οὐρανοῖς.

'And to myriads, a general assembly of angels; and to the Church of the firstborn whose names are written in heaven.'

2. καὶ μυριάσιν ἀγγέλων, πανηγύρει; καὶ, κ.τ.λ.

'And to myriads of angels, a general assembly; and to the Church,' etc.

Moses Stuart, Eager, Edwards, and Farrar distinctly prefer the first arrangement; Chrysostom, Oecumenius, Theophylact, Erasmus, Luther, Calvin, Grotius, Hooker, Weiss, Vaughan, Thayer, Kay, Westcott, Briggs prefer the second. But the meaning is the same, though the punctuation differs; and taking the two together without the comma, καὶ μυριάσιν ἀγγέλων πανηγύρει; καὶ, κ.τ.λ., we get the sense which is adopted by Tisch. after all the Gr. MSS which exhibit the connexion of words (including AC), the Syr. and Lat. VSS, Origen, Eusebius, Basil (multitudinem angelorum frequentem), Vulg. (multorum millium angelorum frequentiam et ecclesiam primitivorum, qui conscripti sunt in cœlis), Wyc. ('and [1388 adds to] the multitude of many thousynd aungels, and to the chirche of the firste men'), Tind. ('and to an innumerable sight of angels, and unto the congregation of the fyrst borne sonnes'), Cov., Matt., Cran., Gen., Bish., Rhem., Oltramare (du chœur joyeux des myriades d'anges, de l'assemblée des premiers-nés), Segond.

3. καὶ μυριάσιν, ἀγγέλων πανηγύρει καὶ ἐκκλησίᾳ πρωτοτόκων.

'And to myriads, a general assembly of angels and a congregation of firstborn.' That is, myriads both of angels and of firstborn. This is the view of Wolf, Rambach, Griesbach, Bengel, Knapp, Böhme, Kuinoel, Tholuck, De Wette, Lachmann, Theile, Bleek, Olshausen, Delitzsch, Trench, Ebrard, Alford, Dale, Maclaren, RVm.

4. καὶ μυριάσιν ἀγγέλων; πανηγύρει καὶ ἐκκλησίᾳ πρωτοτόκων.

'And to myriads of angels; to the general assembly and Church of the firstborn.' This is the order of the Elzevirs, Beza, Calov, Carpzov, Storr, Joannes Gregorius. Matthaei, Alberti, AV, RV, Kurz, Liddon, Saphir ('to the general assembly of the Church of the firstborn ones'), Lünemann, Hofmann, Cremer (who argues that only because πανήγυρις and ἐκκλησία both refer to the same company can the presence of πανήγυρις be accounted for; it is an assembly, yea a festive one —an argument which would have more force if π. followed ἐκ.), Ostervald, Angus, Rendall, WH.

5. καὶ μυριάσιν ἀγγέλων, πανηγύρει καὶ ἐκκλησίᾳ πρωτοτόκων.

'And to myriads of angels, a general assembly and congregation of firstborn.' That is, the angels are both the general assembly and the congregation of firstborn. So Davidson (who argues forcibly), Moulton, Weizsäcker (und Myriaden von Engeln, einer Festversammlung und Gemeinde von Erstgeborenen).

The adv. 'generally' means (1) universally in every place, Jer 48[38] 'There shall be lamentation generally upon all the housetops of Moab' (כֻּלָּהּ, lit. 'all of it' [see Driver on 2 S 2[9]]; RV 'every where'). Cf. Art. XVII. (XXXIX. Articles), 'Furthermore, we must receive God's promises in such-wise, as they be generally set forth to us in Holy Scripture' (*ut nobis in sacris literis generaliter propositæ sunt); Hooker, Eccl. Polity, v. lv. 1, 'God in Christ is generally the medicine, which doth cure the world'; Pr. Bk., Catechism, 'How many Sacraments hath Christ ordained in his Church? Two only, as generally necessary to salvation'; and Chaucer, Troilus and Criseyde, i. 86—

> 'The noyse up roos, whan it was first aspyed, > Thorugh al the toun, and generally was spoken,
> That Calkas traytor fled was, and allyed
> With hem of Grece.'

(2) Together, as a whole, 2 S 17[11] 'Therefore I counsel that all Israel be generally gathered unto thee' (הָאֹסֶף יֵאָסֵף, LXX συναγόμενος συναχθήσεται; Vulg. Congregatur ad te universus populus Israel; RV 'together'). In this sense Tindale uses 'in general' (Expositions, on Mt 6[1-4]), 'For we must have a place to come together, to pray in general.' And from this arose the modern meaning 'on the whole.' Shaks. makes Bottom say 'generally,' 'as a whole,' when he means just the opposite, 'individually,' Mids. Night's Dream, I. ii. 2—

> 'You were best to call them generally, man by man.'

J. HASTINGS.

* On this passage Gibson remarks (The XXXIX. Articles, ii. [1897] 486): 'The English sounds somewhat ambiguous, but there can be no doubt that "generally" here means "universally," i.e. of God's promises as applying to all men, and not, as the Calvinistic party asserted, only to a particular class, consisting of a few favourites of Heaven. This interpretation is rendered certain by the corresponding passage in the Reformatio Legum, where God's promises to the good, and threats to the evil, are spoken of as generaliter propositæ in Holy Scripture. The same interpretation was pointed out by Baro in his Concio ad Clerum in 1595, in the controversy when the Lambeth articles were first projected; and was also asserted against the Puritans by Bishop Bancroft at the Hampton Court Conference. Thus the clause directly condemns the theory of particular redemption.'

GENERATION.—i. 'Generation' is used in AV to tr. 1. דּוֹר dôr; Aram. דָּר dâr, Dn 4[3]; LXX γενεά, etc.; Vulg. generatio, etc. Dôr is used (a) generally for a period, especially in the phrases dôr wādhôr, etc., of limitless duration; past, Is 51[8]; future, Ps 10[6]; past and future, Ps 102[24]; (b) of all men living at any given time, Gn 6[9]; (c) of a class of men with some special characteristic, Pr 30[11-14] of four generations of bad men; (d) in Is 38[12] and Ps 49[19] dôr is sometimes taken as 'dwelling-place.' 2. תּוֹלְדוֹת tôledhôth, from yāladh, 'beget' or 'bear children,' LXX γένεσις, γενέσεις; Vulg. generationes. Tôlĕdhôth is used in the sense of (a) genealogies, Gn 5[1], figuratively of the account of creation, Gn 2[4]; also (b) divisions of a tribe, as based on genealogy, tôlĕdhôth occurs only in the Priestly Code, in Ru 4[18], and in 1 Ch. 3. γενεά in same sense as 1. (a), Col 1[26]; as 1. (b), Mt 24[34]. 4. γένεσις = 2. (a), Mt 1[1], an imitation of LXX use of γένεσις for תּוֹלְדוֹת. 5. γέννημα, 'offspring' = 1. (c). 6. γένος, race = 1. (c).

ii. Γενεά was also loosely used in Greek as 'generation' in English, of a period of about 30 to 33 years, e.g. 'Three generations of men make a hundred years' (Herod. ii. 142). But there is no probable instance of such usage in the Bible. OT texts, such as Gn 15[13. 16], Job 42[16], are cited in favour of it only under a misapprehension.

LITERATURE.—Oxf. Heb. Lex. s. דּוֹר and תּוֹלְדוֹת, and Thayer-Grimm, NT Lex. s. γενεά, etc. W. H. BENNETT.

GENERATION.—In the phrase 'generation of vipers,' which occurs in Mt 3[7] 12[34] 23[33] Lk 3[7], the Greek tr[d] 'generation' is γεννήματα (plu. of γέννημα, which in the best texts occurs only in those places, elsewhere γένημα), a totally different word from γενεά, which is so often tr[d] 'generation' in EV. In fact, γεννήματα means 'offspring'; and as this meaning belonged once to 'generation' also, it could stand as its representative. Thus Bp. Hall, Works (1634), i. 781, 'Of the Deluge'—'These mariages did not beget men, so much as wickednesse, from hence religions (sic) husbands both lost their piety, and gained a rebellious and godlesse generation'; and Shaks. Lear, I. i. 119—

> 'He that makes his generation messes
> To gorge his appetite.'

'Generation of vipers' comes from Tindale, whom the versions mostly follow. Gen. NT has 'ofsprynges of vipers' in Lk 3[7], and Rhem. NT 'vipers broodes' throughout.

In Mt 1[1] 'The book of the generation of Jesus Christ,' the Gr. is γένεσις, which is used also in 1[18] (EV 'birth,' RVm 'generation'), Lk 1[14] (EV 'birth'), as well as Ja 1[23] 3[6], and the meaning is probably 'birth' here also, though all the versions have 'generation.' Cf. Bp. Hall, Works, ii. 104, 'I cannot blame that philosopher who, undertaking to write of the hidden miracles of nature, spends most of his discourse upon the generation and formation of man; Surely we are fearefully and wonderfully made; but, how much greater is the miracle of our spirituall regeneration'; and White, Selborne, xl., 'The threads sometimes discovered in eels are perhaps their young: the generation of eels is very dark and mysterious.'

Still another word is tr[d] 'generation' in 1 P 2[9] 'But ye are a chosen generation' (γένος ἐκλεκτόν, RV 'an elect race'). In this sense Mandeville, Travels, 140, 'This Machomete regned in Arabye, the Zeer of oure Lord Jhesu Crist 610; and was one of the Generacioun of Ysmael.' Wyc. (1388) has 'a chosen kyn.' J. The Jews divided their sacred books into three groups—the Law (or Torah), the Prophets (or Nebiim), and the Writings (or Kethubim). Of these the Law (or Torah), which corresponded to our Pentateuch, was divided into five portions or books, probably for greater convenience in use and reference; and hence the Rabbis sometimes spoke of these books as 'the five fifths of the Torah.' Their first book was the same as our book 'Genesis,' and was called by a title consisting of its opening word Berêshith (='In the beginning'). In the Septuagint version it was called 'Genesis,' γένεσις ('begetting,' 'origin,' 'generation'), a word which occurs in the rendering of 2^4 αὕτη ἡ βίβλος γενέσεως οὐρανοῦ καὶ γῆς. This title was adopted and transliterated in the Lat. translation, and so passed into general use in Western and Eastern Churches alike.

i. CONTENTS.—Genesis begins with an account of the creation of the world. A survey of the whole book shows us a division into two unequal portions, one (chs. 1–11) dealing with primeval, the other and longer portion (chs. 12–50) dealing with patriarchal history. In both these portions we have mention of five distinct 'generations' (tôlĕdhôth תולדות), which represent, as it were, successive stages in the progress of the narrative. In the primeval history are the 'generations' of (1) the heaven and the earth, chs. 1–4; (2) Adam, 5–6^8; (3) Noah, 6^9–9; (4) the sons of Noah, 10^1–11^9; (5) Shem, 11^{10-26}. In the patriarchal history are the 'generations' of (1) Terah, chs. 11^{27}–25^{11}; (2) Ishmael, 25^{12-18}; (3) Isaac, 25^{19}–35; (4) Esau, 36; (5) Jacob, 37–50. It must not be supposed that the number of these 'generations' is accidentally ten. The number ten was regarded as symbolical of completeness; and there can be little doubt that the enumeration of the ten tables of 'generations' was intended to denote the completion of the primitive period. The twelve sons of Jacob, who in Genesis are removed into Egypt, have become in Exodus twelve tribes, and the family of Jacob has grown into the nation of Israel. The Bk. of Genesis gives the traditions respecting the beginnings of the world, of man, of the nations, and of the people of Israel. It brings the people of Israel to the close of the patriarchal age, to the threshold of their history as a nation.

ii. PLAN AND UNITY.—The plan upon which the book is constructed is quite easy to recognize. The history of the Israelite people is traced from the three epochs, (a) the Creation, (b) the Flood, (c) the call of Abraham. An account is given of the three patriarchs, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. The story of Abraham is given at some length; that of Isaac is dismissed very briefly; that of Jacob is merged in the life of Joseph, through whose instrumentality the sons of Jacob are brought into Egypt. The end of the book leaves the Israelites sojourning in Egypt, after the death of Joseph.

The narrative is continued in the Bk. of Exodus. The Bk. of Genesis contains the first portion of the historical narrative which runs continuously from Genesis to the end of the Bks. of Kings.

The book, therefore, presents an obvious unity of design; and the manner in which parenthetical and subsidiary material is introduced but never permitted seriously to impair the general thread of the work, shows artistic skill and a considerable degree of literary self-control.

iii. COMPOSITE STRUCTURE.—But it would be a mistake to let the unity of plan which distinguishes the book conduce to the supposition that its literary structure is homogeneous. The Hebrew chronicles and histories are all of them composite works. Like many of the mediæval chronicles and histories they are compiled from different sources, from materials of different age. The extracts are woven together so as to produce a consecutive narrative. But it is generally not difficult to distinguish the points at which the different sections are pieced together. The similarity of style, in certain sections of the narrative, combined with marked dissimilarity from the style in other sections, has enabled scholars to class together the portions which may be assigned to one or other literary source. In doing this it is easy to let conjecture run too far, and to exaggerate the importance of minutiæ in discriminating between different layers in the strata. But within certain limits the analysis of the distribution of the Bk. of Genesis has now been carried out with a great degree of agreement between the principal scholars of all schools. For while scholars may not be agreed as to the date to which these sources should be assigned, there is no disputing the fact of the family resemblance of certain portions of the book, and the necessity of explaining the resemblances by the supposition of compilatory origin.

From the time (1753) when Astruc, the French physician, first inferred, from the intermittent interchange of the sacred names Elohim and Jahweh, that different documents had been employed in the composition of Genesis, critics have carried on this branch of investigation with the utmost patience and minuteness. It is now generally admitted that the distinctive use of the divine name is only one criterion amongst many by which the vocabulary of certain portions in the book can be shown to differ from that of others; and, further, that a difference of literary treatment and of religious tone can be recognized side by side with that of phraseology and diction.

The idea that such a view is based upon mere theorizing or hair-splitting fancifulness is finally abandoned. So far as the composite character of the literary structure of Genesis is concerned, the main conclusions of criticism may be said to be established. Among the causes which necessitate the hypothesis that different documents were used, may be classed (a) varying accounts of the same thing, e.g. of the Creation, chs. 1 and 2; the number of animals that went into the ark, and the duration of the Flood, chs. 6 and 7; explanations of the names Beersheba 21^{31} 26^{33}, Bethel $28^{18.\,19}$ $35^{14.\,15}$, Israel 32^{29} 35^{10}; of the sale of Joseph by his brethren to Ishmaelites and Midianites, ch. 37: (b) apparent discrepancies, e.g. Abraham's family after Sarah's death, in extreme old age $25^{1ff.}$, cf. 17^{17} 18^{11}; the age of Sarah 17^{17} and 12^{11} 20^2; of Isaac as described in $27^{1.\,2.\,7.\,10.\,41}$ and 26^{34} 35^{28}; the names of Esau's wives 26^{34} 28^9 and $36^{2.\,3}$; Joseph's Egyptian master in 37^{36} and 39^1–40^4: (c) the repetition of the same event, or of different traditions of similar events, e.g. the origin of Isaac's name 17^{17} 18^{12} 21^6, of Edom's 25^{25} and ^{30}, of Issachar's, Zebulun's, and Joseph's ch. 30; and the similar occurrences in $12^{10ff.}$ $20^{1ff.}$ $26^{7ff.}$.

There is no need here (see HEXATEUCH) to recapitulate the arguments by which it has been demonstrated that the structure of the first six books of the Old Testament is a compilation from different literary sources. 'There was a time,' says Delitzsch, 'when the horizon of Pentateuch criticism was bounded by Genesis and the beginning of Exodus. We now know that the mode of composition found in Genesis continues to the 34th chapter of Deuteronomy. It extends, moreover, beyond Dt 34, and continues in the Bk. of

Joshua. . . . And this Hexateuch also is only a component part of the great historical work in five parts (viz. Moses, Joshua, Judges, Samuel, Kings), extending from Gn 1 to 2 K 25, of which the Pentateuch forms one' (Delitzsch, New Comm. on Gen. vol. i. pp. 46, 47).

The biblical student finds in the composite structure a sufficient and satisfactory means of accounting for the numerous minor discrepancies and difficulties in the Bk. of Genesis which have often given occasion for perplexity and doubt, and have too often led to forced and disingenuous methods of exegesis.

iv. THE COMPONENT SOURCES OF THE NARRATIVE.—The following describes roughly the general conclusions of modern criticism. Genesis consists of a consecutive narrative welded together by a compiler designated R, out of three main documentary sources designated by critics P (the Priestly Code), J (the Jahwist), and E (the Elohist).

(a) Of these three principal sources the one most easily distinguished is P. For, though the framework of the narrative preserved from the P source is somewhat meagre, its style and characteristics are very marked. Certain leading events are given by it in great detail, e.g. the Creation, the Deluge, the Covenant with Noah, and the Covenant with Abraham. The chronology is carefully observed; periods of most remote times are reckoned in years with precision; and brief summaries of other events are given (e.g. 10. 25^{12}); or their recollection is preserved by means of genealogies (5. 11^{10} $35^{22ff.}$). 'The history [in P] advances along a well-defined line, marked by a gradually diminishing length of human life; by the revelation of God under three distinct names, Elohim, El Shaddai, and Jahweh; by the blessing of Adam and its characteristic conditions; and by the subsequent covenants with Noah, Abraham, and Israel, each with its special "sign," the rainbow, the rite of circumcision, and the Sabbath, Gn $9^{12.\ 13}$ 17^{11}, Ex 31^{13}' (Driver, LOT[6] p. 127).

P is also characterized by an avoidance of anthropomorphisms. There is no mention of angels or of visions in sleep. God is described as 'appearing' (Gn $17^{1.\ 22.\ 23}$ $35^{9.\ 13}$ 48^{3}), and as 'speaking' (Gn 1^{29} 6^{13} 7^{1} 8^{15}–9^{1}); but, as compared with the other writers whose materials are incorporated in the Pentateuch, P is conspicuously guarded and scrupulous in his references to the Deity against any approach to familiar or irreverent description.

The narrative of P is somewhat formal and precise. It abounds in phrases and expressions which are not elsewhere found.

The following are some of the interesting traits of the P narrative which may be noted here:—

(1) Divine Name.—Except in 17^{1} 21^{1}, Elohim, not Jahweh, is used as the name of God; and these two exceptions are probably due to the compiler or to later copyists. God is revealed to the patriarchs as El Shaddai (Gn 17^{1} 28^{3} 35^{11} 48^{3}, cf. Ex 6^{3}).

(2) Proper Names.—In P 'the sons of Heth' (בְּנֵי חֵת) is always used (Gn $23^{3.\ 5.\ 7.\ 10.\ 16}$ 25^{10} 27^{46} 49^{32}), never 'Hittites' (הַחִתִּים), as in J and E. P has 'Kiriath-arba' for 'Hebron' (Gn 23^{2} 35^{27}), and Paddan-aram (Gn 25^{20} $28^{2.\ 5.\ 6.\ 7}$ 31^{18} 33^{18} $35^{9.\ 26}$ 46^{15}) for the region called in J (Gn 24^{10}) Aram-naharaim. The mention of Machpelah occurs only in the P narrative (Gn $23^{9.\ 17.\ 19}$ 25^{9} 49^{30} 50^{13}).

(3) Among the words and phrases characteristic of P may be mentioned the following, which are found in Genesis:—

אֲחֻזָּה 'possession,' Gn 17^{8} 23^{4} 36^{43} 47^{11} 49^{30}.

אֲנִי 30 times (אָנֹכִי once, Gn 23^{4}).

בָּשָׂר (כָּל־בָּשָׂר) 'flesh' ('all flesh'), Gn $6^{12.\ 13}$ $7^{15.\ 16}$ 8^{17} $9^{11.\ 15–17}$.

גָּוַע 'expire,' Gn 6^{17} 7^{21} 25^{8} 35^{29}.

זֶרַע 'seed,' Gn 9^{9} 17^{7} 35^{12} 46^{6} 48^{4}.

מְגֻרָה Gn $17^{12.\ 13}$ 23^{18}.

מִשְׁפָּחוֹתֵיהֶם (e.g. לְמִשְׁפְּחֹתֵיהֶם 'according to their families'), Gn 8^{19} $10^{5.\ 20.\ 31}$.

עֶצֶם הַיּוֹם הַזֶּה 'the self-same day,' Gn 7^{13} $17^{23.\ 26}$.

רְכוּשׁ 'possessions,' Gn 12^{5} 13^{6} 31^{18} 36^{7}.

שֶׁרֶץ 'swarm,' Gn $1^{20.\ 21}$ 7^{21} 8^{17} 9^{7}.

There is general agreement among critics as to the passages in Genesis that were taken by the compiler from the P document. These are—

1^{1}–2^{4a} $5^{1–28.\ 30–32}$ $6^{9–22}$ 7 (portions) $8^{1.\ 2a.\ 3b–5.\ 13a.\ 14–19}$ $9^{1–17.\ 28.\ 29}$ $10^{1–7.\ 20.\ 22.\ 23.\ 31.\ 32}$ 11 $^{10–27.\ 31.\ 32}$ $12^{4b.\ 5}$ $13^{6.\ 11b.\ 12a}$ $16^{1a.\ 3.\ 15.\ 16}$ 17. 19^{29} $21^{1b.\ 2b–5}$ 23. $25^{7–11a.\ 12–17.\ 19.\ 20.\ 26b}$ $26^{34.\ 35}$ 27^{46}–28^{9} $29^{24.\ 29}$ 31^{18b} 33^{18a} 34 (portions) $35^{9–13.\ 15.\ 22b–29}$ 36 (very largely) $37^{1.\ 2a}$ 41^{46} $46^{6–27}$ $47^{5.\ 6a.\ 7–11.\ 27b.\ 28}$ $48^{3–6.\ 7}$ $49^{1a.\ 28b–33}$ $50^{12.\ 13}$.

(b) When the P portions of the narrative have been removed, there remains a large portion of Genesis which critics have called 'prophetic,' as distinguished from 'priestly,' being clearly separable from P in language and in treatment of narrative.

But this large portion of prophetic writing has also been conclusively shown to be, not homogeneous, but to consist of two main threads of narrative which to a great extent must have covered the same ground, and which a compiler combined in the form of a consecutive narrative. There were therefore two original documents (J and E) independent of one another, which, being welded together, formed a distinct work, JE, which was afterwards combined with P by the final redactor. As to the relative priority of these two documents, scholars are hardly yet in absolute agreement. But, at the present day, opinion inclines to the view that the document, which has as one of its characteristics the use of Jahweh (Jehovah) for the divine name, and has therefore been entitled the 'Jahwist' (= J, for short), is the earlier in date; and that the other, which on account of its use of Elohim for the sacred name (until Ex 3^{14}, when the name was revealed to Moses) is called the Elohist (= E, for short), can be only very slightly later. In determining what that date must have been, we are enabled, by the evidence of the language, to discern that both J and E belong to the best period of Hebrew literature, free from the obscurity of the early and from the insipidity of the later age.

The resemblance of these two documents to one another in their contents, and their difference in style and language, may best be illustrated by a comparison of the parallel narratives in Gn 20 and 26, and in the accounts of the patriarchs Jacob and Joseph.

J contains some of the most striking descriptions in all Genesis; and there is probably no Hebrew writing which in beauty of narrative, vigour, simplicity, and artistic skill can be considered to surpass this document. To it we owe the preservation of the famous stories of the Garden of Eden; of Cain and Abel; of Abraham and the three angelic visitors; of Sodom and Gomorrah; of the mission of Eliezer, the servant of Abraham; of Judah and Tamar; of Judah's intercession with Joseph.

Throughout his narrative, the writer of J keeps prominently in view the spiritual and moral purpose with which he indites his records of old time. It is in this respect that he occupies the position of a 'prophet'; he interprets the truths that underlay the history of the past, and explains God's dealings in the world and with His chosen people.

'He is penetrated by the thought of Jehovah's mercifulness, long-suffering, and covenant faithfulness. He delights to trace the successive stages in the development of faith. It is he who tells how Abraham "believed in the Lord, and He counted it to him for righteousness." . . . The Jahwist appears, in fact, to survey the field of history with the eye of mature spiritual experience; in the lowly beginnings of Hebrew history he discerns the divinely intended consummation—the ultimate purpose which from the first filled the incidents of ordinary life with solemn significance (Gn $19^{22ff.}$ 16^{12} $19^{31ff.}$ $25^{25ff.}$ $49^{9ff.}$).' (Ottley's Bampton Lectures, 1897, pp. 119, 120).

Among the characteristic features of J's writing the following deserve special mention:—

(1) The use of Jahweh (יהוה) as the name of God.—Not, of course, that the word Elohim was not known or used by him; he does use it for the purpose of introducing a comparison between the human and the divine (Gn $32^{29.\ 31}$ 33^{10}), or when he represents a non-Israelite speaking of the Deity to an Israelite, or an Israelite to a non-Israelite (Gn 20^{13} 40^{8} $41^{16.\ 25.\ 28.\ 32}$ 43^{29}). He puts it into the mouth of the serpent (Gn 3^{2}). The name Jahweh, on the other hand, in his narrative, is known to the patriarchs and used by them; and the writer is not apparently aware of the tradition that the name was first revealed to Moses, as recorded in Ex 3. To an English reader, his use of the sacred name appears an anachronism, or a not unnatural anticipation of later general usage.

(2) J's use of words and phrases may be illustrated by—

בֹּאֲךָ, lit. 'as thou comest to,' Gn 10^{19}bis etc.

בִּי אֲדֹנָי Gn 43^{20} 44^{18} (cf. Ex $4^{10.\ 13}$).

מָצָא חֵן 'find favour,' Gn 6^{8} 18^{3} 32^{6} $33^{8.\ 15}$ etc.

עָשָׂה חֶסֶד Gn $24^{12.\ 14.\ 49}$ (used also by E, Gn 20^{13} 21^{23} 40^{14}).

יָדַע (euphemistic use), Gn $4^{1.\ 17.\ 25}$ 19^{8} 24^{16} 38^{26}.

[יָצַא] (Hiph.) Gn 30^{38} 33^{15} 43^{9} 47^{2}.

לִין Gn 19^{2} 24^{23}.

עָתַר Gn 25^{21} (cf. Ex $8^{9.\ 28}$ 9^{23} 10^{17}).

רִפְעִם Gn 2^{23} 18^{32} $29^{34f.}$ 30^{20} 46^{30}; צָעִיר for 'the younger,' Gn 25^{23} 43^{33} 48^{14}.

שִׁפְחָה 'maid-servant' (not אָמָה), Gn 16^{5} 30^{7} etc.

הִשְׁקִיף Gn 18^{16} 19^{28}.

(3) Grammar.—A preference for verbal suffixes, instead of אֵת with suffixes.

Phrases such as 'and it came to pass,' וַיְהִי כִּי, וַיְהִי כַּאֲשֶׁר.

Emphatic use of זֶה and זֹאת.

Fondness for particles.

Use of precative נָא.

The portions of Genesis which are generally assigned by critics to J are as follows:—

2^{4b}–4^{26} 5^{29} 6^{1-8} $7^{1-5.\ 12.\ 16b.\ 17.\ 22.\ 23}$ $8^{2b.\ 3a.\ 6-12.\ 13b.\ 20-22}$ 9^{18-27} $10^{8-19.\ 21.\ 24-30}$ $11^{1-9.\ 28-30}$ $12^{1-4a.\ 6-20}$ $13^{1-5.\ 7-11a.\ 12b-18}$ $16^{1b.\ 2.\ 4-14}$ 18^{1}–$19^{28.\ 30-38}$ $21^{1a.\ 2a.\ 33}$ 22^{20-24} 24^{1}–$25^{6.\ 11b.\ 18.\ 21-26a.\ 27-34}$ 26^{1-33} (exc. 16. 18) 27^{1-45} (mainly) $28^{10.\ 13-16.\ 19}$ $29^{2-14.\ 19-35}$ (exc. 28b. 29) 30^{1-23} (mainly). 24–42 $31^{1.\ 3}$ (25–27. 38–40). 46. 48–50 $32^{4-14.\ 23-32}$ 33^{1-17} 34 (largely) $35^{21.\ 22a}$ [36^{31-38}] 37^{12-35} (partly) 38. 39. 42^{38}–44^{34} 46^{28}–$47^{5.\ 13-26.\ 27a.\ 29-31}$ 49^{1b-28a} $50^{1-11.\ 14}$.

The majority of critics incline to the view that J was composed by a dweller in the Southern kingdom; and it is pointed out in support of this view that the dwelling-place of Abraham, and possibly also of Jacob, is, according to J, Hebron, and that the leader of Joseph's brethren is Judah and not Reuben. Such arguments are obviously precarious; but the alternative opinion, that the writer belonged to the Northern kingdom, as Kuenen maintains, does not rest on any more convincing proofs.

(c) The E document in Genesis, like the J document, has preserved many of the most interesting features of the patriarchal narrative. To use Driver's phrase, its narrative 'is more "objective," less consciously tinged by ethical and theological reflexion than that of J.' We owe to it, however, the mention of many of the most striking details to be found in the book. For instance, the traditions preserved in connexion with particular localities in Palestine are in E chronicled with minuteness, e.g. the sacrifice on Mt. Moriah (22), the pillar at Bethel (28^{18}), and that at Gilead (31^{45}), the altar at Bethel ($35^{1.\ 3.\ 7}$), and Rachel's burying-place (35^{20}). The story of Joseph is largely narrated from the sources which E preserved; and it is to E that we are indebted for the record of the Philistine names Ahuzzath and Phicol (21^{32}), and the Egyptian names Potiphar (37^{36}), Zaphenath-paneah and Asenath (41^{45}).

The most important sections from E embrace Abraham's relations with Abimelech in 20 and 21, the expulsion of Hagar and Ishmael 20^{8-21}, the sacrifice of Isaac 22^{1-19}, Jacob's flight from Haran and his league with Laban 31, and the story of Joseph as related in 40. 41. 42 and 45.

It may be noticed that E makes frequent mention of the means of divine revelation, whether by dream (e.g. 20^{3} 21^{12} 22^{1} 28^{11} 31^{24} 37^{6} 40) or by the ministration of angels (e.g. 21^{17} 22^{11} 28^{12}). 'He interprets in a religious spirit what he records, and aims at bringing out the didactic significance of events, e.g. Gn 50^{20}' (Ottley, BL p. 119).

Among the characteristics of E's style, the following deserve notice:—

(1) The name for God is 'Elohim' (אֱלֹהִים). The sacred name יהוה, according to E, was first revealed to Moses. Accordingly it is not employed by E until after Ex 3^{14}. Other names are also employed by him, as 'El' אֵל (Gn 33^{20} 35^{7} 46^{3}) and 'Adonai' אֲדֹנָי (Gn 20^{4}).

The name 'Jacob' is preferred by E, even after the narrative in Gn 32 with its account of the origin of the name Israel.

(2) Use of words and phrases—

עַל־אודות Gn $21^{11.\ 25}$.

אָסוֹן Gn $42^{4.\ 38}$ 44^{29}.

אָמָה, not שִׁפְחָה, Gn 20^{17} $21^{10.\ 12.\ 13}$. 30^{3} 31^{33}.

בעל (vb. and noun) Gn 20^{3}.

כְּלִמְּכָל Gn 45^{11} 47^{12} 50^{21}.

לֵבָב Gn $20^{5.\ 6}$ 31^{26}.

Archaic words preserved in E—

אֲמָנָה Gn 20^{12}.

מָכוֹן, subst. = 'position,' Gn 40^{13} 41^{13}.

adj. = 'honest,' Gn $42^{11.\ 19.\ 31-34}$.

מוֹנִים Gn $31^{7.\ 41}$.

פֶּרֶר Gn $40^{8.\ 9}$ $41^{8.\ 9}$.

(3) Grammatical usages—

(a) A marked preference for the use of אֵת with the pronom. suffix instead of attaching the suffix to the verb.

(b) Rare uses of the Infinitive—

רָדָה for רֶדֶת, Gn 46^{3}.

עָשׂה עָשׂוֹ Gn 31^{28} 50^{20}.

רְאֹה Gn 48^{11}.

(c) The connexion of loosely attached passages by such phrases as וַיְהִי אַחַר הַדְּבָרִים הָאֵלֶּה Gn 22^{1} 40^{1} 48^{1}.

And the colloquial and somewhat redundant phrases prefixed to the interchange of speech, e.g. 'And . . . said (or, called), and he answered, Here am I,' etc., Gn $22^{1.\ 7.\ 11}$ etc.

The chief portions of the narrative assigned to E are the following (and it will be observed that they are first to be identified in the story of Abraham); 15 (portions, according to some scholars), e.g. parts of vv. $1.\ 2.\ 3.\ 5$ 20^{1-17} 21^{8-32} $22^{1-14.\ 19}$ $28^{11.\ 12.\ 17.\ 18.\ 20-22}$ $29^{1.\ 15-18}$ 30 (portions), $31^{2.\ 4-47.}$ (exc. 18b) $32^{3.\ 13b-22}$ $33^{5b.\ 18b-20}$ $35^{1-8.\ 16-20}$ $37^{2b-11.\ 14a.\ 18.\ 19.\ 22-24.\ 28a.\ 28c-30.\ 36}$ 40 (showing some influence of J) $41^{1-45.\ 50-57}$ 42^{1-37} 45^{1}–46^{5} $48^{1.\ 2.\ 8-22}$ 50^{15-26}.

That E represents an Ephraimitic tradition is the generally accepted opinion. This is based upon the prominence given in its narrative to places and persons with which tradition in the Northern kingdom would presumably be closer in sympathy than tradition in the Southern. Joseph, the father of Ephraim, is the most conspicuous personage in the narrative; and Reuben, not Judah, is the foremost of his brethren. Bethel and Shechem, both sacred places in the Northern kingdom, are particularly mentioned in E. The sojourn of Abraham is not at Hebron, but at Beersheba and Gerar; that of Jacob, at Beersheba and Shechem.

(d) The work of combining JE and P is attributed to the redactor or redactors (R), who 'chose from his sources what was most suited to the plan of his work.' His method is thus admirably and succinctly described by Spurrell: 'Sometimes he merely takes small extracts from one document (e.g. 4^{17-24} 6^{1-4} 30^{32-42}, merely small portions of fuller accounts), or notices individual points (e.g. 11^{29} Jiska mentioned; 20^{12} the relationship between Abram and Sarai, cf. 28[22] [see 35[7]] 48[22]). At other times the portions taken from the documents are quoted in full, and for the most part are verbally transferred from the original (e.g. the narratives in P up to 11[25]), and sometimes, again, whole passages from one document are omitted, possibly because they were at variance with the accounts given by the others (see in P the brief accounts in 11[27–32]; the omission of the introduction to the history of Abram, previous to ch. 12; of the divine manifestation to Isaac, see 35[12]; of the sojourn of Jacob in Paddan-aram; of all the history of Joseph prior to Jacob's arrival in Egypt). Frequently extracts from J are given in an abridged form, in order that P may be reported more fully (cf. 2[5f.] 4[25f.], the Story of Creation, and the Table of Nations, J), and 16[15f.] 21[2ff.] 25[7ff.], 32[4] 35[28f.] P. Elsewhere, however, in the story of the patriarchs the extracts from J are abridged in favour of E. With the exception of the history of Joseph, E contains (from ch. 20 onwards) fewer passages which are verbally reported. Usually the portions in E are expanded by notices from J, or anything worth recording in E is incorporated into the narrative of J. When combining his sources, the compiler, as far as possible, or as far as he deemed necessary, appears to have taken the narrative verbally from each and inserted both in his book (cf. ch. 2 f. side by side with 1, ch. 27 side by side with 26[34f.] and 28[1–9]; 48[3–7] side by side with 48[9–22]). Elsewhere, as, for example, where the event need only be quoted from one document (e.g. the birth or death of any person), he selects his account from one source, even though the same event be recorded in more than one document. In other cases the compiler found two accounts in the documents before him, agreeing in the main but differing in details; he would then weave one account into the other, omitting from each what could not be reconciled, and choosing from both what best suited the plan of his work (cf. chs. 7f. 10. 16. 25. 27–37. 39–50). It was not always possible, without further revision, to place side by side or to weld together the individual extracts from two or three sources. So it was necessary to eliminate what was contradictory from one or other of the documents (e.g. 21[17ff.] explanation of Ishmael's name, 32[8] of Mahanaim, 33[10] of Peniel, cf. 31[25]), or to insert here and there small additions or remarks in order to fill up gaps and remove contradictions. So 4[25] 10[24] 21[14] 26[1a. 15. 18] 35[9] 37[5b. 8b.] 39[1. 20] 43[14] 46[1]. To the desire to produce a readable whole, may be attributed the accommodation necessary to preserve consistency in the use of the names Abram and Sarai in all passages previous to ch. 17, of the double name Yahweh-Elohim in chs. 2–3; also the change of Elohim into Yahweh in 17[1] 21[1]. Another expedient was frequently employed with the same object in view, viz. transposing entire portions of the narrative (so 11[1–9] 12[10–20] 25[5f. 11b] 25[21ff.]-47[12ff.]), or of brief notices (so 24[1a.] 31[45–50] 37[25] etc.), consequently R was obliged to insert all kinds of small additions; cf. 1[1] 9[18] 13[1. 3f.] 24[62]. In other passages the sources are loosely combined (e.g. 7[7–9. 22] 15[7f.] 31[45ff.], ch. 36. 46[8–27]), the compiler now and then making additions of his own to bring the documents into harmony (e.g. 21[34] 27[46] 35[5] 46[12–20]). Explanatory glosses are also found (e.g. 20[18] 31[47] 35[6], and ch. 14, where they are numerous), some of which may be due to a later corrector. All kinds of little additions occur, which are probably not derived from the sources themselves, but were inserted, either when the sources were welded together into one work, or some time after this. These insertions were added partly to explain the object of the narrative (15[12–16] 22[15–18] 26[3b–5]), partly to make it harmonize with statements occurring elsewhere (25[18b] 35[22a], perhaps 4[15a]), and partly to introduce new notices, or new phases of tradition which were not mentioned in the three chief documents (10[9] 32[33]; perhaps 2[10–14], and in 10[14]; 11[28b] 31[b] 15[7] 22[2], etc.). Sometimes possibly use was also made of materials taken from other sources than J, E, and P (e.g. perhaps in ch. 14).'—Spurrell, Genesis[2], pp. lxi–lxiii. Whether the work of combining the narratives of J and E was effected by one writer, or was the result of a gradual process directed and influenced by a group or succession of 'prophetic' men, must be left to conjecture. Some scholars, however, are prepared to give an unhesitating reply. 'That the compiler of JE was a Judæan is clear,' says Fripp, 'from 22[2], where he has substituted "Moriah" for some Ephraimite name; and that he was not far removed from the Deuteronomist we may see in 18[19. 23–33a], in the kindred passages 13[16] 15. 16[10] 18[18] 22[17. 18] 26[4] 32[12] (cf. Dt 1[10] 10[22] 28[62]), and still more plainly in 26[5]' (The Composition of the Book of Genesis, p. 18).

v. THE HISTORICAL VALUE OF THE BOOK.—Doubtless, the views that are held upon the historical character of Genesis depend in great measure upon the conception which is entertained of 'inspiration.' The book itself makes no claim to being in any way supernaturally furnished with means of information. The writers and compilers appear to have made use of their materials in the same fashion as other writers of their day. There is no indication in this, or in other books of Scripture, that Revelation communicated to man a knowledge of facts that were ascertainable by human means.

The early narratives of Genesis respecting the Creation, the Fall, and the Flood are based upon myths and traditions which the Israelites inherited in common with other branches of the Semitic family. The labours of Rawlinson, Lenormant, George Smith, Schrader, Sayce, and others have shown indisputably the affinity of the Israelite with the Chaldæan cosmogony. And it has often been pointed out that the Israelite version of the myth is free from the puerilities and superstitions inalienable from the polytheism of the Babylonian version. 'Where the Assyrian or Babylonian poet,' says Sayce, 'saw the action of deified forces of nature, the Hebrew writer sees only the will of the one supreme God' (HCM p. 71). This assists us to form a judgment upon the true character of these early chapters. The story of the beginnings of the world and of mankind is told, not with a scientific but with a religious purpose. The old-world myths, or tales of Semitic folk-lore, were employed for the purpose of setting forth in their true light—as discerned through the revealing spirit of J''—the unchanging verities respecting the nature of God, of man, and of the created universe (cf. Ryle, Early Narratives of Genesis).

The story of the Flood is doubtless drawn from the reminiscence of a fearful devastation by water at some very remote period. The striking resemblance between it and the so-called 'poem of Izdubar,' contained in the cuneiform texts translated by Geo. Smith (1872), illustrates the similar treatment of semi-mythical, semi-historical material by the Israelite writers. The Genesis account presents many insuperable objections, if it were necessary to accept it as a literally accurate record. But the purpose of the narration is not scientific, but religious; it is obviously intended to depict the divine displeasure against sin, and the divine favour towards the upright and God-fearing. On the other hand, there seems no reason to call in question the occurrence of some terrible overthrow by water that laid waste the Euphrates Valley, or the wonderful deliverance of a few individuals. The reminiscence of these events was variously enshrined in versions of a common Semitic legend.

The narrative of the patriarchs stands midway between the Flood tradition and the Mosaic history. As compared with the former, it marks a great advance in the direction of the historic; relatively to the latter, it still belongs to a prehistoric age. The narrative has come down to us through the medium of documents, whose composition, in the form familiar to us, must have been separated by many centuries from the incidents which they relate. On the other hand, there is no reason to doubt that the stories respecting the Israelite ancestors rest upon a foundation of historic fact. The attempts to resolve the patriarchs, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, into abstract personifications of tribes, or into primitive tribal gods, have admittedly failed. Without the patriarchs 'the religious position of Moses,' says Kittel (Hist. of the Hebrews, p. 174), 'stands before us unsupported and incomprehensible.' It is very possible, indeed most probable, that the picture which has been preserved of the patriarchs derives much of its colouring from the thought and circumstances of a later period, and in particular from the prophetic treatment of the people's history.

Nor can it be questioned that the relationship of tribes and clans is represented in the patriarchal narrative under the symbol of a family genealogy. The primitive connexion of Israel with the peoples round about—Ammon, Moab, Amalek, Ishmael, Edom—is presented to us under the imagery of incidents occurring in the history of a single family during one or two generations. The stories of common folk-lore, deriving proper names from various incidents, are incorporated along with narratives of didactic purpose and deep spiritual import, e.g. the call of Abraham and the visions of Jacob. The memory of the great forefathers of the nation was idealized by the prophetic and priestly writers. But they preserved a living tradition of real men and actual experience.

The difficulty which besets the modern student is how to distinguish the substratum of actual history from the accretion of later legend and from the symbolism of Eastern description. The task is one which will probably defy all the attempts of existing scholarship. Future discoveries may bring fresh light to bear upon the patriarchal narrative. For the present, important as recent discoveries have been in illustrating the Genesis narrative, they have not supplied us with any certain data for its chronology. Thus, while the credibility of an Elamite invasion, as mentioned in Gn 14, has been confirmed, in the opinion of competent scholars, by the evidence of cuneiform inscriptions, we have not yet arrived at any settled conclusion as to the century to which the events should be assigned. While the Babylonian equivalent to the name Abraham has been found in the inscriptions, neither he nor Isaac nor Jacob nor Joseph have yet been identified in the monuments. The identification of Y'ḳb'ar and Y'sp'r, by which some scholars transliterated Nos. 102 and 78 in the list of towns and places conquered by Tahutmes III. in his campaign against Palestine and Syria, with Yaḳobel and Yosephel, Jacob and Joseph, would not, supposing it to be accurate, throw any light upon the historical problem. It would, at the most, afford evidence that the names Jacob and Joseph had been current in Palestine as the names of localities and districts 'centuries before the time of Moses' (cf. Dillmann, Gen. ii. 4, Eng. tr.).

Again, while we gather from the Tel el-Amarna tablets that the officials in the towns of Palestine and Phœnicia, as well as of Egypt, were wont, in the 15th cent. B.C., to employ the cuneiform character in their diplomatic and state correspondence, we are brought no nearer to the determination of the question, when the Palestinian (Phœnician-Hebrew) writing was first adopted, or whether the nomad Hebrews employed writing.

To maintain that because cuneiform writing was practised in Palestine in the 15th cent. by official scribes for state correspondence, the existing patriarchal narratives are therefore based upon Hebrew transcriptions of cuneiform chronicles which were contemporary with the events, is to leap over several stages of the argument. A comparison of the Tel el-Amarna tablets with the patriarchal narrative confronts us with the fact that no one from reading the Genesis account could form any conception of the political condition of Palestine, as it really was, during the patriarchal period. With the isolated exception of the reference to historical details in Gn 14[ff.], the lives of the Hebrew patriarchs furnish no clue to the history of the centuries that correspond to the period of patriarchal sojourn in Palestine.

The story of Joseph shows abundant signs of acquaintance with Egyptian life and customs. But there is no appearance of its having been committed to writing in Egypt or by any contemporary. The dynastic name of the king of Egypt is alone given, i.e. Pharaoh; but we are nowhere told either his own name or that of the capital in which he resided. Accordingly, while some have contended that the mention of the Egyptian hatred for strangers indicates a period subsequent to the domination of the Hyksos, others have held that the elevation of Joseph, a shepherd by birth, to the highest office in the kingdom could have occurred only under a Hyksos dynasty. The Egyptian monuments have hitherto failed to give the name of Joseph; and the mention of a prolonged famine in the el-Kab inscription illustrates, but cannot with any certainty be identified with, the Genesis narrative. The measures taken by Joseph (Gn 47) in consequence of the famine doubtless correspond to Egyptian institutions known to the writer; but hitherto no account of them has been found in other quarters.

The evidence of the monuments, which has in recent years so copiously illustrated the biblical narrative, has not yet contributed with any certainty to the establishment of the literal historical accuracy of the patriarchal story.

The result may be disappointing; but the evidence at our disposal does not at present justify us in claiming more than that the general outline of the narrative is historical, and that the Mosaic epoch presupposes the patriarchal age. 'The historian may complain with Kuenen (see The Religion of Israel, vol. i. p. 113) that the strictly historical kernel which can be safely extracted from such a book as Genesis is vague and more or less indefinite. The fact is that the great figures of the patriarchal period are presented to us in narratives "of which," says Prof. G. A. Smith, "it is simply impossible for us at this time of day to establish the accuracy." We have simply to accept the fact that in the present state of our knowledge there are no clear criteria by which to distinguish precisely the historical nucleus contained in the patriarchal narratives from the idealized picture. If there is uncertainty on this point, we can only conclude that knowledge of the precise details of the history is not of vital importance' (Ottley, BL p. 130 f.).

vi. THE RELIGIOUS TEACHING OF THE BOOK.—A consideration of the religious value of Genesis reveals to us its true character and purpose. The Scriptures were written for religious instruction; and in no book of the OT are the treasures of theology to be found so close, as it were, beneath the surface as in the Book of Genesis.

1. The foundations of a true and spiritual religion are contained in the teaching of the early chapters of Genesis. Through the medium of the prehistoric legend, the Israelite writers communicated to their countrymen that which was revealed to them by the Divine Spirit concerning the Being and Nature of God, the origin and first perfection of the God-created universe, the origin of man, the nature and growth of sin, God's love toward man and His purpose of redemption. The narratives of the Creation and of the Fall present pictorially spiritual truths respecting man's nature, his need of restoration, and his capacity for a progressive development.

2. In the narrative of the patriarchs the redemptive purpose is unfolded by the gradual process of election (Ro 9^{11}), the principle of which had already been indicated in the contrast of Cain and Abel, of the Cainites and the Sethites. The well-known stories of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob were selected and arranged to minister to the purpose of religious teaching; and foremost stood the thought that God's love had alone determined the choice of the man and of the family from which should come the nation destined to be the channel of blessing to the world (Gn 12^{3} 13^{14} 15^{5} 17^{5} 18^{17-19} 22^{16} $26^{3.4}$ 35^{11} 48^{16}). This principle of election is pointedly emphasized in the providence which shields Sarai and Rebekah (Gn 12. 20. 26) from harm, and grants to them the gift of children in a quasi-miraculous manner (Gn 17^{15-20} 18^{11-15} 21^{6-8} $25^{20.21.26}$). The narrative, too, lays stress upon the divine choice by disposing of the collateral lines in the chosen family before passing on to the detailed account of the particular person on whom God's favour has rested (e.g. the family of Japheth, Ham, and Shem, Gn $10^{2.6.21}$; the generations of Shem and Terah, $11^{10.27}$; the story of Lot, 18. 19; the collateral branches of Abraham's family, preceding the story of Isaac, $25^{1.19}$; the generations of Esau, preceding the story of Joseph, 36).

3. Akin to this treatment of election is the prominence given to the conception of God as One who was in communion with the children of men, though in an especial manner He revealed Himself to those whom he had chosen. That God showed favour to Abel's sacrifice is thus scarcely more significant than that He held converse with Cain the murderer. That He appeared to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob was not more suggestive of His relation towards mankind than His appearance to Abimelech (20^{3}) and to Laban (31^{24}). The honour paid by Abraham to Melchizedek typified the recognition of divine power and love transcending the limits of a national covenant (Gn 14). At the same time, the story of 'the priest of God Most High' (14^{18}) illustrated the possession of that basis of instructive national religion, the abiding witness of God within man, upon which alone the structure of revelation could stand. With the people of His choice, God is represented as holding communion under the most anthropomorphic conditions (e.g. Gn 16. 18. 28). But the constitution of the covenant with Noah is ratified by the sacrament of the 'bow' (9^{8-17}), and the covenant with Abraham by that of 'circumcision' (17). And the lesson was thus conveyed to Israel that the phenomena of the physical world are pledges and emblems of a moral purpose overruling all, and that a common—if not almost universal—rite among Semitic races could be set apart and consecrated for the spiritual purposes of the service of the God of revelation.

4. The principle of progressiveness in the religious teaching of Israel is illustrated in Genesis by the three great stages of divine self-manifestation in the history of mankind, represented by the judgment in the Garden of Eden, by the visitation of the Flood, and by the calling of Abraham. Similarly, the record of God's dealings with the chosen man, the chosen family, and the chosen clan, lead up to the formation of the chosen nation, the history of which commences in the Book of Exodus.

The first anticipations of the Messianic hope are expressed in the promise of victory over the power of evil proclaimed in the so-called Proto-evangelium of Gn 3^{15}. These receive a narrower definition in the promise made to Abraham that all the families of the earth should bless themselves in him (Gn $12^{3.4}$). In Gn 49^{11} the allusion to a personal Messiah has been much disputed; but, whatever explanation be given of the words rendered 'until Shiloh come,' the significance of this passage in the ancient 'blessing of Jacob' consists in its identification of the ultimate glory of Israel with the sovereignty impersonated by Judah.

Space forbids us to go further into detail respecting the religious teaching of Genesis. It has been well summed up in the following words: 'The Book of Genesis is the true and original birthplace of all theology. It contains those ideas of God and man, of righteousness and judgment, of responsibility and moral government, of failure and hope, which are presupposed through the rest of the Old Testament, and which prepare the way for the mission of Christ' (Girdlestone, The Foundations of the Bible, p. 155).

LITERATURE.—For the structure of Genesis, the English student is now well equipped with the recent literature on the subject: Driver, LOT; Addis, Documents of the Hexateuch: Fripp, Composition of the Book of Genesis; C. J. Ball, 'Book of Genesis,' SBOT; and Spurrell, Notes on the Text of Genesis. The fullest complete commentaries are those by Dillmann and Delitzsch (both now translated into English; Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark). The foreign books which should be consulted are those on the structure by Holzinger (Einleitung), Kautzsch-Socin, Wellhausen (Die Composition des Hexateuchs, 1889). On Genesis and the Monuments: Sayce, HCM; Schrader, COT; and the writings of George Smith, Maspero, Pinches, Haupt, and others. On the Theology of Genesis: the OT Theology of Schultz, Oehler, Riehm.

GENNÆUS, AV GENNEUS (Γενναῖος, Γέννεος A, 2 Mac 12^{2}).—The father of Apollonius, who was the Syrian commander (στρατηγός) of a district in Pal. under Antiochus V. Eupator.

GENNESARET, LAKE OF (Lk 5^{1}; in 1 Mac 11^{67} GENNESARETH).—See GALILEE, SEA OF.

GENNESARET, LAND OF (ἡ γῆ Γεννησαρέτ, Mt 13^{34}, cf. Mk 6^{53}) deserves special attention, (1) because of its connexion with our Lord, (2) because of the estimation in which it was held by the inhabitants of the country, and (3) because of the account which Josephus has given of its wonderful fertility and loveliness. The place referred to was on the W. side of the Sea of Galilee and towards its N. end. Directly opposite to it on the E. side of the lake there is a corresponding plain which, however, lacks the characteristics that have made the one on the W. side widely famous. The miraculous feeding of the five thousand took place on the E. plain (Mt 14^{15-21}, cf. the other Gospels), immediately after which Christ sent His disciples by ship 'to the other side.' According to Mk they were directed to go towards Bethsaida (6^{45}); according to Jn they went, without instructions, 'towards Capernaum' (6^{17}); but the storm—at that season the strong current of the Jordan would have carried them in spite of themselves out of their course to the S.—compelled them to anchor 'in the land of G.' Bethsaida, Capernaum, and the land of G. are, in our judgment, mentioned in their natural order. The very next act of our Lord mentioned was at Capernaum, leading us to suppose that that place was nearer 'the land of G.' than Bethsaida.

This plain, which is one of the most charming spots in Pal., is about one mile broad and two and a half miles long, having Khan Minyeh on the N. and Mejdel, the ancient Magdala, on the S. The famous pass of Wady Ḥamam leads up through the mountains on the W. towards the Mediterranean. Josephus says, 'Such is the fertility of the soil that it rejects no plant, and accordingly all are here cultivated by the husbandman, for so genial is the air that it suits every variety. The walnut, which delights beyond other trees in a wintry climate, grows here luxuriantly, together with the palm, which is nourished by the heat, and near to these are figs and olives to which a milder atmosphere has been assigned.' Not only does Nature in her ambition here 'nourish fruits of opposite climes, but she maintains a continual supply of them. Thus she produces those most royal of all, the grape and the fig, during ten months without intermission, while the other varieties ripen the year round.' The 'fertilising spring which irrigates the plain,' according to this author, was prob. the fountain at et-Tabigha, which was led in a rock-cut channel round the ledge at Khan Minyeh. 'Ain Mudawareh, which has been suggested as the fountain referred to, is quite out of the question (Wars, III. x. 8).

The Rabbis were as enthusiastic in their praise of this 'garden of princes' as was Josephus. It was to them a veritable 'paradise.' Its fruits were prized for their wonderful sweetness, but they were not found at Jerus. at the feasts, and the reason given was that no one should be tempted to come to the feasts merely for the sake of enjoying those fruits (Bab. Talmud, Pesachim, 8*b*; Neubauer, Géog. du Talm. 45 f.).

GENTILES is one equivalent of the Heb. goïim (גּוֹיִם), which is represented in EV also by such renderings as 'nations' and 'heathen.' RV very frequently replaces AV 'Gentiles' by 'nations.'

גּוֹי (goï) has the same root meaning as עַם ('am, 'people'), which occurs more than 1500 times in OT. In their primary sense of a connected body (cf. Dt 32^{21} and Driver's note), goï and 'am are both applied even to troops or herds of animals (Jl 1^{6}, Pr $30^{25.\ 26}$). So the plur. forms goïim and 'ammîm, like the later lĕummîm, have the general sense of nations or peoples. Ultimately, however, linguistic usage confined the application of the sing. 'am, with rare exceptions (e.g. Gn 26^{11} of the Philistines, Ex 9^{16} of the Egyptians), to the people of Isr., while the sing. goï was prevailingly, though not exclusively, applied to other nations (in Is 1^{4} Zeph 2^{9} goï and 'am are both used to designate Isr.). A similar distinction rules the use in LXX of ἔθνος and λαός, which correspond to גּוֹי and עַם respectively. In NT we find (Lk 2^{32}) τὰ ἔθνη opposed to τῷ λαῷ θεοῦ Ἰσραήλ, although ἔθνος is pretty frequently used of Isr., and that without any disparaging intention (e.g. Lk 7^{5} 23^{2}, Jn $11^{48.\ 51.\ 52}$ 18^{35}, Ac 10^{22} $24^{3.\ 10.\ 17}$ 26^{4} 28^{19}).

Goïim (גּוֹיִם 'nations,' or כָּל־הַגּוֹיִם 'all the nations') occurs very freq. in OT as a designation of non-Jewish peoples (1 S $8^{5.\ 20}$, 2 K 18^{33} 19^{17}, 1 Ch 14^{17} 16^{24}, 2 Ch 32^{23} 36^{14}, Neh 5^{17}, Ps 79^{10} 106^{47} etc.). The phrase gĕlīl haggoïim (גְּלִיל הַגּוֹיִם 'circle of the nations') was applied to a district in the N. of Pal., whose population contained a large Gentile element. It is most familiar to us under its NT form 'Galilee of the Gentiles' (Mt 4^{15}). The LXX equivalent of גּוֹיִם is ἔθνη, which is the regular term for Gentiles in NT as well as in Apocr. (e.g. 1 Es 5^{69} 8^{89}, Wis 14^{11} 15^{15}). The form ἐθνικός occurs in NT three times (Mt 6^{7} 18^{17}, and in the correct text of 3 Jn ^{8}), the adverbial form ἐθνικῶς ('after the manner of Gentiles') once (Gal 2^{14}).

Another designation, practically identical with goïim, is hā-'ărāẓôth, 'the lands' (הָאֲרָצוֹת, more fully עַמֵּי הָאֲרָצוֹת or כִּמְלְכוֹת הָאֲרָצוֹת 'peoples or kingdoms of the lands'). This term is characteristic of late Heb. (occurring 23 times in Ezk and 22 times in Ch, cf. Jer 16^{15}, Dn 9^{7} $11^{40.\ 42}$, Ps 105^{44} 106^{27} 107^{3} 116^{9}).

In NT Ἕλληνες ('Greeks') is sometimes used, especially by St. Paul, as syn. with Gentiles (Ro 2^{9}, 1 Co 12^{13} etc.). The same writer employs ἔθνη in a twofold sense, either as = pagan Gentiles in opposition to the Jews (Ro 2^{14} 3^{29}, Gal 2^{8}) or as = Gentile in opposition to Jewish Christians (Ro 11^{13}, Gal $2^{12.\ 14}$). This double usage is well illustrated by comparing Eph 3^{1} with 4^{17}, in both of which passages ἔθνη is used; but in the first it is simply a mark of nationality, while in the second it has a moral touch, as is often the case with goïim in OT and ἔθνη in the Apocr., where Gentiles is sometimes practically equivalent to heathen (2 K 16^{3} 21^{2}, Ezr 6^{21}, Ps $2^{1.\ 8}$, Jer 10^{2} etc.). From this point of view τὰ ἔθνη, the nations outside Isr., have no part in the covenants of promise (Eph 2^{12}), hence the emphasis which NT lays upon the new order of things when the mystery of the gospel (Eph 6^{19}) is made known (Ac 10^{45} 11^{18} 15^{9} etc.), until, finally, the difference between Jew and Gentile having disappeared, the word ἔθνη (heathen) may be simply opposed to the (united) Christian Church (1 Co 5^{1} 10^{20} 12^{2}, 1 Th 4^{5}, 1 P 2^{12}).

Israel's attitude towards other nations, never marked by much cordiality, underwent most important modifications in the post-exilic period. The reformation of Ezra deliberately aimed at fostering that spirit of exclusiveness which gave so much offence to the Gentile world, and which lent not a little colour to the charge of Tacitus (Hist. v. 5, cf. 1 Th 2^{15}) and others, that the Jews were enemies of the human race. Even to enter the house of a Gentile, and much more to eat with him, involved ceremonial uncleanness (Jn 18^{28}, Ac 10^{28} 11^{3}). In the Talm. (Aboda Zara, i. 1, 2) we find it enacted that for three days before and after a heathen festival it was unlawful to transact business with G., to lend to or borrow from them, to pay money to or receive it from them. Side by side, indeed, with this exclusiveness, a proselytizing tendency was developed, to which we find allusions both in Jos. and NT (Ant. XX. ii.–iv., Mt 23^{15}). By what seems at first a strange inconsistency, but which is easily susceptible of explanation, even G. who were not proselytes might have sacrifices offered in the temple. This, which is implied in Lv 22^{25}, is expressly asserted by Jos. (c. Ap. ii. 5; Wars, II. xvii. 2–4; Ant. XI. viii. 5, XIII. viii. 2, XVI. ii. 1, XVIII. v. 3; cf. 1 Mac 7^{33}). But that the G. could enter into full participation in the blessings of salvation except through the portal of Judaism, was an idea that dawned very slowly upon the minds even of some of the apostles of our Lord. The OT prophets suffered from the same limitations of vision. Even Deutero-Isaiah, who delights to describe the mission of Isr. to be a light to the G. (Is 42^{6} 49^{6}), doubtless regarded conformity to Israel's law as necessary on the part of the latter. It is true that Isaiah himself reaches the sublime conception of Egypt and Assyria being, equally with Israel, the object of God's complacency (Is 19^{23-25}), and that something approaching the conception of a universal religion set free from every trammel of national individuality is reached in Is 56^{6-7} and Zeph $3^{9.\ 10}$. But these exceptions simply prove the rule. Even the Hel. Jews did not necessarily through contact with the G. rise superior to the ancestral contempt for everything outside the pale of Judaism. On the contrary, their pride and exclusiveness were sometimes intensified, as we see from the bitter opposition with which they met the work of St. Paul. And in the Christian Church itself there was considerable friction between Jewish and G. Christians—a fact which, in spite of the exaggerated importance attached to it by the Tübingen school, must never be left out of account in our construction of the early history of the Church. GENTILES, COURT OF.—See Temple.

GENTLENESS.—The word 'gentle' does not occur in OT except in RV of Jer 11^{19}, which tr^{s} כֶּבֶשׂ אַלּוּף 'a gentle lamb,' where AV has 'a lamb or an ox.' It occurs five times in NT (AV). In 1 Th 2^{7} and 2 Ti 2^{24} it corresponds to ἤπιος; it is the character proper to a nurse among trying children, or a teacher with refractory pupils. The RV keeps 'gentle' in both these passages, and it would be hard to find a better word. In Tit 3^{2}, Ja 3^{17}, 1 P 2^{18} 'gentle' is the AV tr. of ἐπιεικής. The difficulty of this word is shown by the fact that in 1 Ti 3^{3} it is rendered 'patient,' while in Ph 4^{5} τὸ ἐπιεικὲς ὑμῶν is tr. 'your moderation.' Yet RV uniformly renders ἐπιεικής 'gentle,' and in Ph 4^{5}, though it displaces 'moderation' by 'forbearance,' it puts 'gentleness' in the margin.

The general idea of the word 'ἐπιεικής' is that which is suggested by equity as opposed to strict legal justice; it expresses the quality of considerateness, of readiness to look humanely and reasonably at the facts of a case. There is a good discussion of it in Trench, Syn. § xliii.: he thinks there are no words in English which answer exactly to it, the ideas of equity and fairness, which are essential to its import, usually getting less than justice in the proposed equivalents. As opposed to πραΰτης, 'meekness,' it is not easy to draw any other distinction than that πραΰτης is more inward and passive, a disposition or habit of the mind itself; ἐπιείκεια, 'gentleness,' is shown actively in relation to others. These words are found together, as characteristic of Christ, in 2 Co 10^{1}; ἐπιείκεια occurs once again in Ac 24^{4}, but here both AV and RV render it 'clemency.' 'Gentleness' in Gal 5^{22} is χρηστότης, a word which rather means 'goodness' or 'kindness.' The corresponding adjective is rendered in various places 'good,' 'kind,' 'gracious,' 'easy.'

The only occurrence of 'gentleness' in OT is 2 S 22^{36} = Ps 18^{35} 'Thy gentleness hath made me great.' The RV keeps 'gentleness' in the text, but gives 'condescension' in the margin, which is much better. It is properly 'thy lowliness' (עֲנְוָתְךָ), i.e., as Cheyne explains it, 'thy fellow-feeling with the lowly.' The key to the meaning is found in comparing such passages as Ps $113^{5f.}$, Is 57^{15}, Zec 9^{9}, Mt 11^{29}. The rendering of 2 S 22^{36} in LXX, ἡ ὑπακοή σου ἐπλήθυνέν με, agrees with the MT עֲנְתָךְ (עָנָה = respondere = ὑπακούειν). J. DENNEY.

GENUBATH (גְּנֻבַת, cf. Palmyrene גנבא, de Vogüé, No. 137, Γανηβάθ AB Luc.).—Son of Hadad, the fugitive Edomite prince, by the sister of Tahpenes queen of the Pharaoh who ruled Egypt at the close of the reign of David and the commencement of that of Solomon. Genubath was weaned by queen Tahpenes, and brought up in the palace among the sons of Pharaoh (1 K $11^{19.\ 20}$).

GEOGRAPHY.—See PALESTINE, WORLD.

GEOLOGY OF PALESTINE.—In dealing with this subject the name 'Palestine' will be taken in its widest sense to include both the western and eastern sections of country lying on either side of the Jordan-Arabah depression, as well as the mountainous region of Sinai on the south.

There are few countries in which the physical features more clearly indicate the internal geological structure than that we have now to consider; hence, in dealing with these features under distinct heads, we shall have to explain how they are dependent on the nature and position of the formations of which they are constructed.

I. PHYSICAL DIVISIONS.—The whole region is physically divisible into five sections or tracts of country, which the student of Scripture will find to be curiously interwoven with the historical events and incidents therein recorded. Indeed it may be said that without some knowledge of the features of Palestine it is impossible to understand accurately, or to grasp in their full meaning, many of the most important events of Bible history. Many of the articles in this work will serve to illustrate this statement.

1. The Maritime Plain.—The first of these physical tracts is the Maritime Plain, stretching along the Mediterranean coast from the Delta of the Nile to the base of Carmel, and including the land of Philistia and part of Phœnicia. Historically, 'the River of Egypt' (Wady el-'Arîsh), a waterless dell emptying into Lake Serbonis, should be regarded as the western border of Palestine, but physically it is not of importance. The Maritime Plain consists of a series of low, undulating hills and wide valleys rising into levels of 300 to 400 ft. above the sea inwards to the base of the central tableland; or, west of Gaza, gradually merging into the elevated plain of the Badiet et-Tîh. It is composed of sand, gravel, and soft calcareous sandstone; but considerable areas are covered by a rich brownish loam with exceedingly fertile properties, capable of producing wheat and other plants in abundance. Throughout almost its whole length the coast is bordered by a range of sandhills—sometimes rising to a height of 150 ft.—which are ever moving inland, impelled by the westerly winds, except where hindered by natural or artificial barriers; the natural barriers being streams. North of Carmel, the plain of Esdraelon (Sanjak Akka) is the representative of the Maritime Plain of Philistia, and it extends northwards with a gradually narrowing breadth to the mouth of the Nahr el-Kelb at Beirût. This line of coast was originally decorated with palm trees, and gave rise to the name of Phœnicia, by which it is known in ancient history.

2. The Tableland of Western Palestine and the Desert of the Tîh.—This forms the central and largest physical district of Palestine, stretching from the base of the Lebanon to the northern margin of the mountainous region of Sinai. On the west it is bounded by the low-lying Maritime tract just described, except where the bold headland of Mount Carmel thrusts itself out into the very waters of the Mediterranean; and on the east by the deep depression of the Jordan-Arabah Valley. Along its centre it consists of an elevated plateau of limestone; or, more frequently, of a narrow ridge invaded by deep ravines coming up from the Maritime Plain on the one hand, and from the Jordanic Valley on the other. Along this ridge runs the main high road from Syria to Hebron and the Sinaitic peninsula; and most of the important towns, including Safed, Bethel, Jerusalem, Bethlehem, and Hebron, are planted on this saddle. Some of the higher points rise to considerable elevations ranging up to over 3000 ft.; thus, Jerusalem at the temple area reaches 2593 ft., and Hebron 3040 ft. above the level of the Mediterranean. Towards the south (lat. 31° N.) the tableland of southern Judæa broadens out into the arid expanse of the Badiet et-Tîh ('Desert of the wanderings'), which stretches southwards as far as lat. 29°, and is perhaps the least known of any part of N. Palestine. It consists of a vast expanse of Cretaceous and Nummulite limestone breaking off along a high escarpment overlooking the plain of Lower Egypt and the Gulf of Suez towards the west, and in the opposite direction forming the western margin of the Wady el-Arabah along a somewhat indented line of limestone cliffs. Towards the south the Badiet et-Tîh terminates in the lofty escarpment of Jebel Ejmeh, which reaches a level of over 5000 ft. above the Red Sea, and is formed of strata of nearly horizontal limestone superimposed on others of Nubian sandstone. To the south of this grand rampart of terraced strata rise the lofty ridges and peaks of the Sinaitic mountains.

The Badiet et-Tîh forms a nearly barren, repulsive, but broken tableland of an average level of 4000 ft., with little pasturage except in the neighbourhood of a few springs, and along the course of the valleys. That it was at a former period well watered we have clear evidence in the existence of these valleys themselves, some of which yield an intermittent supply of water, especially those which connect with the rivers Jeib and Fikreh, which enter the Dead Sea from the south. Kadesh-barnea was doubtless situated near the eastern margin of the Badiet et-Tîh.

The streams which descend on either hand from the tableland of Western Palestine generally have their sources in copious springs rising through the limestone strata — which, being highly porous, readily absorb the rain or snow which falls during the winter months. The rain thus imbibed sinks down and forms underground reservoirs which feed the springs. The valleys are generally bounded by steep, sometimes precipitous, banks of limestone; and, owing to the extraordinary depth of the Jordan Valley and its close proximity to the sources, the streams descending from the central watershed on the east side to enter the Jordan or Dead Sea have a very rapid fall. Thus the Wady el-Aujeh, which has its source at Mezráh esh-Sherkiyeh at a level of about 3000 ft. above the Mediterranean, reaches the Jordan at a depth of 1200 ft. below the same plane, having a fall of 4200 ft. within a distance of 15 miles, that is, at the rate of 280 ft. per mile. The Kelt (brook Cherith?), which rises at Bireh (Beeroth) at a height of 2800 ft. and flows for the most part between lofty walls of rock for a distance of 21 miles, reaches the Jordan at a depth of 1170 ft. below the Mediterranean level, the fall being at the rate of about 190 ft. per mile; and lastly, the Wady en-Nar (brook Kidron) rising to the east of Jerusalem after flowing through the deep gorge of Mar Saba, enters the Dead Sea at a level of 1290 ft. below that of the sea, and has a total fall of about 3692 ft. in 14 miles, being at the rate of 264 ft. per mile. The streams entering the Mediterranean have necessarily a less precipitous course, and flow with a gentle current on reaching the Maritime Plain. Throughout the greater part of their extent the hills of Western Palestine are very bare of soil, the limestone strata of which they are formed being clearly traceable by the eye along their flanks, or cropping out under the feet at the summit. But in the valleys where soil has accumulated, and especially where there is artificial irrigation, the fertility is extraordinary and amply rewards cultivation.

(3) The Jordan-Arabah Valley. — The third physical feature is that of the Jordan-Arabah Valley intervening between the tableland of Western Palestine and the high plateau of Edom, Moab, and the Jaulán. Commencing in Cœle-Syria at the base of the Lebanon, it ranges southwards to the Dead Sea, when it descends to its lowest level of 1292 ft. below the surface of the Mediterranean, as determined by the officers of the Ordnance Survey (see DEAD SEA); then continuing southwards, the floor of the valley gradually rises to a level of about 640 ft. above the same plane at er-Rishy, from which it descends with a very gentle slope to the head of the Gulf of 'Akabah, of which it forms the physical prolongation. As already stated (see ARABAH), this great depression coincides with a line of 'fault' (or fracture of the earth's crust), along which the strata have been vertically elevated on the east side, or depressed on the west—a view which can be demonstrated at many points by a comparison of the strata along the opposite sides of the valley. Thus at the saddle of er-Rishy, above referred to, we find the Cretaceous limestone forming the cliffs on the west side of the valley, while on the opposite side the Edomite cliffs are composed of masses of granite, porphyry, and schist surmounted by the Nubian sandstone, which is in turn overlain above Petra, at a level of about 4000 ft., by the same Cretaceous limestone of er-Rishy; being very nearly the amount of the vertical displacement of the strata which occurs along the line of fault at this spot. Somewhat similar are the relations of the rocks at the southern end of the Dead Sea; but along the line of the Jordanic Valley towards the Sea of Tiberias the displacement diminishes considerably, so that Cretaceous limestones are found forming both sides of the valley. The Jordan-Arabah 'fault' generally keeps very close to the base of the cliffs forming the eastern margin of the valley, and numerous branching, or parallel, 'faults' accompany the main line of displacement, at least in the region south of the Dead Sea.

The floor of the Jordan-Arabah Valley is formed of alluvial terraces, gravel, blown sand, and mud flats. The terraces are of various ages, the more ancient occupying higher levels; the more recent being only a little elevated above the waters of the Jordan and Dead Sea. The highest and most ancient of the terraces are those seen at Ayûn Buweirdeh, occupying a position in the centre of the valley about 30 miles S. of the southern end of the Dead Sea, and at a level nearly corresponding to that of the Mediterranean. They are formed of calcareous marls with fresh- or brackish-water shells of the genera Neritina, Melania, Melanopsis, etc., and point to a time when the waters of a great lake occupied a position about 1300 ft. above the present surface of the Dead Sea. This lake must have extended northwards, so as to include the whole of the Jordan Valley as far as the Lake of Hûleh, a distance of about 200 miles. Next in importance to the terrace above described is that which may be recognized all round the margin of the Dead Sea hollow, known as the 'Ghor,' rising about 600 ft. above its surface —and formed of saliferous marls with gypsum on the west side, and of gravel and sand on the east. The salt terrace (Khasm Usdum) is referable to this horizon; and besides this, there are two or three distinct terraces at lower levels. The surface of the Sea of Tiberias which lies in the upper part of the Jordan Valley is 682 ft. below that of the Mediterranean, while the Lake of Hûleh rises to 7 ft. above this level. Still proceeding northwards the Jordan itself has its source in the copious fountains of Banias (Cæsarea Philippi) which burst forth, 'full grown at birth,' from the base of Mount Hermon, fed by the well-nigh perennial snows which crown the dome-shaped summit, which, at a height of 10,000 ft. above the level of the sea, dominates all objects terrestrial as far as the eye can reach.*

(4) The Tableland of Edom, Moab, and the Jaulân.— This section of country has to some extent been described under the head of the ARABAH (wh. see). Bounded on the west by the deep depression above described, it forms the western margin of the great Arabian Desert, the home of the wandering Bedawîn. Commencing on the north at the base of Mount Hermon, it stretches as a gradually ascending tableland southwards, through the Jaulân and Haurân (Trachonitis), into the ancient kingdoms of Ammon, Moab, and

* For an account of these springs, see Tristram, Land of Israel[2], 585.

Edom. Breaking off along a steep escarpment or series of scarps on the western side, on overlooking the Dead Sea it reaches a level of 3000 ft. above the Mediterranean, and farther south at Petra rises to still higher levels. In this latter part of its range the escarpment is much broken by ravines which penetrate its sides, and cause repetitions of the features along lines of 'faulting'; but, on approaching the head of the Gulf of 'Akabah, the escarpment becomes more consolidated, and the granite walls, penetrated by numerous igneous dykes of porphyry, basalt, and diorite, rise with an abrupt ascent from the Valley of the Arabah to levels of 5000 or 6000 ft. above the surface of the gulf. Here the intensely red colour assumed by the rocks has given rise to the name Jebel en-Nur ('mountain of fire') which is applied to the heights above 'Akabah. At this point the gorge of the Wady el-Ithem offers the only accessible road by which the Arabian Desert can be reached from the Arabah Valley until we arrive opposite Mount Hor (Jebel Haroun) at a distance of 45 miles to the northward, and this must consequently have been the route by which the Israelites circumvented the land of Edom when marching towards the plains of Moab on their way to the Promised Land;—the more direct way having been denied them by the king of Edom (Nu 20^{14-21}). The flanks of the tableland are intersected by numerous channels of mountain torrents—those to the southward near 'Akabah being generally dry, except after thunderstorms, when they bring down quantities of stones and shingle which they throw out in fan-shaped ramps at the mouth of each wady. A perennial stream, however, flows through the Wady Mûsa at Petra and along the Wady Haroun. But when we reach the borders of Moab and a region of greater rainfall to the northward, streams become more frequent and copious, and the Hessi, Kerat, the Arnon (Mojib), and Zerka Ma'in (Callirhoë), together with numerous smaller brooks, descend the slopes into the Dead Sea from perennial springs.

The southern portion of this tableland within the limits here imposed is made of very ancient formations, consisting of granite, schist, porphyry, and other igneous rocks which pass, in a northerly direction towards Petra, below great masses of red and variegated sandstone of, perhaps, two geological ages, the Carboniferous and Cretaceous. These sandstones often rise in courses of cyclopian masonry above the granitic base; sometimes forming terraces, sometimes truncated pyramids, or rampart-like breastworks, of which Mount Hor offers a striking example. These sandstone strata line the flanks of the escarpment to some, not well-determined, point in the Jordan Valley north of the Dead Sea; but they are everywhere superimposed by the white calcareous strata of Cretaceous age which gradually descend northwards from the Edomite plateau to the bed of the Jordan itself, and constitute the sides of the Jordanic Valley to the margin of the Sea of Galilee.

The region of the Jaulân and Haurân, which in some sense forms a continuation of the Moabite plateau, is an elevated plain formed altogether of sheets of basaltic lava, from the surface of which rise the truncated cones of extinct volcanoes, generally clothed with forests of oak. It is altogether uncertain at what period the volcanic fires became extinct, but it seems probable that it was not later than the close of the Pleistocene, or Glacial period, and was therefore synchronous with the gradual recession of the waters of the great Jordan Valley lake; the proximity of water being necessary to volcanic activity. On the other hand, the relations of the lava streams, both in this region and in the vicinity of the Dead Sea, to the Cretaceous strata, make it clear that the period of greatest volcanic action was long posterior to the age of these rocks themselves, and may be referred to that of the Pliocene. There is, moreover, no evidence that these volcanoes were in active eruption during the period of the early occupation of the country by man.

(5) The Sinaitic Peninsula.—In marked contrast, both as regards form and colour, to the plateaux and terraces of Western Palestine and the Badiet et-Tîh, characterized by greyish and yellowish tints, is the mountainous region of Sinai lying between the two arms of the Red Sea, and bounded along the northern margin by the escarpment of the Cretaceous and Nummulite limestones of Jebel Ejmeh above described. Here we find ourselves in presence of a group of noble mountains, crowned by peaks and serrated ridges, traversed by broad sinuous valleys which form the highways by which the traveller must find his way, and which are now generally dry, though once the channels of rivers and streams. The Sinaitic mountains are formed of rocks amongst the most ancient in the world, and referable to the Archæan age; and, as they are bare and destitute of verdure, they rise above the valleys in naked walls rich in their natural colouring of red, purple, and blue. It is only along the valleys that the green of verdure is seen, owing to the growth of small scrub and desert flowers, with groups of palms and tamarisks around the springs of water. These rescue the region from the reproach of utter barrenness, and allow the Arab to pitch his camp, and even to pasture his flocks of sheep and goats. The mountain summits rise to high elevations. At the head of the group stands the twin-peaked Jebel Katharina, reaching a height of 8551 ft. above the sea; next, Jebel Umm Shomer, 8449 ft.; then Jebel Mûsa (the traditional Mount Sinai), 7373 ft.; and Jebel Serbâl, which though not the highest is certainly the most striking of the series, because of its isolated position and serried outline; its summit reaches an elevation of 6734 ft. above the Gulf of Suez.* Standing on the summit of Sinai, the scene is most striking and impressive. The tumultuous assemblage of peaks and serrated ridges formed of rocks of granite and porphyry, whose natural reddish tints have been deepened and intensified by the powerful rays of the sun; the profound gorges and valleys walled in by lofty cliffs of naked rock; the absence of trees and verdure, except along the floors of the valleys, —all tend to impress the beholder with the conviction that he is here gazing on the face of nature under one of her most savage forms, in which the ideas of solitude, waste, and desolation contend with those of awe and admiration. This assemblage of peaks and ridges is bounded towards the east and west by the deep depressions of the Gulfs of Suez and 'Akabah; towards the north, distant glimpses of the tableland of the Tîh are obtained; while the mountains of Edom, rising beyond the Gulf of 'Akabah and the valley of the Arabah, bound the view in the direction of the great Desert of Arabia.

II. Geological Formations.—The formations of which the above tracts of country are composed range from the most ancient to the most recent;—but with wide gaps in the general succession as determined in other regions. For example, we have no representatives of the Cambrian, Silurian, Devonian, Permian, Triassic, or Jurassic formations, all of which are well developed in the British Islands; and we are therefore driven to the conclusion that Palestine presented conditions unsuited to the deposition of strata during these periods; or else that beds belonging to one or more of these periods having been deposited, had afterwards been removed by denuding agencies; but this is the less probable supposition.

* The elevations were determined by the officers of the Ordnance Survey of Sinai. The height of Jebel Mûsa, calculated by Mr. R. Laurence from Suez by aneroid, was 7585 ft., and from 'Akabah was 7595 ft., both over those of the Ordnance Survey, but probably less reliable. (See Hull, Mount Seir, 48).

The general succession of the formations present in Palestine is as follows in descending order:—

Geological Formations.
Recent	1. Sandhills and Desert sands. 2. Alluvial deposits of the Jordan and other streams.
From Pluvial to Pliocene.	1. Raised sea-beaches; sand and gravel with shells. 2. Calcareous marls, saliferous beds, sand and gravel forming terraces in the Jordan-Arabah Valley; old Lake beds in Arabia-Petræa.
More Recent Volcanic rocks	Basalt, dolerite, tuff, etc.
Eocene	1. Calcareous Sandstone of Philistia (?). 2. Nummulite limestone series.
Cretaceous	1. Cretaceous limestone with marls, etc. 2. 'Nubian sandstone.'
Lower Carboniferous	1. Wady Nasb limestone. 2. Desert sandstone and conglomerate.
Volcanic Series	Agglomerates, beds of lava, ashes, and tuff of indeterminate age.
Archæan	Granitic gneiss, granite, hornblendic and other schists; dykes of diorite, porphyry, etc.

(a) Archæan. — These rocks are found only amongst the Sinaitic and Edomite mountains, and are considered to be the representatives of the crystalline masses which come to the surface from beneath the Nubian sandstone at the First Cataract of the Nile. They lie at the base of all the formations in this part of the world, and have been referred by Fraas to the Archæan period.* They consist of hornblendic, chloritic, and talcose schists of the Wadis Nasb, Sarabit, and Feirân, underlain by reddish and greyish granite and gneiss. These rocks are penetrated by innumerable dykes and ridges of red felstone-porphyry, diorite, and basalt, of later, but indeterminate, age; except that they are more ancient than the Nubian sandstone of the Cretaceous period, or the Desert sandstone of the Carboniferous.

(b) Volcanic Series.—To the period of these dykes may be referable the stratified lavas, tuffs, and agglomerates of the Wady Haroun and Jebel esh-Shomrah (or Shomar) which form the basement beds east of the Dead Sea,† and are overlain by the Desert sandstone. Magnificent sections of agglomerate and igneous intrusions are laid open in the Wady el-Hessi, near es-Safieh, but their age is indeterminate beyond the fact that they are later than the Archæan and earlier than the Cretaceous or Carboniferous periods.

(c) Carboniferous Beds. — One of the most remarkable discoveries amongst the geological series of Palestine was that of Carboniferous rocks in the Wady Nasb by H. Bauerman in 1868,‡ afterwards extended to the eastern bank of the Dead Sea at Lebruj, near es-Safieh, by the Expedition of the PEF in 1883–84.§ The formation consists of red, purple, and variegated sandstone, which the writer has named 'the Desert sandstone' below, surmounted by blue limestone containing shells and corals of Carboniferous limestone species, such as Spirifer striatus, S. attenuatus, Productus scabriculus, Orthis michelini, Syringopora ramulosa, Fenestella plebia (?), and others. The occurrence of these strata in two widely-separated localities suggests the idea that they once occupied an extended and connected area, and have subsequently been dissevered by denudation. That the limestone is a marine deposit formed over the floor of the sea during a period of submergence, is shown by the names of the fossils above quoted, which are all of marine species and genera. These fragmental tracts may only be relics of a formation which included the upper division of the Carboniferous system, but which has been subsequently removed by denuding agencies.

(d) Cretaceous Beds; Nubian Sandstone (Russegger).—In the absence of several formations which in Europe and the British Isles succeed the Carboniferous, the Cretaceous strata are found in Arabia Petræa resting on an eroded surface of the older formations above described, whether of Carboniferous or of Archæan age. The formation is, however, only found represented by its upper members; the lower, belonging to the stages Neocomian, Urgonian, Aptian, and Albian not being here represented. Notwithstanding this hiatus, the Cretaceous is the most important of all the formations of Palestine, stretching from the southern margin of the Badiet et-Tîh to the Lebanon, and forming large tracts of the great Arabian desert east of the Jordan-Arabah depression. It is represented by two divisions; the lower or Nubian sandstone (Cenomanian of D'Orbigny) the equivalent of our 'Upper Greensand,' and by the Cretaceous limestone and marl, the equivalents of our Chalk and Chalkmarl (Senonian and Turonian). The Nubian sandstone consists of red and variegated, rather soft sandstone with a conglomerate of small pebbles of quartzite, granite, porphyry, and jasper at its base. Its thickness is exceedingly variable, owing to the irregularities of the floor of older rocks over which it was deposited, and its only fossils are fragments of plants at rare intervals. All along the escarpment of the Tîh from the Wady Hamr to the Gulf of 'Akabah it underlies the white limestones and marls of the upper Cretaceous beds, and along the flanks of the great western escarpment from 'Akabah to the northern end of the Dead Sea and beyond it is interposed between the crystalline rocks and the same calcareous strata.* On approaching the Sinaitic mountains, the Nubian and Desert sandstones may be observed in isolated masses capping the Archæan rocks; sometimes rising from their bases in truncated pyramids; and in the Wady el-'Ain, which is a continuation of the Wady Zelagah, one of the most remarkable old river courses in the peninsula, the walls of Nubian sandstone rise on either hand to a height of several hundred feet above the floor.† But it is in the Wady Mûsa at Petra that this formation is displayed to best advantage. Rising in nearly vertical walls from the floor of the valley and its branches, the sandstone has formed the material out of which the tombs and temples have been sculptured in various forms of architecture, displaying marvellous varieties of colour in yellow, orange, red, and purple shades, which have called forth the admiration of all travellers (see PETRA). These colours are due to the presence of various mineral pigments, of which oxides of iron, manganese, and possibly copper, are the most abundant.

The Nubian sandstone is probably a lacustrine deposit laid down over the floor of a vast inland lake, the boundaries of which, owing to extensive geological changes, it is now impossible to define except at distant intervals. One portion of this boundary was undoubtedly formed of the rocks of the Sinaitic group of mountains; other portions may be discovered in Central Africa; and the lake itself may have been connected with the Cretaceous ocean in the direction of the Mediterranean.* The formation was accumulated from the waste of granitic and plutonic rocks forming the surrounding lands now partly submerged beneath the waters of the ocean.

(e) Cretaceous Limestone.—This great series of calcareous strata immediately succeeds the Nubian sandstone; and as it is altogether a marine deposit, it must have been formed over the bed of the ocean after a general subsidence and submergence of the region occupied by the lacustrine waters of the previous period. The lower beds are chiefly formed of white calcareous marls succeeded by harder limestone strata with bands of siliceous chert or flint. The following section taken in the Wady el-Hessi, at the S.E. border of the Badiet et-Tîh, will serve to give a general idea of the character of the lower portion of the formation. (1) Lowest beds;—light-blue calcareous marl, passing downwards into dark-blue clay with selenite, 250 ft. thick; (2) soft white limestone, with rare bands of chert, 200 ft.; (3) hard siliceous limestone with numerous bands of chert, forming the top of the cliff, about 200 ft. thick. Fine sections are also laid open on ascending the flanks of the escarpment overlooking the basin of the Dead Sea (the 'Ghor') on the eastern side, of which Lartet gives the details.† The total thickness of the Cretaceous limestone series may reach 800 to 1000 ft., and amongst the fossil forms the following may be cited: Ammonites Luynesi, A. rhotamargensis, Pholadomya Luynesi, Ostrea Mermeti, O. flabellata, Hippurites, etc. Foraminifera, visible only under the microscope, doubtless are abundantly present.

Building Stone.—The uppermost beds of the Cretaceous limestone yield an excellent building stone which has been used in the construction of the buildings in and about Jerusalem, including the walls of the temple. The stone has been extracted from the large quarries and caverns near the Damascus gate. The rock is hard, compact, and delicately coloured, capable not only of furnishing large blocks such as may be seen at the 'Wailing Place of the Jews,' but of being worked into ornaments and smaller objects of use, and of receiving a polish. Fraas gives the following section of the beds in descending order at this spot‡:—

1. Craie blanche (Senonien).
2. Étage supérieure des Hippurites ('Misseh').
3. Étage inférieure des Hippurites ('Melekeh').
4. Zone of Ammonites rhotomargensis (Turonian).

No. 2 ('Misseh') of the above section affords the principal building stone, and is 16 ft. in thickness; and Sir C. W. Wilson has shown that the reservoirs, sepulchres, and cellars under and around the city are excavated in the soft beds of No. 3 ('Melekeh') underlying the firmer beds of the 'Misseh,' which form the platforms for the buildings.§

(f) Lower Eocene Beds; Nummulite Limestone.—This formation, though belonging to the Tertiary division of the geological series, immediately succeeds the Cretaceous limestone just described, and bears so general a resemblance to it that together they appear to constitute one great calcareous formation, incapable of separation. This apparent continuity is, however, illusory, as has been shown by Zittel in the case of Egypt and the Nubian Desert; and a detailed survey would doubtless have the result of showing that the two formations are disconnected by an unconformity, however slight. The latest explorer of the geological features of Palestine, Dr. Blanckenkorn, is clearly of opinion that the two formations are capable of separation;* and Lartet had previously expressed the same view.

The Nummulite limestone is but sparingly represented in Palestine. It forms the southern slopes of part of the Lebanon,† is found capping Mount Carmel, and occurs in isolated masses at Sebastieh (Samaria), Nablûs (Shechem), and the vicinity of Jerusalem. It also overspreads a large tract of the western Tîh plateau, as it has been identified by its characteristic fossils in the limestone cliffs which overlook the Isthmus of Suez, but its inland limits remain to be determined with any degree of accuracy.

The lower beds of the formation consist of white marls and chalky limestone with Nummulites, surmounting the harder beds of Cretaceous age: these are succeeded by white limestones with bands of flint, resembling those of the latter period; and, as Lartet has pointed out, this general resemblance causes much uncertainty in the discrimination of the two formations on the spot. The Nummulite limestone is an oceanic deposit laid down under similar conditions of deposition to those of the Cretaceous beds, but with an interval of slight disturbance and movement in the floor of the sea. The fossils are distinctly of Tertiary genera and species.

(g) Upper Eocene? Calcareous Sandstone of Philistia.—This formation is frequently laid open in small sections between Beersheba and Jaffa, and in the Plain of Philistia. It consists of soft yellowish calcareous sandstone; but its relations to the Cretaceous and Nummulite beds are unknown, as the junction has not been observed. The writer has provisionally assigned these strata to the Upper Eocene stage, for reasons which are too much involved to be stated at length here.‡ No fossils were noticed in the sandstone; and it is only right to observe that Blanckenkorn considers it to be of post-Tertiary or Diluvial origin. Its real age is one of those points remaining to be determined by future exploration.

(h) Miocene Period.—This epoch in the geological history of Palestine is unrepresented by any known strata; yet it was one of the greatest importance as regards the development of the physical features of this region, and, it may be added, of that of the whole basin of the Mediterranean and surrounding districts. The Miocene was the great land-forming epoch, during which the general outlines of the existing land surfaces were finally determined, and the relative areas of land and sea were constituted as they exist to this day. Down to the close of the preceding Eocene epoch the whole of Palestine, including the Lebanon and the Great Desert east of the Arabah, formed the bed of the ocean, the only emergent portions being the Sinaitic mountain-tops; all to the northward, eastward, and westward as far as the borders of the Atlas mountains, was overspread by the waters of the ocean. But with the close of the Eocene period a great physical change set in. Owing to contraction and movements in the crust, the seabed was elevated into land in the tracts bordering the Great Sea. Mountains, such as the Lebanon, were upraised; the strata were bent, folded, and fissured; and amongst the greatest of these fissures was that of the Jordan-Arabah Valley, along which the tableland of Edom and Moab was elevated into land. In a word, all the main physical features of the region here being passed under review had their first inception; and although they have been somewhat modified during succeeding periods, these modifications have not materially altered the main outlines of the land. River channels have been originated and deepened, and the land-surfaces have been somewhat eroded and worn down, but the main features remain as they were at the close of the Miocene period. These terrestrial changes occupied, without doubt, a vast length of geological time.

* In North Africa the boundary lay along the northern base of the Ahaggar Mountains in lat. 25° N. and the Morocco Atlas on the north, as the present writer has shown elsewhere; 'Geological History of Egypt and the Nile Valley,' Trans. Vict. Inst. vol. xxiv. p. 307 (with Map).

(i) Pliocene to Pluvial.—The deposits referable to this period consist of raised beaches on the areas bordering the Mediterranean and Red Seas, and the terraces of the Jordan-Arabah Valley; these latter having been already described, our observations here will be confined to the old sea-terraces.

After the great emergence and elevation of land areas which had taken place during the preceding Miocene period, there appears to have been a subsidence to the extent of at least 220 or 230 ft. around the shores of the Mediterranean and Red Seas. The escarpments bordering the Delta of the Nile, and those of the Tîh and Western Palestine, again became sea-cliffs, with beaches at their base, while the waters of the Mediterranean and Red Seas commingled along the Isthmus of Suez. The amount of the submergence, as above stated, is demonstrated in the clearest manner by the occurrence of old sea-beaches both in Egypt and Palestine, at or about this level; of which the most remarkable is that known as 'Fraas' beach,' at Jebel Mokattam, above Cairo, and again at the Great Pyramid platform near Ghizeh. This occurs at a level of 220 ft. above the sea, and is characterized by beds of sand and gravel with marine shells, some of which are extinct species, while others are still living in the Red Sea; the cliffs of limestone are also penetrated by numerous borings of Teredo. Similar beds of gravel with shells may be observed on the eastern margin of the Gulf of Suez, as well as in the Arabah Valley up to a level of nearly 200 ft. above the Gulf of 'Akabah. But the most important case is that occurring in the valley of the Sherîah at Tell Abu Hareireh, east of Gaza, at a level of 200 to 220 ft. above the Mediterranean on both sides of the stream—a level corresponding to that of the raised beach above Cairo. Here the terrace lies in a hollow formed in the 'calcareous sandstone of Philistia,' which is clearly of older date than the shelly gravels of the raised beach: the following is the section in descending order;—

1. Loam	5	0	thick.
2. Soft calcareous sandstone in thin layers	10	0	,,
3. Beds of shells (chiefly casts) . . .	0	6	,,
4. Soft calcareous sandstone, with small pebbles of flint and oyster shells .	5	0	,,
5. River-bed; hard calcareous sandstone (thickness unknown) . . . (over)	2	0	,,

The shells in bed No. 3 consist of the genera Turritella, Dentalium, Artemis, Pecten, Cardium, Ostrea, and spines of Echinus.*

All along the lower parts of the Maritime Plain extending for several miles inland from Jaffa, and rising from 200 to 300 ft., shelly sands and beds of gravel may be observed; and again inland from Beirût this ancient sea-bed may be observed at intervals, varying in character and composition, as at Ramleh, Lydda (Ludd) and Lokandel el-Motram in the valley between Beirût and the western spurs of the Lebanon, where it consists of conglomerate of water-worn pebbles of limestone, and may be referable to the later Pliocene age. The more recent sea-beaches, formed during the rising of the beds in the Pleistocene age, occupy lower levels, and are characterized by Mediterranean forms, such as Pectunculus violascens, Purpura hemastoma, and Murex brandaris, etc.

The submergence of the Palestine and adjoining areas, after the present land-surface had been determined, and subsequent re-elevation to existing levels, is therefore clearly determined by the above instances of old sea-margins. Meanwhile, in the region of the Jordan-Arabah depression, corresponding changes had been going on, resulting in the formation of terraces at various levels from that of the outer sea to the present margins of the inland lakes, but in time extending into the Pleistocene (or Pluvial) period; with some account of which, as far as it concerns the Palestine area, our review of the geological history of this region properly ends.

(j) Pluvial to Recent.—The general refrigeration of the climate in the northern hemisphere referable to the Glacial epoch, which was accompanied in the temperate zone by accumulations of snow and the advance of glacial ice, did not leave Palestine altogether unaffected; on the contrary, it has left indelible traces on its physical features. We know through the observations of several travellers, commencing with Sir J. D. Hooker, that there are old glacier morsines in the Lebanon at a level of 4000 ft. above the sea, and that one of the principal groups of old cedars is planted on a large moraine.* The presence of glaciers in the Lebanon being thus established, we necessarily infer the existence of a climate resembling rather that of the Caucasus and the Alps than that of the present day; perhaps we may say that the mean annual temperature, which is now about 70° Fahr., was at this epoch of extreme cold about 55° or 60°, and a correspondingly lower temperature extended over all the countries to the south of the Lebanon.† A further inference may be drawn, namely, that the rainfall all over Palestine, and extending into the Sinaitic peninsula, was considerably larger than at present, and the evaporation less rapid; and the general result would be that the present rivers and streams would have been larger, and valleys which, like those of the Badiet el-Tîh, are now destitute of streams, were channels for running water. It may be readily conceived that, when the perennial snows of the Lebanon were melting during the spring and summer, the waters of the Jordan were swollen far beyond their present limits, and that the surface of the Dead Sea, now retained at its present low level by the equalization of river supply and evaporation, must have risen to a limit far above that of the present day. We cannot, therefore, feel surprise at the evidences of former greater levels of the 'Jordan-Valley lake' afforded by the terraces rising hundreds of feet above the present surface of the Dead Sea, which have been described; they were the necessary result of greater influx of waters from streams, and of smaller evaporation, due to the humidity of the atmosphere and decreased temperature in the climate as compared with that of the present day. As the glacial conditions of the Pleistocene epoch passed away, and those of the present day gradually came into operation by a corresponding process in an opposite direction, the lakes and streams would naturally assume their present limits, or in some instances actually disappear. GEORGIAN VERSION.—See VERSION.

GEPHYRUN (Γεφυρούν).—A city captured by Judas Maccabæus, 2 Mac 12[13]. AV, perhaps rightly accentuating γεφυροῦν (infin. of γεφυρόω), tr. 'he went also about to make a bridge to a certain city.' RV has 'he also fell upon a certain city Gephyrun,' and appends marginal note, 'The relation between the names Gephyrun and Caspin is unknown, and perhaps the Greek text is corrupt. Compare Gephrun, the name of a city of Gilead mentioned by Polybius, v. lxx. 12, and Caspor, 1 Mac 5[26. 36].' Jos. (Ant. XII. viii. 5) gives the name as Ephron. The site is unknown.

GER (גֵּר) is a Heb. term which in AV is generally rendered 'stranger.' The fact that the same tr[n] is adopted also for other words whose proper equivalent is 'foreigner,' creates needless confusion, which might be avoided either by leaving gêr, which is a technical term, untranslated, or by translating it 'protected stranger.' Driver (Deut. p. 126) suggests that the rendering might uniformly be 'sojourner' (so frequently in RV), which would preserve the connexion in EV with the verb 'sojourn' (גּוּר) in such passages as Gn 12[10] 19[9] 47[4], Is 52[4].

In opposition to the nokhri, who is often a mere passing stranger ('thou camest but yesterday,' 2 S 15[20]), the gêr, while not homeborn, is a temporary dweller in the land (Gn 23[4] [P] תּוֹשָׁב) of Abraham at Hebron; Ex 2[22] [J] of Moses in the desert, 18[3] [E] to explain the name Gershom; fig. of J", Jer 14[8]; of Israel in Egypt, Gn 15[13], Ex 22[21] 23[9] [all JE], Lv 19[34] [H], Dt 10[19] 23[8]; more frequently of gêrim in Israel (e.g. 2 S 1[13] an Amalekite, cf. Jos 8[33. 35] [E] 20[9] [P], Is 14[1]). The LXX, which twice transliterates גֵּר (Aram. גִּיּוֹר) by γ(ε)ιώραε, Ex 12[19], Is 14[1], uses πάροικος 11 times to tr. גֵּר and 10 times for תּוֹשָׁב. πάροικος answers to the classical μέτοικος (which is not used by LXX except in Jer 20[3] and not at all in NT). μέτοικος designated a resident in a community who had not the same rights as a native citizen. As גֵּר occupies a position intermediate between אֶזְרָח (native) and נָכְרִי (foreigner), so does μέτοικος between ἀστός or πολίτης and ξένος. Of course the μέτοικος was from one point of view a foreigner, and might be called ξένος; hence οἱ ἐπιδημοῦντες ξένοι is in Ac 17[21] rightly applied to the μέτοικοι at Athens. πάροικος appears in NT in same sense as in LXX (Ac 7[6. 29], Eph 2[19], 1 P 2[11]). The ξένοι καὶ πάροικοι of Eph 2[19] is specially instructive; it answers exactly to the peregrini atque incolæ of Cic. de Offic. i. 34.

The gêr in the oldest time is a stranger who dwells under the protection of a family or a tribe to which he does not belong. He is not necessarily a non-Israelite. In Dt 18[6] Jg 17[7-9] 19[1] the term is applied to Levites (see Driver and Moore, ad loc.). The position of the gêr in Israel is illustrated by W. R. Smith from the precisely analogous institution of the jár among the Arabs. He lives in the midst of the community personally free, but possessed of no political rights. He has left his own kin, it may be on account of a feud, or simply in order to benefit himself, and has cast himself upon the protection of a powerful chief or clan in his new dwelling-place. The institution is still known in Arabia (OTJC[2] 342 n.).

In return for the protection accorded him the gêr had services to render. He was not indeed a slave (Micah's Levite not only enjoyed personal freedom but received wages, Jg 17[10], Gn 29[15], Dt 24[14]), but his lot was at times hard enough (cf. Gn 31[7-40] Jacob's complaint of his treatment by Laban). Nothing evidences the precarious position of the gêr better than the frequent OT exhortations to act justly by him Dt 1[16] 24[17] 27[19], to show him kindness Dt 10[19] 26[12], to refrain from oppressing him Ex 22[21] 23[9] (both JE), Lv 19[33] (H), Dt 24[14], Jer 7[6], Zec 7[10]. Hence probably also the repeated injunction that he was to enjoy the Sabbath rest Ex 20[10] 23[12] (both JE), Dt 5[14].

A man might be the gêr of a king or of the chief of a clan rather than of the whole community. A typical instance of this is found in David's relation to Achish of Gath. The Phil. lords will have nothing to do with 'these Hebrews' (1 S 29[3]). David as the gêr of Achish was expected to make the interests of his patron his own (1 S 27[12]), and in particular to go to war along with him even against his native country (28[1ff.]).

A whole clan or tribe might be gêrim (Jos 9 the Gibeonites, 2 S 4[2] the Beerothites; and even Israel in Egypt is described as a gêr Gn 15[13], Ex 22[21] 23[9] [all JE], Lv 19[34] (H), Dt 10[19] 23[8]). In such cases, also, services had to be rendered in return for protection (e.g. by Jacob's family according to their occupation Gn 47[6], by the Gibeonites in hewing wood and drawing water Jos 9[27], by the Israelites in the building of cities Ex 1[13f.]). It frequently happened that these gêrim were ultimately absorbed into the tribe whose protection they had invoked. See FOREIGNER, and cf. Kuenen, Rel. Isr. i. 182 f.

There were also gêrim of a god or a temple, who acted as ἱερόδουλοι in return for the protection accorded by the deity or the sanctuary. Evidence of this is furnished by such Phœn. proper names as Ger'ashtart (see ASHTORETH, p. 168[a]), Germelkart, etc. (cf. the גּר of Ps 5[4] 15[1] 61[4], and see Cheyne, ad loc., and W. R. Smith, RS p. 77 ff.). The Gibeonites may have belonged to this class, and the list of 'Nethinim' (Ezr 2[43ff.] = Neh 7[46ff.]) contains many names of unquestionably foreign origin (Wellh. Proleg. 225 n.).

The close connexion which subsisted in the popular imagination between each land and its god, demanded that whoever settled there must serve the tutelary deity (2 K 17[24ff.] the story of the Assyr. colonists of Samaria). Hence the Sabbath rest (Ex 20[10] 23[12], Dt 5[14]) is not only a privilege enjoyed by the gêr, but an obligation imposed upon him. On the other hand, we read of Solomon (and it corresponds with the cosmopolitan character of his policy) that he built sanctuaries at Jerus. for a number of foreign deities (1 K 11[7f.]). These were doubtless intended to serve, not only for his wives, but for others belonging to foreign nationalities who had been attracted to his capital, and who may have had, as in later times (Neh 13[16]), their own quarter of the city. In like manner, the Israelites who had bazaars at Damascus (1 K 20[34]) prob. erected altars built of earth from the land of Israel (cf. 2 K 5[17]), and maintained the worship of J" side by side with that of the Syrian gods. Solomon's example was copied by Ahab for the benefit of his wife and of the Tyrians and Zidonians who would frequent his court (1 K 16[32f.]).

This syncretism in worship and tolerance of dissent from the national religion, which were greatly favoured by the existence of a multitude of local sanctuaries, received a check through the introduction of the Deuteronomic legislation with its central sanctuary, but far more through the enactments of the Priests' Code (P). The ideas introduced in Dt of Israel as a holy people, and of the land as not to be 'defiled' (21[23]), led logically to the conclusion that the gêr who sojourned in Israel must conform as far as possible to the same regulations as the covenant people. Accordingly, we meet with an extension both of the privileges and the duties of the gêr. In D, indeed, matters are not carried so far as in P. In Dt 14[21] the gêr is allowed to eat the flesh of an animal that has died of itself, acc. to Lv 17[15] he is defiled no less than the Isr. by such an act. On the other hand, no difference is recognized between Isr. and gêr in the following particulars:—The gêr is to participate in the Feast of Weeks (Dt 16[10f.]), of Tabernacles (16[13f.]), in the offering of first-fruits (26[11]), the Sabbath rest (5[14], cf. Ex 20[10] 23[12], JE), the tithes (14[28f.]), the gleanings of the field, etc.

(24$^{19ff.}$), and he is to have equal justice done to him (24^{14}).

The exile helped to draw the bonds of union closer between Israelite and gêr, both alike being now strangers in a strange land. Hence in Ezk 47$^{22f.}$ we find the same provision made for both in the ideal division of the land. On the other hand, in addition to the keeping of the Sabbath, we are probably safe to infer that circumcision was considered by Ezekiel to be obligatory for the gêr (cf. Ezk 44$^{6-10}$ where uncircumcised 'in heart' and 'in flesh' are parallel terms). Deutero-Isaiah anticipates the conversion to Israel's God, not only of individuals (44^{5}), but of kings and princes (49^{7}) as well as their subjects (51$^{4f.}$), nay, he foresees a time when to that God 'every knee shall bow and every tongue shall swear' (45^{23}). In bringing about this consummation Israel has its function as a missionary nation (42$^{6.\ 19}$ 43$^{8.\ 11}$ 49^{6}). The creed of Deutero-Isaiah is, 'There is no God but J", and Israel is His prophet' (Wellh. Gesch. p. 117).

This universalism, indeed, could, according to the notions of most, realize itself only through the forms of Judaism. Non-Israelites must submit to the yoke of Israel's law. In post-exilic times the exclusion from the community of all who would not adopt the drastic reforms of Ezra and Nehemiah, enabled one and the same standard to be applied to the purified remnant. Hence, 'in P the gêr is placed practically on the same footing as the native Israelite; he enjoys the same rights (Nu 35^{15}, cf. Ezk 47^{22}), and is bound by the same laws, whether civil (Lv 24^{22}), moral and religious (18^{26} 20^{2} 24^{16}, cf. Ezk 14^{7}), or ceremonial (Ex 12^{19}, Lv 16^{29} 17$^{8.\ 10.\ 12.\ 13.\ 15}$ 22^{18}, Nu 15$^{14.\ 26.\ 30}$ 19^{10}); the principle, "One law shall there be for the home-born and for the stranger," is repeatedly affirmed (Ex 12^{49}, Lv 24^{22}, Nu $^{9.\ 14}$ 15$^{15.\ 16.\ 29}$), the only specified distinctions being that the gêr, if he would keep the passover' (which under no circumstances is the foreigner [בֶּן־נֵכָר] permitted to do), 'must be circumcised (Ex 12^{48}), and that an Israelite in servitude with him may be redeemed before the jubilee (Lv 25$^{48f.}$), a privilege not granted in the case of the master's being an Israelite (v.$^{40f.}$)' (Driver, Deut. p. 165).

After the definite breach with the Samaritans (Neh 13$^{28ff.}$), and the establishment of the temple on Mt. Gerizim (Jos. Ant. XI. viii.), the propagandist activity of Jerus. would be stimulated, and it would be felt that the way was more clear to work. There may be a reminiscence of this policy and its results in what the Chronicler reports to have taken place in the reign of Hezekiah (2 Ch 30$^{1ff.}$, cf. 1 Ch 13^{2}, 2 Ch 15^{9}). As Schürer points out, the word gêr has already in P advanced far on to its later use as = proselyte (προσήλυτος, which frequently in LXX represents גֵּר of MT). This meaning appears completely established in the Mishna, where gêr denotes one who by circumcision and complete adoption of Israel's laws has become incorporated with the covenant people. If this last sense was intended to be brought out with special distinctness, the phrase גֵּר צֶדֶק ('righteous stranger') was used. For gêr in the original sense of a stranger dwelling in Israel, the Mishnic formula was גֵּר תּוֹשָׁב (in OT these terms are parallel in Gn 23^{4}, Lv 25$^{23.\ 35.\ 47}$, 1 Ch 29^{15}, Ps 39^{12}), which in mediæval Judaism became גֵּר שַׁעַר = a stranger dwelling within the gates of Israel (cf. Ex 20^{10}, Dt 5^{14} 14^{21} 24^{14}). The use of גֵּר to designate a converted Gentile became finally so well established that a verb (occurring in the Mishna) was formed from it, גִּתְגַּיֵּר 'to become a convert' (Schürer, HJP II. ii. 315).

The battle which had been fought and gained by Ezra and Nehemiah had indeed to be fought over again more than once in Jewish history, notably in the Gr. period by the MACCABEES (which see); but for the further elucidation of the subject we must refer the reader to such articles as HASIDÆANS, PHARISEE, PROSELYTE.

GERA (גֵּרָא).—Mentioned as one of Benjamin's sons in Gn 46^{21}, omitted in Nu 26$^{38-40}$. Acc. to 1 Ch 8$^{3.\ 5.\ 7}$ G. is a son of Bela and a grandson of Benjamin. Gera was evidently a well-known Benjamite clan, to which belonged Ehud (Jg 3^{15} where see Moore's note) and Shimei (2 S 16^{5} 19$^{16.\ 18}$, 1 K 2^{8}). See GENEALOGY.

GERAH.—See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

GERAR (גְּרָר, Γέραρα).—This place, as identified on existing maps, is about 6 miles from Gaza, a little W. of S., and perhaps 25 miles from Beersheba in a direction N. of W. Gerar is mentioned in OT in the history of the time of king Asa and in that of the patriarchs. In Asa's time it was one of several cities in that region (2 Ch 14$^{13.\ 14}$). (In 1 Ch 4^{39} Gerar should possibly be substituted for Gedor of MT. The LXX reads Γέραρα. See GEDOR). In the earlier time, G. is the region where Abraham and Isaac came into contact with a king or kings named Abimelech. The site as now identified is well within the territory properly known as the land of the Philistines. The region as mentioned in Ch and Gn must have extended far to the S., and far enough to the E. to cover part of what is elsewhere known as the Negeb, or S. country.

Were the people whom Abraham and Isaac met in this region true Philistines? That is, did they belong to the same race that afterwards so often oppressed Israel? Their essentially pastoral character is no argument in the negative, for Israel was then also a pastoral people. The region is called the land of the Philistines (Gn 21$^{32.\ 34}$), but that is not in itself decisive, for the writer uses the geog. terms belonging to his own time, and not necessarily to the time of Abraham. The people are called Philistines (Gn 26$^{1.\ 8.\ 14.\ 15.\ 18}$), but even that is not so conclusive as at first it seems, for the term may be merely geographical, describing the people who, in the time of Abraham, lived in the country which the writer knew as Philistine. But Abimelech seems to have been a Phil. name (Ps 34, title). Phichol, the 'captain of his host' (Gn 21$^{22.\ 32}$ 26^{26}), is witness to the existence of military organization, such as corresponds with the genius of the later Philistines. Ahuzzath (26^{26}) is naturally explained as one of the Phil. names in ăth, like Goliath. Add these confirmatory particulars to those above given, and we have proof of considerable strength identifying the Philistines of Isaac with those of later times.

G. was a well-known place in the earlier centuries after Christ. A monastery was located there. The abbot Sylvanus, of the 4th cent., was celebrated; and Marcion, bishop of G., was one of the signatories of the Council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451. The Talm. writings know the district as Gerarki (Euseb.; Jerome, Onomast.; Sozomen, Hist. Eccles. vi. 32, ix. 7; Schwarz, Pal. p. 109). Travellers of the present cent. have given a good deal of attention to this region, e.g. Thomson, Land and Book, ii. 350; Stanley, Sin. and Pal. p. 159; Robinson, Researches, i. 189, ii. 43, 44. GERASA (Γέρασα, Γερασηνοί).—In the RV 'Gerasenes' takes the place of 'Gadarenes' in Mk 5^{1}, Lk 8^{26}; with these exceptions the expression 'the country of the Gerasenes' does not occur in the Bible. See GADARA, GERASENES.

Jerome (ad Obad. 1) states that Gilead was called in his day Gerasa, and it is possible that the term 'country of the Gerasenes' (or Gilead) may have extended as far as the Lake of Gennesaret; but as Gilead is usually supposed to have been terminated on its northern boundary by the Hieromax, it seems more probable that the 'country of the Gerasenes' (Mk 5^{1}) refers to a town of the name of Gerasa on the eastern shore of Gennesaret (see GERASENES, and cf. Origen, Opp. 4, p. 140). According to Ptolemy (v. 15), Gerasa was a city of Cœle-Syria (which included Gilead), 35 miles from Pella; and Pliny describes it (v. 18), Gerasa being read for Galasa, as one of the cities of the Decapolis which was built or rebuilt, colonized and endowed with privileges on the conquest of Syria by the Romans, B.C. 65 (Stephanus, Ethnic.). Eusebius (Onomast. s.v.) describes the Decapolis as that part of Peræa 'that lies about Hippos, Pella, and Gadara.' Josephus (BJ III. iii. 3) places Gerasa in the district of Peræa, east of Jordan, on the borders of the Arabian desert, and mentions it in connexion with Pella and Philadelphia (BJ I. iv. 8). Epiphanius (Adv. Hær. i. and ii.) describes Decapolis as around Pella and Basanets, and speaks of the fountain of Gerasa of Arabia. Jamblicus states that it was colonized by veterans of Alexander the Great, which is not improbable from its proximity to Pella, which was probably colonized in this manner.

The early history of Gerasa is unknown; it first appears in history as an important fortified city in the account of i s capture (c. 83 B.C.; BJ I. iv. 8) by Alexander Jannæus, the Hasmonæan king of the Jews. Having subdued Pella, he directed his march on the city of Gerasa, lured by the treasures of Theodorus, son of Zeno, and, having hemmed in the garrison by a triple wall of circumvallation, carried the place by assault. In Ant. XIII. xv. 3 Pella is called Dios, or placed close to it, and Gerasa is called Essa. In A.D. 65 Gerasa, as one of the cities of Decapolis, was probably rebuilt by the Romans. On the revolt of the Jews against the Roman dominion they laid waste the villages of the S rians and their neighbouring cities, among which were Gerasa and Pella; and 'every city was divided into two armies, encamped one against another'; but the Gerasenes did no harm to those Jews who abode amongst them, and even conducted those who wished it as far as their border (BJ II. xv. 1, 5). Shortly after this, Vespasian sent Lucius Annius to Gerasa with an army, who took the city and slew a thousand young men, and plundered and burned the city (BJ IV. ix. 1). Nothing further is heard of Gerasa in history; but during the peaceful age of the Antonines (A.D. 138 to 180) it attained a position of the greatest prosperity, and was adorned by monuments, which, still existing, show that it became one of the most important cities of Syria. It subsequently became the seat of a bishopric, and the name of one of its prelates is found amongst those who were present at the Council of Chalcedon. There is no evidence that the city was ever inhabited by the Arabs after the Roman and Byzantine period. In the Talmudic writings and in Jerome, Gerash and Gilead are synonymous. Reland states that coins of Gerasa exist, showing the worship of Artemis in the temple there in 2nd cent. (cf. Schürer, HJP II. i. 118). During the Crusades Baldwin (A.D. 1121) besieged a castle constructed of large stones called Jarras, supposed to be Gerasa; but William of Tyre, in speaking of the siege, makes the distance not far from the Jordan; and as Gerasa has no appearance of having been occupied by any settled population since its destruction during the Byzantine period, it was probably some other castle that Baldwin attacked.

It is probable that the fountains and waters of Palestine, where conveniently situated, mark the sites of towns and villages from the earliest times, and that the splendid perennial stream and fountains of Jerâsh must have been chosen as a position for a town at a very early date. No identification, however, appears to have been attempted with any success except that by Sir George Grove with reference to Ramoth-gilead. He points out that if Ramoth-gilead and Ramath-mizpah are identical, a more northern position than es-Salt would seem inevitable, and that the Arabic version of the Bk. of Joshua gives Ramat el-Jerash, thus identifying the Gerasa of the classical geographers with Ramah of Gilead. The Jewish traveller Parchi says that 'Gilead is at present Djerash' (Zunz in Asher's Benjamin, 405). See RAMOTH-GILEAD.

Jerâsh is situated in the Belḳa of the modern Arabs, near their best pasture ground, which is referred to in the Bible (Dt 3^{10} 4^{43}; see Driver's note) as plains (mîshôr), in RV 'tablelands,' thus having the same signification, to a limited extent, as the Arabic name Jerâsh.

There can be no doubt that the very remarkable ruins still existing in good preservation in the highlands of Gilead, called Jerâsh, represent the remains of the Roman city of Gerasa of the time of the Antonines; and although these ruins, so far as they have yet been observed, are distinctly attributable to the 2nd to 5th cents., there is no reasonable doubt that they are built on the site of the earlier Greek city of Gerasa. This locality is mentioned by Yakûbi in the 7th cent. as being in his time one of the towns of the Jordan Provinces, and the poet Al Mutanabbi praises the fertility of Jerâsh. Yakût in the 13th cent., who had not himself seen the spot, describes it as a 'great city now in ruins' through which runs a stream which turned many mills, and relates that the Jerâsh mountains contained many villages.

Jerâsh is beautifully situated in the highlands of Gilead, 20 miles east of the Jordan, the same distance north of 'Ammân (Philadelphia), 22 miles from Fâhel (Pella), and 6 miles north of Wady Zerḳa (Jabbok). It is 1900 ft. above the level of the Mediterranean, in the midst of hills rising from 500 to 600 ft. higher, until the tablelands (mishôr), called by the Arabs Belḳa, are reached, which during part of the year are rich pasture, and for a short period in the autumn appear to be desert. The city occupies a considerable portion of a shallow valley, the ruins stretching some way up the limestone hills; and through the midst runs a delightful perennial stream fringed with oleanders, and falling about 1000 ft. before reaching the Zerḳa, 6 miles to south. The city is surrounded by walls, built in the outline of an irregular nine-sided polygon, about 3000 yards in circumference, the stream dividing it into two nearly equal parts: the greater portion to the west, on which side are all the public buildings; the private buildings occupying the east side of the stream and the higher ground to the west. The site of the city is undulating and full of knolls, affording most excellent positions for public buildings. The walls of the city are much decayed, and in some parts have been quite removed—they have been 8 ft. thick, and are built of small squared stones of limestone. There have been at least six gates in the wall—three to west, one to east, and the two principal north and south gates. Between these two gates runs a paved road with a double row of columns on the west side of the stream, close to it on the north and about 100 yards from it on the south; the public buildings are constructed in connexion with this main thoroughfare. They were all of about the same date, and, taking it all together, this city is the most complete example of the Roman work of the time of the Antonines in Syria. They are constructed on one general plan, and cannot be considered in architectural remains to be inferior to Palmyra, though the ruins of the latter cover a far larger area. Reference to the works of Wood and Dawkins and the photographs taken by Pal. Explor. Fund in 1867 will show that each city has a distinct architectural character.

On approaching Jerâsh from the south, attention is attracted by a fine arch of triumph of decorated stone in the Corinthian order, with three arched passages and a front of 80 ft., leading to a paved Roman road running for about 300 yards northerly to the southern gate of the city. On the left-hand side is a naumachia or theatre for naval contests, about 700 ft. by 300 ft., with its arena below the level of the surrounding ground, in order that it might be filled from an aqueduct which supplied water from the stream. On the left, among the hills, is the Necropolis, and sarcophagi of black basalt with Roman devices are to be seen lying about. The southern gate is in ruins, but it is similar in appearance to the triumphal arch. The main street on entering the city bears to the left, leading to an oval colonnade or hippodrome, 310 ft. by 230 ft., lined with columns 2 ft. 5 in. in diameter, with capitals of the Ionic order, supporting a plain entablature. Immediately to the left on entering the city are a large theatre and a temple. The theatre facing north is open, and is constructed to seat over 2000 people, with a closed stage 110 ft. across; it is lavishly decorated in the Corinthian order. The temple facing nearly east is peripteral, measuring 110 ft. by 85 ft. along the walls outside the cell; the columns are 4 ft. in diameter and spaced at 12 ft. intervals from centre to centre. Near the northern end of the hippodrome the main street, 22 ft. wide, leads in a straight line direct to the north gate, and is adorned with a row of columns on each side with Corinthian capitals supporting an entablature. The columns are about 3 ft. or more in diameter. The road, 22 ft. wide, is paved with hard stone, which has still the marks of chariot wheels, and at the sides are raised pavements for foot passengers. At a distance of about 100 yards is a cross street at right angles, also with a double row of columns, leading up the hill on the left to the west gate, and to the right over the stream by a Roman bridge; four large pedestals, 12 ft. square, at the cross streets still remain, where statues once adorned the city. About 50 yards from the cross streets are some ruined palaces, with columns 4 ft. in diameter, with fragments of Egyptian rose granite and remains of frieze, cornice, and pediment, on which decorations have been lavished with great exuberance, with an inscription apparently containing the name of Marcus Aurelius Antoninus (A.D. 161–180); and at about 100 yards from the cross street, both right and left, are the remains of a series of handsome buildings, one a basilica, grouped in relation to the great temple of the Sun, which stands on a natural eminence nearly in the centre of the city in the western quarter. The temple facing the east measures round the walls of cell 89½ ft. by 44½ ft., the platform is 14 ft. wide on each side. It has at the entrance 12 columns, 5 ft. in diameter, spaced at intervals of 12½ ft. from centre to centre; 11 of these magnificent columns still remain in situ, 10 of them surmounted by their Corinthian capitals. All the buildings about the temple have been highly ornamented. From an inscription copied by Burckhardt it would appear that these buildings were erected in the time of Antoninus Pius, A.D. 138–161. Proceeding farther north we come to a second street of intersections, with a handsome rotunda over the intersection; the cross street leads on the left to another theatre, and on the right to an extensive building supposed to have been a bathing establishment. The theatre is not so large as that to the south, and has an open stage or scene. On the east bank of the river to the north is another Corinthian temple facing west, a very unusual aspect for temples of the 2nd and 3rd cents. in Palestine.

There are many other ruins of public buildings not enumerated whose identity has not been established, and a number of inscriptions (more than ten), two of which, near the ruins of a building supposed to have been a church, south of the temple of the Sun, refer to the establishment of Christianity and the discontinuance of pagan worship of about 5th cent., an important piece of evidence in connexion with the subject in Syria (Conder, Palestine, p. 180). The stream which runs through Jerâsh is principally fed from springs within the city on east side. There are very full accounts of Jerâsh in the travels of Buckingham, Burckhardt, Irby, and Mangles, but no recent surveys have been made. Jerâsh was visited by the present writer in 1867, and a sketch plan of the city was made and several plans of temples, which have not yet been published. Fifteen photographs of ruins also were taken, which have been published by the Palestine Exploration Fund.

GERASENES.—The country of the Gerasenes (AV of Mt 8[28] Gergesenes; Mt 5[1] Lk 8[26] Gadarenes; RV in Mt Gadarenes, in Mk and Lk Gerasenes) is referred to in NT only in connexion with the casting out of the legion of demons and their entry into the herd of swine. There are three distinct readings of the name of the people in the MSS—Gergesenes, Gadarenes, Gerasenes—as the following table will show:—

	Mt	Mk	Lk
B	Γαδαρηνῶν	Γερασηνῶν	Γερασηνῶν
ℵ	Γαζαρηνῶν (ℵ[c] Γεργεσ.)	Γερασηνῶν	Γεργεσηνῶν
A	(wanting)	Γαδαρηνῶν	Γαδαρηνῶν
C	Γαδαρηνῶν (C[3] Γεργεσ.)	Γαδαρηνῶν	Γερασηνῶν (C[2] Γεργεσ.)
D	(wanting)	Γερασηνῶν	Γερασηνῶν

Thus, as WH (App. p. 11) point out, documentary evidence shows that Γαδαρηνῶν is the true reading in Mt, Γερασηνῶν in Mk and Lk.

The miracle took place 'on the other side' of the Lake of Gennesaret, which is 'over against Galilee' (i.e. on the eastern side of the lake) (Lk 8[22. 26]). And when Jesus 'was come out of the boat, straightway there met him out of the tombs a man with an unclean spirit, who had his dwelling in the tombs' (Mk 5[2]). This clearly indicates that the tombs were close to the shore of the lake, and from the following passages it appears that the tombs and city were in the proximity: Lk 8[27] 'There met him a certain man out of the city who had devils . . . and abode not in any house but in the tombs.' From the following it appears that the hills ran up directly from the coast of the lake: Lk 8[32] 'Now there was there a herd of many swine feeding on the mountains . . . and the herd rushed down the steep into the lake, and were choked.'

From this it is certain that 'the country of the Gerasenes' cannot refer to the city of Gerasa in Gilead (Jerâsh), as Gerasa is an inland town east of Jordan, near Philadelphia, towards Arabia (BJ III. iii. 3, 4), which has certainly been identified with the ruins of Jerâsh. It also appears that Gadara cannot be the city spoken of in the incident, as it (now Umm Ḳeis) is situated about six or more miles south of the Lake of Gennesaret on the summit of a high hill with the deep gorge of the river Hieromax (Jarmûk) at its foot, cutting it off from the broad plain shelving down to the lake. There was, however, a district attached to the city of Gadara, and it is possible that a place on the lake called Gerasa (not the Gerasa of the preceding art.) lay within Gadarene territory. Gadara was but 6 miles S.E. of the southern extremity of the lake, and Jos. (Vita, 9, 10) mentions Gadarene villages close to the lake side. According to Josephus, however (BJ IV. vii. 3), Gadara was the capital of Perœa, which did not extend north of the Hieromax. It is not improbable, however, that during the many vicissitudes of the administration accorded to Gadara its jurisdiction may have extended up the eastern side of the Lake of Gennesaret at the time the miracle occurred.

The problem, then, is to find a site on the east side of the lake which satisfies the biblical description and shows traces of the city and tombs. This has been successfully accomplished by Thomson (The Land and the Book, ii. 35), through the identification of the ruins of Kersa or Gersa on the eastern side of the Lake of Gennesaret, nearly half-way down from the northern end, south of the Wady Samakh (see further and especially Schumacher, The Jaulân, 179). Wilson states (Recovery of Jerusalem, p. 368) that about a mile south of this the hills, which everywhere else on the eastern side are recessed from half to three-quarters of a mile from the water's edge, approach within 40 ft. of it. They do not terminate abruptly, but there is a steep even slope, which we would identify with the 'steep place' down which the herd of swine ran violently into the sea. Macgregor (Rob Roy on the Jordan, p. 423) states, 'Between Wady Samakh and Wady Fik there are at least four distinct localities where every feature in the Scripture account of this incident may be found in combination; above them are rocks with caves in them, very suitable for tombs.' Thomson states that there are ancient tombs in the high grounds about the ruins of Kersa. Gergesa and Gerasa may thus be variations of the same name which is now found under the form of Kersa, Chersa, or Gersa, which now exist close to Wady Samakh, subject to the various pronunciations according to whether the people are from the hill country, or the plain, or from the desert. The name Gergesenes appears to be similar to that of a Canaanitish tribe (GIRGASHITES) which, according to Jos 24^{11}, would appear to have been located west of Jordan, but which Jerome (Comm. ad Gen. xv.) locates on the shore of the Sea of Tiberias. Origen also (Opp. iv. 140) alludes to the city Gergesa, which stood formerly on the eastern side of the lake, and to the precipitous descent to the water down which the swine rushed. A village, Gergesa, on a hill above the lake, is also mentioned by Eusebius and Jerome (OS^{2} p. 256, 14; p. 162, 18).

GERGESENES.—See GERASENES.

GERIZIM (הַר גְּרִזִים har Gĕrizzîm, the modern Jebel eṭ-Ṭûr).—This important mountain faces its northern companion Ebal, having in the narrow pass between them the town of Nâblus (Neapolis), the ancient Shechem. Its height, 2849 ft., makes it lower than the other by 228 ft., but it has far surpassed it in historical and religious associations. The cleft between them (to which possibly the mountain owes its name) presents the only pass from east to west in the mountain range of Ephraim, and, being also on the main road from north to south, its facility of access and central position in the land marked it out as an important place in the kingdom of Israel.

To-day, as the sacred place of the little Samaritan community, it is interesting chiefly as a monument to the vitality of religious prejudice. The Samaritan Pentateuch contains a verse giving express commandment that an altar should be built on Mt. Gerizim, making it rather than Ebal or the temple-rock of Jerusalem the first and central shrine of the chosen people and the revealed law. This knowledge of the will of the Almighty is thus confined to a small and dwindling company in a Syrian village, the rest of the world, both Jews and Gentiles, being in darkness and error; and the assumption is to them one of comfort and complacency. The Samaritans and their Mt. Gerizim thus form the world's memorial of sectarianism, after the manner of Natural History showing at once the grub and the leaf it lives upon.

The top of the mountain is broad, bare, and rocky, and among the sacred places scattered over it some refer to the Bible narrative, others to Samaritan events, and others to Christian history.

1. Patriarchal.—Abraham entered the Promised Land by the pass of Gerizim, encamping at Shechem by the oak of Moreh, Gn 12^6 (J). Gerizim is also claimed, as against Mt. Moriah in Jerusalem, to have been the mountain to which Abraham was directed when commanded to offer up Isaac, Gn 22^2 (R). Much discussion has taken place over this locality, the evidence bearing chiefly on points of distance, conspicuousness, and the meaning of the words Moreh and Moriah. The Scripture account scarcely encourages such attempted precision, as its reference is merely to 'one of the mountains,' the words 'of Moriah' being an undoubted gloss. On the whole, Gerizim or some neighbouring height accords best with the Bible description.

The Samaritans point to a trench on the S.E. end of the Gerizim summit as the spot where Isaac was laid on the altar. The Jews and Moslems agree with the Samaritans in attaching great importance to this trial by sacrifice in the life of Abraham, Jewish tradition stating that Isaac said to his father, 'Bind me fast,' and the Moslems making Ishmael, whom they substitute for Isaac, surpass this zeal by saying, 'Do not bind me.'

Samaritan tradition, arguing from the neighbourhood of the village of Salem, makes Gerizim the place where Abraham was met by Melchizedek and the king of distant Sodom (Gn $14^{17ff.}$). It is also connected with Jacob, who, on his return from Paddan-aram, bought 'the parcel of ground' for his encampment at Shechem, Gn 33^{18-20} (E). In addition to this, the Samaritans point to a spot on the summit called Khurbet Lauzeh, as the place where Jacob slept, and had the vision of divine protection and promise, Gn $28^{11f.}$ (E).

2. Israelite. — Ebal and Gerizim were the mountains on whose sides the tribes assembled under Joshua, according to the command of Moses, to hear the curses and the blessings connected with the observance of the law (Dt $11^{29.\ 32}$ $27^{11.\ 12}$, Jos $8^{33.\ 34}$). Gerizim was probably selected in preference to Ebal as the mount of blessing, because to one looking eastwards it was on the right hand, the side of good fortune (see Driver on Dt 11^{29}). The Samaritans point out a piece of flat rocky ground as the site of Joshua's altar and their own temple.

The distance from Ai, taken along with the position of Ebal and Gerizim in the centre of a hostile country, has offered a difficulty to the acceptance of the above narrative in Deuteronomy. A solution was attempted by Eusebius (Onom. sac.^{2} 253), Epiphanius, and others, by referring Ebal and Gerizim to localities nearer the Jordan Valley. But their connexion with Shechem, to which Josephus (Ant. XI. viii. 6), Eusebius, and Jerome themselves refer, has always discountenanced such a theory.

Gerizim comes again into prominence when Jotham delivered his highly figurative parable to the treacherous elders of Shechem (Jg 9^{7-21}).

Tradition has represented these two mountains as brought under the spell of the blessings and curses once pronounced upon them, declaring Gerizim to be beautiful and fertile, while Ebal is bare and barren; but at the present day they show the similarity that might be expected from their proximity, elevation, and composition.

3. Samaritan. — It is well known that the Samaritans erected a temple on Gerizim which henceforth became the rival of the temple at Jerusalem in historical claims and sanctity as a religious centre. The occasion that led to its erection, acc. to Josephus (Ant. XI. viii. 2, 4), was the marriage between Manasseh of the high-priestly family in Jerusalem and the daughter of Sanballat. This union, and many similar intermarriages, created the desire for an independent sanctuary, that would be free from the dictation of the Jerusalem authorities. It is practically certain that Josephus' chronology here is incorrect. He places the erection of the schismatic temple in the time of Alexander the Great, who, according to him, authorized its erection; but there can be little doubt that the temple on Gerizim was built a century earlier (c. 432 B.C.) by the son-in-law of Sanballat the Horonite referred to in Neh 13^{28} (cf. inter alios, Ryle, Canon of OT, 91 f.). This Samaritan temple lasted at least till the time of the Maccabees, when it was probably destroyed (c. 110 B.C) by John Hyrcanus (Jos. Ant. XIII. ix. 1; Wars, I. ii. 6). To what extent this rivalry as to the proper site of worship survived in the time of Christ, is seen in the proverbial hatred between Jews and Samaritans, and in the arguments urged by the Samaritan woman at Jacob's well (Jn $4^{20.\ 21}$).

4. Christian.—The most conspicuous ruins in Gerizim at the present day are those called in Arabic el-Kula'ah, 'the fortress.' We have here the remains of the church built by the Christians in the reign of Zeno in A.D. 475, which, having been destroyed by the Samaritans, was afterwards enlarged and fortified by Justinian in 530. See SAMARITANS.

The most interesting link with the past is the yearly celebration of the Samaritan Passover on its summit. As the sun sets on the Passover Eve, the seven lambs are slain, ceremonially examined, and roasted in the oven pit. At midnight the covering is removed, and the flesh is eaten by the standing elders with their families in the improvized tents. Anything left over is scrupulously collected and consumed, so that the letter of the commandment may be kept.

GERON should possibly appear as a proper name in 2 Mac 6^{1}, according to which Antiochus Epiphanes sent γέροντα Ἀθηναῖον (AV and RV 'an old man of Athens,' RVm 'Geron an Athenian') 'to compel the Jews to depart from the laws of their fathers.'

GERRENIANS (ἕως τῶν Γερρηνῶν, A Γεννηρῶν, AV Gerrhenians, 2 Mac 13^{24}). — When Lysias, recalled from Pal. by troubles in Syria, made peace with Judas Maccabæus in B.C. 162, he left Hegemonides as commandant 'from Ptolemais to the G.' (AV wrongly, 'made him—i.e. Judas—principal governor,' etc.). The true reading and the people intended are both uncertain. The analogy of 1 Mac 11^{59} suggests some place near the border of Egypt; but Gerrha, between Pelusium and Rhinocolura, was in Egyptian territory. Ewald (Hist., Eng. tr. v. 319) suggested that the word should be understood of the inhabitants of Gerar, an ancient Phil. city S.E. of Gaza; and this view is supported by cod. 55, which reads Γεραρηνῶν (see RVm). On the other hand, Syr. reads Gazar (ܓܙܪ), i.e. Gezer or Gazara, not far from Lydda (cf. 1 Mac $15^{28.\ 35}$).

GERSHOM (גֵּרְשֹׁם or גֵּרְשֻׁם).—1. The firstborn son of Moses and Zipporah (Ex $2^{22}=18^{3}$, both JE, 1 Ch 23^{15}). In the two former passages the writer explains the name as though it were connected with גֵּר 'a sojourner' and שָׁם 'there,' cf. the LXX form Γηρσάμ (Ex $2^{22}=18^{3}$). Unless Ex 4^{25} (J) gives us an account of his circumcision we know nothing further of G.'s life, but there are a few scattered notices of his descendants. In the pre-Massoretic text of Jg 18^{30}, supported by some cursive MSS of the LXX, Jonathan, the son of Gershom, the son of Moses, is said to have officiated as priest of the sanctuary of J″ at Dan, and it is added that the office was held by members of the family until the Captivity. The MT here reads Manasseh for Moses; so LXX, A, B, L. See Moore, in loc. In 1 Ch 23^{14} it is stated that the sons of Moses were reckoned amongst the tribe of Levi, i.e. in contradistinction to the Aaronite branch of the family, who were consecrated for special purposes. Lastly, from 1 Ch 26^{24} we learn that in the time of David a son of G. named Shebuel was 'ruler over the treasuries,' cf. 23^{16} 24^{20} (Shubael). 2. Gershon, the eldest son of Levi (1 Ch $6^{16.\ 17.\ 20.\ 43.\ 62.\ 71}$ 15^{7}). See next article. 3. A descendant of Phinehas who journeyed with Ezra from Babylon to Jerus. (Ezr 8^{2}).

GERSHON (גֵּרְשׁוֹן, called also Gershom, גֵּרְשֹׁם or גֵּרְשֻׁם, 1 Ch $6^{16.\ 17.\ 20.\ 43.\ 62.\ 71}$ 15^{7}). — All our data about G. and his family come from P and the Chronicler, the latter, however, adding nothing to P's account with regard to G. himself. According to these writers he was the firstborn of the three sons of Levi (Ex 6^{16}, Nu 3^{17}, 1 Ch $6^{1.\ 16}$ 23^{6}), born before the migration of Jacob and his family into Egypt (Gn 46^{11}). He had two sons, Libni (for whom we find Ladan in 1 Ch 23^{7} 26^{21}) and Shimei (Ex 6^{17}, Nu 3^{18}, 1 Ch $6^{17.\ 20}$). This is all that we know of G. personally, but of the fortunes of his descendants we have fuller particulars. Their history falls into three periods—(1) the wilderness wanderings; (2) the monarchy; (3) after the Exile.

1. At the time of the census taken by Moses in the wilderness of Sinai, the Gershonites were divided into two families, the Libnites and the Shimeites (Nu 3^{21}). The whole number of males from a month old was 7500 (3^{22}), and between 30 and 50 years of age 2630 ($4^{22-3.\ 38-41}$). Their position in the camp was behind the tabernacle westward (3^{23}), and their chief at this time was Eliasaph the son of Lael (3^{24}). The office assigned to them by P during the wilderness wandering was the carrying of the curtains, the coverings, the screens, and the hangings of the tabernacle, and of the Tent of Meeting, together with the accompanying cords and instruments (3^{25-27} 4^{24-26} 10^{17}). In this they were to be at the command of Aaron, and were superintended by Ithamar his son (4^{27-28}). Two waggons and four oxen were assigned to them for this service (7^{7}). In this respect of office the Gershonites were preceded by the younger family, the Kohathites. The G. are also mentioned at the time of the census taken by Moses and Eleazar in the plains of Moab by the Jordan, when the whole number of the Levites was 23,000 (26^{57}). At the allotment of Levitical cities by Joshua and Eleazar after the entry into Pal., thirteen cities in the territories of eastern Manasseh, Issachar, Asher, and Naphtali were assigned to the Gershonites (Jos $21^{6.\ 27\text{-}33}$ [P]=1 Ch $6^{62.\ 71\text{-}76}$).

2. In the reign of David, as narrated by the Chronicler, we have several references to the Gershonites.* The G. family of Asaph, together with the Kohathite family of Heman and the Merarite family of Ethan or Jeduthun, were, acc. to this writer, specially set apart to administer the temple music (cf. 1 Ch $6^{31\text{-}47}$ $25^{1\text{-}7}$; and see ASAPH). Consequently, at the bringing of the ark into Jerus., of the 130 Gershonites under the leadership of Joel who are said to have been present (1 Ch 15^{7}), Asaph and certain others took part in the music ($15^{17.\ 19}$ $16^{5.\ 7}$). Descendants of the two families of Ladan (for Libni) and Shimei are mentioned as 'heads of the fathers' houses' when David divided the Levites into courses (1 Ch $23^{7\text{-}11}$), and the sons and grandsons of Ladan are spoken of as superintendents of the treasuries at this time (1 Ch $26^{21\text{-}2}$ 29^{8}). In 1 Ch 26^{1} the marginal reading Ebiasaph should be followed. Further, in the reign of Hezekiah G. are mentioned as taking part with the other Levites in the cleansing of the temple (2 Ch $29^{12.\ 13}$), and in 2 Ch 35^{15} the Asaphite singers are recorded as present when the passover was kept in the eighteenth year of Josiah.

3. In the period after the Exile we hear a good deal of the Asaphite branch of the singers. When Zerubbabel returned to Jerusalem, 128 Asaphites (or 148 acc. to Neh 7^{44}) were included amongst his followers (Ezr 2^{41}). At the laying of the foundation of the temple, Asaphites are found leading the music (Ezr 3^{10}), and special provision appears to have been made for them (Neh 11^{22}; cf. also 1 Ch 9^{15}, Neh 11^{17} 12^{35}).

The name Gershonites (הַגֵּרְשֻׁנִי) occurs Nu $3^{21.\ 23.\ 24}$ $4^{24.\ 27.\ 28}$ 26^{57}, Jos 21^{33}, 1 Ch 23^{7}, 2 Ch 29^{12}. They are elsewhere called 'the sons of Gershon' (Ex 6^{17}, Nu $3^{18.\ 25}$ $4^{22.\ 38.\ 41}$ 7^{7} 10^{17}), or 'the children of Gershon' (Jos $21^{6.\ 27}$), or 'the sons of Gershom' (1 Ch $6^{17.\ 62.\ 71}$ 15^{7}). For their history see above. In 1 Ch 26^{21} the word is applied in sing. to Ladan, in 29^{8} to Jehiel.

GERSON (A Γηρσών, B Ταροσότομος), 1 Es 8^{29}.—In Ezr 8^{2} GERSHOM.

GERUTH-CHIMHAM (גְּרוּת כִּמְהָם Kerê, ג' כִּמּוֹהָם Kethibh) Jer 41^{17}.—A khan (?) which possibly derived its name from Chimham, the son of Barzillai the Gileadite, 2 S $19^{37f.}$. See CHIMHAM. Instead of גְּרוּת we should almost certainly read גְּדֵרוֹת 'hurdles,' after Josephus and Aquila (see Graf).

GESHAN (גֵּישָׁן).—A descendant of Caleb, 1 Ch 2^{47}. Mod. editions of AV have Gesham, although the correct form of the name appears in ed. of 1611.

GESHEM (גָּשֶׁם, Γῆσαμ, Neh 2^{19} $6^{1.\ 2}$; in 6^{6} the form Gashmu occurs).—An Arabian, who is named along with Sanballat the Horonite and Tobiah the Ammonite, as an opponent of Neh. during the rebuilding of the walls of Jerusalem. He may have belonged to an Arab community, which, as we learn from the monuments, was settled by Sargon in Samaria c. B.C. 715—this would explain his close connexion with the Samaritans; or he may have been the chief of an Arab tribe dwelling in the S. of Judah, in which case his presence would point to a coalition of all the neighbouring peoples against Jerusalem. Since the internal administration of the Persian satraps was not sufficiently firm to prevent petty feuds among subject races in distant parts of the empire, there is nothing unnatural in the mention of an alliance of Samaritans, Arabians, Ashdodites, and Ammonites against the Jews (Neh $4^{7f.}$). Geshem with his confederates mocked Neh.'s intention of repairing the walls (2^{19}); and when the walls were completed, he joined with Sanballat in inviting Neh. to a conference in the plain of Ono ($6^{1ff.}$). His authority was cited in support of the rumour that Neh. intended to rebel against the Persian king (6^{6}). H. A. WHITE.

* It must never be overlooked that it is the habit of the Chronicler to carry back many of the arrangements of his own age to the time of David.

GESHUR, GESHURITE (גְּשׁוּר, הַגְּשׁוּרִי).—A small Aramæan tribe whose territory, together with that of Maacah (wh. see), formed the W. border of Bashan (Dt 3^{14}, Jos 12^{5} 13^{11}). The Geshurites were not expelled by the half-tribe of Manasseh, to whom their land had been allotted (Jos 13^{13}), and were still ruled by an independent king in the reign of David, who married the daughter of Talmai king of Geshur (2 S 3^{3}). After the murder of his half-brother Amnon, Absalom took refuge with his maternal grandfather in 'Geshur of Aram' (2 S 13^{37} 15^{8}). Geshur and Maacah were probably situated in the modern Jaulân (Smith, HGHL p. 548, n. 9), if they are not to be identified with it (Driver, Deut. p. 56 f.). In 1 Ch 2^{23} Geshur and Aram are said to have taken the 'tent-villages' of Jair from the Israelites. On the strength of Jos 13^{2} and 1 S 27^{8}, it has been maintained that there was another tribe of this name in the neighbourhood of the Philistines. This view has been recently revived by Hommel (AHT p. 237 ff.), who regards Geshur as a contraction for Gê-Ashûr or Gê-Shûr, 'the lowland of Ashûr or Shûr,' and identifies it with the extreme southern portion of Palestine between el-'Arish ('the brook of Egypt') and Gaza (or Beersheba). According to Hommel, this tract of country was originally inhabited by the tribe of Asher (Ashûr being treated as the 'broken' or internal plural form of Asher). But even if we could follow him in his view that Shûr (Gn 16^{7} 20^{1} 25^{18}, 1 S 15^{7}) was merely a popular abbreviation of Ashûr (see SHUR), and that the latter was so called after the tribe of Asher, his derivation of Geshur must be rejected. Such a contraction as Geshur for Gê-Ashûr or Gê-Shûr (גְּשׁוּר for גֵּיא אָשׁוּר or גֵּיא שׁוּר), is entirely foreign to the Hebrew language; and, further, the meaning of gê' (גֵּיא, constr. st. of גַּיְא) is not 'lowland,' but 'ravine' or 'glen.' It is noteworthy that the B text of the LXX at 1 S 27^{8} gives only one name, omitting Geshur, which is probably an incorrect gloss (see GIRZITE). In the remaining passage (Jos 13^{2}) the context (cf. vv.$^{11.\ 13}$) renders the present reading very suspicious: possibly we should substitute וְכָל־הַגְּזֵרִי ('and all the inhabitants of Gezer') for וְכָל־הַגְּשׁוּרִי ('and all the Geshurites'). In the absence of further proof, therefore, we may conclude that the name Geshur was applied only to the country E. of the Jordan.

In 2 S 2^{9} 'Geshurites' (הַגְּשׁוּרִי) should perhaps be substituted for 'Ashurites' (הָאַשׁוּרִי). So Vulg., Syr., and Thenius, Ewald, Wellhausen. Others prefer to read הָאֲשֵׁרִי ('Asherites,' cf. Jg 1^{32}). This is adopted by Köhler, Kamphausen, Klostermann, Budde, and others. J. F. STENNING.

GESTURES.—1. An emotional necessity of Oriental life. Gesture is much resorted to by Orientals in the communication of their thoughts and expression of their feelings. This does not prove them more emotional than Anglo-Saxons, if we use this term of sincerity of feeling and its practical and permanent influence upon conduct, but they have much greater facility and variety in its expression. Where we control our feelings, they are controlled by them, not because the feelings are always stronger, but because the controlling power is less. They are more governed by the impression of the moment, and the mood changes with the occasion that produced it. Thus the passage of a funeral procession through an Oriental town makes a reverent hush among the trades and traffic of the street, and the people stand mute and motionless like a guard of honour; among the aged and infirm, lips move in prayer, and eyes are filled with tears; but when the spectacle has passed, the return to other things is rapid, easy, and complete.

In congenial company a jest may cause such merriment that one of the number will call out, 'The Lord cover (forgive) us for this laughter!' In the same way grief is vented to the point of physical reaction and dismissal. In lands that have given freedom to the press, there is an outspoken frankness about the statement of private intention and public affairs, but the feelings of the heart are kept in hallowed reserve; in the East, on the contrary, plans, motives, and expectations are seldom stated simply and sincerely, but the expression of feeling is always profuse and exuberant. The strongest possible terms of devotion to God and attachment to friends are in constant use, but only one of themselves can tell when language is the symbol of feeling and when its substitute. In modern Syria, a mere child detected in theft or falsehood at school boldly calls heaven and earth to witness that he is innocent. In the Arabic grammar, emotional apostrophe is treated as a commonplace of daily speech, and rules are provided for adjuration and imprecation. Conversation is usually conducted in a loud tone of voice; truth, in the interest of truth, is sympathetically exaggerated; the simple 'yes' and 'no' of the European are regarded as cold and deficient in humanity.

The Bible abounds in vivid narrative, and the dramatic form is approached in Job and Canticles, but neither among the Hebrews nor the Arabs has there been any dramatic literature in the European sense of the term. This may be largely due to the fact that their speech is generally so figurative and animated.

Such temperament and surroundings help to explain the fact that the language of Orientals is so rich in figure, and their spoken words to such an unusual degree helped and harmonized by appropriate gesture.

2. Expressiveness and variety of Oriental gesture.—To the European, Oriental gesture is lacking in self-command and husbanded energy, and approaches grimace and contortion. The whole body is pressed into the service. Two men engaged in warm dispute appear to be using the deaf and dumb alphabet. The body is one moment bent forward, the next is standing erect; the hands are stretched out in supplication, and then slapped and held on each side of the head in the anguish of distraction and the shock of assumed amazement. The eyes flash, and the voices rise higher, until one yields to the vehemence of the other (2 S 19^{43}), or both are separated by the bystanders (Ex 2^{13}). The head is shaken, nodded, jerked, and inclined sideways, forwards, and backwards in a variety of ways reaching in suggested meaning from indifference, impatience, acquiescence, and denial to amazement, sarcasm, denunciation, and disgust. The shrugging of the shoulders is similarly varied to express embarrassment, surprise, ignorance, and irresponsibility. An Oriental reading the Bible naturally supplies this shrug when reading Gn 25^{32} 37^{26} 44^{16}, Ex 3^{13} 15^{24} 17^{4}, 1 S 17^{29}, Ph 1^{22}, the first sentence of Rev 7^{14}, etc. In salutation the form varies with the relationship. A man greeting his senior or superior brings the hand with a round sweep towards the ground, as if he should be kneeling there, and lifts it to his breast and head, implying readiness to receive, understand, and obey commands. Relatives or intimate acquaintances meeting each other after an interval kiss each other on both cheeks. A son or daughter kisses the hand of a parent or aged relative, and the same respectful courtesy is shown towards priests as spiritual fathers. Frequently, a man meeting his friend puts out both hands as if to clasp and kiss his hand with the respect of inferior to superior, but the other is expected to defeat this intention, allowing his fingers to be touched, and by withdrawing his hand to claim the equality of a friend. When one enters a room where others are seated, those assembled rise in token of respect and welcome, this being especially observed in the case of the aged.

Many particular gestures and special actions might be noted. The beggar at the door brings his forefinger across his teeth to prove that he has eaten nothing that day (Am 4^{6}).

In friendly explanation, as an act of affectionate persuasion, and as a liberty of familiar friendship, the hand is put under the chin, and the face lifted up, or the beard stroked as Joab did to Amasa (2 S 20^{9}). The outstretched arm indicates authority and decision, if the hand is also open and extended (Ex 6^{6}); but when the fingers and thumb are drawn together to a cone, it implies a respectful request for permission to speak or interfere (Ac 21^{40}).

Naturally, the most characteristic gestures are those where the strongest emotions are called forth or appealed to, as in the dance, in bereavement, and the symbolical gestures and attitudes of Oriental prayer. See further such articles as FOOT, HAND, HEAD.

G. M. MACKIE.

GET, GETTING.—1. The verb to 'get' (of which the parts are get, *gat or got, gotten or got) is frequently used in the sense of 'go,' generally followed immediately by a personal pronoun. Thus 2 S 4^{7} 'they smote him . . . and gat them away through the plain all night' (וַיֵּלְכוּ דֶּרֶךְ הָעֲרָבָה, RV 'went by the way of the Arabah'). Four times in NT ὕπαγε, the imperat. of ὑπάγω, to 'depart,' is so tr^{d}, viz. ὕπαγε Σατανᾶ, 'Get thee hence,† Satan,' Mt 4^{10} (Rhem. 'Avant Satan'); and ὕπαγε ὀπίσω μου Σατανᾶ, 'Get thee behind me, Satan,' Mt 16^{23}, Mk 8^{33}, Lk 4^{8} (the last omitted by RV after edd.). This idiom is still bolder in earlier versions, as in Tind., Mt 27^{62} 'the hye prestes and pharises got them selves to Pilate'; Lk 22^{41} 'And he gate him selfe from them, about a stones cast'; Jn 5^{13} 'For Jesus had gotten him selfe awaye, because that ther was preace of people in the place.'

2. The same form of expression (though the idiom is different, the pron. being now the remote object) is often used when the meaning is 'find' or 'gain.' Sometimes the pers. pron. is expressed in the Heb., sometimes not. Thus Gn 34^{4} 'Get me this damsel to wife' (קַח־לִי); Ex 14^{18} 'When I have gotten me honour upon Pharaoh' (בְּהִכָּבְדִי); 2 S 20^{6} 'lest he get him fenced cities' (וְיָרְכְּשָׁא לוֹ); Ec 2^{7} 'I got me servants' (קָנִיתִי עֲבָדִים, RV 'I bought menservants'); 2^{8} 'I gathered me also silver' (וְכַנַּסְתִּי לִי); Jer 13^{1} 'Go and get thee a linen girdle' (קְנֵה לְךָ, RV 'buy thee'). This remote object is expressed otherwise than by a pers. pron. in 1 Mac 3^{3} 'So he gat his people great honour' (καὶ ἐπλάτυνεν δόξαν τῷ λαῷ αὐτοῦ).

3. Other passages deserving attention are: Gn 4^{1} 'I have gotten a man from the LORD' (קָנִיתִי אִישׁ אֶת־

* The 1611 edition of AV spells this form 'gate' everywhere except Sir 46^{2}, 1 Mac 9^{32}.

† This passage has given the phrase 'get thee hence' a meaning in mod. Eng. which it did not always carry. Thus Mk 1^{44} Tind. 'Get the hence and shewe thy silfe to the preste'; Jn 5^{11} Tind. 'Take up thy beed, and get thee hence'; and Zec 6^{9} AV 'Get you hence, walk to and fro through the earth.'

יהוה, RV 'I have gotten a man with the help of the Lord'*); Wis 10^8 'they gat not only this hurt, that they knew not the things which were good' (ἐβλάβησαν, RV 'were disabled'); Sir 13^{11} 'Smiling upon thee [he] will get out thy secrets' (ἐξετάσει, RV 'will search thee out'); 21^{11} 'getteth the understanding thereof' (κατακρατεῖ τοῦ ἐννοήματος αὐτοῦ, RV 'becometh master of the intent thereof'); 27^{19} 'so hast thou let thy neighbour go, and shalt not get him again' (οὐ θηρεύσεις αὐτόν, RV 'thou wilt not catch him again'); 1 Mac 9^{32} 'when Bacchides gat knowledge thereof' (ἔγνω, RV 'knew it'); 2 Mac 5^6 'But Jason slew his own citizens without mercy, not considering that to get the day of them of his own nation would be a most unhappy day for him' (οὐ συννοῶν τὴν εἰς τοὺς συγγενεῖς εὐημερίαν δυσημερίαν εἶναι τὴν μεγίστην, RV 'that good success against kinsmen is the greatest ill success'†).

Getting is used as a verbal subst. in Gn 31^{18} 'the cattle of his getting' (מִקְנֵה קִנְיָנוֹ, Dillm. das Vieh seines Erwerbes, 'the cattle of his possession'; Kalisch, 'the cattle of his acquisition'); and in Pr 4^7 'with all thy getting, get understanding' (בְּכָל־קִנְיָנְךָ, RV 'with all thou hast gotten': the meaning is not 'whatever thou gettest, get understanding,' but 'by means of all thy gains, get understanding'; cf. Mt 13^{46} 'went and sold all that he had, and bought it'). T. Lever (Sermons, 1550, Arber's ed. p. 117) translates Is 56^{11} 'Unshamefaste dogges, knowynge no measure of gredye gettynge.'

J. HASTINGS.

GETHER (גֶּתֶר).—Named in Gn 10^{23}, along with Uz, Hul, and Mash, as one of the 'sons of Aram' (in 1 Ch 1^{17} simply 'sons of Shem'). The clan of which he is the eponymous founder has not been identified. Dillmann considers that Knobel's explanations (Völkertafel, 235 f.) from Arabian genealogies, as well as the attempts of Glaser (Skizze d. Gesch. u. Geog. Arab. 421 f.), have failed to yield any acceptable results.

GETHSEMANE (Γεθσημανεί).—A 'plot of ground' (χωρίον, Mt 26^{36}, Mk 14^{32}), which appears to have been on the Mt. of Olives (Lk 22^{39}) and beyond the ravine of the Kidron (Jn 18^1). The 'garden' or enclosure (κῆπος) belonging to it was the scene of our Lord's Agony. The name (from גַּת 'press' and שֶׁמֶן 'oil') means 'oil-press' (on the form of the name see Dalman, Gram. 152, 289 n. 3). Leaving Jerusalem by St. Stephen's gate one comes to the traditional site of Gethsemane, at a distance of almost 50 yards beyond the bridge that spans the Kidron. A stone wall encloses a nearly square plot of ground, which contains eight very ancient olive trees. Some cling fondly to the idea that these were actual witnesses of the Agony; others hold that this is precluded by the express statement of Josephus (BJ VI. i. 1), that during the siege by Titus all the trees in the neighbourhood of Jerusalem were cut down. Robinson, Thomson, and many other recent explorers doubt the accuracy of the tradition which locates Gethsemane, although it is universally admitted that the real site cannot be far from the traditional one. The tradition in question dates only from the 4th cent., and Robinson may be right in his suggestion that the site of Gethsemane, like that of Calvary, was fixed upon during the visit of Helena to Jerusalem, A.D. 326. Eusebius (OS^{2} 248, 18) says that Gethsemane was at, Jerome (ib. 130, 22) that it was at the foot of, the Mt. of Olives. The latter adds that a church had been built over it (see the Peregrinatio Silviæ, cf. the testimony of Antoninus Martyr at the end of 6th cent.). The traditional site is objected to on the ground that it is too near the city.

GEZER (גֶּזֶר, Γάζερ, Γέζερ, Γάζαρα, Γάζης, Vulg. Gazer).—Now Tell Jezer, near the village of Abû Shûsheh and 4 miles W.N.W. of 'Amwâs, the ancient Nicopolis (see Euseb. Onom. Sac. p. 254, 14), to the right of the road from Jaffa to Jerusalem. The site, which is marked by blocks of unhewn stone and early pottery, would well repay excavation. Here have been found two inscriptions on a rock, one containing the name ΑΛΚΙΟΥ in Gr. letters, the other תחם גזר 'the boundary of Gezer' in Heb. characters of the Maccabæan age. M. Clermont-Ganneau, to whom the discovery was due, suggests that Alkios should be identified with a certain Alkios son of Simon, whose sarcophagus has been found at Lydda, and points out that Tell Jezer is the Mount Gisart of the Crusaders. The inscription may define the Sabbatic limit of the city. Josephus (Ant. VIII. vi. 1) places the town on the frontier of the territory of the Philistines; and Strabo (XVI. ii. 29), who calls it Gadaris, states that it had been appropriated by the Jews. In 1 Ch 20^4 Gezer is given in place of the otherwise unknown Gob of 2 S 21^{18} (where, however, the Sept. and Syr. read Gath).

When the Egyptians under the Pharaohs of the 18th dynasty conquered Canaan, Gezer was placed under an Egyptian governor. In the time of the Tel el-Amarna tablets (B.C. 1400) the governor was Yapakhi, and we hear of Gezer (Gazru) along with Ashkelon and Lachish sending provisions to Jerusalem. Subsequently, however, Gezer was occupied by the Bedâwi sheikh Labai (who had once been governor of Shunem) and his confederate Malchiel, and it joined in an attack on Ebed-tob, the king of Jerusalem. This was the subject of a charge brought against Labai before the Egyptian Pharaoh. When the Israelites entered Canaan, Horam (Ailam in the Sept.) was king of Gezer; he came to the help of Lachish, but was defeated and slain by Joshua (Jos 10^{33} 12^{12}). The town was included in the southern border of Ephraim, and was assigned to the Kohathite Levites (Jos 16^3 21^{21}); the Israelites, however, failed to capture it, and its Canaanite inhabitants paid tribute to the Ephraimites (Jos 16^{10}, Jg 1^{29}). A recently discovered inscription of Merenptah, the son and

* There are two difficulties: (1) קָנִיתִי 'I have gotten' is evidently meant to explain the name קַיִן Cain. See under CAIN. (2) אֶת־יהוה is either simply 'the Lord' (אֶת being the sign of the object), or 'with the Lord' (אֶת being the prep.). The prep. is not elsewhere used with יהוה (yet cf. אֶת־כִּי נְשָׂכַת־כִּי || Job 26^4). But the direct object gives so difficult a sense that most versions and commentators prefer the prep., as AV and RV. The LXX has Ἐκτησάμην ἄνθρωπον διὰ τοῦ θεοῦ; O.L., Vulg. possedi (acquisivi, procreavi) hominem per deum; Luther, Ich habe den Mann, den Herrn; Wyc. 1382, 'I haue had a man bi God,' 1388, 'Y haue gete a man bi God'; Tind. 'I haue gotten a man of the LORDE'; Cov. 'I haue opteyned the man of the LORDE'; Rog. 'I haue obteyned a man of the LORD'; Gen. 'I haue obteined a man by the Lord' [Gen. marg. That is, according to the Lord's promise, as ch. 3^{15}; some read, To the Lord, as reioycing for the sonne, whom she wolde offer to the Lord as the first frutes of her birth']; Bish. † This passage is referred to by Scrivener (Camb. Bible, p. 65 n. 1) as one of the colloquial forms which disfigure the AV Apocrypha, though he admits that it keeps up the verbal play of the Greek. It is, however, no colloquial or other English idiom, it is simply a literal tr. of the Greek. The Gen. Bible is more idiomatic, 'not considering that to have the advantage against his kinsmen is greatest disadvantage,' and it preserves the word-play also.

successor of Ramses II. (B.C. 1280), in which mention is made of the Israelites, speaks of Gezer having been taken by the Egyptians (or, according to another possible translation, by the people of Ashkelon). In the reign of Solomon it was again taken by an Egyp. Pharaoh, who handed it over to his daughter, Solomon's wife (1 K 9^{16}). Solomon thereupon restored it, as well as the neighbouring Beth-horon, and it henceforth remained in Israelitish possession. Under the name of GAZARA (wh. see), Gezer appears repeatedly during the Maccabæan struggles (1 Mac 4^{15} 7^{45} 9^{52} $13^{43.53}$ $14^{7.34}$ 15^{28} 16^{1}, 2 Mac 10^{32}). It was then an important stronghold, for whose possession both parties contended strenuously. See, further, Clermont-Ganneau, Arch. Researches in Pal. (1896), pp. 224 ff.

A. H. SAYCE.

GHOST.—Like 'ghastly' and 'aghast,' 'ghost' has had an h inserted in the course of its history—an Italian affectation, says Earle, and for the most part a toy of the Elizabethan period. The Anglo-Saxon form is gâst, the connexion of which with Ger. geist is obvious. The Middle-Eng. form is 'goost' and sometimes 'gost.' Wyclif's form is 'goost,' Tindale's 'goost' and rarely 'gost,' the Geneva 'gost,' the Rhemish NT and the AV always spell 'ghost.'

The root of the word, according to Skeat, is the Teut. GIS = Aryan GHIS = to terrify, so that the modern use of the word is as close to the primitive meaning as any other. The sense of 'apparition' or 'spectre,' appears, however, to be later in English usage than that of 'breath' or 'spirit,' so that the derivation is a little uncertain. The range of meaning in older English is considerable.

The principal meanings are: (1) Breath, as Bp. Andrewes, Sermons, ii. 340, 'Ye see then that it is worth the while to confess this as it should be confessed. In this wise none can do it but by the Holy Ghost. Otherwise, for an ore tenus only, our own ghost will serve well enough.'

(2) The soul or spirit of a living person. Thus Chaucer, Clerke's Tale, 972—

> '"Nat only, lord, that I am glad," quod she,
> "To doon your lust, but I desyre also
> Yow for to serue and plese in my degree
> With-outen feynting, and shal euermo.
> Ne neuer, for no wele ne no wo,
> Ne shal the gost with-in myn herte stente
> To loue yow best with al my trewe entente."'

So Spenser, FQ II. i. 42—

> 'Whom when the good Sir Guyon did behold,
> His hert gan wexe as starke as marble stone,
> And his fresh bloud did frieze with fearefull cold,
> That all his sences seemd bereft attone:
> At last his mightie ghost gan deepe to grone,
> As lion, grudging in his great disdaine.'

(3) It is applied especially to the soul or spirit departing from the body. Thus in 'The Forty-two Articles' of 1553 (Gibson, The XXXIX Articles, i. 71), Art. III—'For the bodie laie in the Sepulchre, until the resurrection: but his Ghoste departing from him was with the Ghostes that were in prison, or in helle, and didde preache to the same, as the place of S. Peter doeth testify.' Thence arise the phrases 'breathe out, yield up, give up the ghost,' as Chaucer, Legend of Good Women, 886—

> 'When that he herde the name of Tisbe cryen,
> On her he caste his hevy deedly yën,
> And doun again, and yeldeth up the gost.'

So Prioresses Tale, 1862—

> 'This holy monk, this abbot, him mene I,
> His tonge out-caughte, and took a-wey the greyn,
> And he gaf up the goost ful softely.'

And Spenser, FQ II. viii. 45—

> 'He tombling downe on ground,
> Breathd out his ghost, which to th' infernall shade
> Fast flying, there eternall torment found
> For all the sinnes wherewith his lewd life did abound.'

(4) The most frequent application of the word is, however, to the spirit of a dead person, a disembodied spirit. Bp. Hall says (Works, ii. 114), 'Herod's conscience told him he had offered an unjust and cruell violence to an innocent, and now hee thinkes that John's ghost haunts him.' Cf. also Mk 6^{49} Rhem. 'But they seeing him walking upon the sea, thought it was a ghost, and cried out.' The word is found as early as Chaucer quite in the modern sense, as Prologue, 8—

> 'He was nat pale as a for-pyned (= tormented) goost.'

The application to the Holy Spirit is also very early. Thus Malory, Morte d'Arthur (Globe ed.), XIII. viii. 7—'In the midst of this blast entered a sun-beam more clearer by seven times than ever they saw day, and all they were alighted of the grace of the Holy Ghost.' Nor is it always accompanied by the adj. Holy: Chaucer (Seconde Nonnes Tale, 328) has—

> 'But ther is better lyf in other place,
> That never shal be lost, ne drede thee nought,
> Which Goddes sone us tolde thurgh his grace;
> That fadres sone hath alle thinges wrought;
> And al that wrought is with a skilful thought,
> The gost, that fro the fader gan procede,
> Hath sowled hem, withouten any drede.'

(5) Finally, it should be noticed that the word is sometimes applied to a dead body. Spenser, FQ II. viii. 26—

> 'Palmer, (said he) no knight so rude, I weene,
> As to doen outrage to a sleeping ghost.'

Shaks. II Henry VI. III. ii. 161—

> 'See how the blood is settled in his face!
> Oft have I seen a timely-parted ghost,
> Of ashy semblance, meagre, pale, and bloodless.'

This is held to be the meaning of Hamlet, I. iv. 85—

> 'Still am I call'd, unhand me, gentlemen.
> By heaven, I'll make a ghost of him that let's me!'

And Dyce quotes from Hooker's Amanda (1653), p. 207—

> 'What stranger who had seen thy shriv'led skin,
> Thy thin, pale, ghastly face, would not have been > Conceited he had seen a ghost i' th' bed,
> New risen from the grave, not lately dead?'

In AV 'ghost' is used only in the phrase 'give up' or 'yield up the ghost,' and in the name 'the Holy Ghost.'

1. The poetic and 'Priestly' word גָּוַע gâwa', whi h means 'to expire,' 'to perish,' is tr^{d} 'give up the ghost' in Gn $25^{8.17}$ 35^{29}, Job 3^{11} 10^{18} 13^{19} 14^{10}, La 1^{19}; and 'yield up the ghost' in Gn 49^{33}. This tr^{n} is partly due to the Geneva Bible (Gn 35^{29} 49^{33}), but seems in most places original to AV. There is no reason for so special a tr^{n} in those passages; elsewhere gâwa' is tr^{d} simply 'die,' except Jos 22^{20}, Job 34^{15}, 'perish.' The Heb. רוּחַ rûaḥ, 'breath,' 'spirit,' is never tr^{d} 'ghost.' But נֶפֶשׁ nephesh, 'soul,' is twice so tr^{d}, Job 11^{20} 'their hope shall be as the giving up of the ghost' (מַפַּח־נָפֶשׁ; AVm 'a puff of breath'); and Jer 15^{9} 'she hath given up the ghost' (נָפְחָה נַפְשָׁהּ). In To 14^{11} we find ψυχή tr^{d} in the same way, 'he gave up the ghost in the bed' (ἐξέλιπεν [B ἐξέλειπεν] αὐτοῦ ἡ ψυχὴ ἐπὶ τῆς κλίνης). In NT we do not find ψυχή so tr^{d}, but πνεῦμα twice, Mt 27^{50} 'Jesus, when he had cried again with a loud voice, yielded up the ghost' (ἀφῆκε τὸ πνεῦμα; RV 'yielded up his spirit'); and Jn 19^{30} 'he bowed his head and gave up the ghost' (παρέδωκε τὸ πνεῦμα; RV 'gave up his spirit'). Though ψυχή is not tr^{d} 'ghost,' the verb ἐκψύχω, which occurs three times, is twice (Ac 5^{5} 12^{23}) tr^{d} 'give up the ghost,' and once (Ac 5^{10}) 'yield up the ghost.' Similarly ἐκπνέω, which also occurs three times (Mk $15^{37.39}$, Lk 23^{46}), is each time tr^{d} 'give up the ghost.' Finally, the phrase ἐν ἐσχάτῃ πνοῇ (lit. as RV 'at the last gasp') is rendered in 2 Mac 3^{31} 'give up the ghost.'

2. Wherever πνεῦμα is accompanied with ἅγιον it is tr^{d} in AV after all the previous versions 'Holy Ghost' (in 1611 always spelt 'holy Ghost,' which is the more surprising that Rhem. NT has almost always 'Holy Ghost'). When πνεῦμα occurs without ἅγιον, and the reference is to the Holy Ghost, it is tr^{d} 'spirit' or 'Spirit.' The RV has a few times, Amer. RV always, replaced 'Holy Ghost' by 'Holy Spirit'; both have generally accepted 'give up' or 'yield up the ghost.' See articles HOLY SPIRIT and SPIRIT.

GIAH (גִּיחַ).—Named in the account of Joab's pursuit of Abner, 2 S 2^{24}, 'the hill of Ammah that lieth before Giah by the way of the wilderness of Gibeon.' Ammah is prob. taken correctly as a proper name, although it cannot be identified. Theod., indeed, tr. it by ὑδραγωγός, 'aqueduct' (so Vulg. aquæductus), but this would necessitate the article, הָאַפָּה (cf. Wellh. and Driver, ad loc.). Wellh. proposes to eliminate Giah from the text, and for עַל־פַּגֵּי גִּיחַ דֶּרֶךְ כְּרַכָּר גּ׳ of MT to substitute עַל־פְּגֵי הַדֶּרֶךְ בְּכַרְכַּר גּ׳, holding that גִּיחַ has arisen out of גֵּי ה (cf. the LXX Γαί, i.e. גֵּיא 'ravine'). It was natural to interpolate a gai answering to the preceding 'hill,' and the ה of גֵּיחַ might readily arise from the ה of הַדֶּרֶךְ. This emendation is accepted by Budde (in SBOT) and Kittel (in Kautzsch's AT).

GIANT.—Most peoples have traditions in regard to gigantic men existing in earlier times. Not many decades ago these traditions were supposed to be confirmed by discoveries of remains of prehistoric men of enormous size. But a close scrutiny of the evidence indicates that prehistoric men were not larger than the men now living, and that the difference between the largest men that ever lived and men of normal size is less than used to be thought. Moreover, the giants of the traditions, when we come to study the subject closely, are found to be more or less confused with mythological beings or with ghosts, thus becoming, in a measure, unreal.

There was a time when the biblical accounts of giants were interpreted and coloured by the traditions and supposed historic remains. More lately there is a tendency to interpret them in the light of the unreality that is now assigned to the extra-biblical traditions. These facts are a reason for scanning carefully the biblical evidence and confining ourselves very closely to it.

In our EV three different words are translated giant. In Gn 6^4 and Nu 13^{33} is used the word נְפִילִים (in LXX and Gr. Enoch οἱ γίγαντες). See NEPHILIM. This word denotes beings analogous to the demigods of the Greek and Latin mythology. When applied to the giant inhabitants of Pal. (Nu 13^{33}), it should perhaps be regarded as a figure of speech. The word used in Job 16^{14} is gibbor (גִּבּוֹר), a mighty man (RVm), a hero, an armed assailant, not a giant. The same word is used in the plur. in Gn 6^4, apparently as an equivalent for Nephilim, and is tr. in the Sept. γίγαντες; but it is evidently the equivalent of the word 'heroes' as used in mythological legends.

The true Heb. word for giant is different from these. In 2 S $21^{16.\ 18.\ 20.\ 22}$ is the word raphah (רָפָה), tr^{d} giant, and in 1 Ch $20^{4.\ 6.\ 8}$ is the variant rapha' (רָפָא). From the same stem, in this variant form, comes the plur. rĕphaim (רְפָאִים, also used for the 'shades,' see REPHAIM), and this is the proper equivalent of our Eng. word 'giants.'

Raphah means to become limp, to be slack, to be loosened. It often describes the physical and moral condition of one who goes to pieces through fear or discouragement, one who is physically and spiritually relaxed through terror or panic (in Qal, Jer 6^{24} 49^{24} 50^{43}; Hithp., Jos 18^3, Pr 18^3 24^{10}). Many regard the word rĕphaim as the plur. of the gentilic adject. rĕphai, Rephaite; but its use indicates that it is rather a common noun in the plur., and it will be so treated in this article.

1. GEOGRAPHICAL DISTRIBUTION.—In David's time, the accounts say, there were rephaim, that is to say, giant people, living in Gath, and they mention none elsewhere. The Goliath whom David slew was one of these (1 S 17 et al.). So were Ishbi-benob, Saph (in 1 Ch 20^4 Sippai), Goliath the Gittite (in 1 Ch 20^5 Lahmi, the brother of Goliath the Gittite), and a man of stature with twenty-four fingers and toes (2 S 21^{16-22}, 1 Ch 20^{4-8}). See each of these names, in its place. Some of these men individually, and all four of them collectively, are said to have been born 'to the raphah (in 1 Ch $20^{6.\ 8}$ rapha') in Gath.' Certainly raphah is here not a proper name. It is to be tr^{d} 'the giant.' It is to be understood either individually or collectively. If individually, then probably 'the giant' is the Goliath whom David slew, and the four men here mentioned are his sons. If collectively, then the assertion is that the four were of the breed of the giants that lived at Gath.

Some centuries earlier, just before the conquests by Moses and Joshua, the rephaim were more widely distributed. At that time, Og, the king of Bashan, was the only remaining representative 'of those that were left of the rephaim' E. of the Jordan (Dt 3^{11}). W. of the Jordan the ANAKIM (wh. see) had their principal seat, perhaps, at Hebron and its vicinity (Nu 13^{22}, Jos 14^{12-15} $15^{13.\ 14}$ 11^{21}, Jg 1^{20}); but there were Anakim also in the mountain country of Israel as well as in the mountain country of Judah, and among the Phil. cities near the Mediterranean (Jos $11^{21.\ 22}$). Further, there seem to have been rephaim in the forest region near Mount Carmel (Jos 17^{15}). There are traces, too, of giant occupation, either then or earlier, in such geographical names as the valley of Rephaim (Jos 15^8 18^{16} etc.), near Jerus., and 'the Avvim,' one of the cities of Benjamin (Jos 18^{23}). And it is presumable that they occupied yet other localities at this date.

Going back to earlier times, two passages are especially important. In Dt $2^{10f.}$ Moses is represented as mentioning, for the encouragement of Israel against the Anakim, several giant peoples that had been dispossessed by other peoples. In Gn 14 we have an account of the several peoples that were attacked by the four kings in their march southward, in the days of Abraham. The peoples mentioned in these two passages are mainly the same, and they are so mentioned as to enable us to locate them geographically. The four kings 'smote Rephaim' (Gn 14^5), and this region must have been so called because there were rephaim then living there, E. of the Jordan, well to the N., the region where Og afterwards reigned. Proceeding S. they smote the Zuzim, apparently the same with the Zamzummim, who occupied territory afterwards held by the Ammonites, and who are said to be rephaim (Gn 14^5, Dt 2^{20}). Still marching S., they reached the Emim, who are also said to be rephaim, in the territory afterwards held by Moab (Gn 14^5, Dt $2^{10.\ 11}$). Yet farther S., in the country of Seir, they attacked the Horim, who were probably rephaim, though this is not expressly stated (Gn 14^6, Dt $2^{12.\ 22}$).

W. of the Jordan, the Avvim were near Gaza at a very early period (Dt 2^{23}). The rephaim are mentioned along with the Kenite, the Hittite, the Perizzite, the Amorite, etc. (Gn 15^{20}), as in the land, apparently, in Abraham's time. The Anakim are not mentioned by name in connexion with this early period, but we are told that 'Sarah died in the city of Arba, which is Hebron, in the land of Canaan' (Gn 23^2); and that 'Jacob came to Isaac, his father, to Mamre, the city of the Arba, which is Hebron' (Gn 35^{27}). Evidently, the writer of these statements held that the city was called by the name of Arba in the time of Jacob and of Abraham. It follows that he held that the Anakim were already there, for Arba 'was the great man among the Anakim' (Jos 14^{15}). And from Nu 13^{22} it is difficult to avoid the conclusion that it was the Anakim who built Hebron 'seven years before Zoan of Egypt.'

2. HISTORY OF THE GIANT PEOPLES.—If what has been said is true, we are to think of them as widely spread in Pal., on both sides of the Jordan, as early as the time of Abraham. They are expressly said to have preceded the Caphtorite Philistines, the Ammonites, the Moabites, the Edomites, the Israelites; it is not said whether they preceded the Can. peoples. Some affirm them to have been the aborigines of Palestine. This is not in itself improbable, and it is perhaps confirmed by what we know of their characteristics. In particular, the name Horite is supposed to denote a cave-dweller, and if we regard the Horites as rephaim, this is an argument of some weight.

Not all scholars accept the opinion stated above, that the Anakim and other rephaim were W. of the Jordan in Abraham's time. There is a theory that these were immigrants from the rephaim E. of the Jordan, after the invasion by the four kings; but this lacks confirmation. It is said, further, that the Anakim cannot early have had their seats W. of the Jordan, because the country was then in the possession of other peoples. But, as we shall presently see, the rephaim lived among other peoples during most of their known history.

As another objection, one might plausibly say that Arba was the father of Anak, and the three chiefs whom Caleb conquered were sons of Anak, and therefore the Anakite possession dated back only to the generation before the Exodus. But this inference is based entirely on the inexactnesses of translations. Arba is not said to have been the father of Anak, but 'the father of the Anak' (Jos 15^{13}), 'the father of the Anok' (Jos 21^{11}). The article here makes a difference. Arba is not said to be the father of some person named Anak or Anok, but the father of the Anak stock. This is another way of saying that he was 'the great man among the Anakim' (Jos 14^{15}). Again, Sheshai and Ahiman and Talmai are not said to have been the children of a person called Anak, but 'the children of the Anak' (Nu 13^{22}, Jos 15^{14}), and 'the three sons of the Anak' (Jg 1^{20}). In other words, Arba was thought of as the greatest man commemorated in the traditions of the Anakim, and in that sense the father of the Anakim; and the three chiefs were the greatest living leaders of the Anakim. There is nothing here to disprove the antiquity of the Anakim. See further Moore, Judges, p. 24.

The rephaim seem to have had strong local attachments. Once in a locality, they remained there, unless they were wholly extirpated. After many centuries Moses, and Joshua, and Jair, and Caleb found Og in the old seats of the Rephaim, and the tribesmen of Arba at the city of Arba, and the Horite still living in Seir, though incorporated among the Edomites. Yet more marked seems to have been the persistence of the Avvim in the Phil. country (Dt 2^{23}). The Caphtorim had destroyed them, but they were still there in the time of Joshua (Jos 13^{3}), and survived his conquests. Presumably, they are to be identified with the Anakim who were left in Gaza, in Gath, and in Ashdod, the name Anakim being here used generically (Jos 11^{22}). Presumably, Goliath and the other giants of David's time came of this stock.

3. The Giants in their Relations to other Peoples.—The diction of OT, when it speaks of the giant peoples, has a marked peculiarity which is not preserved in the EV; the gentilic name is always used in the plur., not in the sing. as in the case of other peoples. For example, we have 'the Gazite and the Ashdodite, the Ashkelonite, the Gittite, and the Ekronite, and the Avvites' (Jos 13^{3}); 'the Hittite, and the Perizzite, and the Rephaites (better, rephaim), and the Amorite' (Gn 15^{20}). Curiously, the names Caphtorim and Pelishtim follow the same usage with those of the giant peoples, 'the Philistine' never occurring in the singular to denote the people, but only to denote some individual. If the Horites were giants, their name is exceptional, 'the Horite' being the designation commonly used.

This use of language is certainly significant. Apparently, it shows that the writers of OT regard the giants, not as a group of nationalities or peoples, but simply as a breed of men, existing in several varieties. With this agree statements made concerning the giants at all periods. The Davidic giants, though children of the raphah, were politically Philistine and Gittite. Og, though of the breed of the rephaim, was politically Amorite (Jos 2^{10} etc.). In the time of the conquest, the Anakim around Hebron were politically Amorite; in the time of Abraham, it is probably fair to infer that they were politically Hittite. Giants as they were, and formidable, they maintained their existence only where they became associated with some other race, the other race being always dominant. The case of the Horites, maintaining their position as a people among peoples, is probably to be accounted for by some peculiar turn taken in their relations with Esau and his Hivite connexions by marriage.

4. Peculiarities of the Giant Race.—They were of great stature. Probably, no authentic measurements of men exceed those of the Goliath whom David slew. The Israelites of the Exodus seemed as grasshoppers by the side of the Anakim.

There is no ground in the biblical accounts for inferring that they were monstrous in shape. The six-toed man of David's time must be regarded as exceptional and not typical. The name Avvim may be from a stem that denotes crookedness, physical or moral, but it is insufficient as evidence that the Avvim had distorted bodies. The Anakim are verbally 'men of neck,' and this is commonly interpreted to mean that they were long-necked. But it is quite as likely to mean that they were thick-necked. The name Emim, 'formidable ones,' may indicate that fearsomeness was the principal characteristic of the giants, but their terribleness apparently was due to their size and prowess, and not to anything uncanny about them.

The name Horite is supposed to denote cave-dweller; but even if the rephaim were originally cave-dwellers, most of them were certainly not so within the time during which we have information concerning them.

They were a numerous stock. 'A people great and many, and tall as the Anakim,' is a phrase used more than once.

Yet the rephaim, as a whole, were inferior to the peoples of normal stature who surrounded them. Individuals among them were leaders—for example, Og, or the three chiefs at Hebron; but these were exceptional. We might infer this from the general history of mankind, but it is better to infer it from the fact given in the Bible, that the rephaim, coming in contact with other men, became either extinct or subordinate. Doubtless they were more formidable, however, as fighters in the Amorite or Philistine armies than they would have been by themselves.

5. Mention in Later Times.—We have no clear facts concerning the giants later than the time of David. In the LXX of Jer 47^{5} we read: 'Ashkelon is cast away, the remnant of the Enakim.' Those who prefer this to the Heb. text find in it proof of a survival of men of the giant breed even to that date, but this is precarious.

Later writers confuse the rephaim with the Nephilim, speak of their foolishness, and of their bones or other relics as on exhibition at Hebron, or Damascus, or elsewhere (Jth 16^{7}, Wis 14^{6}, Sir 16^{7} 47^{4}, Bar 3^{25}; Jos. Ant. v. ii. 3; Benjamin of Tudela, Itin. p. 56). Yet others enlarge upon the biblical statements with the most extraordinary assertions, measurements, and legends.

GIBBAR (גִּבָּר 'hero').—A family which returned with Zerub. (Ezr 2^{20}). The name is probably an error for Gibeon (גִּבְעוֹן) of Neh 7^{25}. See GENEALOGY.

GIBBETHON (גִּבְּתוֹן 'mound,' 'height').—A town which is mentioned, along with Eltekeh and Baalath, as belonging to the tribe of Dan, and as a Levitical city (Jos 19^{44} 21^{23}). In the time of the early kings of northern Israel G. was in the hands of the Phil., and was a place of importance. Nadab, king of Israel, was besieging it when he was slain by his successor Baasha; and a quarter of a century later Omri was similarly engaged when he was made king by the army, to succeed Zimri (1 K 15^{27} 16^{15-17}). In Onom. Sac.[2] (246, 255) a Gabathon is mentioned 17 miles from Cæsarea. But this is nearly W. of Samaria, and much too far to the north to agree with the biblical notices of G. The Pal. Survey maps identify it with Kibbiah, well down the western slope of the mountain country, 840 ft. above the sea, in lat. 31°·58 and long. 35°·1, nearly equidistant from Jerusalem, Shechem, and Joppa.

GIBEA (גִּבְעָא).—A grandson of Caleb (1 Ch 2^{49}). It is now generally admitted that the list of the descendants of Judah through Caleb given in 1 Ch $2^{42ff.}$ is geographical rather than genealogical, and comprises all the towns lying in the Negeb of Judah, to the S. of Hebron (Wellh. Proleg. p. 217). G. is probably only a variation in spelling of the more common Gibeah (גִּבְעָה). See GIBEAH 1.

GIBEAH (גִּבְעָה a 'hill,' as distinct from a 'mountain,' or 'mountainous district' [הַר]).—A careful examination of all the passages in which Gibeah occurs as the name of a place, seems to show that the uncertainty and confusion which have hitherto existed with regard to the actual situation of G. are largely due to two causes. In the first place, the older translators failed in many cases to distinguish between the use of the word as an appellative and its use as a proper name, the result being to multiply the number of the places bearing this name. Secondly, the name itself is so closely allied, both in form and meaning, to that of another well-known spot, viz. Geba (גֶּבַע), that the two have frequently been interchanged, and the difficulties of identification considerably increased. A consideration of these two facts makes it probable that the actual number of places mentioned in the OT under this name (excluding those which are further defined by some additional word) is to be reduced to two.

1. A city of Judah (Jos 15^{57}), possibly one of two villages called Gabaa, Gabatha (Lagarde, Onomast. 255. 160). The exact site is unknown, but the context clearly shows that it was situated in the neighbourhood of Maon, Carmel, and Ziph, on the fertile plateau which lies to the S.E. of Hebron (Hist. Geog. pp. 306 n., 317).

2. A city of Benjamin (Jg $19^{12f.}$), described elsewhere as 'of Benjamin' (1 S $13^{2.\ 15}$ 14^{16}, cf. Jg 19^{14} 'which belongeth to Benjamin'), and 'of the children of Benjamin' (2 S 23^{29}); most probably it is to be identified also with 'G. of Saul' (1 S 11^{4}, Is 10^{29}, cf. 1 S $10^{5\text{-}6}$), and with 'the hill (RVm Gibeah) of God' (1 S 10^{5}).

From the somewhat scanty notices supplied by the historical books of the OT, we gather (a) that Gibeah was quite distinct from Geba (1 S $14^{1\text{-}5}$, Is 10^{29}); (b) that it lay to the N. of Jerusalem, close to the main N. road, and S. of Ramah (Jg $19^{12\text{-}14}$); (c) that just N. of the town, the main road divided into two branches, one of which led to Bethel, and the other diverged to Geba (Jg 20^{31}). The situation of Tell (or Tuleil) el-Fūl, with which Gibeah has been identified by Robinson (BR[2] i. 577–579) exactly fulfils all these requirements. It is the name given to a hill situated about four miles to the N. of Jerusalem, and lying a quarter of a mile to the E. of the main road. Er-Rām (Ramah) lies farther to the N., while the main road from Jerusalem divides in two just beyond Tell el-Fūl, one branch diverging to the right to Jeba (Geba), and the other going northwards to Beitin (Bethel). The writings of Josephus furnish additional proof, not only of the correctness of this identification, but also of the identity of Gibeah and G. of Saul. He relates (BJ v. ii. 1) that Titus, while advancing to the siege of Jerusalem, halted for a night at Gophna (Jufna), and the following night encamped 'at a place called the Vale of Thorns, near a certain village called Gabath-Saul, which signifies "Hill of Saul," distant from Jerusalem about 30 stadia.'* During the night a legion coming from Emmaus ('Amwās, Nicopolis) joined the main army; the reinforcement had doubtless come up by the road which in the present day joins the northern road just above Tell el-Fūl. Cf. also Jerome, Ep. 108. 8 (Opp. ed. Vallarsi, i. 690), and Robinson, l.c.

The town of Gibeah is associated with several striking events in the early history of Israel. (1) It occupies an important position in the second of the two supplementary narratives which conclude the Book of Judges (ch. 19–21). A certain Levite from the hill country of Ephraim is forsaken by his concubine, who flees to her father's house in Beth-lehem-judah. Here she is followed by the Levite, who remains several days in Beth-lehem, enjoying the hospitality of his father-in-law. Despite the entreaties of the latter, they start on the return journey late in the afternoon of the fifth day ($19^{8.\ 9}$), and towards nightfall reach Jebus or Jerusalem. Being unwilling to 'turn aside into the city of a stranger,' the Levite presses on in the hope of reaching either Gibeah or Ramah (v.[13]), and finally spends the night at the former place. Here they are hospitably received by an old man, a sojourner in the place; but during the night the Benjamite inhabitants beset the house, and demand that the Levite be given up to them. The latter, in self-defence, surrenders his concubine to them, and in the morning finds her on the threshold dead from their ill-usage. He then returns to his home, cuts up her body into twelve pieces, and sends them throughout the borders of Israel ($19^{15\text{-}30}$). Ch 20 describes how the Benjamites refuse to surrender the men of Gibeah to the assembled tribes, who in consequence attack Gibeah, and destroy the tribe of Benjamin, with the exception of 600 men. The kernel of the story is undoubtedly historical, but it has been worked over and expanded by 'an author of the age and school of the Chronicler' (Moore, Judges, p. 402 ff.). Throughout the narrative the name of the place is given as Gibeah simply, except in 19^{14} 20^{4} ('that belongeth to Benjamin'), and in 20^{10}, where the text wrongly gives 'Geba of B.' (לגבע) for 'Gibeah of B.'; the similarity of the two names has caused the same error elsewhere.

In 20^{31}, however, another Gibeah seems to be referred to by the narrator. After twice suffering defeat at the hands of the Benjamites, the men of Israel lay an ambush against Gibeah, and then entice the Benjamites into 'the highways, of which one goeth up to Bethel, and the other to Gibeah, in the field.' From this passage it has been concluded that there was another place called Gibeah in the immediate neighbourhood, which was distinguished by the addition of 'in the field.' But this view is opposed by the accentuation, according to which 'in the field' is parallel to 'in the highways' (so RV). It is evident that Gibeah is a mistake for Geba (Jeba), the road to which branches off just N. of Tell el-Fūl; Moore thinks it probable that the author had 'no clear conception of the topography' (Judges, p. 436).

Again in v.[33] it is stated that the Israelite liers-in-wait 'brake out of their place, even out of Maareh-geba.' AV and RVm give 'even out of the meadow of Gibeah,' their translation being based on that of the Targum. The rendering 'meadow' (for מַעֲרֶה), however, is very questionable, and it has been proposed to follow the Pesh., and render, with a change of the vowel points, 'cave.' The correct reading is doubtless that preserved by one large group of Greek MSS and Jerome, viz. 'from the W. of G.' (מִמַּעֲרָב לְגִבְעָה, cf. Jos 8[9. 12]). See Moore, Judges, pp. 437, 438.

(2) From 1 S 10[26] * we learn that Gibeah was the native village of Saul, to which he returned after his election as king; from this time onwards it is frequently called 'G. of Saul.' (The identity of the two places is sufficiently clear from the narrative of 1 S 13 and 14). It was here that Saul, while pursuing his ordinary occupations, heard of the grievous plight of Jabesh-gilead in consequence of the attack of Nahash the Ammonite (11[4]). The occasion foreshadowed by Samuel (10[7]) had now arrived, and Saul, following the promptings of the divine spirit, at once took action. He slew a yoke of oxen, and sent portions of them throughout the borders of Israel, bidding the people follow after him. The summons was promptly obeyed, and by means of a forced march Saul effected the release of Jabesh-gilead. From the account of the war with the Philistines (1 S 13. 14), which occupied the greater part of Saul's reign, Gibeah would seem to have been of considerable strategic importance. The exact sequence of events, however, is not quite clear, chiefly owing to the corruptness of the text, and the confusion which clearly prevails with regard to the two places Geba and Gibeah. According to the more probable view, Saul, with 2000 men, took up his position at Michmash (Mŭkhmās), on the N. side of the Wâdy Suweinît, from which he commanded the heights of Bethel, while Jonathan, with 1000 men, remained at Gibeah, some three miles farther south (13[2]). The signal for revolt was given by Jonathan, who destroyed the pillar † of the Philistines at Gibeah (emending v.[3] 'and the Philistines heard saying, The Hebrews have revolted. And Saul blew the trumpet,' etc.; cf. Driver, Sam. ad loc.); the Phil. at once mustered in great force, and marched against the Israelites. Unable to withstand the advance of the enemy, Saul retreated down the eastern passes to Gilgal in the Jordan Valley, while the Philistines seized the deserted camp at Michmash (vv.[4. 5]). For a time the cause of Israel seemed hopeless, but Saul, having collected some 600 men, the remnant of his forces, effected a junction with Jonathan at Gibeah (v.[15] following the LXX; in v.[16] Geba must be a mistake for Gibeah). In the meantime the Philistines overran the country in three directions (for 'the border' [הגבול], v.[18], the LXX has הגבע; we should probably read הגבעה Gibeah, since it would be meaningless to talk of a company of spoilers starting from Michmash in the direction of Geba, situated on the opposite side of the Wâdy Suweinît). Hostilities between the opposing forces were again initiated by Jonathan. On this second occasion, accompanied only by his armour-bearer, he apparently proceeded from Gibeah to Geba, and thence (cf. 14[1] 'that is on yonder side') made his desperate effort against the Philistine garrison at Michmash. The latter, believing, no doubt, that the two warriors were supported by a large force, offered but little resistance, and no fewer than twenty were slain at the first onset (14[14]). The panic caused by this sudden attack rapidly spread throughout the Philistine camp, which soon became the scene of the wildest confusion. The news was conveyed to Saul at Gibeah by his scouts or outposts (v.[16]), and a general onslaught on the terrified Philistines, in which the whole country joined, was successfully carried out. It does not seem, however, that the Israelitish victory on this occasion had more than a temporary effect, for we are told later on that 'there was sore war against the Philistines all the days of Saul' (14[52]).

(3) In the appendix to 2 S (21–24) Gibeah is mentioned as the scene of the tragic incident of the hanging of the seven sons of Saul (2 S 21[1–14]). The famine, which had troubled the land for three years, is declared by J″ to be due to the slaughter of the Gibeonites by Saul, though no such act is recorded in the history of Saul's reign. To appease the wrath of J″, seven descendants of Saul were handed over to the Gibeonites, and hanged by them. See RIZPAH.

(4) Lastly, in the imaginative description of the march of Sennacherib against Jerusalem given by Isaiah (10[28–32]), the Assyrians are represented as advancing in a straight line from the North, undeterred by any obstacle. The prophet depicts the last stages of their victorious advance; the passage of the steep defile of the Wâdy Suweinît is secured by despatching a troop in advance to Migron, S. of the pass; the main army is thus enabled to cross in safety, and encamps at Geba; while the villagers of Ramah and Gibeah take refuge in flight (cf. Driver, Isaiah, pp. 71, 72). The passage is important as establishing the fact that Geba and Gibeah were two distinct places.

3. There are several place-names compounded with Gibeah (or Gibeath, גִּבְעַת the st. constr.), which are translated in the RV text by 'hill,' but given as 'Gibeah' in the margin. These are—

(1) Gibeath hā'ărālōth (גִּבְעַת הָעֲרָלוֹת), 'the hill of the foreskins' (Jos 5[3]), between the Jordan and Jericho, so called as the scene of the circumcision, after the passage of the Jordan. See GILGAL.

(2) Gibeath-Phinehas (גִּבְעַת פִּינְחָס), 'the hill of P.' in Mt. Ephraim (Jos 24[33]). The exact site is unknown. Conder (PEF Mem. ii. 218) follows Schwarz (HL p. 118) in identifying it with 'Awertah near Nablūs (Shechem); so apparently G. A. Smith. Guérin (Judée, iii. pp. 37, 38; Samarie, pp. 106–109), chiefly on the authority of Jerome (Ep. i. 888), identifies it with Jîbîa, three miles N. of Kuryet el-Enab (so Dillmann).

(3) Gibeath hammōreh (ג' הַמּוֹרֶה), 'the hill of Moreh,' usually identified with the modern Jebel Duby, a slight eminence on the N. side of the valley above Shunem (Solam). On this view, which identifies 'the spring of Harod' (which see) with 'Ain Jālūd, at the foot of Mt. Gilboa, about half an hour to the E. of Jezreel (Zer'in), the camps of Gideon and the Midianites (Jg 7[1]) would occupy much the same position as those taken up at a later period by Saul and the Philistines (1 S 28[4], cf. 29[1]). So G. A. Smith, Hist. Geog. p. 397 f.; Stanley, Sinai and Palestine, 1856, p. 341 f. Moore, however

* 1 S 10[25-27] has been clearly shown by Budde (Richter und Samuel, p. 174 f.) to be a harmonistic insertion of the editor; but this fact does not affect the point at issue.

† So Driver, Wellh., Th.; RV gives 'garrison.' The נְצִיב was probably a pillar erected in token of Philistine domination. See Driver, Sam. p. 61.

(Judges, p. 200 f.), objects that this view is based on the notice in 6^{33}, which is not from the same source as 7^{1} (J), and prefers therefore to place G. hammōreh near Shechem (Gn 12^{6}, Dt 11^{30}). See MOREH.

(4) Gibeath ha-Elohim (גִּבְעַת הָאֱלֹהִים), 'the hill of God,' probably the same as Gibeah 2. It was the spot at which Saul, on his return from the city of Samuel, was to meet a band of the prophets (1 S 10^{5}). In v.^{10} it is called Gibeah, or 'the hill' simply; and as it is stated that there was a garrison (or rather 'pillar') of the Philistines there, it may safely be inferred that it is identical with 'G. of Benjamin' (cf. $13^{2.3}$; in v.^{3} we must read Gibeah for Geba).

(5) Gibeath ha-Hachilah (1 S 23^{19} 26^{1}). See HACHILAH.

(6) Gibeath Ammah (1 S 2^{24}). See AMMAH.

(7) Gibeath Gareb (Jer 31^{39}). See GAREB.

GIBEATH (גִּבְעָת), Jos 18^{28} = GIBEAH No. 2 (which see). Gibeathite (גִּבְעָתִי), 1 Ch 12^{3}, gentilic name from Gibeah (of Benjamin?).

GIBEON (גִּבְעוֹן, Γαβαών). — An ancient city of Canaan belonging to the Hivites* (Jos $9^{3ff.}$), and apparently the capital of a small independent state (9^{17}); it was 'a great city, as one of the royal cities . . . greater than Ai' (10^{2}). It was later assigned to the tribe of Benjamin (18^{25}), and was eventually made over with its suburbs to the descendants of Aaron (21^{17}).

The identity of G. with the village of el-Jîb, which lies some 5 or 6 miles to the N.W. of Jerusalem, is practically beyond dispute. The modern village still preserves the first part of the older name, while its situation agrees in every respect with the requirements of the history of the OT. Just beyond Tell el-Fûl (Gibeah), the main N. road from Jerusalem to Beitîn (Bethel) is joined by a branch road leading up from the coast. The latter forms the continuation of the most southerly of the three routes which connect the Jordan Valley with the Maritime Plain (Smith, HGHL p. 248 f.) After the Israelites had crossed the Jordan at Gilgal and destroyed Jericho, their most direct means of access to the central plateau lay by the Wâdy Suweinît. From Michmash at the head of the valley the way ran almost straight across the tableland to the vale of Aijalon. Now, just before this road leaves the higher ground and descends into the Shephelah, it divides into two, the one branch leading down by the Wâdy Selman, the other running in a more northerly direction by way of the two Bethhorons (Smith, HGHL p. 210 n. 2). Here, on this open fertile plateau, slightly to the S. of the main road, rises the hill on which the modern village of el-Jîb is built, right on the frontier line which traverses the central range to the S. of Bethel. It was this natural pass across Palestine which in early times served as the political border between N. and S. Israel, and it was owing to its position on this frontier that G. acquired so much prominence in the reigns of David and Solomon. A short distance to the E. of the village, at the foot of the hill, there is further a stone tank or reservoir of considerable size, supplied by a spring, which rises in a cave higher up. Thus we find that the physical features of the modern el-Jîb correspond in every respect with those of the ancient Gibeon as set forth in the historical books of the OT.

1. We learn from the Bk. of Joshua, that after the destruction of Jericho and Ai by the Israelites the inhabitants of G. devised a scheme by which they hoped to avoid the fate that had befallen their neighbours. They accordingly despatched an embassy to the Israelite camp at Gilgal for the purpose of misleading the enemy by representing that they were not inhabitants of Canaan, but came from a far distant country. In support of this statement the embassy drew attention to the condition of their provisions and garments, which bore apparent traces of having been brought from a long distance. Their request for an alliance was at once granted by Joshua and the princes, and a covenant ratified between the two peoples. Within three days, however, the trick played by the men of G. was fully exposed, but, on account of the covenant oath, Joshua and the princes of the congregation determined to abide by the alliance, while they condemned the Gibeonites to perpetual service as 'hewers of wood and drawers of water to all the congregation' (Jos 9^{3-27}). Meantime the neighbouring Amorite kings under Adoni-zedek of Jerusalem had combined to resist the forces of Joshua, and as a first step to lay siege to G. An urgent summons for help was sent to the Israelites, to which Joshua promptly responded by making a forced night-march from Gilgal with all his troops. The confederate kings were utterly routed by the Israelites, who pursued the flying foe down the valley of Aijalon as far as Makkedah in the Shephelah. It was on this occasion that, at the prayer of Joshua, 'the sun stayed in the midst of heaven, and hasted not to go down about a whole day' (10^{1-14}; see BETH-HORON). We learn from 2 S $21^{1f.}$ that the Gibeonites were nearly exterminated by Saul, but no details are supplied in the narrative of his reign. Reparation was made by David through the sacrifice of seven of Saul's descendants.

2. We next hear of Gibeon at the beginning of David's reign, when he was as yet king of Judah only, and was still opposed by Ishbosheth the son of Saul. During the struggle for supremacy two bodies of troops, under their respective generals,—Joab the son of Zeruiah and Abner the son of Ner,—met, as if by agreement, on the frontier at Gibeon. The battle went in favour of David's men, and in the subsequent flight of Abner the latter slew Asahel, the younger brother of Joab (2 S 2^{12-32}). The story clearly belongs to the older narrative (J^{1}) of the books of Samuel, and is undoubtedly genuine, though vv.$^{14-16}$ seem to interrupt the main narrative. These verses describe the mortal combat that took place between the 12 champions of each party. The name given to the spot, Ḥelḳath-haẓẓûrîm (חֶלְקַת הַצֻּרִים 'the field of sword-edges'), has probably been more correctly preserved in the LXX (Μερὶς τῶν ἐπιβούλων, i.e. ח׳ הָאֹרְבִים 'the field of the liers in wait'; cf. Driver, in loc.), and should be transliterated Ḥelḳath-haẓẓôdîm. The 'pool of Gibeon' here mentioned (v.^{13}) is doubtless the reservoir referred to above. Similarly, in Jer $41^{11f.}$ Johanan the son of Kareah is stated to have delivered the captives of Mizpah from the hands of Ishmael the son of Nethaniah, 'by the great waters that are in Gibeon.' It was at this spring also, according to Josephus (Ant. v. i. 17), that Joshua surprised the five kings of the Amorites when they were besieging Gibeon.

3. Owing to the great similarity between the two names (see GEBA, GIBEAH), Geba seems to have been substituted for Gibeon in 2 S 5^{25}. The parallel passage (1 Ch 14^{16}) gives Gibeon, and this reading is also supported by the LXX and by Is 28^{-1}, which connects Gibeon with Perazim as in 2 S 5^{17-25}. Further, the Philistines were encamped in the valley of Rephaim to the W. of Jerusalem (Smith, HGHL p. 218, by a lapsus calami or a printer's error, places the valley S.E. of Jerusalem; it is correctly placed in the map, Plate IV.), while David was advancing from the S., when commanded to 'make a circuit behind them' (v.[23]). His attack therefore from Gibeon to the N.W. of Jerusalem suits the requirements of the context; Geba was too far to the E.

* According to 2 S 21^{2} the Gibeonites were 'of the remnant of the Amorites.'

4. The rebellion of Absalom, which culminated in his death, was quickly followed by an outbreak on the part of the men of Israel under one Sheba the son of Bichri (2 S 20[1ff.]). The task of suppressing the revolt was at first assigned to Amasa, but owing to his dilatoriness Abishai * was also sent in pursuit. The latter was accompanied by Joab, and the two parties of David's troops met 'at the great stone which is in G.' (20[8]). Not suspecting any evil, Amasa advanced to salute Joab, and was treacherously slain by him. The 'great stone of G.' is not mentioned elsewhere; it was probably a pillar or cairn of stones such as we frequently find in connexion with the OT sanctuaries, e.g. at Mizpah, Bethel, Gilgal (cf. W. R. Smith, RS 186 f.).

5. It was, however, as the site of a bāmāh, or 'high place,' that G. was especially famous. At this sanctuary, because it was 'the great high place' (הַבָּמָה הַגְּדוֹלָה), Solomon inaugurated his reign by offering a thousand burnt-offerings, and received the divine blessing in a dream by night (1 K 3[4f.]). It is true that, according to 2 Ch 1[3], G. is represented as containing the 'Tent of Meeting of God' as well as the brazen altar; but this statement would seem to have no other foundation than the desire of the Chronicler to reconcile the action of the young king and its approval by J″ with the enactments of the later priestly legislation (cf. Wellhausen, Proleg.[4] p. 182 f.). The earlier history knows nothing of the presence of the Tent of Meeting at G. (according to 1 S 1[9] 3[3] it was already replaced by a temple at Shiloh; 1 S 2[22b] is omitted in LXX, and is clearly a later addition; so Driver, Budde, Wellhausen, Klost.), while 1 K 8[1f.] clearly places it, together with the ark of the covenant, 'in the city of David, which is Zion.'

'Men of G.' are mentioned as among those 'which came up at the first,' i.e. who returned from Babylon under Zerubbabel (Neh 7[25]; in the corresponding list of Ezra 2[20] Gibbar is probably a mistake), and also as taking part in the repairing of the wall of Jerusalem under Nehemiah (Neh 3[7]).

Lastly, Gibeon is mentioned by Josephus (BJ II. xix. 1) as the place where Cestius Gallus encamped on his march from Antipatris to Jerusalem, after he had fired the town of Lydda (Διὰ Βαιθωρὼν ἀναβὰς στρατοπεδεύεται κατά τινα χῶρον Γαβαὼ καλούμενον, ἀπέχοντα τῶν Ἱεροσολύμων πεντήκοντα σταδίους; elsewhere he puts the distance at 40 stadia). GIDEON (גִּדְעוֹן ?=feller, hewer), also called Jerubbaal (יְרֻבַּעַל Jg 6[32] etc.) and Jerubbesheth (יְרֻבֶּשֶׁת 2 S 11[21]), son of Joash, of the clan of Abiezer in the tribe of Manasseh, a native of Ophrah;‡ deliverer of Israel from the Midianites (Jg 6–8). The nomad Arabs of the Syrian and Arabian desert had invaded the central district of Palestine. They must have entered it by the only natural approaches from the Jordan Valley, the Wady Fâr'a, which leads into the neighbourhood of Shechem, and the Nahr Jalûd, which opens on to the plain of Jezreel. The scene of the invasion and conflict lay in this region. Manasseh and Ephraim were the principal sufferers; accordingly a Manassite is the hero of the deliverance, and Ephraimites take part in completing it (7[24]–8[3]).

On one of their marauding expeditions the Midianites had murdered Gideon's brothers at Tabor (8[18]);* personal revenge, therefore, was one of the motives which instigated his action (8[4–21]). National interests, however, were superadded. According to one ancient account, Gideon was called by an angel of the Lord to save Israel from the hand of Midian (6[11–24]). The angel of J″, i.e. J″ Himself in the form of an angel (vv.[16, 23]), appears under the holy tree of Ophrah. He summons Gideon to the task of deliverance. The meal which is offered to the pilgrim stranger is miraculously consumed, and the angel disappears. Gideon, convinced by the miracle, builds an altar to J″-shalom.†

There follows what seems to be a second version of the call of Gideon (6[25–32]). He is bidden destroy the village altar of Baal, and the sacred post beside it (ashērah), erect an altar to J″, and offer a bullock.‡ The people of Ophrah are incensed at the destruction of their holy place, and threaten Gideon with death. His father rescues him by a witty taunt, which secures for Gideon the name Jerubbaal.§

After this Gideon collects the men of his clan Abiezer (v.[34]), and encamps with them by the spring of Harod, on the S.E. edge of the plain of Jezreel, near the Midianite army (7[1]).‖ He pays a night visit to the enemy's camp, and overhears the telling of a dream, which encourages him to act at once (7[9–15]). He skilfully posts his men under cover of night; the alarm is given; the camp is thrown into a panic, and the Midianites break up in flight towards the Jordan (vv.[18–22]).¶ There are clearly two accounts of the subsequent course of events. According to one (7[24]–8[3]), Gideon summons Ephraim to cut off the flight of the

† In v.[16a] omit יהוה, so Budde. V.[17b] prob. editorial addition, anticipating v.[21f.]. V.[2] is perhaps secondary; the narrative does not imply that G. intended to offer a sacrifice. V.[2a] editorial, anticipates G.'s recognition of the angel. With this § cf. Gn 18[1ff.] J, and Jg 13[2–23]. This § is ascribed by some critics to J.

‡ In v.[25] the words 'bullock, even the second bullock of seven years old,' are corrupt and ungrammatical. פר השני and פר השור are doublets.

§ The name cannot='one who strives with Baal,' as the text would ingeniously suggest; but 'Baal strives, Baal being a name for J″, used without offence in early times; cf. Eshbaal, Meribaal, etc. But Jerubbaal should prob. be written Jerubaal ='Baal (i.e. J″) founds,' ירה, cf. Jeruel, Jeremiah (Wellh. Text d. B. Sam. p. 31. So Bu., Moore). In v.[31] 'he that will plead . . . morning' interrupts the condition. cl.; 'because one hath broken down his altar' is repeated from v.[32]; both should be struck out as insertions. This § is attributed to E.

‖ The account (7[2-8]) of the test by which Gideon's large army was reduced to 300 belongs to some later tradition It is obviously connected with 6[35]; but this verse is inconsistent with 7[23], and neither can be original. At end of 7[5] note LXX A+ μεταστήσεις αὐτὸν καθ' αὑτόν. In v.[6] 'putting their hand to their mouth' is a gloss; it should come at the end of the verse.

¶ This paragraph has been a good deal altered by editors. Two versions of Gideon's stratagem seem to have been combined. In the one version the 300 are armed with pitchers and torches; in the other, with trumpets only. The text has been greatly confused by harmonizing additions; see the commentaries. In v.[20] the word 'a sword,' RVm, is prob. a gloss. In v.[22b] the two narratives are combined again in describing the direction of the flight.

Midianites at the Jordan ford. The movement is successful, and the Ephraimites capture and slay the two princes Oreb and Zeeb.* In the pride of their success, the Ephraimites quarrel with Gideon for not having called in their assistance earlier. But Gideon appeases their jealousy by a shrewd speech: 'Is not the gleaning of Ephraim better than the vintage of Abiezer?' This certainly looks as if the victory were won, and the 'vintage' over: the Ephraimites had completed the work of Gideon on the W. side of the Jordan crossing. In the other narrative, however (8^{4-21}), we find Gideon in hard pursuit, with his 300, on the E. of Jordan. So far from having won a victory, the chances of success seem so unlikely that the people of Succoth and Penuel treat the pursuers with mockery, and refuse provisions for the wearied troops. At length, however, Gideon reaches the place where the Midianites are encamped, takes them by surprise, captures the two kings, Zebah and Zalmunna,† and returns in triumph, punishing Succoth and Penuel on the way. He then kills the two kings with his own hand, in revenge for their murder of his brothers. The divergence of the two accounts is apparent. An attempt to combine them can be made, as is done, e.g., by Kittel.‡ He regards the exploit of Ephraim at the ford as merely an episode in the pursuit, which is continued by Gideon and his men on the E. side of the river, and overcomes the difficulty of 8^{1-3} by supposing these verses to be merely an imitation of 12^{1-3}. It seems, however, much more likely that we have in 8^{4-21} clearly a very ancient and homogeneous fragment, a narrative of the pursuit and final defeat parallel to 7^{24}–8^{3}.§ Whether 8^{4-21} is a direct continuation of 7^{9-22} or not, is difficult to say. It implies some account of a successful rout of the Midianites, but not necessarily that given in 7^{9-22}. Perhaps we have here an ancient fragment, of which the beginning has been lost.‖

The Midianites triumphantly overthrown, Gideon's grateful countrymen offer to make him king. He declines; but asks for the golden earrings taken in the spoil. With these he makes an ephod, i.e. apparently an image of J″, overlaid with metal,¶ and sets it up in his house at Ophrah ($8^{24-27a\alpha}$ in the main). The judgment of a later age condemned the action, and saw in it the cause of subsequent disaster (v.$^{27a\beta b}$). The usual formula of the editor brings the story to a close (v.^{28}). The account of Gideon's family, the birth of Abimelech, and Gideon's death and burial (vv.$^{30-32}$), seems to come from the hand of the final editor, who was familiar with P in Genesis, and intended these verses to form a connecting link with the story of Abimelech in ch. 9. The remaining vv.$^{33-35}$ belong to the Deuteronomic framework of the Book of Judges. The story of Gideon is told in an extremely complicated narrative. Two main documents can be traced, but these have been so interwoven both before and after the Deuteron. redaction of Judges, that the analysis in detail must be regarded more as a critical experiment than as possessing any degree of certainty. In this article the two main narratives have been followed, and secondary elements noticed chiefly in footnotes. G. A. COOKE.

* It is interesting to note that the powerful tribe of Beṭawîn, the Beni 'Adwân, who range over the S.E. side of Jordan, still call their chief by the hereditary title of Dhiab = Zeeb = wolf.

† Apparently intended to mean Victim and Protection withheld. But the latter name is prob. compounded with צלם, Ṣalm, name of a deity, cf. צלמשוב on Aram. inscr., CIS cxiii, cxiv.

‡ Gesch. d. Hebr. ii. p. 72. The attempt is also made in the text by insertion of the words 'beyond Jordan' at end of 7^{25}.

§ The number 300 is common to both accounts.

GIDEONI (גִּדְעֹנִי 'my cutter down').—Father of Abidan, prince of Benj., Nu 1^{11} 2^{22} $7^{60.\ 65}$ 10^{24} P.

GIDOM (גִּדְעֹם).—The limit of the pursuit of Benjamin by the other tribes, Jg 20^{45}. Possibly the word is not a proper name, but may be read as an infinitive, 'till they cut them off' (Moore, ad loc.). No place of the name of Gidom is mentioned elsewhere. LXX B has Γεδάν, A Γαλαάδ (Gilead). Another variant is Gibeah or Geba.

GIER EAGLE ('gier' is the same as the German Geier, 'vulture,' 'hawk') is tr^{n} in AV of רָחָם (rāḥām) in Lv 11^{18} and Dt 14^{17}, in both of which passages RV has 'vulture' (Driver more specifically 'carrion vulture'). RV gives 'gier eagle' also as tr^{n} of פֶּרֶס (pereṣ) in Dt 14^{12}, where AV has 'ossifrage' (lit. 'bone breaker'). The pereṣ is the bearded vulture or Lämmergeier, 'the largest and most magnificent of the vulture tribe' (quoted by Driver, Deut. p. 162, from Tristram, Nat. Hist. of Bible, p. 171). The name of the rāḥām is literally preserved in the Arab. rakham, the Pharaoh's Hen, Neophron percnopterus.

The adult rakham has the front of the head and the upper part of the throat and cere naked, and of a bright lemon-yellow. The plumage is of a dirty white, except the quill feathers, which are of a greyish black. Its appearance when soaring is very striking and beautiful. It is the universal scavenger of Egyptian cities. It is found in great abundance also in Palestine and Syria. See EAGLE. G. E. POST.

GIFT.—This, or the similar term present, is used to tr. a variety of Heb. and Gr. words, the principal of which are the following:—

1. מִנְחָה Gn 32^{13} 33^{10} (parallel to בְּרָכָה, lit. 'blessing' in 33^{11}; cf. 1 S 30^{26}, 2 K 18^{31}, Is 36^{16}), esp. of a gift offered by way of homage, e.g. 1 S 10^{27}, Ps 45^{12} (cf. the 'gifts' presented by the Magi, Mt 2^{11}), or tribute, Jg $3^{15.\ 17t.}$, 2 S $8^{2.\ 6}$, 1 K 4^{21} [Heb. 5^{1}], 1 Ch 18^{2}, 2 Ch 26^{8} 32^{23} (cf. אֶשְׁכָּר of Ps 72^{10}, Ezk 27^{15}). Minḥâh is used also of a gift (offering) to God, Gn 4^{4}, 1 S 26^{19}, Mal 3^{4} etc., and in Ezk and P is a technical term for the 'meal-offering,' Lv $2^{1ff.}$ and oft., Ezk 46^{20} etc. The NT equivalent is δῶρον, e.g. Mt 2^{11} 5^{23} 8^{4} 23^{18}, He 5^{1} 8^{3} 9^{9}. δῶρον also answers in the LXX to קָרְבָּן (ḳorbān), which in Ezk 20^{28} 40^{43} and frequently in Lv and Nu (but only by P) is used for an 'oblation.' See art. CORBAN for a full account of the meaning of 'gift' in such passages as Mt 15^{5}, Mk 7^{11}.

2. מַשָּׂאת (pl. מַשָּׂאֹת) is the word used of the 'mess' which Joseph gave to his brethren Gn 43^{34}, which David sent to Uriah 2 S 11^{8}, of the 'gifts' which Ahasuerus sent upon the occasion of his feast Est 2^{18}, and of the ritual offerings referred to in 2 Ch $24^{6.\ 9}$ and Ezk 20^{40}. It is used in Jer 40^{5}, along with the similar term אֲרֻחָה of the 'victuals' (RVm 'allowance') and 'present' which Jeremiah received from Nebuzar-adan. An allowance (אֲרֻחָה תָּמִיד) of the same kind was given to the captive king Jehoiachin, 2 K 25^{30} = Jer 52^{34}. The 'exactions of wheat' (מַשָּׂאת־בַּר) of Am 5^{11} are 'the presents which the poor fellahîn had to offer to the grasping aristocrats out of the hard-won produce of their toil' (Driver, ad loc.).

3. מַתָּן (from נָתַן 'give'), מַתָּנָה (in Dn $2^{6.\ 48}$ 5^{17} Aram. מַתְנָא), מַתָּת (a by-form found only in 1 K 13^{7}, Pr 25^{14}, Ec 3^{13} 5^{18}, Ezk $46^{5.\ 11}$). This is the most general term for 'gift.' It is used in Gn 24^{53} and 34^{12} of the present given to a bride in addition to the 'dowry' (i.e. purchase price, כֹּהַר) paid to her relatives; in Gn 25^{6} of the portions settled by Abraham on the children of his concubines (cf. the action of Jehoshaphat, 2 Ch 21^{3}); of gifts to the sanctuary or to a deity, Ex 28^{38}, Nu 18^{11}, Dt 16^{17}, Ezk 20^{26} (in this last of the sacrifice of children); in Ps 68^{18}* of 'gifts' in token of homage; in Pr 15^{27} Ec 7^{7} of 'gifts' intended by way of bribe; in Dn $2^{6.\ 48}$ 5^{17} of the 'gifts' of Nebuchadnezzar and Belshazzar.

4. שֹׁחַד. This always (even in 1 K 15^{19}, 2 K 16^{8} practically) means a 'bribe.' The taking of bribes by those appointed to dispense justice is forbidden in Ex 23^{8} (repeated in Dt 16^{19}), and is frequently alluded to in OT, e.g. Dt 10^{17} 27^{25}, Is 1^{23} 5^{23} 33^{15}, Mic 3^{11}, Ezk 22^{12}, Ps 15^{5}, Pr 17^{23}. 'It blindeth them that have sight' (פִּקְחִים, Ex 23^{8}; or 'the eyes of the wise,' עֵינֵי חֲכָמִים Dt 16^{19}), and 'perverteth the words of the righteous.'

5. נֶגֶד (Baer נֵגֶד) and נֶדֶן each occur only in Ezk 16^{33} of a 'gift' in the sense of the hire of a harlot. The ordinary term for this is אֶתְנָן, which occurs in the same context, Ezk $16^{31.\ 34}$ (cf. Dt 23^{19}, Is $23^{17ff.}$, Hos 9^{1}, Mic 1^{7}).

In NT, while δῶρον and δόμα have generally a material sense, δωρεά (once in Jn, 4 times in Ac, 5 times in Paul, once in He) appears always to be used of a 'gift' belonging to the spiritual or supernatural order. The 'gifts' (AV 'offerings,' RV ἀναθήματα) to which the attention of Jesus was called (Lk 21^{5}) would be such as Josephus (BJ v. v. 4) describes, most of which had been presented to the temple by Herod. The Greek word in the same sense occurs (only) in 2 Mac 9^{16} (cf. for the idea 3^{3} and 3 Mac 3^{17}). For the gifts (χαρίσματα) of the early Church, see CHURCH, pp. 427 f., 434 f.

The above analysis will show the variety of occasions upon which a 'gift' might be offered and the variety of forms it might take amongst Orientals. It had its place in their dealings both with their fellow-men and with their God or gods. One did not come before prophet (1 S 9^{7}) or king (1 K 10^{10}) or God (Ex 23^{15}) with empty hands. The English words 'gift' and 'present' are apt, indeed, to convey an idea of spontaneity about the transaction which was generally absent. The 'present' of Ehud to Eglon (Jg $3^{17ff.}$) was really tribute, belonging to the same category as that offered by Jehu to Shalmaneser (see Moore on Jg 3^{17}). It is very important also to remember that while a man might offer a 'present' to his bride-elect, the 'dowry' (מֹהַר) was not a 'gift' but a price paid to the family of the bride as compensation for the loss of her services (W. R. Smith, Kinship and Marriage in Early Arabia, 78 f.). The mōhar might consist of money (Gn 34^{12}, Ex 22^{15}, Dt 22^{29}), of personal service (Gn $29^{20.\ 27}$), or of military services (Jos 15^{16}, Jg 1^{13}, 1 S 17^{25} 18^{24}, 2 S 3^{14}). From Dt 22^{29} we may probably infer that an average mōhar was 50 shekels of silver (see Driver, ad loc.)

So firmly established is the custom in the East of giving a present upon certain occasions that the latter is demanded as a right. Lane (Modern Egyptians, Gardner's ed. p. 168) mentions that while male servants at Cairo are paid very small wages (from four to eight shillings a month), they receive many presents from their master as well as from his visitors and from the tradespeople with whom he deals. An Oriental servant, on quitting his master's service, always expects not only his wages but a present as well, in token of friendship and satisfaction. This rule holds good from the lowest menials up to the highest officials. (For interesting examples see Trumbull, Oriental Social Life, 327 ff.). This practice may throw light upon the asking (not 'borrowing') by the Israelites of jewels of gold and silver, etc., from the Egyptians (Ex 11^{2} 12^{35}), although it is more than doubtful whether it accounts for the possession by the people of such stores of gold as are said to have been used in the construction of the Tabernacle of the Priestly Code.

Many of the usages connected with 'gifts' cluster round marriage. Abraham's servant gave a present to Rebekah when he went to woo her on behalf of Isaac (Gn 24^{22}). After the conclusion of a marriage contract, Lane tells us, presents are expected by various functionaries connected with the different families. Presents are sent to the bridegroom's house by his friends and by all who are invited to the wedding. The bride's presents, including her trousseau, are sometimes borne in procession to her home in advance of her going to the house of her husband, or they are borne before her upon that occasion (Trumbull, op. cit. 44). At his first interview with his bride after the marriage ceremony, the bridegroom makes her a present of money, which is called 'the price of the uncovering of the face.' A marriage-portion (שִׁלֻּחִים) might be given to the bridegroom by the father of the bride (1 K 9^{16} Pharaoh and Solomon, cf. Jg $1^{14f.}$ Caleb and Othniel).

In the East friends frequently send presents to one another, but no pretence is ever made that a quid pro quo is not expected. David was as little disinterested when he sent a 'present' to the elders of Judah (1 S 30^{26}) as Ephron the Hittite was sincere in his offer to give the cave of Machpelah gratis to Abraham (Gn 23^{11}). The 'gift' expected from Nabal (1 S 25^{8}) was really a species of blackmail.

The power of a gift to propitiate one has always been recognized. Jacob made sure of appeasing Esau by the present he sent before him (Gn 32^{20}). The same notion was transferred to one's dealings with God, δῶρα θεοὺς πείθει, δῶρ' αἰδοίους βασιλῆας (Hes. ap. Plat. Rep. 390 E). Gifts were offered in homage to God (Mal 1^{3}), or to procure His favour or support. A prayer would often take the form of a conditional vow, 'If J" will be with me, I will offer so and so to Him' (e.g. Jg 11^{30} Jephthah, Gn $28^{20ff.}$ Jacob). The notion of propitiating the Deity by a gift comes out in David's words to Saul, 'If J" hath stirred thee up against me, let him be gratified by an oblation,' 1 S 26^{19}. It is true at the same time that the 'gift theory' of sacrifice does not furnish an adequate explanation of all the facts connected with even the ordinary oblations, much less with the holocaust, and least of all with human sacrifice (cf. W. R. Smith, RS 375).

The blinding effect of a 'gift' upon the administrators of justice is described in the above citations, Ex 23^{8}, Dt 16^{19}. Bribery of judges has always been common in the East. Lane (Modern Egyptians, p. 103 ff.) gives a remarkable instance of its occurrence in the court of the Kâdi at Cairo. Felix expected a bribe from St. Paul, Ac 24^{26}.

A 'gift' in OT times sometimes took the form of sending 'portions' (מָנוֹת) from a feast to friends or to the poor, Est $9^{19.\ 22}$, Neh $8^{10.\ 12}$ (cf. Rev 11^{10}). The most honoured of the guests present received the largest and finest portion (Gn 43^{34}, 1 S 1^{4} 9^{23}; cf. Iliad, vii. 321, viii. 162, xii. 310; Odyssey, iv. 65 f., xiv. 437; Diod. v. 28).

In the NT we find the Philippians singled out for commendation for the 'gift' (δόμα) which they sent once and again to St. Paul's need (Ph $4^{16f.}$).

* In Eph 4^{8}, as is well known, St. Paul gives a peculiar turn to this passage, his ἔδωκεν δόματα τοῖς ἀνθρώποις corresponding as little to the LXX ἔλαβες δόματα ἐν ἀνθρώπῳ as to the MT לָקַחְתָּ מַתָּנוֹת בָּאָדָם. This is not the place to examine the legitimacy or the motives of the apostle's procedure. A full discussion of the whole question will be found in Meyer, ad. loc. (cf. Driver, Expositor, Jan. 1889, p. 20 ff.). See also art. QUOTATIONS.

GIHON (גִּיחוֹן, Γηών, Gehon).—One of the four rivers of Paradise (Gn 2^{13}). If Eden is Edin, the 'Plain' of Babylonia, we must look for the Gihon in one of the rivers which in early days flowed into what the Babylonians called 'the salt river,' or Persian Gulf, close to the garden of Eridu, where grew the sacred tree of Bab. tradition. As two of the rivers were the Tigris and the Euphrates, our choice of the other two is limited. The G. compassed 'the whole land of Cush,' the Kassi or Kassites of the cuneiform inscriptions, whose original seat was in W. Elam, from whence they descended into Chaldæa, and there founded a dynasty of kings. The G. would seem, therefore, to have been the Kerkhah of modern maps (see EDEN). In Jer 2^{18} the Sept. substitutes Gihon (Γηών) for Sihor, the Nile, in consequence of a belief that had arisen among the Jews that the Cush of Gn 2^{13} was the African Ethiopia (see note ad loc. in Streane, Double Text of Jeremiah). In Sir 24^{27} the Gihon is introduced metaphorically into a description of wisdom.

GIHON (גִּיחוֹן).—A spring near Jerusalem (1 K $1^{33.\ 38.\ 45}$). Hezekiah 'stopped the upper spring of the waters of Gihon and brought them straight down on the west side of the city of David' (2 Ch 32^{30}). Manasseh 'built an outer wall to the city of David, on the west side of Gihon in the [torrent] valley' (2 Ch 33^{14}). These indications suffice to show that Gihon was in the Kidron ravine. The name ('bursting forth') and the notice of the aqueduct (see SILOAM) show that the spring now called the 'Virgin's Fountain' is intended. See BETHESDA, ENROGEL.

GILALAI (גִּלָלַי).—A Levitical musician (Neh 12^{36}).

GILBOA (גִּלְבֹּעַ always with article except in 1 Ch $10^{1.\ 8}$; LXX Γελβοῦε; meaning uncertain. For early explanations see Lagarde's Onom. Sacra, pp. 35, 180, 189).—A range of hills, now known locally as Jebel Fuḳû'a, forming an arc of a circle to the E. of the plain of Esdraelon, and extending from Zer'in first S.E. and then S. The range consists of limestone, mixed in the northern and western parts with chalk, the wearing away of which has caused rugged channels. The highest and steepest part is on the N. side, just where it begins to bend south. Here it rises to a height of more than 2000 ft. above the valley of the Jordan (i.e. about 1700 ft. above sea-level). Towards the S. the sides slope more gradually, and sink to a height of a few hundred feet. As the plain on the W. is 300 ft. above, and the Jordan Valley is the same number of feet below sea-level, Gilboa is much more imposing on the east than on the west. The W. side is drained by the Kishon, one of the sources of which is on its slopes; the N. side by the Nahr Jalud, which rises near Zer'in and flows to the Jordan; the E. side by small streams running down to the Jordan Valley. Except on the lowest parts of the W. side the range is devoid of vegetation. At the present time there are two or three small villages on the slopes. One of them, Jelbun, still preserves a reminiscence of the ancient name of the hill. Zer'in is the old Jezreel, while Conder thinks that Fuḳû'a is possibly Aphek, and Mujedd'a at the eastern foot of the range the probable site of Megiddo.

Gilboa is mentioned in OT only in connexion with the camp of the Philistines and the death of Saul (1 S 28^4 $31^{1.\ 8}$, 2 S $1^{6.\ 21}$ 21^{12}, 1 Ch $10^{1.\ 8}$). Saul and the Israelites went from Gilboa to the fountain which is in Jezreel. Near it they were defeated by the Philistines, and on its slopes they fell down wounded, and Saul and Jonathan were slain. But though mentioned so seldom, Gilboa, being the eastern boundary of the great battlefield of Palestine (cf. ESDRAELON), has at all times played an important part in the history of the country from the days of Saul to those of Saladin and Napoleon.

GILEAD (גִּלְעָד).—1. The 'son' of Machir (son of Manasseh) in Nu 27^1 36^1, Jos 17^3 (all P), 1 Ch 7^{17}, as conversely Machir is said to have 'begotten' Gilead in Nu 26^{29}, and is called the 'father' of Gilead in 1 Ch $2^{21.\ 23}$ 7^{14}. The eponymous ancestor of the district called Gilead (which see). An analogous personification no doubt underlies the statement (Jg 11^1) that 'Gilead begat Jephthah' (viz. by an illegitimate wife). 'Gilead is the name of a region or of its population (Jg 5^{17}), not of a man' (Moore, ad loc.), and a piece of tribal history is related (as sometimes happens in the OT) as though it were the domestic history of an individual; Jephthah's relations with the other inhabitants of Gilead being represented (v.^{2}) as his relations with the legitimate sons of his father Gilead. See further MANASSEH.

2. A Gadite, the son of Michael, 1 Ch 5^{14}.

S. R. DRIVER.

GILEAD (גִּלְעָד, Γαλαάδ).—This name is applied to persons, to a tribe or family (Nu 36^1), to a particular city (Hos 6^8),* to a mountain, and to a district east of the Jordan, whose dimensions varied somewhat when spoken of by different writers. It appears first in the account of Jacob (Gn 31^{25}), and thereafter is of frequent occurrence during the entire period of biblical history. As a geographical term it was still in use in the time of Josephus.

The present article is to deal with Gilead as a division of the Holy Land, its physical features, its geographical limits, and its historical associations.

From the mountains of Western Pal. the entire length of G. can be seen, and a large portion of its territory brought under the eye at once. It appears thence like a vast mountain range, varying from 3000 to 4000 ft. in height. To make up this height the depression of the Jordan Valley is reckoned, which is from 700 to 1300 ft. below the level of the Mediterranean. The summit of this range does not rise into peaks, but is pretty uniformly level. Valleys, wooded sections, and bold headlands are noticed, which give the impression that the country is wild and rugged. On the other hand, if from any point in the plain of Bashan, which bounds G. on the east, one looks westward to this range, he sees only a long line of low picturesque hills. The reason is that Bashan is a plateau rising 2000 or more feet above the sea-level. From this point no one would think of describing G. as 'rough and rugged.' Again, when one comes to travel through G. in different directions, he finds himself in the midst of charming natural scenery, where streams, springs, and forests, rich fields, gentle slopes, and quiet valleys attract the eye. Thus, according to the point of view of the observer, three very different descriptions of this region can be given, each having the merit of apparent accuracy.

The etymology of the word as given by Gesenius and Fuerst, viz. 'hard, stony region, rocky mountain,' does not indicate the character of the country; certain limited sections might be thus described, but outside of these G. is in the main a fertile and beautiful country. Josephus (Wars, III.

* Possibly also in Jg 10^{17}. For Gilead of Hos 6^8 some MSS of the LXX, which belong to the Luc. recension, read Gilgal (Γάλγαλα), which Nowack considers (comparing 4^{15} 9^{15} 12^{12}) worthy of consideration. See further Dillmann on Gn 31^{54}.

iii. 3) says that 'it is not favourable for the growth of delicate fruits,' but that does not invalidate the statement just made as to its general character.

In the conquest of the east Jordan country by Moses and Joshua (Nu 21), G. is not mentioned, although the sections as conquered one after another can be pretty clearly defined. Attention to these details will help us in fixing its geographical limits. Occasionally G. was used so as to include the entire country between Hermon on the north and the river Arnon on the south (Jos 22^9), but generally the region south of Heshbon and the north end of the Dead Sea, i.e. the territory of Reuben, was not included, and in the opposite direction the south end of the Sea of Galilee was its northern limit. The Jordan was its western boundary, and the eastern was the point where the hills meet the Bashan plain.

The entire country was called Amorite, with the exception of the district about Rabbath of the children of Ammon (Amman), the Upper Jabbok, which was not then conquered. Sihon was crushed at Jahaz, south of Heshbon (Nu 21^{23}), but the Jazer region, north of Heshbon, held out, and required a special expedition to subdue it (Nu 21^{32}). The third step was the successful battle with Og at Edrei, far to the N.E. of Jazer (Nu 21^{33}). The three final steps in the conquest of the northern portion of the country are mentioned in connexion with Machir, Jair, and Nobah (Nu 32^{40-42}).

In the division of the territory between the two and a half tribes the phrase 'half Gilead' occurs several times. Half belonged to Gad and half to Manasseh (Dt 3^{13}, Jos 13^{31}). G. had previously been divided in the same way between the two kings Sihon and Og (Jos $12^{2.5}$). The Hebrews simply retained, it appears, the old distinction. The suggestion has been made that the valley of the Jabbok should be the line dividing the two sections; but the objections to this view are serious, first, because this valley would not divide G. into halves; secondly, it would give to the tribe of Gad a small territory, and to Manasseh a very large one, whereas the number of warriors in these two tribes was about equal, requiring a more equal distribution of land.

The two and a half tribes may have differed in their tastes from their brethren, for they seem to have been exceptionally rich in cattle, and these wide pasture lands appealed to them as desirable for their future home (Nu 32^1). The present writer having lived in that region for months, and travelled through it in many directions, has often been impressed with its attractiveness, in contrast, for instance, with the rocky hills of Judæa. Its natural beauties, of many varieties, form landscape pictures which it is delightful to recall.

It is no wonder that these tribes were eager to call these lands their own. The portion of the Jordan Valley which belonged to G. was of such fertility that it might easily be made one of the gardens of the world. Streams descended from the hills; there were numerous fountains of sweet cool water, and copious sulphur springs existed in the valley at several different points (Merrill, East of the Jordan, pp. 143, 178, 183, 430). The great valleys of G. were likewise celebrated. Not to mention that of Heshbon on the south, there was that of the Jabbok, Zerka, famous in connexion with the history of Jacob; the Menadireh, near the south end of the Sea of Galilee, having a stream nearly equal to the Jordan in size; also Yabis and 'Ajlun, along the latter of which ran the great road between Shechem and Ramoth-gilead.

Among the principal cities of G. were Mahanaim, Succoth, Penuel, Mizpeh, Jazer (which was one of the census stations when David numbered the people—an evidence of its central position and importance), Jabesh-gilead, Ramoth-gilead (which was a city of refuge, Jos 20^8), and, in later times, Pella, Gerasa, and several others of the cities of the Decapolis. Of the three commissariat officers of Solomon who were assigned to the country east of the Jordan, two were stationed in Gilead proper—one at Ramoth, and the other at Mahanaim (1 K $4^{13.14}$). It is noticeable that four of its chief cities had the name Gilead affixed to them, viz. Ramoth, Jabesh, Mizpeh, and Jazer (1 Ch 26^{31}).

G. was to Pal. a sort of bulwark on its eastern border against invading armies from the south, east, and north, and it was a wise providence that planted there the most warlike tribes, ever ready to defend the national life (Jos 17^1, 1 Ch 5^{18}). As if in keeping with this idea, much of the history of G. which has a conspicuous place in the biblical records has to do with wars, partly of conquest and partly of defence against powerful enemies. At one time the Hebrews had conquered all the desert tribes lying to the east of them, and had occupied their lands (1 Ch 5). The Ammonites, who for a long time had resisted the invaders, were at last, under Jephthah, thoroughly subdued, and twenty of their strongest cities taken from them (Jg $11^{32.33}$). The same hero, partly by bravery and partly by a curious stratagem, gained a great victory over the Ephraimites (Jg 12). It was on the soil of G. that Gideon swept back to their desert home the routed hosts of Midian (Jg 8). Here occurred the fierce battle between the army of David and that of Absalom, in which the latter lost his life (2 S 18). Furthermore, at the national stronghold, Ramoth-gilead, battle after battle was fought for its ownership. The Syrians of Damascus had captured it, and an attempt to regain it cost Ahab his life. A little later Joram succeeded in wresting it from the enemy, and held it against the powerful assaults of Hazael the Syrian king (2 K 9^{14}). Once, indeed, and probably on several other occasions during their history, the strength of the brave inhabitants was broken by invading armies from Assyria, and, according to custom, Tiglath-pileser carried them away captive (1 Ch 5^{26}). See George Smith, Assyrian Eponym Canon, ch. vi. on 'Assyrian Notices of Palestine,' pp. 106–150.

Another phase of interest attaching to G. was that it was a refuge for royalty. It was here that Saul's son Ish-bosheth was made king by Abner (2 S $2^{8.9}$). Thither Absalom fled when he feared the anger of his father, and there he remained three years (2 S 13^{38}). David, in turn, found an asylum among its friendly inhabitants when the rebellion of Absalom was at its height (2 S 17^{27-29}).

G., however, was not always a scene of conflict, for some of the pleasantest incidents of sacred history are connected with it. It was the place of reconciliation between Jacob and Laban, when the memorable words were uttered, 'The Lord watch between me and thee when we are absent one from another' (Gn 31^{49}). No less characteristic and beautiful, taking all its incidents, was Jacob's reconciliation with Esau (Gn 33). When the brave men of Jabesh-gilead risked their lives to recover the bodies of Saul and his sons from the enemy, and from terrible disgrace, there was displayed in that act the highest type of both loyalty and humanity (1 S 31^{11-13}). The kindnesses shown by the people of G. to David in the hour of his sore extremity were the expression of true-hearted pity for their humiliated king; and a little later Barzillai's leave-taking of him on the banks of the Jordan was surpassingly tender (2 S 17^{27-29} $19^{31ff.}$). Again, we see Elijah, the greatest prophet of OT, coming forth from his home in the Gilead hills (1 K 17^1), and taking a foremost place among the spiritual leaders of the world. Still later and brighter we find our Lord making to this region at least two interesting visits; and not long after His death, when the armies of Rome were at the gates of Jerus., we find the Christians of the Holy City, now doomed to destruction, taking refuge in Pella, at that time one of Gilead's most attractive cities (Euseb. HE iii. 5).

In the history and struggles of the Maccabæan period G. played an important part; and later, during the Roman occupation, its natural resources were highly developed. These, even in the present degraded condition of the country, are seen to be great, and, under more favourable conditions of government than now exist, a wonderful degree of prosperity might easily be restored to ancient Gilead. S. MERRILL.

GILEAD, BALM OF.—See BALM.

GILEAD, MOUNT (הַר הַגִּלְעָד).—In Jg 7^3, when Gideon, before his conflict with the Midianites, is about to reduce the number of the people with him, there occur the words, 'Whosoever is fearful and trembling, let him return and make a circuit (?) * from Mount Gilead.' Gideon's men are encamped (see v.[1]) on the N. or N.W. spur of Gilboa; and as Gilead, in the ordinary acceptation of the term, was on the East of Jordan, it becomes a question what is here meant. (1) Studer (Comm. ad loc.) supposed that as the Midianites lay in the Vale of Jezreel, N. of Gilboa, between the men of Asher, etc. (6^{35}), and their homes, they were bidden to cross the Jordan, and so, by a circuit through Mt. Gilead, evade the enemy. If such were the author's meaning, it would be very obscurely and indirectly expressed. (2) Le Clerc (1708) proposed to read 'from Mount Gilboa' for 'from Mount Gilead'; and this reading is adopted by Hitz., Berth., Keil (alternatively), Grätz, Reuss, and others. The mention of the spot on which the host was encamped has been deemed 'superfluous' (Stud.). Yet the narrator (who, it is to be remembered, really penned the sentence) may have thus specified it for the sake of emphasis. (3) The Vale N. of Gilboa is now called the Nahr Jalûd, and there is a spring, 'Ain Jalûd, issuing forth from the foot of Mt. Gilboa, about $1\frac{3}{4}$ miles E.S.E. of Zerin (Jezreel), and probably the 'Spring of Harod' of Jg 7^1; and it is possible that the part of the Gilboa range on which Gideon's men were, may have been called 'Mount Gilead'; there are cases in which the original ע is not preserved in a modern name (cf. Keil [altern.], G. A. Smith, Geogr. p. 398 n.). (4) Moore emends וַיִּצָּרְפֵם גִּדְעוֹן: 'Let him return. And Gideon tried them; and there returned,' etc. But 'let him return' is rather abrupt (contrast Dt 20^8); and try (test), in spite of v.[4], is not altogether suitable in v.[3]. On the whole, (2) seems the most probable. S. R. DRIVER.

GILEADITES.—By this term a branch of the tribe of Manasseh is first meant, and the order of descent appears to have been: Manasseh the father of Machir, the father of Gilead, 'of whom came the family of Gileadites' (גִּלְעָדִי Nu 26^{29}). Secondly, the inhabitants of the district are likewise thus called, and for this purpose the phrase 'men of Gilead' is also employed (אַנְשֵׁי ג' Jg 12^4). Jair (Jg 10^3), Jephthah (Jg 11^1), and Barzillai, who befriended David (2 S 17^{27}), are specially mentioned as 'Gileadites.' Sometimes the name of the district, גִּלְעָד, is rendered 'Gileadite,' as in Jg 12^5. In mentioning the cause of the war between Gilead and Ephraim, a peculiar charge is made against the Gileadites which it is difficult to explain (Jg 12^4). Evidently, bitter reproach or supreme contempt was meant, and the charge or insinuation was resented with great violence and bloodshed. S. MERRILL.

GILGAL (גִּלְגָּל 'a circle' of stones, 'a cromlech,' always with the article, except Jos 5^9, where a theory of the origin of the name is given. LXX has generally Γάλγαλα in the plur. (Jos $4^{19.\ 20}$ 5^9 10^7, 1 S 13^{15} etc. etc.), but also in the sing., τὴν Γάλγαλα (1 S 7^{16}), τῆς Γάλγαλα (1 S 10^8 A, B has Γαλαάδ); for the sing. indeclinable form Γαλγάλ see Jos 14^6 (B) 15^7 (A, B has Ταγάδ), Hos 9^{15} etc. These forms are used indifferently in reference to the same Gilgal. Vulg. Galgala, always in the plural).

Three distinct Gilgals are indicated by the references. 1. A place between Jericho and the Jordan (Jos 4^{19}), בִּקְצֵה מִזְרַח יְרֵחוֹ 'in the extreme east of Jericho, i.e. on the eastern border of its territory' (Gesenius). It was the first camp of the Isr. after crossing the Jordan (Jos 4^{19}). Twelve memorial stones taken from the bed of the river were here erected (v.[20]). Circumcision of those born in the wilderness (5^{2-9}), consequently the place called Gilgal in memory of the rolling away (גלל) of the reproach of Egypt (v.[9]). The passover celebrated (v.[10]). The manna ceases (v.[12]). Joshua returns every night to this camp during the siege of Jericho (6^{11}). The Gibeonites make their treaty with Joshua here (9^{3-15}). They ask aid from Joshua at Gilgal against the league of the five kings of the Amorites (10^6). Joshua ascends with the men of war (v.[7]), and after a successful battle returns to the camp (v.[15]). After taking Makkedah (v.[28]), Libnah (v.[29]), Lachish (v.[32]), Eglon (v.[35]), Hebron (v.[37]), and Debir (v.[38]), and after smiting his enemies from Kadesh-barnea to Gaza, he returns again to Gilgal (v.[43]). After completing the northern campaign, culminating in the great battle against the allied kings at the waters of Merom, Joshua is again found at Gilgal (14^6), where he assigns by lot the inheritance of Manasseh, Judah, and Ephraim. The inference is that Gilgal was the central camp for the people, not only during the nearer campaigns, but 'until the land rested from war' (11^{23}). In 18^3 we find the whole congregation assembling at Shiloh, where the other lots were granted.

A Gilgal appears prominently in the history of Saul and Samuel. It was one of the places where Samuel judged the people in his yearly circuit, which included Mizpah and Bethel. These three places are called sacred in the LXX (1 S 7^{16} τοῖς ἡγιασμένοις τούτοις). It was clearly one of the central places for sacrifice (10^8 13^{9-10} 15^{21}); and here Samuel hewed Agag in pieces before the Lord (15^{33}). Here Saul was crowned (11^{14-15}), and rejected as king (15^{26}). Though it is not certain that this is the Gilgal of the camp, it is placed here, as the following points favour the identification:—(1) References are made to going down to Gilgal from the hill-country (10^8 and 15^{12}), and up to Gibeah (13^{15}). (2) The sacredness of the spot may have been due to the setting up of the twelve stones. We may also notice that while Saul was in Gilgal in fear of the Philistines, many Hebrews crossed the Jordan to Gad and Gilead.

* The word is a ἅπ. λεγ., and the meaning is far from certain. No root צפר, to go round, is known in either Heb. or the cognate languages. צפר in the Mishna, and صَفَرَ in Arab., are to braid, plait; hence צְפִירָה, Is 28^5, a plaited garland or chaplet (Aq. Theod. στλέγμα), and in the Mishna the plaited rim of a basket. The only support for a verb צפר to go round would be either (1) the assumption that it was the root of צְפִירָה in the obscure passage Ezk 7^7 (in v.[10] the sense chaplet suffices), supposing—what is anything but certain—that it there means the round (of fate), or the turn (of fortune—καταστροφή); or (2) the supposition that it was a denominative from צְפִירָה garland, regarded simply as something forming a circle. It is evident how hypothetical either of these etymologies is. Arab. صَفَرَ means also to leap in running, to bound or run quickly; hence Siegfried-Stade, to spring away. It is, no doubt, possible that the root may have been in use in Heb. in this sense. AV depart early (denom. from the Aram. צַפְרָא morning) is quite out of the question.

The Gilgal of the camp is plainly mentioned in 2 S 19[15], where the people assemble at Gilgal to conduct David back over Jordan on his return from exile.

The Gilgal of Hos 4[15] 9[15] 12[11] and Am 4[4] 5[5] (in connexion with Bethel), evidently a place whose sanctity had been violated, seems to be the Gilgal mentioned above as a central place of worship, and is placed under this head for the reasons given. It may be identical with the Beth-gilgal of Neh 12[29].

The Gilgal of Jos 15[7] also should be here, as it is placed in Benjamin near the north border of Judah, over-against the going up of Adummim, which has been identified with the peak Ṭala'at ed-Dumm, south of the Wady el-Kelt, about halfway from Jericho to Jerusalem. [Driver thinks this impossible. See GELILOTH]. In the parallel passage, 18[17], it is called Gelilôth (גְּלִילוֹת). There has been much dispute as to the identity of the Gilgal of Dt 11[30], but upon the whole it should most probably be placed here (see the very careful note by Driver, ad loc., also 2nd ed. p. xxi; and G. A. Smith, HGHL, App. 675; Buhl, GAP 202).

This Gilgal is to be looked for between Jericho and the Jordan. In 1865 Zschokke heard the name Jiljûlieh applied to a mound or tell near the tamarisk, Sejeret el-Ithleh, 4½ miles from the Jordan and 1⅓ miles from modern Jericho. In 1874 Conder recovered the same name, as applied to a birket or pool near the tree. According to Jos. (Ant. v. i. 4), Galgala is 10 stadia from Jericho and 50 from the Jordan. The former distance corresponds very well with the position of the birket. The distance of 50 stadia is impossible, as the plain is only from 50 to 52 stadia wide at this part, but reading 30 (λ′) for 50 (ν′) we get the distance from the Jordan at once, 3½ miles, which corresponds better to the position of Birket Jiljûlieh. In the 4th cent. Jerome (see 'Galgala' in the Onomasticon) describes it as a deserted spot, 2 miles from Jericho, held in great veneration by the inhabitants of the region. Whether the twelve stones were still pointed out is not clear, as the expression in the Epitomæ Paulæ (§ 12), 'Intuita est castra Galgalæ et secundæ circumcisionis mysterium et duodecim lapides,' may mean considered, and not beheld. Arculf (A.D. 700) saw a Galgalis, 5 miles from Jericho, with a large church covering the twelve stones of commemoration. Willibald (c. 730) mentions a moderately-sized church of wood, and places Galgala 5 miles from the Jordan, which he says is 7 miles from Jericho. In the 13th and 14th cent. the stones are mentioned by Thietmar and Ludolf de Suchem respectively. Thus the site of the Birket Jiljûlieh corresponds very well to the description of Josephus, Jerome, and Willibald. Hence the early Christian tradition may have been based on an older Jewish identification.

The birket measures 100 ft. by 84, outside measurement, with walls 32 in. thick, constructed of roughly-hewn small stones, apparently without cement. North of the pool may be traced lines of similar masonry, covering, according to the present writer's observations, a space 300 yards long, and apparently representing the foundations of three constructions. Conder sees here the ruins of a monastery. South and east of the pool there are 25 mounds, scattered irregularly over an area ⅓ of a mile square.* These are all small, the largest measuring about 50 ft. in diameter and 10 ft. in height. Two of these mounds show superficial traces of ruins, the rest being mere heaps of earth. Ganneau excavated two: the first revealed pottery, tesseræ, and glass, the second merely sand. Conder recovered from the natives a tradition which connected this site with a City of Brass, taken from the infidels by a great Imâm, who rode around the city and blew at the walls, which fell. Conder thus sums up (Mem. PEF, vol. iii. p. 173): Birket Jiljûlieh appears to be the early Christian site; there is nothing against its being the original one.

* For plan see p. 182, PEFSt, 1894.

2. Another Gilgal is mentioned in 2 K 2[1] and 4[38] in the history of Elijah and Elisha. From 4[38] we cannot assume that it was a seat of a school of prophets, as these may have come from Bethel (cf. 2[3]). There is a large modern village called Jiljûlîe, on the top of a high hill, about 8 miles N.W. of Bethel, from which it is separated by the great Wady el-Jîb (Mem. PEF, vol. ii. p. 290). It is 450 ft. lower than Bethel, but the descent into this valley may account for the statement that Elijah and Elisha went down to Bethel. This expression rules out the Gilgal of the Jordan valley.

3. In Jos 12[23] the king of the Nations of (RV Goiim in) Gilgal (מֶלֶךְ־גּוֹיִם לְגִלְגָּל, LXX Γεὲλ τῆς Γαλεελαίας, adopted by Dillm.) is named among the conquered kings, in the part of the enumeration following the maritime plain from north to south. The name occurs immediately after Dor, the modern Tantura. About 30 miles S.S.E. of Tantura there is the modern village of Jiljûlieh, which may be on the site of this Gilgal. F. J. BLISS.

GILOH (גִּלֹה). Driver [Text of Sam. p. 241] points out that the gentilic גִּילֹנִי implies that the original form was גִּלֹן, from the root גיל or גול, not from גִּלֹה).—A city in the southern hills of Judah (Jos 15[51]), the birthplace of Ahithophel the Gilonite, the famous counsellor of David (2 S 15[12] 23[34]). Its site is uncertain. There is a ruin called Jûla on the hills N.W. of Hebron. See SWP, vol. iii. sh. xxi. C. R. CONDER.

GIMEL (ג).—The third letter of the Heb. alphabet, and as such used in the 119th Psalm to designate the 3rd part, each verse of which begins with this letter. It is transliterated in this Dictionary by g.

GIMZO (גִּמְזוֹ; cf. Assyr. proper name Gamuzanu [Pinches, Hebraica, July 1886, p. 222]).—A town noticed with Aijalon and other places on the border of Philistia (2 Ch 28[18]). It is the modern Jimzu near Aijalon. See SWP, vol. iii. sh. xvii.; Robinson, BRP[2] ii. 249; Baedeker-Socin, Pal. 21. C. R. CONDER.

GIN.—Two Heb. words are so tr[d] in AV: (1) פַּח paḥ in Job 18[9], Is 8[14], and מוֹקֵשׁ môḳêsh in Ps 140[5] 141[9], Am 3[5], Job 40[24] AVm. The usual tr[n] of both words is 'snare.' As Driver shows, however (Joel and Amos, on Am 3[5]), the paḥ is the snare, the môḳêsh something without which the snare is useless, perhaps the bait. See SNARE.

In the 1611 ed. of AV the word is spelt 'ginne' in Is 8[14], Am 3[5], Job 40[24m]; but in Job 18[9], Ps 140[5] 141[9] the spelling is 'grinne.' 'Grinne' was changed in 1613 to 'grin'; Dr. Paris in his ed. of 1762 cast out the r, and the word has been 'gin' ever since. But 'gin' and 'grin' are not the same. 'Grin,' from Anglo-Sax. grin or gryn, has many forms in Middle-Eng. (Wyclif's Bible, 1382, shows grene, grane, gryn, grynne), and does mean a 'trap.' 'Gin' is probably a contraction of 'engine' (Fr. engin), which comes from Lat. ingenium and is used of any ingenious contrivance. A trap, however, is a contrivance, and so the words got mixed in spelling and in meaning.

In early writers 'gin' is used both abstractly of a contrivance, device, and concretely of an instrument contrived for war, torture, or the like. Thus Piers Plowman, (B) xviii. 250—

'For gygas the geaunt with a gynne engyned,' that is, 'For Gigas the giant with a contrivance contrived'; Spenser, FQ II. iii. 13—

'Which two, through treason and deceiptfull gin,
Had slaine Sir Mordant and his lady bright.'

As an instrument of torture, FQ I. v. 35—

'Typhoeus joynts were stretched on a gin.'

The word 'grin' by and by went out of use, and 'gin' became restricted to the meaning of trap or snare. T. Fuller, Holy Warre, v. 1 (p. 247), says, 'Now Satan, the master-juggler, needeth no wires or ginnes to work with, being all ginnes himself; so transcendent is the activity of a spirit.' It was specially applied to snares for birds, as T. Adams, Works, i. 7, 'For hunting, they have nets; for fowling, gins; for fishing, baits'; and iii. 17, 'In the air, the birds fly high above our reach, yet we have gins to fetch them down.' J. HASTINGS.

GINATH (גִּינַת, Γάωνθ AB, Γωνώθ Luc.).—Father of Tibni, who unsuccessfully laid claim against Omri to the throne of Israel (1 K $16^{21, 22}$).

GINNETHOI, AV Ginnetho (גִּנֵּתוֹי).—A priest among the returned exiles (Neh 12^{4}). The name appears in Neh 12^{16} 10^{6} as Ginnethon (גִּנְּתוֹן). See GENEALOGY.

GINNETHON.—See GINNETHOI.

GIRDLE.—See DRESS, vol. i. p. 626[a].

GIRGASHITE (in Heb. always sing. הַגִּרְגָּשִׁי 'the Girgashite,' and rightly so rendered in RV; in LXX and Josephus ὁ Γεργεσαῖος; in AV only twice in sing. Gn 10^{16}, 1 Ch 1^{14}; elsewhere plural, 'Girgashites').—Very little is known of this people, whose name, though occurring several times in OT in the list of Can. tribes * (Gn 10^{16} 15^{21}, Dt 7^{1} [and 20^{17} in Sam. and LXX], Jos 3^{10} 24^{11}, 1 Ch 1^{14}, Neh 9^{8}) affords no indication of their position, or to what branch of the Can. they belonged, except in two instances, namely, Gn 10^{16}, where the G. is given as the name of the fifth son of Canaan, and Jos 24^{11}, where the G. would seem to have inhabited the tract on the west of Jordan, the Isr. having been obliged to cross over that river in order to fight the men of Jericho, among whom were the Girgashites. It has been suggested that a town (now in ruins), near the mouth of the Wady Samakh, called Kersa, might be identified with Gergesa; the former being pronounced, it is said, nearly the same as the latter by the Bedawin. Gergesa contains, moreover, the same consonants as the Heb. גִּרְגָּשִׁי (Girgashi, LXX οἱ Γεργεσαῖοι; see GERASENES, p. 160[a]), found in Gn 15^{21}, Dt 7^{1} etc., and, if the same word, would be the district or chief town of the G., which, according to Jerome and Eusebius (OS.[2] p. 256, 14, p. 162, 18), was situated on a hill sloping steeply to the shore of the Sea of Galilee. There is, then, a probability that Girgashi, Kersa, and Gergesa (where our Lord healed the demoniac and allowed the demons to enter into a herd of swine which ran down the steep into the sea) are one and the same.

A fragment of an Assyr. tablet (K. 261, Brit. Mus.) possibly throws a ray of light on this people. In that text the Kirkišāti, possibly the Girgashites,† are mentioned more than once, in one case accompanied by the adjective rabbāti—'numerous.' These Kirkišāti seem to have been one of the nations attacked by an early ruler named Gazzāni (? father of Tidal). According to Origen (in Jo vi. 41), the Girgashites (οἱ Γεργεσαῖοι) were so called from an old town, on the shore of the lake, called Gergesa. This is hardly far enough east to make the Assyr.-Bab. Kirkišāti identical with the Girgashites, unless (as is possible) we suppose them (being a 'numerous' people) to have founded colonies in or near Mesopotamia; or that the Bab. ruler led an army all the way to the 'land of the Amorites,' as, in fact, many of the kings of Babylonia and Assyria are recorded to have done,—indeed, the 14th ch. of Gn not only states that the Bab. kings there mentioned went so far, but that one of their allies was Chedorlaomer, king of Elam, a country situated at a still greater distance. It is noteworthy that the Talmud contains a tradition of the G. appealing to Alexander the Great, during his sojourn in Palestine, complaining of having been banished from Canaan by the Jews, and asking justice. The existence of the G. at such a late period implies that they were, in early times, an important tribe or nationality, thus agreeing with what is stated in OT, and with the Assyr. reference to the Kirkišāti.

GIRZITE (Kethibh הַגִּזְרִי, Ḳerê הַגְּזְרִי, the Gizrite; B τὸν Γεσειρί, A τὸν Γεσερεὶ καὶ τὸν Γεζραῖον).—Acc. to 1 S 27^{8}, David and his men, while living at the court of Achish king of Gath, 'made a raid upon the Geshurites (which see), and the Girzites (RVm Gizrites), and the Amalekites: for those nations were the inhabitants of the land, which were of old, as thou goest to Shur, even unto the land of Egypt.' The LXX (B) is probably correct in reading only one name 'Gizrites' for 'Geshurites and Girzites,' viz. the Canaanite inhabitants of Gezer, a town on the S.W. border of Ephraim (Jos 10^{33} $16^{3, 10}$, Jg 1^{29}), the modern Tell Jezer, between Emmaus ('Amwās, Nicopolis) and Ekron ('Aḳir). The original population, which had not been driven out by the Ephraimites, retained its independence till the days of Solomon, when Pharaoh king of Egypt conquered the city, and gave it with his daughter to Solomon; the latter rebuilt it (1 K 9^{15-17}). GIVE.—1. The verb [אָזַן] âzan, which is formed from אֹזֶן the ear, is used in the Hiphil, meaning 'to listen,' 41 times, and 32 times it is tr[d] in AV 'give ear,' the other renderings being 'hearken' Gn 4^{23}, Nu 23^{18}, Job 9^{16} 33^{1} 34^{16} 37^{14}, 'hear' Ps 135^{17} 140^{6} (RV 'give ear'); 'give good heed' Ec 12^{9} (RV 'ponder,' RVm 'give ear'). Sometimes it is God that gives ear or is entreated to give ear, sometimes it is man. In Apocr. the phrase also occurs, 2 Es 8^{24} (auribus percipere); Wis 6^{3} (ἐνωτίζομαι); Sir 4^{15} (ὑπακούω), 6^{23} (ἀκούω). It is not found in NT. For the phrase cf. Marlowe, Faustus, v. iii. 'The devil threatened to tear me in pieces if I once gave ear to divinity; and now 'tis too late'; and Milton, PL ix. 1067—

'O Eve, in evil hour thou didst give ear
To that false worm, of whomsoever taught
To counterfet man's voice.'

Ps 39[2] Wyc. 1388, 'Y abidynge abood the Lord; and he gaf tent to me' (LXX προσέσχεν μοι). 3. Give diligence, 2 P 1[5] 'giving all diligence' (σπουδὴν πᾶσαν παρεισενέγκαντες, RV 'adding all diligence'); 1[10] 'give diligence' (σπουδάσατε); Jude[3] 'when I gave all diligence' (πᾶσαν σπουδὴν ποιούμενος). 4. Give audience, Ac 15[12] (ἀκούω, RV 'hearken'); 22[22] (ἀκούω, RV as AV). 5. Give reverence, He 12[9] (ἐντρέπομαι). 6. Give occasion, Dt 22[14] 'if a man take a wife . . . and give occasions of speech against her' (וְשָׂם לָהּ עֲלִילוֹת דְּבָרִים); RV 'lay shameful things to her charge'; Driver, 'frame against her wanton charges'; the phrase, which is uncertain in meaning, is fully discussed by Driver, Deut. p. 254 f.), so 22[17], 2 Co 5[12] (ἀφορμὴν διδόντες). 7. Give testimony, Sir 36[15] 'Give testimony unto those that thou hast possessed from the beginning, and raise up prophets that have been in thy name' (δὸς μαρτύριον); Ac 13[22] 'he raised up David to be their king; to whom also he gave testimony, and said' (ᾧ καὶ εἶπεν μαρτυρήσας, RV 'bare witness'); so 14[3]. For 2 K 11[12] 'And he brought forth the king's son, and put the crown upon him, and gave him the testimony' (אֶת־הָעֵדוּת, AV 1611 'the Testimonie'), see TESTIMONY. 8. Give witness, Job 29[11] 'when the eye saw me, it gave witness to me' (וַתְּעִידֵנִי); Ac 10[43] 'To him give all the prophets witness' (μαρτυροῦσιν, RV 'bear . . . witness'). 9. Give record, 1 Jn 5[10] 'the record that God gave of his Son' (ἣν μεμαρτύρηκεν ὁ θεός, RV 'the witness that God hath borne concerning his Son'). 10. Give word, Ps 68[11] 'The Lord gave the word' (אֲדֹנָי יִתֵּן אֹמֶר, RV 'the Lord giveth the word'). 11. Give voice, Ps 18[13] 'The Lord also thundered in the heavens, and the Highest gave his voice' (עֶלְיוֹן יִתֵּן קֹלוֹ, RV 'the Most High uttered his voice.' Cf. Gn 45[2] AVm and RVm 'And he gave forth his voice in weeping' for text 'And he wept aloud,' Heb. וַיִּתֵּן אֶת־קֹלוֹ בִּבְכִי; and Jer 25[30] Cov. 'He shal geve a greate voyce (like the grape gatherers)'; Ac 26[10] 'when they were put to death, I gave my voice against them' (κατήνεγκα ψῆφον, RV 'gave my vote'). 12. Give commandment, Ex 25[22] 'I will commune with thee . . . of all things which I will give thee in commandment unto the children of Israel' (אֲצַוֶּה אוֹתָךְ); 1 Ch 14[12] 'And when they had left their gods there, David gave a commandment, and they were burned with fire' (וַיֹּאמֶר דָּוִיד, RV 'gave commandment'); Ezr 4[21] 'Give ye now commandment to cause these men to cease' (שִׂימוּ טָעַם, RV 'Make ye now a decree'); Ps 71[3] 'thou hast given commandment to save me' (צִוִּיתָ); Jn 14[31] 'as the Father gave me commandment, so I do' (TR ἐνετείλατό μοι, L Tr WH ἐντολὴν ἔδωκέν μοι); Ac 1[2] (ἐντειλάμενος); 23[30] (παραγγείλας, RV 'charging'); He 11[22] (ἐνετείλατο). 13. Give charge, 2 S 18[5] 'when the king gave all the captains charge' (בְּצַוֹּת); Job 34[13] 'Who hath given him a charge over the earth?' (פָּקַד עָלָיו, RV 'Who gave him a charge?'); Jer 47[7] (צִוָּה־לָהּ); Mt 4[6] 'He shall give his angels charge concerning thee' (ἐντελεῖται), so Lk 4[10]; 1 Ti 5[7] 'And these things give in charge'* (καὶ ταῦτα παράγγελλε, RV 'These things also command'); 6[13] 'I give thee charge' (Παραγγέλλω σοι, RV 'I charge thee'). 14. Give judgment, 2 K 25[6] 'and they gave judgment upon him' (וַיְדַבְּרוּ אִתּוֹ מִשְׁפָּט, AVm 'spake judgment with him,' RVm 'spake with him of judgment'); so Jer 39[5, 9]. Cf. Sir T. More, Utopia (Lumby's ed. p. 15), 'An other sorte sytteth upon their allebencheis, and there amonge their cuppes they geve judgment of the wittes of writers.' 15. Give sentence, Jer 4[12] 'now also will I give sentence against them' (אַף־גַּם מִשְׁפָּטִים, RV as AVm 'utter judgments'); Lk 23[24] 'Pilate gave sentence that it should be as they required' (ἐπέκρινε). 16. Give counsel, 2 S 17[7] 'the counsel that Ahithophel hath given is not good at this time' (הָעֵצָה אֲשֶׁר־יָעַץ), so 1 K 12[8, 13], 2 Ch 10[8]. 17. Give assurance, Ac 17[31] (πίστιν παρασχών). 18. Give place, (a) literally, Is 49[20] 'give place to me that I may dwell' (גְּשָׁה־לִי); Sir 29[27] 'Give place, thou stranger, to an honourable man' (ἔξελθε, RV 'go forth'); Mt 9[24] 'Give place: for the maid is not dead' (Ἀναχωρεῖτε); and (b) figuratively, Gal 2[5] 'To whom we gave place by subjection, no, not for an hour' (εἴξαμεν). Cf. Ro 12[19], Eph 4[27], and Babees Book (Early Eng. Text Soc.), p. 103—

> 'Sit thou not in the highest place,
> Where the good man is present,
> But gyue him place: his maners marke
> Thou with graue aduysement.'

Knox in his 'Godly Letter to the Faithful in London' (Works, iii. 167), says, 'But, Deir Brethrene, be subject unto God, and gif place to his wraith, that ye may eschape his everlasting vengeance.' Cassius says to Brutus (Shaks. Jul. Cæs. IV. iii. 146)—

> 'Of your philosophy you make no use,
> If you give place to accidental evils.'

Tindale uses 'give room' in the same way, Prologe to the Pentateuch, 'Isaac, when his welles which he had digged were taken from him, geveth rowme and resisteth not.'

3. To 'give oneself to' is a phrase of occasional occurrence, representing various expressions in the original, but always implying energy or absorption in the pursuit spoken of. It occurs Ec 2[3] 'I sought in mine heart to give myself unto wine' (לְמָשׁוֹךְ בַּיַּיִן אֶת־בְּשָׂרִי, lit., as AV, 'to draw my flesh with wine,' RV 'to cheer my flesh with wine'); Ac 6[4] 'we will give ourselves continually to prayer' (προσκαρτερήσομεν, RV 'we will continue stedfastly in prayer'); 1 Co 7[5] 'that ye may give yourselves to fasting and prayer' (TR ἵνα σχολάζητε τῇ νηστείᾳ καὶ τῇ προσευχῇ, edd. ἵνα σχολάσητε τῇ προσευχῇ, RV 'that ye may give yourselves unto prayer'); 1 Ti 4[15] 'give thyself wholly to them' (ἐν τούτοις ἴσθι). Sometimes the phrase is restricted to some part of the person, as the heart, Ec 1[13, 17] 'I gave my heart to know wisdom,' Sir 39[8]; or the mouth, Ps 50[19] 'Thou givest thy mouth to evil' (פִּיךָ שָׁלַחְתָּ בְּרָעָה). And then we have the frequent phrase given to, with the same meaning and used both of good and bad pursuits. The expressions in the original are as a rule much more forcible than the Eng. phrase. They are, Pr 23[2] 'if thou be a man given to appetite' (אִם־בַּעַל נֶפֶשׁ אָתָּה, lit. 'if the owner of soul [=desire] thou'; so Ec 8[8] 'given to it [wickedness]'); Pr 24[21] 'meddle not with them that are given to change' (עִם־שׁוֹנִים 'changelings,' or perhaps, as Del., 'revolutionaries'); Jer 6[13] 8[10] 'given to covetousness' (בּוֹצֵעַ בָּצַע, lit. '[greedy] gainer of [greedy] gain'); 1 Es 2[27] 'given to rebellion and war' (συντελοῦντες, lit. 'accomplishing'); Sir 17[16] 'given to evil' (ἐπὶ τὰ πονηρά, RV omits); 19[1] 'given to drunkenness' (μέθυσος, RV 'that is a drunkard'); Ac 17[16] 'wholly given to idolatry' (κατείδωλον οὖσαν, RV 'full of idols'); Ro 12[13] 'given to hospitality' (τὴν φιλοξενίαν διώκοντες, lit. 'pursuing hospitality,' as RVm); 1 Ti 3[2] 'given to hospitality'

* Twice the phrase 'give in charge' occurs in Shaks. in the same sense of 'command,' but in a context which suggests the mod. meaning 'give charge of,' I Henry VI. II. iii. 1—

> 'Porter, remember what I gave in charge;
> And when you have done so, bring the keys to me';

Tempest, V. i. 8—

> 'How fares the king and 's followers?
> Confin'd together
> In the same fashion as you gave in charge,
> Just as you left them; all prisoners, sir.'

(φιλόξενος, lit. 'guest-loving'); 3^3 'given to wine' (πάνοινος, RV 'brawler'; so Tit 1^7); 3^8 'given to much wine' (οἴνῳ πολλῷ προσέχων); Tit 1^7 'given to filthy lucre' (αἰσχροκερδής, lit. 'basely greedy,' RV 'greedy of filthy lucre'); 2^3 'given to much wine' (οἴνῳ πολλῷ δεδουλωμένας, RV 'enslaved to much wine').

4. In the sense of grant, admit, 'give' is often found in writers of the date of AV. Thus Shaks. Winter's Tale, III. ii. 96—

> 'The crown and comfort of my life, your favour,
> I do give lost; for I do feel it gone';

and Milton, PL ii. 14—

> 'Though oppressed and fallen
> I give not heaven for lost.'

This idiom does not occur in AV, but closely associated with it is the sense of give leave to, seen in Mt 13^{11} 'Unto you it is given to know' (ὑμῖν δέδοται γνῶναι); and 1 Co 12^3 'I give you to understand' (γνωρίζω ὑμῖν, lit. 'I make known to you'), phrases which are as old as Wyclif, and in common use still. Cf. Milton, PL ix. 818—

> 'Shall I to him make known
> As yet my change, and give him to partake
> Full happiness with me, or rather not,
> But keep the odds of knowledge in my power
> Without copartner?'

There is a further extension of this sense in Job 24^{23} 'Though it be given him to be in safety,' i.e. though he be not merely permitted but enabled.

5. When followed by certain adverbs, 'give' is used in ways that are at least archaic now. (1) Give again=give back, restore, Lv $25^{51.52}$ (יָשִׁיב, RV 'give back'); Ezk 33^{15} 'If the wicked restore (יָשִׁיב) the pledge; give again (יְשַׁלֵּם, lit. 'make complete') that he had robbed . . . he shall surely live'; Lk 4^{20} 'And he closed the book, and he gave it again to the minister' (ἀποδούς, RV 'gave it back'). See AGAIN. (2) Give forth, Nu 20^8 'Speak ye unto the rock before their eyes; and it shall give forth his water' (וְנָתַן); Ac 1^{26} 'And they gave forth their lots' (ἔδωκαν). (3) Give out, Jos 18^4 'Give out from among you three men for each tribe' (='choose out,' which is Coverdale's tr^n, 'give out' is the Bishops' tr^n, Heb. הָבוּ לָכֶם, RV 'appoint for you'; in Dt 1^{13} the same phrase is tr^d 'take you' in both AV and RV; it occurs also in Jg 20^7, 2 S 16^{20}); Jer 4^{16} 'watchers come from a far country, and give out their voice against the cities of Judah' (יִתְּנוּ; cf. Mk 15^{37} Wyc. [1388], 'And Jhesus gaf out a greet cry, and diede'); Ac 8^9 'Giving out that himself was some great one' (λέγων, lit. 'saying,' as all previous Eng. versions, Vulg. dicens, but Luther gab vor). (4) Give over, always with the meaning 'surrender,' modern 'give up,' Ps 118^{18} $78^{50.62}$, Is 19^4, Sir 23^6 30^{21} 33^{20}, Ro 1^{28}, Eph 4^{19}. Cf. Pr. Bk., Collect for St. Andrew's Day (1559–1604), 'Grant unto us all, that we being called by thy holy word may forthwith give over ourselves obediently to follow thy holy commandments' (changed in 1662 into 'give up ourselves'). (5) Give up, 2 S 24^9 'And Joab gave up the sum of the number of the people unto the king' (וַיִּתֵּן)='delivered,' as most earlier versions (LXX ἔδωκεν, Vulg. dedit). J. HASTINGS.

GIZONITE (הַגִּזֹנִי).—A gentilic name which occurs in 1 Ch 11^{34} in the colloc. הָשֵׁם הַגִּזֹנִי 'Hashem the Gizonite.' In all probability this should be corrected to יָשֵׁן הַגִּזֹנִי 'Jashen (cf. the parallel passage 2 S 23^{32}) the Gunite' (so Klosterm., Budde, Driver, Kittel). The 'Gunite' (Nu 26^{48}) is confirmed by the reading of A and Luc. Γωννί or Γουνί, and even by the meaningless Σομολογεννουνείν of B. See JASHEN.

GIZRITE.—See GIRZITE.

GLASS (זְכוּכִית, ὕαλος) is an artificial substance, fusible, usually more or less transparent or translucent, and composed of a mixture of metallic silicates. One of the metals present is always either potassium or sodium, the other being generally calcium or lead. Thus modern window glass contains the silicates of sodium and calcium, crown glass those of potassium and calcium, and flint glass those of potassium and lead. Other metals such as iron may be present, either accidentally as impurities, or designedly as colouring matters. Although the references to glass in Scripture are few, its manufacture is of high antiquity, and in the progress of civilization it has served many purposes both of use and ornament.

The origin of the art of glass-making is obscure. The account given by Pliny (Nat. Hist. xxxvi. 25), of its accidental production through the melting of blocks of 'nitrum' employed by some sailors to support their caldron over a fire which they had made on the sands at the mouth of the river Belus in Syria, is well known but fabulous. The assertion, however, that no fire burning in the open air could possibly give rise to sufficient heat for the formation of glass, is incorrect, as crude glass is known to have been produced during the burning of a stack of wheat. But, even if Pliny's narrative were credible, the glass he describes, consisting of a single alkaline silicate, would have been soluble in water, and of no practical use. It is probable that the process of vitrification was first observed in the course of metallurgical operations. The art was widely known in the ancient world, and, while its origin may be difficult to localize, it is in Egypt that the earliest traces of it have hitherto been found. Glass-blowers are represented on the walls of the Tomb of Ti at Sakkhara, which dates from the 5th dynasty, and on many other tombs of later date, such as those at Beni-Hasan (Usertesen I., 12th dynasty, B.C. 3500). There is similar pictorial evidence that glass vases were used for wine in Egypt at least as early as the Exodus. Glass was also known in very ancient times in Assyria and Babylonia (see vol. i. p. 220[a]), and even in China.

The earliest glass was opaque or semi-opaque. The art of making it transparent was a later development; and even the first transparent glass was not colourless, but tinted. The oldest dated specimen of glass as yet known is a small ornament found at Thebes, in the shape of a lion's head. It is of opaque blue glass, and bears the name of Nu-Antef IV. (11th dynasty). Next to it comes an opaque glass jug of turquoise blue colour with yellow ornaments, having round the neck the name and titles of Tahutmes III. (18th dynasty). The oldest dated transparent glass known is a vase found by Layard at Nimroud, and bearing the name of Sargon (B.C. 722–705). (These objects are all in the British Museum. The first is figured in the Introduction to the Catalogue of glass objects in the South Kensington Museum, p. ix, the second in Wilkinson's Anc. Egyp. ii. 140, and the third in Layard, Nin. and Bab. p. 197).

The sands at the mouth of the Belus, the scene of Pliny's legend, were famous for their glass-making excellence, and were largely exported for this purpose to Sidon and elsewhere (Strabo, Geog. XVI. ii. 25; Jos. Wars, II. x. 12). Pliny refers to Sidon as a famous seat of glass manufacture, and Strabo also mentions the glass-works of Alexandria. Glass has been made in Hebron since very early times, and the glass-works there are said to supply in modern times a large part of the glass-ware used in Southern Syria, Egypt, and Arabia.

The references to glass in OT are few, and only one is direct, viz. that in Job 28^{17}, where RV so renders זְכוּכִית (AV crystal), following LXX ὕαλος and Vulg. vitrum, the allusion being to a rare and valuable substance, than which wisdom is still more precious. From Pr 23^{31} it may be inferred that drinking-cups of transparent glass were used by the Hebrews. The phrase 'treasures hid in the sand,' in the blessing of Zebulun (Dt 33^{19}), is interpreted in the Targum of Ps-Jonathan as referring to the sands of the Belus with their glass-making properties. (See Driver, Deut. p. 410). It has been supposed that the name שִׂשְׂרֵכֹת מַיִם 'burnings of waters' (Jos 11^8 13^6) may refer to glass-works, but the allusion may only be to the hot springs in the neighbourhood (for the various opinions and authorities see Keil, in loc.). There is a legend in the Koran (ch. 27) about a glass pavement in Solomon's palace at Jerus. which the queen of Sheba mistook for water. Recent excavations attest that glass was in use in Palestine at a very early date, and was most common during the Roman period (Warren, Underground Jerusalem, p. 518).

The Gr. word ὕαλος or ὕελος was applied by classical writers, not only to glass, but to mineral substances with similar properties (Herod. iii. 24; Achilles Tatius, ii. 3). Glass, indeed, was early used for making imitation gems (Pliny, xxxvi. 26), which Herodotus calls λίθινα χυτά (ii. 69). In NT ὕαλος and ὑάλινος are found only in Rev. The adj. is used in 4^6 15^2 of a sea; the noun occurs in $21^{18.\ 21}$, gold being compared to it. In the former instances there may be an allusion to limpid transparency (in 4^6 the sea is ὁμοία κρυστάλλῳ, cf. 22^1), but in the latter, notwithstanding the adj. διαυγής in 21^{21}, the reference is obviously to brilliant lustre. Probably in all instances the point of the comparison is smoothness and sheen (in 15^2 the sea is μεμιγμένη πυρί, and in 22^1 the 'crystal' river is λαμπρός).

All other passages where glass occurs in AV refer to mirrors, and these were almost universally of polished metal. Pliny (Nat. Hist. xxxvi. 26) speaks of mirrors in connexion with the glass manufacture of Sidon, but his words seem to describe an unsuccessful experiment (see MIRROR). Windows in Pal. do not appear to have been glazed in ancient times, though glazed windows have been found in the ruins of Pompeii (Smith's Dict. Antiq. s.v. vitrum).

GLASS.—The word 'glass,' which is now colloquial Eng. for 'mirror,' occurs with this meaning in AV, both in OT and NT. In Is 3^{23} 'the glasses' are part of the 'bravery' of the daughters of Zion (הַגְּלְיֹנִים, RV 'hand mirrors'). The translation is disputed by Ewald, who prefers 'gauzes,' 'transparent garments,' but it is generally accepted. 'Glass' is, however, an unfortunate rendering, as the material of which the gillâyôn was made was polished metal. The same word is used in 8^1 of a writing-tablet. In Ex 38^8 we read of 'the looking-glasses (1611 'looking glasses') of the women assembling' (מַרְאֹת הַצֹּבְאֹת, AVm 'brasen glasses,' RV 'mirrors of the serving women'), which were given to make the laver of brass and its brazen foot in the tabernacle.* And in Job 37^{18} the sky is 'as a molten looking-glass' (1611 'looking glasse,' Heb. כְּרָאִי מוּצָק, RV 'as a molten mirror').

In Sir 12^{11} the metaphor is used of a person wiping the rust off a looking-glass, but never being able to wipe it altogether away. The Gr. word is ἔσοπτρον (RV 'mirror'), which is found once elsewhere in LXX, Wis 7^{26}, where it is tr^{d} in AV 'mirror' (the only occurrence of that Eng. word). This is the Gr. word which is tr^{d} 'glass' = 'mirror' in NT. It is found only in 1 Co 13^{12}, Ja 1^{23} (RV 'mirror'). In 2 Co 3^{18} the verb κατοπτρίζω (which occurs only here and in the middle voice) is tr^{d} 'beholding as in a glass' (RV 'reflecting as a mirror,' RVm 'beholding as in a mirror'). Cf. Spenser, Hymne of Heavenly Beautie—

> 'Those unto all he daily doth display
> And show himselfe in th' image of his grace,
> As in a looking-glasse, through which he may > Be seene of all his creatures vile and base,
> That are unable else to see his face,
> His glorious face! which glistereth else so bright,
> That th' Angels' selves can not endure his sight.'

T. Adams in like manner speaks of seeing through a glass (Practical Works, ii. 27), 'He that hath seen heaven with the eye of faith, through the glass of the Scripture, slips off his coat with Joseph, and springs away.' But he also uses 'in a glass' (ii. 2), 'The world is a glass, wherein we may contemplate the eternal power and majesty of God.' So Tindale (Expositions, Parker Soc., p. 89) speaks of the law as a glass in which a man sees his own damnation. Bp. Hall, in his 'Contemplations' (Works, 1634, ii. 107), uses the word literally: 'How witty wee are to supply all the deficiencies of nature: if wee be low, wee can adde cubits to our stature; if ill colored, wee can borrow complexion; if hayreless, periwiggs; if dim-sighted, glasses; if lame, croutches.' And again, metaphorically (Works, ii. 119), 'There cannot be a better glasse wherein to discerne the face of our hearts then our pleasures.' Knox employs 'mirror' and 'glass' together, 'Epistle to Mrs. Elizabeth Bowes' (Works, iii. 338): 'The expositioun of your trubillis, and acknowledging of your infirmitie, war first unto me a verie mirrour and glass whairin I beheld my self sa rychtlie payntit furth, that nathing culd be mair evident to my awn eis.' See preceding article and MIRROR.

GLEANING.—The Hebrew law on this subject is contained in Lv $19^{9f.}$ 23^{22} (both H) and Dt 24^{19-21}. The first of these passages reads, 'When ye reap the harvest of your land, thou shalt not wholly reap the corners (פְּאַת)* of thy field, neither shalt thou gather (תְּלַקֵּט) the gleaning (לֶקֶט) of thy harvest. And thou shalt not glean (תְּעוֹלֵל)† thy vineyard, neither shalt thou gather (תְּלַקֵּט) the fallen fruit (פֶּרֶט) of thy vineyard; thou shalt leave them for the poor and for the stranger (גֵּר).' In Dt 24^{19-21} the law regarding gleanings in the cornfield and the vineyard is stated in substantially the same terms, and a similar provision is extended to the olive garden, 'When thou beatest (תַּחְבֹּט, a technical term; cf. Is 27^{12}) thine olive tree, thou shalt not go over the boughs again, it shall be for the stranger, for the fatherless, and for the widow.' The story of Ruth illustrates the working of the above provisions, which give point also to the question of Gideon, 'Is not the gleaning (עֹלְלוֹת) of Ephraim better than the vintage of Abiezer?' (Jg 8^2).

GLEDE (רָאָה rā'âh, γύψ, vultur, Dt 14^{13}).—In the passage (Lv 11^{14}) the word דָּאָה dā'âh, also tr^{d} in the LXX γύψ, occurs in a corresp. position in the verse, and there can be little doubt that the רָאָה of Dt is a textual error for דָּאָה. In that passage AV tr. it 'kite' and RV 'vulture.' Dā'âh, from a root signifying to dart or fly swiftly, is undoubtedly one of the raptatores, but which it is impossible to say with certainty. Glede is an old name for the kite, and has been adopted by RV as well as AV for rā'âh. Tristram (Nat. Hist. of Bible, p. 186) thinks that רָאָה may refer to the buzzard, Buteo vulgaris, Leach, which is one of the birds known in Arabic as 'aḳâb, and one of those known as shâhîn. See FALCON, KITE, VULTURE.

GLISTER.—The three verbs 'glisten,' 'glister,' and 'glitter' come from the same Teutonic base, gli, to shine, 'glitter' being traced to the Scandinavian, 'glisten' and 'glister' being apparently English in their earliest form. 'Glister' is simply a frequentative form of 'glisten.'

* This is the technical term which gave its name to the Talmudic tract Peâh, in which the interpretation of the 'corners' and the whole subject of the rights of the poor to the produce of the land are discussed.

† עֹלְלוֹת is used of the gleanings of a vineyard (Jg 8^2, Is 24^{13}, Jer 49^9, Mic 7^1) or of an olive tree (Is 17^6), not of grain (לֶקֶט). The verb is used figuratively in Jg 20^{45} of the fate of the flying Benjamites, 'And they gleaned of them (וַיְעַלְלוּהוּ) in the highways five thousand men,' and in Jer 6^9 'They shall thoroughly glean (עוֹלֵל יְעוֹלְלוּ) the remnant of Israel as a vine.' The other verb is used in Jg 1^7 of the seventy kings that gathered (מְלַקְּטִים) their meat under the table of Adoni-bezek; so frequently of picking up such articles as arrows, wood, etc.

The form 'glisten' is not used in AV :* 'glister' is found five times in AV of 1611; 'glitter,' nine times. Both words are used freely by writers of the period, and apparently without difference of meaning, so that the MSS and texts are sometimes uncertain. The tendency of later editions is to change 'glister' into 'glitter,' as has been done (since 1762) in AV with Job 20^{25}, which was 'glister' in 1611; and as is constantly done now in quoting the proverb, 'All that glisters is not gold,' a proverb found in Shaks. (Merchant of Venice, II. vii. 65), as well as in earlier writers, as T. Lever (Sermons, 1550, Arber's ed. p. 22), 'Alas, good brethren, as trulye as al is not golde that glystereth, so is it not vertue and honesty, but very vice and hipocrisie, wherof England at this day dothe most glorye.' As long as this proverb was quoted correctly (i.e. as long as 'glister' remained in good English use), it had a tendency to give 'glister' a depreciatory sense. This has been noticed in Milton (see Verity's notes on Lycidas in 'Pitt Press Milton,' p. 126). But there is no such distinction in AV. In course of time 'glister' went out of use, and now 'glitter' (perhaps under the influence of the same proverb) is often used with the depreciation of 'glister,' while 'glisten' has taken up the more honourable sense which once belonged to 'glitter.'

The occurrences of 'glister' in AV 1611 are: (1) Job 20^{25} 'the glistering sword cometh out of his gall' (בָּרָק bârâḳ, a word used either lit. of 'lightning,' and then mostly in the plur. 'lightning flashes,' or fig. of the lightning-flash of a weapon. This fig. use is always applied to a weapon. AV then tr. by 'glitter' in Dt 32^{41}, Ezk $21^{10.\ 28}$, Nah 3^{3}, Hab 3^{11}; but in Ezk 21^{15} the feeble tr^{n} is found 'it is made bright,' RV 'it is made as lightning,' as in vv.$^{10.\ 28}$. In Dt 32^{41} the Heb. is particularly bold: 'If I whet the lightning of my sword,' as RVm, EV 'If I whet my glittering sword'). We find 'glister' applied to armour by Spenser, FQ I. i. 14—

> 'His glistring armor made
> A little glooming light, much like a shade.'

And by North, Plutarch, p. 395, 'For the glistering of their harness, so richly trimmed and set forth with gold and silver, the colours of their arming coats upon their curaces, after the fashion of the Medes and Scythians, mingled with the bright glistering steel and shining copper, gave such a show as they went and removed to and fro, that made a light as clear as if all had been on a very fire, a fearful thing to look upon.' The early Eng. versions apply the word frequently to fire, as Cov. Is 50^{11} 'Ye walke in the glistringe of youre owne fyre'; Ezk 1^{4} 'And I loked, and beholde, a stormy wynde came out off the north with a greate cloude full of fyre, which with his glistre lightened all rounde aboute'; and v.^{13} 'and the fyre gaue a glistre,† and out off the fyre there wente lightninge.'

(2) 1 Ch 29^{2} 'glistering stones' (אַבְנֵי־פוּךְ; RV 'stones for inlaid work'). RV is rather an interpretation than a translation. The puk was an eye-paint made of antimony, much used by Eastern ladies, and not confined to ladies (see Lane, Mod. Egyptians, Gardner's ed. p. 53; and Shaw, Travels in Barbary^{2}, 229). The word occurs also in 2 K 9^{30}, where in AVm the Heb. is tr^{d} literally, 'Jezebel . . . put her eyes in painting'; Is 54^{11}, where 'I will lay thy stones in fair colours' is lit. as RVm 'in antimony' (it is the mortar, says Orelli, with which the new stones of Jerusalem will be set, that they may shine forth like dazzling eyes); and Jer 4^{30} where the eye-paint is directly spoken of. The nearest parallel to our passage is Is 54^{11}, and the 'glistering' of AV is better than the 'inlaid' of RV; for some kind of coloured, brilliant stone seems meant. The LXX rendering is λίθους πολυτελεῖς ('very costly stones'); Vulg. quasi stibinos (stibium, antimony); Wyc. 1388 'stonys as of the colour of wymmens oynement'; Luth. eingefasste Rubinen (taking the previous word along with this); so Cov. 'set Rubyes'; Rog. 'set stones,' with marg. 'some read Carbuncle, or ani other precious stone called Stibion'; Gen. 'carbuncle stones'; Bish. 'glystering stones'; Dou. 'as it were stibians,' with marg. 'a kind of finne white stone'; Ostervald, pierres d'escarboncle; Segond, pierres brillantes; Kautzsch, Puchsteine, with marg. 'pukh bedeutet anderwärts die Augenschminke, bezeichnet also wohl einen schwarzglänzenden Stein'; Cheyne, 'stones of (i.e. edged with) antimony.' For the Eng. word cf. Spenser, FQ I. iv. 8—

> 'A mayden Queene that shone, as Titans ray,
> In glistring gold and peerelesse pretious stone.'

(3) 2 Es 10^{25} 'And it came to pass, while I was talking with her, behold, her face upon a sudden shined exceedingly, and her countenance glistered, so that I was afraid of her and mused what it might be' (species [Fritzsche specie] coruscus fiebat visus ejus, RV 'her countenance glistered like lightning'). The countenance has the epithet 'glister' applied to it in Spenser's Hymne of Heavenly Beautie, quoted under GLASS—

> 'His glorious face! which glistereth else so bright,
> That th' Angels selues can not endure his sight.'

(4) 1 Mac 6^{39} 'Now when the sun shone upon the shields of gold and brass, the mountains glistered therewith, and shined like lamps of fire' (ὡς δὲ ἔστιλβεν ὁ ἥλιος ἐπὶ τὰς χρυσᾶς καὶ χαλκᾶς [A omits καὶ χαλκᾶς] ἀσπίδας, ἔστιλβεν τὰ ἔρη ἀπ' αὐτῶν, καὶ κατηύγαζεν ὡς λαμπάδες πυρός; RV 'Now when the sun shone upon the shields of gold and brass, the mountains shone therewith, and blazed like torches of fire'). The verb στίλβειν occurs once in NT, Mk 9^{3} in the narrative of Christ's transfiguration, τὰ ἱμάτια αὐτοῦ ἐγένετο στίλβοντα, where RV renders 'his garments became glistering,' after Rhem. version.

(5) Lk 9^{29} 'And as he prayed, the fashion of his countenance was altered, and his raiment was white and glistering' (ὁ ἱματισμὸς αὐτοῦ λευκὸς ἐξαστράπτων; RV 'became white and dazzling'). This is the only occurrence in NT of the Gr. compound ἐξαστράπτειν. It is found in LXX, Ezk 1^{4} of the flashing of flames of fire, 1^{7} and Dn 10^{6} of the glittering of burnished brass, and Nah 3^{3} of flashing spears. The simple verb is used twice by St Luke (and by no other NT writer), 17^{24} of the flashing of lightning, and 24^{4} of the 'shining garments' (RV 'dazzling apparel') of the angels at the tomb.* The meaning of the simple verb, then, is to flash as lightning, and the compound means to flash forth, and may be consciously chosen (as Farrar holds) to suggest that the flashing was from some inward radiance. The versions as a rule are feeble and inadequate: Vulg. 'vestitus ejus albus et refulgens'; Wyc.

* Nor in Shaks. or Milton, though it is at least as old as Udall, on Ac 10: 'And sodainly beholde a certain man, whose countenaunce was full of maiestie, stood visible before me, in a glistening garmente.'

* Cf. Milton, Comus, 219—

> 'I see ye visibly, and now believe
> That he, the Supreme good, t' whom all things ill
> Are but as slavish officers of vengeance,
> Would send a glistering guardian, if need were,
> To keep my life and honour unassail'd.'

'his clothing whit shining'; Luther 'sein Kleid war weiss, und glänzte'; Tind. 'his garment was whyte and shoon'; so Cov. (shyned), Rog., Cran., Gen. 1557; Gen. 1560 'his garment was white and glistered'; Bish. 'his garment shining very white'; Rhem. 'his raiment white and glistering'; Ost. 'ses habits devinrent blancs et resplendissants comme un éclair'; Olt. 'ses vêtements devinrent éblouissants de blancheur'; Seg. 'Son vêtement devint d'une éclatante blancheur'; Weizsäcker 'sein Gewand ward strahlend weiss.' The RV word 'dazzling' (introduced also at Lk 24[4]) is new, and involves a new idea which the Gr. word does not suggest, and which transfers the mind from the sight to the spectators.*

By a strange contrast Tindale uses 'glistringe whyte' (Lv 13[2. 23]) of the 'bright spot' in the skin which had to be examined for leprosy. Bunyan more appropriately (Holy War, p. 146) makes Emmanuel command 'that those that waited upon him should go and bring forth out of his Treasury those white and glistering robes that I, said he, have provided and laid up in store for my Mansoul.' And Rutherford (Letters, No. 51) writes to Marion M'Naught, 'I dare in faith say and write (I am not dreaming), Christ is but seeking (what He will have and make) a clean glistering bride out of the fire.' J. HASTINGS.

GLORIOUS.—The adj. 'glorious' had a wider application formerly than it has now. Thus Sylvester, Du Bartas's Weeks, ii.—

> 'Yet will I not this Work of mine give o're.
> The Labour's great: my Courage yet is more;
> . . . . . .
> Ther's nothing Glorious but is hard to get.'

It is applied in AV not only to the king (2 S 6[20]), and the king's daughter (Ps 45[13]), but also to the beauty of Ephraim standing above its fertile valley (Is 28[1. 4]), and the security of Tyre 'in the heart of the seas' (Ezk 27[25]); Wisdom is glorious (Wis 6[12]), and the 'fruit of good labours' (3[15]), and the 'long robe of righteousness' (Sir 27[8]); and (not only figuratively but literally) dress is described as glorious, Esther's (Ad. Est 14[2] 15[1]), the apparel of the young men of Judah in the peaceful days of Simon (1 Mac 14[9]), and even Nicanor's apparel (2 Mac 8[35]).

But the most evidently obsolete use of the word is when it means boastful, or as we still say vain-glorious, Ad. Est 11[11] 16[4] ('lifted up with the glorious words of lewd persons that were never good,' τοῖς τῶν ἀπειραγάθων κόμποις ἐπαρθέντες, RV 'boastful'). This meaning of 'glorious,' which follows Lat. gloriosus, was once common, and is still retained by the French glorieux. Thus Bacon (Essays, 'Of Followers and Friends,' Gold. Treas. ed. p. 198), 'Likewise Glorious Followers, who make themselves as Trumpets, of the Commendation of those they Follow, are full of Inconvenience'; and 'Of Vaine-glory' (p. 216), 'They that are Glorious must needs be Factious; for all Bravery stands upon Comparisons.' So Chapman, Homer's Iliads, xiii. 738—

> 'Vain-spoken man and glorious.'

GLORY (IN OT).—In EV 'glory' most frequently corresponds to the Hebrew כָּבוֹד, which is also, owing to the difference between Hebrew and English idiom, in some cases tr[d] by 'glorious' (e.g. Is 4[2] 11[10], Neh 9[5]). But several other Heb. words are also sometimes tr[d] by 'glory' or 'glorious,' viz. אַדִּיר, אַדֶּרֶת, and the Niph. and Hiph. of the vb. [אדר] in Zec 11[3] and v.[2] (RVm), Ex 15[6. 21], Is 42[21]; נָאוֹר Ps 76[4]; הוֹד e.g. Ps 45[3] 148[13]; הָדָר e.g. Is 5[14] (cf. הָדוּר 63[1]), Ps 90[16]; תִּפְאֶרֶת e.g. Ps 16[31] 20[29]; צְבִי e.g. Is 13[19] 24[16]. In Dn 'glory' occurs several times as tr[n] of the Aram. יְקָרָא. The verb 'to glory' in EV generally corresponds to הִתְהַלֵּל 'to make one's boast of,' e.g. Jer 9[23.]; and 'to glorify' or 'be glorified' to various verbal forms of the roots כבר and פאר.

Full details as to the various Heb. words must be sought in the Heb. lexicon or in commentaries on the various passages. Generally speaking, the English term is sufficiently clear from the context in spite of the number of the Heb. words which it renders. But we have to consider here some characteristic or peculiar uses of the term, especially the important ideas expressed by the phrase 'the glory of J".'

i. 1. The 'glory' of men or of material objects calls for little explanation. A man's 'glory' is sometimes the outward tokens of his prosperity, such as silver and gold, or the splendour of his appearance; sometimes his reputation, the esteem in which he is held. For the first sense we may refer to Is 61[6], where the term stands in parallelism with 'wealth.' Again in Hag 2[7] 'glory' is parallel to the 'desirable things of all nations'; we must consider these to be more explicitly described by the next verse as consisting of silver and gold, and these in their turn (v.[9]) as constituting 'the latter glory' of the temple; cf. also Is 66[11.], Ps 49[16. 17], Nah 2[9]. In the last passage we are near to what was perhaps the original meaning of the Heb. kābôd, viz. 'weight'; cf. the use of the vb. kābēd in e.g. Job 6[3], and the noun kōbed in Pr 27[3]. We may notice also the association of the word (kābôd) with 'ōsher 'riches' in Est 5[11], where it also stands in parallelism with rōb, 'multitude.' So the glory of a king (or a nation) consists in the warriors that betoken his might, Is 8[7] 17[3.] 21[16]; of Lebanon (Is 60[13]), in the trees with which it is covered. The 'king's daughter' of Ps 45[13] is 'all glorious' in virtue of her richly adorned clothing; cf. Ex 28[2], and metaphorically Job 19[9].

2. For instances of 'glory' in the sense of 'reputation' see Ps 4[2], Job 29[20], 2 S 6[20] ('How glorious was the king of Israel,' i.e. 'how much reputation did he gain for himself'—ironically). But in most cases where the Heb. word (kābôd) has this sense, it is tr[d] in EV by 'honour,' e.g. Ec 10[1], Pr 21[21].

The usage in Ps 73[24], if the text be correct, is isolated; 'glory' here appears to mean the splendour into which men pass, who like Enoch and Elijah are translated by God; so RV text; RVm is hardly so probable a translation. Against the text, see, however, e.g. Wellh. in SBOT.

3. The 'glory' of a nation may be, as we have seen, its warriors as betokening its might. But it is a favourite prophetic doctrine that Israel's might does not consist in its armies and weapons of war, but in J" (cf. Is 31[1-3], Zec 4[6], Ps 20[7]). Hence, perhaps, we may derive a noticeable usage whereby J" is described as Israel's glory. Thus Jeremiah (2[11]) says, 'Hath a nation changed their gods which yet are no gods? but my people have changed their glory (i.e. J") for that which doth not profit' (i.e. for other gods); and probably Hos 4[7b] originally ran 'they have exchanged their glory for infamy' with a like meaning. Cf. also Ps 3[3] (cf. 62[7]) 106[20].

4. Another noticeable use of the term is to describe the self; thus it forms the parallel to 'my soul,' a frequent Hebrew term for self, in Gn 49[6] 'O my soul, come not thou into their council; unto their assembly, my glory, be not thou united'; and to 'heart' in Ps 16[9] 108[1]. Cf. also Ps 7[6] 57[8] and 30[12] (where read כְּבוֹדִי for כְּבוֹד). This usage is generally explained as a poetical expression for 'self'; and, unlike 'soul,' 'glory' in this sense certainly is confined to poetical passages. For a somewhat parallel usage we might then compare

* 'White and dazzling' is Mrs. Lewis's tr[n] of the Sinaitic Palimpsest, but with marg. 'like lightning.' ܒܪܩ; cf. Delitzsch's Hebrew translation of the Gospels, חֲלָבִין וְהַבְרִיק.

'my darling' (יְחִידָתִי) in Ps 22[20]. But another explanation deserving of attention has been offered (see e.g. Dillm. on Gn 49[6]). In Assyrian kabidtu (כָּבֵד 'liver') is frequently used as a synonym for napištu (= נֶפֶשׁ 'soul'); it has therefore been suggested that in the Hebrew passages above cited we ought to point kĕbēdî instead of kĕbôdî and tr. literally 'my liver,' i.e. 'myself'; the liver, which was thought to be a seat of life, affording as suitable a periphrasis for the self as 'the soul'; cf. La 2[11] and (for Assyrian usage) Fried. Delitzsch, Assyrisches Handwörterbuch, p. 317*a* (s.v. kabidtu). Some support is given to this view by the fact that the LXX translates the word in Gn 49[6] by τὰ ἥπατά μου (i.e. 'my liver'); on the other hand, in the Psalms (which were translated later) the regular rendering is δόξα (otherwise 15[16][9]).

ii. The Glory of J".—The glory of J" (כְּבוֹד יהוה) or of God (כְּבוֹד אֵל, אֱלֹהִים) is, like 'the name of J"' (8[2]), with which it stands in parallelism in Is 59[19], Ps 102[15],* a summary term for the self-revealed character and being of God. It is also frequently used, especially in certain writings, to denote a particular physical appearance indicating the divine presence. It has been generally assumed that the latter is the original usage; but this, as will be seen, is far from certain, and, in any case, the sharply defined significance of the term in P cannot be traced back to early times. In several cases the meaning of the term is ambiguous, and it has been interpreted by some commentators in the one, by others in the other, of the two senses just indicated. But the cases in which the meaning is quite unambiguous render it possible and convenient to divide our examination of the usage and more detailed significance of the term into two sections, according as the reference is to the self-revealed character or to the physical manifestation of God. In conclusion, we shall have to consider certain ambiguous passages, and the relation between the two meanings.

1. The glory of J" as a term for the self-revealed character and being of God.—Since Ex 33[17-23] belongs, in all probability, to a secondary (7th cent.) stratum of J (see below, § 3), the earliest occurrence of the phrase is in Isaiah, who uses it (6[3]) quite unambiguously to denote the divine nature as revealed in the world; J"s glory is the outward manifestation of His holiness. The sense is probably similar in 3[8], where Judah's sin is represented as culminating in this: that she wilfully opposed herself to a God who had manifested Himself to her in His majesty and might (cf. Am 3[2]). Although these are the only two passages in Isaiah's writings in which the phrase actually occurs, the underlying idea of J"s power and might as manifested in nature and history is fundamental with the prophet; cf. especially 2[10. 21], where the recurring term is similar, but not as in EV identical, with the one we are discussing—the glory of His majesty (בְּדַר גְּאוֹנוֹ) in vv.[10. 19. 21]. We may therefore reasonably attribute to Isaiah a commanding influence over both the phrase and the idea as they appear in subsequent literature. The direct influence of Is 6[3] is seen in Hab 2[14], and also, in all probability, in Nu 14[21] (cf. e.g. Kuenen, Hexateuch, p. 247). In Nu 14[22] the glory of J" is specifically the manifestation of His nature in history, in the life of the nation; and this is the case also in Dt 5[24] [Heb. 5[21]], although at first sight the context generally might suggest that the phrase signifies here a physical appearance; but the accompanying synonym 'his greatness,' the meaning of which is unambiguous (cf. 3[24] 9[26] 11[2]), is decisive against this. The same predominant reference to history marks Ezekiel's use of the phrase in 39[21], and underlies his use of the verb (נִכְבַּד = to show oneself glorious, to manifest one's glory) in 28[22] 39[13]. The phrase is quite clearly to be taken in the same sense in Is 66[19], where J"s glory is the counterpart of His 'fame,' and is to be declared among the nations (yet on this and the preceding verse see Dillm.); according to Cheyne (in his Commentary) also in Is 40[5]. In the Psalms the particular nuance of the phrase differs in different passages. Judging from the general tenor of the Psalms, it is God's manifestation through His control of the lives of nations or individuals that the respective writers intend mainly to imply by their use of the phrase in 57[5. 11] 63[2] (cf. Ps 73[17]—in the sanctuary the Psalmist realizes the meaning of J"s moral government, and so perceives 'his glory'), 72[19] (= Is 6[3], Nu 14[21]), 96[3] ('his glory' ‖ 'his marvellous works'), 97[6] (‖ 'his righteousness'), 102[15f.] (cf. Is 59[19]), 138[5] (‖ 'the ways of J"'); cf. also 'the glory of thy kingdom' ‖ 'thy power,' 'the glory of the majesty of his kingdom' ‖ 'his mighty acts,' 45[11f.]. On the other hand, in 19[1], where it is parallel to 'handy work' (מַעֲשֵׂה יָדָיו), and in 104[31], the chief emphasis lies on the fact that the natural world is a revelation of God; this is perhaps also the case with 8[2],* although in this psalm it is, in particular, man's place in nature that reveals God's nature and purpose. Pr 25[2] in connexion with the foregoing usages, and in the light of such passages as Job 28, may be interpreted to mean that the very mysteries of nature, the sense that there is much hidden which is not revealed, contributes to man's perception of God's nature. The term 'glory,' especially in a phrase that recurs more than once and deserves particular attention, is also used in the modified sense of the praise which God's character, as revealed in His works and deeds, should call forth; thus 'the glory of his [J"s] name' or 'the glory due unto his name,' where both renderings of the RV represent the same Hebrew phrase (כְּבוֹד שְׁמוֹ), means the praise due to His self-revealed character from those to whom it has been revealed (29[2] 66[2] 96[8]), and similarly the glory of J" (Is 42[8] 43[7] 48[11]; cf. also Ps 79[9] in connexion with v.[13]). In 113[4], as the parallel indicates, the phrase is barely more than a periphrasis for J".

2. The 'glory of J"' denoting a physical phenomenon indicative of the divine presence.—With the exception of a single Jahwistic passage (Ex 33[17-23]), and, according to a possible interpretation, a single passage in Jeremiah (17[12]) which must be left for discussion in the next section, this usage first appears in Ezekiel, who in any case appears to have exercised as great an influence on this modification of the idea as Isaiah on that discussed in the foregoing section. Ezekiel, as we have seen, does indeed employ the phrase and the cognate verb in the manner already discussed in the preceding section; but generally with him the glory of J" is a bright or fiery appearance that resembles the rainbow (1[28] 10[4]), causing the ground, where it appears, to shine (43[2]); moves from one place to another (9[3] 10[4. 18] 43[2]), or is borne from one place to another on cherubim (10[19] 11[22f.]), each movement being accompanied by a rushing sound (3[12], where read בְּרוּם for בָּרוּךְ, and translate 'a great rushing when the glory of J" was lifted up from its place'). Again, as in the vision of the coming judgment the 'glory of J"' is seen by Ezekiel to leave Jerusalem (11[23]), so in the vision of coming restoration it is seen returning to the city (43[2ff.]).†

* Cf. the combination שֵׁם כְּבֹדֶךָ in Neh 9[5] (cf. Ps 72[19]).

* In the theophany of Hab 3[3] the word used for 'his glory' in v.[3] is different in the Hebrew (הוֹדוֹ). So also in Ps 148[13].

† Contrast the early narrative in Samuel of the loss of the ark to the Philistines (1 S 4[21. 22]). The ark symbolized J"'s presence; with it J" is felt to be leaving Israel; but the 'glory' which departs is the glory of Israel. The possession of the ark was

In brief, with Ezekiel, 'the glory of J″' has become a term for a theophany; and accordingly when Ezekiel sees it, he worships (44[4]). But it is important to observe that throughout it is a theophany seen in vision; Ezekiel no more regards the appearance which he terms the glory of J″ as visible to the natural eye, than he regards the whole complex appearance of the chariot in ch. 1 as being so visible. It is further to be observed that in 39[21] the only passage where he refers to the 'glory of J″,' except in his visions, he uses the phrase in the sense discussed in § II. 1. Zechariah associates fire and glory when he says, 'For I, saith the LORD, will be unto her a wall of fire round about, and I will be the glory in the midst of her' (2[5]); but he is evidently speaking in metaphor. In P the usage is different; the idea that the glory of J″ is the divine nature manifested through the divine activity only finds expression—and that, perhaps, not quite consciously—in the use of the verb (נִכְבַּד), discussed above, in Ex 14[4. 17. 18], Lv 10[3]. The actual phrase 'the glory of J″' is invariably used by P of a physical phenomenon manifest to ordinary natural vision. The 'glory of the LORD' first appeared at the time of the giving of the Law on Sinai; it then 'abode upon Mount Sinai,' and its appearance was 'like devouring fire on the top of the mount in the eyes of all the children of Israel' (Ex 24[16-18]). As a consequence of coming into close proximity with 'the glory of J″' (Ex 24[18]), Moses' face shone with a brightness so fierce that he had to veil his face when he came before the people (Ex 34[29-35]). With the exception of this unique occasion, 'the glory of J″' invariably appears at the tabernacle; see Ex 29[43] 40[34. 35] 16[7. 10] [a misplaced narrative which should follow the narrative of the erection of the tabernacle: in v.[10] restore הַמִּקְדָּשׁ (towards) the sanctuary, for the senseless redactorial הַמִּדְבָּר=(towards) the wilderness; cf. e.g. Dillm. ad loc.], Lv 9[6. 23], Nu 14[10] 16[19] 16[42] (He 17[7]) 20[6]. The appearance of 'the glory of J″' to the people was either a sign of the divine favour (Lv 9[6. 23]), or, more frequently, a warning of divine anger, e.g. Ex 16[7. 10], Nu 14[10]. It is never directly stated of 'the glory of J″' in connexion with the tabernacle that it was a fiery appearance; but this is clearly implied, for there, as on Mt. Sinai, it appears in connexion with cloud (Ex 16[10], Nu 16[42], and in Nu 14[10] [LXX], cf. also Lv 9[23. 24]). The cloud, it must be remembered, according to P, always abode upon or covered the tabernacle, and became fiery in appearance at night (Ex 40[38] 9[16]). We must therefore seek the peculiarity of 'the glory of J″' (as conceived by P) in the fact that it was a sudden fiery appearance in the cloud by day (cf. Ex 16[7. 10]—note 'in the morning'), Nu 16[16. 19], cf. Lv 10[2. 3]. Closely related to P's conception is that found in 1 K 8[11]=2 Ch 5[14] 7[1. 3], all of which passages have been influenced by P (on 1 K 8[1-11] see Cornill, Einleitung, p. 109).

3. Before attempting to discuss the relation between the two conceptions already considered, we must examine certain passages where the phrase either possesses a different meaning or is ambiguous. Most important is the passage in Ex 33[17-23]. This scarcely belongs to the earliest stratum of J. If it is correctly assigned by Kuenen (Hexateuch, p. 246 f.) and others (cf. Wellhausen, Composition, p. 96; see Driver, LOT[6] p. 38) to the 7th cent., the earliest usage of the phrase in the extant literature is by Isaiah. Now, the conception of the author of Ex 33[17-23] is clearly not identical with Isaiah's; but neither is it reasonable to identify his conception with that of Ezekiel or P. In Ex 33[17-23] 'the glory of J″' is used with reference to a theophany in human shape; in reply to Moses' request that he may see J″'s glory, J″ promises that though he cannot see His face, and therefore, while His glory is passing by, Moses' face must be covered, yet, when His glory has passed by, he may look after J″ and see His back. The idea is clearly not the same as in 16[10] or 24[17]. In the Jahwistic passage we have a glorious appearance in human form to Moses only; in P, a fiery appearance, which can hardly have been, and is certainly not implied to have been, in human form to all the people. Jer 14[21] (cf. also 17[12], which, however, is perhaps post-Jeremianic—cf. Cornill, Einleitung, p. 167; Driver, LOT[6] p. 237) might at first appear to presuppose Ezekiel's or P's conception; but we really do more justice to the context, which is entirely concerned with J″'s activity in history and nature, by following the suggestion of the parallel term 'thy name,' and interpreting the phrase 'the throne of thy glory' in accordance with the usage discussed in § II. 1; cf. also Giesebrecht on 17[12]. In certain late * passages of the Bk. of Isaiah it is most natural to interpret the phrase of a physical appearance; but all these passages are of a poetical character; see 35[2] 58[8] 60[1. 2], and perhaps also 40[5] (cf. Dillm. ad loc.). The same interpretation should possibly be given to Ps 26[8b]—'the place of the tabernacle of thy glory' (מְקוֹם מִשְׁכַּן כְּבוֹדֶךָ)—where the phraseology at any rate has probably been suggested by P. Perhaps we ought also to compare in the present connexion the (probably non-Isaianic) reference in Is 11[10]; cf. also 60[13].

In the light of the preceding survey of the exegetical and critical data, the most probable conclusion appears to be that 'the glory of J″' was originally used to express the manifestations of J″'s power and might, or more generally of His nature; through Isaiah the phrase became enriched and deepened in meaning, and subsequently continued to express this idea, and became reflected also in the Niphal of the verb. Comparatively early, however, viz. in Ex 33[17-23], we find the phrase also used in connexion with, and perhaps itself expressing, a theophany in human form: possibly, however, 'glory' is here merely a periphrasis for self, just as it is in connexion with a human subject in an early poem (Gn 49[6]), and several psalms (e.g. 7[5] 16[9] 57[8]—yet on this usage cf. § I. 4); note the equivalence in Ex 33[22] 'while my glory passeth by . . . until I have passed by.' The phrase first unmistakably expresses a physical phenomenon in Ezekiel, who uses it to express the form under which in his visions he realizes the movements of J″, more especially the coming removal of His presence from Jerusalem and His subsequent return after the Exile is ended. But it is not till we come to P in the 5th cent. that the phrase is used of a physical phenomenon actually supposed to have been visible to the natural eye. This writer uses it of a particular fiery appearance, by which the Deity indicated His presence in the tabernacle. The idea of such a theophany in fire and cloud is unquestionably ancient, as we may see in the case of the burning bush, or in J's account of the Pillar of Fire and Cloud; the use of the particular phrase 'glory of J″,' which originally possessed an entirely different significance, to express that idea, is first suggested by Ezekiel, and first really appropriated by P and his school (1 K 8[11], 2 Ch 7). As understood by P, 'the glory of J″' is closely related to the Shechinah of later Jewish theology (on which cf. Weber, Die altsynagog. Paläst. Theol. pp. 179–184). How thoroughly the priestly writer has

Israel's glory; the loss of it the departure of their glory (cf. § I. 3 above). The passage has not therefore a direct bearing on the conception of 'the glory of J″.'

* Cf. Cheyne, Introd. to Book of Isaiah, pp. 208 ff., 298, 381 (all post-exilic passages).

materialized the earlier conception may be seen by a comparison with Dt. The recurring promise of that book is that God will cause His name to dwell at the one sanctuary. P has materialized this into a physical phenomenon. If we have rightly interpreted the phrase in certain post-exilic passages in the Bk. of Isaiah of a physical phenomenon, we may probably account for the use by the combined influence of Ezekiel, and such stories connected with the Exodus as those of the pillar of cloud (cf. Is 4^5).

G. B. GRAY.

GLORY (NT).—The tr. in NT (AV and RV) once of κλέος 'renown' (1 P 2^{20} only), and, in its verbal signification, occasionally representing καυχᾶσθαι 'to boast' and its cognates καύχησις 'boasting' (Ro 15^{17}) and καύχημα 'something to boast of' (1 Co 9^{16}); but almost entirely confined to the rendering of δόξα and its correlatives. Δόξα runs parallel in its significations with its parent δοκέω, though finally going beyond it. The history of this verb, from the oldest Greek downwards, shows that the chronological order of its meanings is (1) intrans. 'I seem,' (2) trans. 'I think'; the extension from δοκεῖ μοι 'it seems to me,' to δοκῶ 'I think,' being due to the same personalization as is the Eng. extension of 'If it please you' to 'If you please.' Its fundamental idea appears to be subjective judgment, which may be right or wrong, as opposed to φαίνεσθαι, which is objective and external to the thinker,—the look of a thing; which also, of course, may be either veracious or misleading. But δόξα stands for the classical sense of opinion once only in sacred literature, viz. 4 Mac 5^{18}; and as mere outward appearance in opposition to reality (Plato, Xenophon) it does not occur in NT; for whereas the LXX version of Is 11^3 allowed itself δόξα there for the 'sight of the eyes' as the false guide to judgment, the NT at Jn 7^{24} has 'judge not according to ὄψις.' But while it ignored the precise senses of appearance and opinion, the NT usage, following that of the LXX, accepted the classical and LXX development of outward appearance (rather than opinion) into reputation, and affords abundant instances of the LXX non-classical expansion of the same idea into outward splendour or manifested excellence. Both reputation and splendour (or manifested excellence) find their common expression in glory. Thus Jn 12^{43} 'They loved the glory (honour) from men rather than the glory from God'; Lk 2^9 'The glory (brightness) of the Lord shone round about them'; and 2 Co 3^9 'Much rather doth the ministration of righteousness exceed in glory (manifested excellence).' [Cf. OT כָּבוֹד kābôd, in its varied senses: honour (to God) Jos 7^{19}, or men Gn 31^1 (Jacob); brightness (in the cloud), the rabbinical Shechinah Ex 16^{10}; or beauty of appearance Is 60^{13} (Lebanon, cf. 1 Co $15^{40.\ 41}$); manifested excellence Ex 33^{22} 'my glory,' cf. v.^{19} 'my goodness'].

These senses in NT are common and undisputed, as is also the closely related sense of majesty or magnificence of king or ruler, e.g. of God, in doxologies, 1 P 4^{11}; of Christ, Ja 2^1, 2 Th 1^9 ('the glory of his might'), cf. He 1^3; and of man as ruling for God, 1 Co 11^7 (the woman making conspicuous the authority of the man). But there are still differences of opinion as to the sense of brightness and the extensions of it. When used of God, of Christ, of regenerated and glorified humanity, how far is it literal, symbolical, ethical? That it is ethically used of God is obvious from such passages as Ro 3^{23} 'All have sinned and fall short of the glory of God,' i.e. the manifested perfection of His character, or, according to the context (vv.$^{21.\ 22}$), His righteousness. That it is ethically used of Christ is obvious from Jn 1^{14} 'We beheld his glory . . . full (as He was) of grace and truth.' That it is ethically used of human nature in the process of glorification, i.e. of ethical and spiritual transfiguration, is obvious from 2 Co 3^{18} 'We all, with unveiled face, mirroring in ourselves the glory of the Lord, are being transformed into the same image from glory to glory, even as from the Lord the Spirit.'

A literal element also presents itself. The conception and description in NT of the divine manifestation in heaven and on earth, of the form of heavenly beings, and of the future appearance (according to St. Paul) of the glorified children of God in the heavenly body, are in the line of the OT theophanies and angelophanies with their light and brightness. This fact is clear from the 'glory of the Lord' round the shepherds (Lk 2^9), from the transfiguration of Christ (Lk 9^{32}), from the appearance of Moses and Elias 'in glory' (Lk 9^{31}), from St. Paul's vision of the Lord in the way (Ac 9^3 and parallel passages in Ac 22 and 26), and from the 'body of glory' (Ph 3^{21}), perhaps suggested by this vision. By this apparent literalism in the conceptions of the divine and the coming 'glory,' Pfleiderer is induced to define the specially Pauline δόξα as 'the brilliant light which is everywhere the manifestation of the πνεῦμα, and forms a special attribute of the majesty of God' (Paulinism, Eng. tr. i. 135), the πνεῦμα being 'heavenly, supersensuous matter,' 'originally belonging to God and then to Christ the Son of God, in such wise that it constitutes their divine essence, and is presented in a concrete form in them' (i. 200). And Weiss, while denying that the 'essence of the Spirit is (in St. Paul) conceived as a luminous substance' (Bib. Theol. of NT, Eng. tr. i. 397), affirms that 'it is characteristic of the Pauline theology that the apostle has transformed the (earlier and vaguer) idea of the divine δόξα into an altogether concrete notion,—that of a heavenly radiant light proceeding from a supermundane substance of light' (i. 396), 'a luminous light-substance in which God reveals Himself' (ii. 187, n. 7). 'Out of it are formed the bodies of the heavenly beings, and . . . this same δόξα will believers yet bear when they are conformed to His image, to whom, as the Lord of the Spirit, this δόξα belongs.' Weiss, indeed, disclaims materialism in this interpretation; but it is hard, with this disclaimer, to see what is meant by 'supermundane substance.' Dr. Sanday also (Romans, p. 85), quoting from Weber (Altsyn. Theol. p. 214) the rabbinical view that 'the glory' (the first among the six things lost by Adam at the fall) was a reflection from the divine glory which, before the fall, brightened Adam's face, goes on to say: 'Clearly, St. Paul conceives of this glory as in process of being recovered: the physical sense is also enriched by its extension to attributes that are moral and spiritual.'

It is proverbially difficult, of course, to distinguish sometimes, in St. Paul's expressions, the literal from the freely symbolical: the discriminating critic will find this difficulty not only with δόξα but also with σάρξ, σῶμα, and πνεῦμα; and it is a difficulty that must be expected to arise when, in an old vocabulary, verbal expression has to be found for new thought. In this exigency words are often selected which, being in themselves subjective as well as objective, admit of being wholly subjectivized. One of these plastic words appears to be δόξα in the moulding hands of St. Paul: a word elastic and not rigid, a word 'thrown out at an idea' (like the words just mentioned), and not intended mechanically to define it. It seems unjustifiable, therefore, to chain St. Paul to the rigid, concrete conception of a literal light substance (even though it be elevated into the cloudland of the supersensuous or supermundane), whether for the πνεῦμα (in God and Christ), or for the heavenly body of Christ and of the believer to be glorified through Him. In 2 Co 3^{18}, above quoted, the ethical sense of the glory is so pre-eminent as to suggest not merely an 'extension of the physical' but even a supplantation of it; and this ethical conception comes out again plainly enough in Ro 5^2 and 3^7, where righteousness is the burden of the thought. A non-Pauline, but not an anti-Pauline, illustration is furnished by Jn 1^{14}, also above quoted: there the bright cloud (δόξα, Ro 9^4) in the tabernacle (cf. ἐσκήνωσεν) serves St. John for the historical and allegorical foundation of the idea of the Logos in the tabernacle of the flesh, and the incarnate God in the world of men or among the Jewish people.

Prudence may well, therefore, lead us to pause before we go further than this,—that the 'brightness' accompanying Theophany, Christophany, Angelophany, in OT or NT times, and the double meaning brightness and manifested perfection, contained in δόξα, led St. Paul to avail himself of it as the most significant symbol for the manifestation of perfected human nature; being also for him the most significant inherited symbol of the divine perfection as manifested to the human eye. His root-idea is spiritual: in the new life the Spirit is the vitalizing principle, and the new body 'raised in glory' (1 Co 15^{43}) (σῶμα not necessarily, with St. Paul, connoting the material) will be spiritual (πνευματικόν), the expression and the organ of the spiritual life. J. MASSIE.

GNAT (κώνωψ).—A term for any insect of the Culicidæ, a family of dipterous insects, with bristly stings, included in a flexible proboscis. They penetrate the skin, suck the blood, and at the same time inject a poisonous fluid, which causes swelling, and sometimes ulcerations. The humming noise produced by their wings in flight disturbs the rest of their victims, as they are for the most part nocturnal in their habits. The commonest species of gnat in Bible lands is the mosquito. The gnat is mentioned only once (Mt 23^{24}), where 'strain at' of AV is plainly wrong, and 'strain out' of RV right. G. E. POST.

GNOSTICISM is the comprehensive name used to embrace a large number of widely ramified sects, on the borderland between Christianity and heathen thought, which flourished in the 2nd cent. The name in this sense is modern. There were, indeed, sects who called themselves Gnostic (γνωστικοί), as claiming a deeper knowledge of spiritual things, and Church writers (especially Irenæus) were fond of bringing different false teachers under the condemnation of 1 Ti 6^{20}; but there was no common name for these varying systems, and the limit assigned to the present use of the word must be to a certain extent arbitrary. The following are among the tendencies characteristic of the so-called Gnostic sects:—(1) An attempt to grapple with the problems of creation, and especially the origin of evil; (2) an attempt at its solution by theories which postulate a string of emanations extending between the first God and the visible universe, thus concealing the difficulties of the problem rather than solving it; (3) a tendency towards dualism, resulting either in asceticism or licentiousness; (4) a syncretistic tendency, combining in an artificial manner with some more or less misunderstood Christian doctrines, elements from classical, Oriental, and Jewish sources, or even from common magic; (5) a tendency towards a Docetic Christology, i.e. one which looked upon the earthly life of Christ, or at any rate the sufferings, as unreal; (6) a tendency to represent γνῶσις (knowledge) as something superior to mere faith, and the special possession of the more enlightened. Some of these characteristics are more common in one, some in another, of the heresies called Gnostic, nor probably is it possible to find any one idea common to them all.

i. The following is an account of the various places in the NT where reff. to Gnosticism have been found or imagined. These reff. have played a very large part in the critical discussions of the last sixty years, and in some cases touch on problems not yet solved. For a fuller discussion reference is given to the various separate articles.

1. In Ac 8^{9-24} we have our earliest account of SIMON MAGUS (wh. see), who has played a large part in the history of Gnosticism, and is regarded by ecclesiastical writers as the father of all false teaching. Many doctrines characteristic of Gnosticism are attributed to him in later writers, and works of his are quoted—how far genuine is very doubtful. From Acts we learn that he practised 'magical arts,' and was called the Great Power of God (οὗτός ἐστιν ἡ δύναμις τοῦ θεοῦ ἡ καλουμένη μεγάλη). Both these were consistent with the tendencies we call Gnostic.

2. In 1 Co we find St. Paul using the word γνῶσις, which generally in NT implies a deep knowledge of spiritual things in a bad sense, and contrasting it with ἀγάπη (1 Co 8^1 'knowledge puffeth up, but love edifieth'). There was a tendency to lay undue stress on intellectual gifts.

3. In the Ep. to the COLOSSIANS (wh. see) false teachers are attacked who combined asceticism, scrupulousness concerning food, new moons, and sabbaths with angel worship (θρησκεία τῶν ἀγγέλων), and apparently a tendency to depreciate the person of Christ. Their teaching is called 'the philosophy and vain conceit' (διὰ τῆς φιλοσοφίας καὶ κενῆς ἀπάτης), is said to be according to the traditions of men, after the elements of (see ELEMENT) the world (κατὰ τὰ στοιχεῖα τοῦ κόσμου), and a voluntary humility (ταπεινοφροσύνη, Col 2^{8-23}). According to Baur (Ch. Hist. Eng. tr. i. 127), 'the numerous echoes of Gnosticism and its peculiar doctrines, which are to be found in the three Epp. to the Ephesians, Colossians, and Philippians, are sufficient, had we no other ground to go upon, to fix the position of these works in the post-apostolic age.' But this extreme statement has long ceased to be accepted. It has been pointed out by many that the Colossian heresy was clearly Judaistic, and that 2nd cent. Gnosticism was strongly anti-Jewish. Lightfoot accounted for the 'Gnostic' tendencies by supposing a Judaism modified under influences similar to that of the Essenes. Hort (Judaistic Christianity, p. 128) denies that there is any 'tangible evidence for Essenism out of Palestine,' and considers that we are on 'common Jewish ground,' but the Judaism of the Dispersion and not of Palestine.

4. 'Still more directly and indubitably do the Pastoral Epistles carry us to the period of the Gnostic heresy,' writes Baur, while here again his position is almost universally modified or set aside. The false teachers of these Epistles (see PASTORAL EPP., TIMOTHY, TITUS), to dwell only on leading features, taught a different doctrine (ἑτεροδιδασκαλεῖν), consisting of fables and endless genealogies (1 Ti 1^4), foolish questionings, strifes, and fighting about the law (μάχας νομικάς), Tit 3^9; they forbade to marry, and commanded to abstain from meats (1 Ti 4^3). Their teaching is described as profane babblings and oppositions of the knowledge which is falsely so called (ἀντιθέσεις τῆς ψευδωνύμου γνώσεως). This last phrase seemed to suggest a reference to Marcion, and is so taken still by Harnack, who regards the verse as a later interpolation; and the Fathers were accustomed to hold that the expressions concerning 'genealogies' referred to Valentinian and other theories of emanations, while the prohibition of marriage suggested Encratite doctrine. But none of these allusions were really necessary, and the expression 'Jewish fables' (Tit 1^{1}) shows that we cannot be dealing with the anti-Jewish Gnosticism of the 2nd cent. Lightfoot sees a development of the Colossian heresy; and Hort, although his explanations are in some cases thoroughly convincing, perhaps goes too far in banishing all of what we should call Gnostic tendencies.

5. The First Epistle of St. John directly, the Gospel indirectly, combat a form of teaching which denied that Jesus Christ had come in the flesh (1 Jn 4^{1-3}). The most common explanation is to see in this a refutation of the peculiar form of Docetism associated with Cerinthus, with whom St. John is connected historically by tradition.

6. In the Apoc. we have reference to certain NICOLAITANS (wh. see), who are classed by Fathers (e.g. Iren. I. xxvi. 3) among heretics, to the teaching of one JEZEBEL (wh. see), and to some who knew the deep things of Satan (τὰ βαθέα τοῦ Σατανά), a phrase which has a Gnostic ring about it (Rev $2^{6.\ 15.\ 20.\ 24}$).

7. In the Ep. of JUDE and in 2 PETER (wh. see) there is a violent polemic against certain Antinomian tendencies. It has been the custom to see here a definite allusion to some of the Antinomian sects of the 2nd cent. Harnack (Chronologie der altchristlichen Litteratur, i. 466), for example, sees a reference to the Antinomian Gnostic sects described by Irenæus. But a careful analysis of the language of both the Epistles shows that it was at any rate primarily practical immorality that was in both cases attacked. They are 'ungodly men,' 'turning the grace of our God into lasciviousness,' they have 'given themselves over to fornication,' 'they are blasphemous in their language,' they 'are sensual' (Jude $v.^{4.\ 7.\ 10.\ 19}$), 'they walk after the flesh in the lust of defilement,' and 'despise dominion' (2 P 2^{10}); to this corresponds the statement that they have fallen back into their old evil ways (2 P 2^{21-22}), and a theoretical basis seems to be given in the disbelief in the Parousia which is growing up. Even the expression 'denying their Master,' which occurs in both Epp. (Jude $v.^{4}$, 2 P 2^{2}), may mean only denying Him by lives unworthy of Him. In any case, even if the existence of a theoretical Antinomianism as well as practical immorality cannot be entirely denied, there are certainly no clearly defined traces of later Gnosticism implying the existence of any special 2nd cent. sect, and compelling us to place the two Epp. in the 2nd century.

The above are the references, real or supposed, to Gnosticism in the NT. A theory which flourished for some time referred them all to heresies of the 2nd cent., and signs therefore of the late date of the NT writings. This theory seems now to be given up or much modified, as may be seen by consulting the various modern commentators, and it is really more correct to say that the developed Gnostic heresies of the 2nd cent. presuppose the NT. Many of the names of the Valentinian æons seem derived from the prologue to St. John's Gospel. The Gnostics often used NT doctrines which they only half understood, and misapplied biblical texts. But if we cannot find what is now called Gnosticism in the NT, there are signs of the tendencies out of which it grew. Even Hort, who shows how much which was formerly explained as Gnostic is perfectly explicable as Jewish, admits that there are elements for which we cannot account, and that the Judaism of the Dispersion is different from the Judaism of Palestine. If we put together our data in the NT, we notice that to a very large extent it comes from Asia Minor. The Colossian Epp., those to Timothy, the Apocalypse, Cerinthus, the Ignatian letters, are all alike indications of a clearly defined tendency. To say that the origin of this is Essene influence certainly goes beyond our data, but the illustrations given by Lightfoot derived from the teaching of the Essenes and Therapeutæ are perfectly legitimate as showing that the Judaism of the 1st cent. was capable of being affected by very various and extraneous elements. The Jews in Phrygia (Ramsay, Cities and Bishoprics, ii. p. 674) were, we know, peculiarly lax, and influenced by the surrounding heathen life and thought. The great movements of the 2nd cent., heathen, Jewish, and Christian, which arose from the intense spiritual earnestness with which Christianity had inspired the world, brought into life elements that had been working silently ever since the unification of the Roman Empire had broken down the old national religions, had brought into contact with one another very different faiths, and had turned men's minds from the political interests, which are always impossible under a personal government, to the problems and questions of religion. From this point of view, the embryo Gnosticism of the NT takes its proper place in the history of religious development.

There are other points of view from which the developed Gnosticism of the 2nd cent. affected the Bible, mainly the history of the Canon, of Interpretation, and of the Text. The idea of a CANON (wh. see) as a collection of several books was not created by Gnosticism, but opposition to that movement made the definition of its limit necessary. There were collections of sacred writings before Marcion, but the work of Marcion and the existence of many apocryphal writings showed the necessity of strict definition. Our first recorded commentary on any book of Scripture is that of Heracleon the Valentinian on St. John. And the belief at any rate that heretics mutilated Scripture caused careful attention to be paid to the transmission of the sacred text. How far any of the various readings still existing may be due to Gnostic influence is at present an open question.

LITERATURE.—On Gnosticism generally, by far the best work for English readers is Mansel's Gnostic Heresies, where there is a very full discussion of the biblical passages. In as far as it is behind modern criticism, it may be supplemented by the articles in Smith's Dict. of Christian Biography, where references are given to the special literature. On Biblical Gnosticism see esp. Lightfoot 'On the Colossian Heresy' in his Epistle to the Colossians, and Hort, Judaistic Christianity. For special literature on the Bible passages see the articles referred to.

ii. On account of his relation, real or supposed, alike to 1 Jn and to developed Gnosticism, it will be worth while to examine in detail the opinions of Cerinthus, so far as these can now be recovered. He taught in the province of Asia at the end of the 1st century.

I. HIS TEACHING.—The only method of acquiring critical information concerning his teaching is to distinguish the different sources from which it comes. (1) Polycarp (†154), acc. to Irenæus (Hær. III. iii. 4; Eus. HE III. xxviii. 6, IV. xiv. 6), related a story of the Apostle John. On going into a bath he saw C. there, and immediately rushed out saying, 'Let us flee lest the bath fall on us, for C., the enemy of the truth, is within.' Even if the incident be, as is possible, either exaggerated or a myth, it would not have arisen so early unless there were grounds for bringing the two together; the story may therefore be taken as sufficient and conclusive evidence for placing C. at the end of the 1st cent. The later date implied in less trustworthy authorities (Pseudo-Tertullian, 3, etc.) seems simply to have arisen from taking the order of Irenæus as chronological.

(2) Irenæus himself (c. 200) tells us that St. John wrote his Gospel to correct the errors of C. (Hær. III. xi. 1). He describes these as follows (Hær. I. xxvi. 1). C. taught in Asia; he said that the world was not made by the first God, but by a power separate from Him and independent of Him. Jesus was not born from a virgin, but was the son of Joseph and Mary like other men, but distinguished by his superiority in justice and prudence and wisdom. After his baptism the Christ descended on him in the form of a dove, and announced the unknown Father. At the end of his life the Christ left Jesus, Jesus suffered and rose again, the Christ being spiritual remained without suffering.

(3) The common source of the three writers, Pseudo-Tertullian (§ 3), Philaster (§ 36), Epiphanius (Hær. xxviii.), is generally supposed to have been an early treatise by Hippolytus (190). The account it contains seems to be much less accurate than that of Irenæus. The God of the Jews was one of the angels who created the world, and who gave the law. Christ was a man, the son of Joseph and Mary, on whom apparently a power came down. C. had Judaistic tendencies. He supported circumcision and the Sabbath, and rejected the Apostle Paul. He was identified with the opponents of the apostles in the Ac, an identification which Epiphanius developed at great length. It may be noticed that there is an element of inconsistency in this account. Cerinthus is a Judaizer, although he puts the God of the Jews in such an inferior position.

(4) In his later treatise (Ref. Omn. Hær. vii. 33, x. 21) Hippolytus (220–230) derives his information from Irenæus, adding the statement that C. was educated in Egypt.

(5) The only other information of importance is that of Caius (c. 200), the Rom. presbyter (ap. Eus. HE III. xxviii.), who ascribes to him a gross Chiliasm. There was to be a kingdom of Christ upon earth; it was to last 1000 years, and to be a time of fleshly indulgence—a perpetual marriage feast. This statement is repeated or corroborated by Dionysius of Alexandria (ap. Eus. HE III. xxviii. 4, 5, VII. xxv. 2–5).

It is unnecessary to examine later writers, who all seem merely to combine, or exaggerate, or corrupt the above accounts. If we examine these in detail, we shall notice that there are three quite independent traditions. Irenæus has no reference to Judaistic views, and Caius alone describes the Chiliastic opinions. The account in Irenæus is far the clearest and most trustworthy; to that we may add the information of Caius, remembering that the repulsive side may very likely be exaggerated. How far we can accept Hippolytus I., which clearly gives an inaccurate and confused account, may be doubtful.

II. THE CANON.—A special interest attaches to C. in relation to certain books of NT. Caius (loc. cit.) makes the following statement concerning him: Κήρινθος ὁ δι' ἀποκαλύψεων ὡς ὑπὸ ἀποστόλου μεγάλου γεγραμμένων, τερατολογίας ἡμῖν, ὡς δι' ἀγγέλων αὐτῷ δεδειγμένας, ψευδόμενος ἐπεισάγει. 'C., the man who makes use of revelations purporting to have been written by a great apostle, lyingly imposes upon us marvellous prodigies which he professes to have been shown him by angels.' Dionysius seems to have had this passage in his mind when he states that some ascribed the Apoc. to Cerinthus. It is doubtful, however, whether the words of Caius will bear this meaning. They may mean that Cerinthus used forged Apocalypses, or interpreted the Apocalypse in his own way, or possibly that he was the author of it; and we have other grounds for believing that Caius did not accept the book. The opinion that C. was the author of the Apoc. was also held by some heretics mentioned by Philaster (§ 60), and by those whom Epiphanius (Hær. li. 3, 4) calls Alogi. This opinion seems to have been one invented by those who disliked the Apoc. for the support it was supposed to give to Chiliastic opinions. Acc. to Epiphanius, these same Alogi ascribed to Cerinthus the Gospel of St. John—a statement which is certainly absurd, and looks as if it were an exaggeration of the statement in Philaster, who says that they reject the Gospel but does not say that they ascribe it to C. We are also told, if we are to believe Hippolytus I., that C. rejected the writings of St. Paul, the Acts of the Apostles, and all the Gospels except that according to St. Matthew, and that he accepted this only in a mutilated form.

III. RELATION TO ST. JOHN.—As we have seen, the most authentic accounts of C. make it quite clear that his teaching was Docetic, and that he was a contemporary of St. John. If we examine the writings traditionally ascribed to the latter, it becomes perfectly clear that he had a false teaching before him of a Docetic character. These two traditions then corroborate one another. The one demands an environment which the other supplies; nor does it seem in the least probable that either was invented to account for the other.

It may be further suggested that the developed Docetism taught by Cerinthus implies a developed theory concerning Christ's divinity from which it was a deviation, and that his heretical teaching concerning the birth of Christ has all the appearance of being developed in opposition to a belief in the Virgin birth.

LITERATURE.—References to ancient authors are given throughout the art.; the most useful modern book is prob. that of Hilgenfeld, Ketzergeschichte, pp. 411–421; see also Hort, Judaistic Christianity, pp. 188–191; Renan, Les Évangiles, p. 417 ff.; Westcott, On the Canon, ch. iv. § 1, and most early Church histories. The art. in Smith's Dict. Chr. Biog. is uncritical.

A. C. HEADLAM.

GO.—The verb to 'go' is found in the English versions of the Bible in many senses and constructions that have now gone out of use. A careful study of its occurrences will repay the labour it costs.

1. With all its freedom of usage there is a precision in the movement expressed by 'go' which we have now lost. If a person 'runs' or 'rides' we now can say that he 'goes'; but running and riding were formerly contrasted with going, which was therefore used as we now should use 'walk.' Thus Chaucer, Knightes Tale, 1351—

> 'That other wher him list may ryde or go,
> But seen his lady shal be never-mo.'

Shaks. Lear, I. iv. 134—

> 'Ride more than thou goest'; and Tempest, III. ii. 63, 'As proper a man as ever went on four legs.' So Ascham, The Scholemaster, 151, 'I purpose to teach a yong scholer to go, not to daunce.' The use is found as late as Watts, Come, Holy Spirit—

> 'Our souls can neither fly nor go
> To reach immortal joys.'

In the earlier versions this meaning is often found. Thus Is 40^{31} Wyc. (1388), 'But thei that hopen in the Lord, schulen chaunge strengthe, thei schulen take fetheris as eglis: thei schulen renne, and schulen not trauele; thei schulen go, and schulen not faile' (Cov. 'When they go, they shal not be weery,' Gen. 'they shal walke and not faint,' so AV); Mk 5^{42} Tind., 'And streyght the mayden arose, and went on her fete' (so Gen. 1557, but 1560 'walked' as AV, Gr. περιεπάτει); Hos 11^{3} Cov. 'I lerned Ephraim to go.' The last example has been retained by AV and RV, 'I taught Ephraim to go' (תַּרְגַּלְתִּי, lit., as Pusey, 'I set on his feet'). Other examples in AV are Pr 6^{28} 'Can one go upon hot coals, and his feet not be burned?' (after Wyc. 'go on colis,' אִם־יְהַלֵּךְ אִישׁ, RV 'walk'); Is 59^{8} 'they have made them crooked paths; whosoever goeth therein shall not know peace' (after Cov. 'their wayes are so croked, that who so euer goeth therein, knoweth nothinge of peace,' כָּל הֹלֵךְ בָּהּ לֹא יָדַע שָׁלוֹם); Jer 10^{5} 'they must needs be borne, because they cannot go' (Wyc. 'for thei moun not go,' כִּי־לֹא יִצְעָדוּ). See also Jos 18^{4}, Pr 4^{14} 6^{22} 9^{6}, Mic 2^{3}, Mk 12^{38}, where RV has 'walk' for AV 'go.'

2. 'Go' is sometimes superfluous or nearly so, as in Jos 9^{4} 'They did work wilily, and went and made as if they had been ambassadors' (וַיֵּלְכוּ וַיַּצְמִּידוּ); Is 37^{37} 'So Sennacherib king of Assyria departed, and went and returned, and dwelt at Nineveh' (וַיֵּלֶךְ וַיָּשָׁב). Somewhat similar is the very frequent use of 'go' immediately before some other verb, as 2 K 1^{6} 'There came a man up to meet us, and said unto us, Go, turn again unto the king that sent you.' Occasionally a pronoun intervenes between the verbs, as 1 K 20^{33} 'Then he said, Go ye, bring him.' In AV the usage is almost confined to the imperat., though some other moods occur, as 1 S 29^{8} 'What hast thou found in thy servant . . . that I may not go fight against the enemies of my lord, the king?' (RV 'go and fight'). Cf. Shaks. Hamlet, I. v. 132—

> 'And for my own poor part,
> Look you, I'll go pray.'

In these phrases the verb to 'go' has no such independent meaning as we associate with it, implying removal from a place; it expresses no more than the setting about the act contained in the following verb. And this is often all that it contains when 'and' comes between the two verbs, as Dt 31^{1} 'And Moses went and spoke these words to all Israel'; Ex 2^{1} 'And there went a man of the house of Levi, and took to wife a daughter of Levi'; 2 K 3^{7} 'And he went and sent to Jehoshaphat the king of Judah, saying, The king of Moab hath rebelled against me' (see 'Go to' below). This auxiliary use of 'go' is seen also in expressions like 'go childless' Gn 15^{2} (וְאָנֹכִי הוֹלֵךְ עֲרִירִי), which may mean, however, 'and I am going hence [i.e. to die] childless [lit. 'naked'],' as Del., Dillm., Spurrell, and RVm); 'go mourning,' Job 30^{28} (קֹדֵר הִלַּכְתִּי, Dav. 'I go blackened, not by the sun,' so RVm); 'go crouching,' Sir 12^{11} (πορεύηται συγκεκυφώς); 'go gay,' Bar 6^{9} (παρθένῳ φιλοκόσμῳ, EV 'for a virgin that loveth to go gay,' Gifford 'fond of ornament,' the only occurrence of the Gr. word in LXX or NT). Cf. Shaks. Othello, II. i. 151—

> 'She that was ever fair, and never proud;
> Had tongue at will, and yet was never loud;
> Never lack'd gold, and yet went never gay.'

And Milton, University Carrier, ii. 22—

> 'Ease was his chief disease, and to judge right,
> He di'd for heaviness that his cart went light.'

3. To go is often to proceed, advance, make progress, whether literally or figuratively, as Shaks. I Henry IV. I. iii. 292—

> 'No further go in this
> Than I by letters shall direct your course.'

In 2 Mac 4^{40} we find the unusual expression (it does not occur in Shaks.) 'a man far gone in years,' which RV retains. The Gr. (προβεβηκὼς τὴν ἡλικίαν) is common enough, the identical phrase occurring again in 6^{18}, where it is tr^{d} 'an aged man,' RV 'well stricken in years.' Cf. Gn 24^{1} 'And Abraham was old, and well stricken in age,' AVm 'gone into days.' But the most important use of 'go' in this fig. sense is to express the progress of an undertaking, as in 2 S 1^{4} 'And David said unto him, How went the matter?' (הֵיכָה הַדָּבָר, lit., as AVm, 'What was the thing?'); and To 10^{8} '1 will send to thy father, and they shall declare unto him how things go with thee' (τὰ κατὰ σέ). Cf. Tind. Prologe to the Pent. of 1534, 'Then go to and reade the storyes of the byble for thy lerninge and comforte, and se every thinge practysed before thyne eyes: for accordinge to those ensamples shall it goo with the and all men untill the worldes ende.' Cf. also Job 8^{13} Cov. 'Even so goeth it with all them, that forget God,' and Hos 10^{15} Cov. 'Even so shal it go with you (o Bethel) because of youre malicious wickednes.' So Shaks. Winter's Tale, III. ii. 218—

> 'Howe'er the business goes, you have made fault
> I' the boldness of your speech.'

The idiom is not obsolete; on the contrary, it has lately received a further and bolder extension, which may be illustrated by the following quotation from Harper's Magazine, lxxvi. 808, 'Society has invented no infliction equal to a large dinner that does not go, as the phrase is. Why it does not go when the viands are good and the company is bright, is one of the acknowledged mysteries.' More frequently, however, some adverb accompanies 'go,' to express the manner of progress. In AV we find: (1) Go well, Dt 4^{40} 'that it may go well with thee'; Heb. יִיטַב לְךָ, which occurs also 5^{16} $12^{25.\ 28}$ (EV 'go well with'), 5^{29} $6^{3.\ 18}$ 22^{7} (EV 'be well with'); and the similar phrase טוֹב לְ in 5^{33} (EV 'that it may be well with'), 19^{13} (EV 'go well with'). The Eng. phrase occurs also in 2 Ch 12^{12} 'in Judah things went well' (הָיָה דְבָרִים טוֹבִים); Pr 11^{10} 'When it goeth well with the righteous, the city rejoiceth' (בְּטוּב צַדִּיקִים); To 12^{17} 'it shall go well with you' (εἰρήνη ὑμῖν ἔσται, RV 'ye shall have peace'); 14^{9} 'that it may go well with thee' (ἵνα σοι καλῶς ᾖ, RV 'that it may be well with thee'); Sir 1^{13} 'Whoso feareth the Lord, it shall go well with him at the last' (τῷ φοβουμένῳ τὸν Κύριον εὖ ἔσται ἐπ' ἐσχάτων).* Cf. Shaks. K. John, III. iv. 4—

> 'Courage and comfort! all shall yet go well.
> What can go well, when we have run so ill?'

(2) Go ill, Job 20^{26} 'it shall go ill with him that is left in his tabernacle,' so RVm, but RV 'it shall consume that which is left in his tent,' Dav. 'it shall devour him that is left in his tent' (Heb. יֵרַע שָׂרִיד בְּאָהֳלוֹ); Ps 106^{32} 'they angered him also at the waters of strife, so that it went ill with Moses for their sakes' (וַיֵּרַע לְ). So Shaks. Cymb. I. vii. 95—

> 'Doubting things go ill often hurts more > Than to be sure they do.'

(3) Go evil, 1 Ch 7^{23} 'it went evil with his house' (בְּרָעָה הָיְתָה). (4) Go sore, 1 S 31^{3} 'And the battle went sore against Saul' (וַתִּכְבַּד אֶל); 1 Ch 10^{3} (וַתִּכְבַּד עַל). This is Coverdale's tr^{n}; Wyc. 1382, 'And al the charge (1388 'weighte') of the batayl is turned unto Saul,' and Dou. 'And the whole weight of the battel was turned upon Saul,' are after the Vulg. 'Totumque pondus proelii versum est in Saul'; LXX is more literal, καὶ βαρύνεται ὁ πόλεμος ἐπὶ Σαούλ. Cf. Tindale, Works, i. 90, 'What shall we then say to those Scriptures which go so sore upon good works?' (5) Go right, Sir 49^{9} 'and directed them that went right' (RV 'and to do good to them that directed their ways aright,' reading καὶ ἀγαθῶσαι [for AV καὶ κατώρθωσε] τοὺς εὐθύνοντας ὁδούς).

4. One of the ways by which the verb to 'go' extended its meaning was by accepting 'went' as its past tense. 'Went' was the past tense of the verb to 'wend,' and had originally but little connexion with 'go' in meaning, as it had none in etymology. For 'go' is now the opposite of 'come'; but as a river may 'come winding' as well as 'go winding,' it was possible formerly to say that it 'came and went,' and yet express movement in only one direction. Hence we find 'went' and even 'go' used of a river, where the meaning is 'took its (winding) course.' Thus Gn 2^{10} 'And a river went out of Eden to water the garden' (יֹצֵא; LXX ἐκπορεύεται, Vulg. 'egrediebatur,' Wyc. 1832, 'And a flood gede out of the place of delice to watre paradis'). Cf. Milton, Lycidas, 103—

* 'Go well' occurs in another sense in Pr 30^{29} 'There be three things which go well' (RV 'are stately in their march').

'Next Camus, reverend sire, went footing slow.'

'Wend' has practically gone out of use, and 'yode' the original past tense of 'go' is obsolete long since, so that 'go' and 'went' serve as present and past with the same meaning throughout. Before passing from this matter of form, it may be well to notice the old-fashioned 'let us be going' (Jg 19^{28} 'Up and let us be going' קוּמִי וְנֵלֵכָה; Mt 26^{46} ἄγωμεν), which would now be called a 'Scotticism,' though RV retains it. The identical phrase (ἐγείρεσθε ἄγωμεν) tr^{d} in Mt 'Rise, let us be going,' is found in Mk 14^{42}, where AV gives 'Rise up, let us go,' but RV 'Arise, let us be going,' as in Mt 26^{46}. Again, in Jn 14^{31} we find ἐγείρεσθε ἄγωμεν ἐντεῦθεν, but 'let us be going hence' proved too much for RV; both versions give 'Arise, let us go hence.' Another grammatical peculiarity is found in Is 15^{5} 'for by the mounting up of Luhith with weeping they shall go it up,' for 'go up it,' the object preceding its preposition. Cf. North's Plutarch, Pelopidas, p. 324, 'Notwithstanding, when they came to the hilles, they sought forcibly to clime them up.'

5. The verb to 'go' forms with other words, chiefly adverbs, some noteworthy expressions.

1. Go about: This phrase has three clearly distinguishable meanings (see ABOUT). (1) 'Go round,' Jos 6^{11} 'So the ark of God compassed the city, going about it once' (הַקֵּף); (2) Go from place to place,' as Ac 10^{38} 'who went about doing good'; and (3) 'set oneself to do,' 'attempt,' as Ac 26^{21} 'For these causes the Jews caught me in the temple, and went about to kill me.' The verbs tr^{d} 'go about' with the second meaning are סָבַב sâbhabh, lit. 'turn' (Jos 16^{6}, 1 S 15^{12}, 2 K 3^{25}, 2 Ch 17^{9} 23^{2}, Ps 55^{10} [Piel], Ec 2^{20}, Ca 3^{2} [Piel], 3^{3} 5^{7}), הָלַךְ hâlak, 'go' (Pr 20^{19}), שׁוּט shût, 'wander' (Nu 11^{8}), סָחַר sâḥar, usually 'traffic' (Jer 14^{18}), חָמַק ḥâmaḳ, 'turn away' (Jer 31^{22} Hithp. = 'turn hither and thither'), περίαγω 'lead or go round' (Mt 4^{23} 9^{35}, Ac 13^{11}), and διέρχομαι 'go through' or 'throughout' (Ac 10^{38}). Cov. uses the same phrase in Job 27^{12} 'Wherfore then do ye go aboute with soch vayne wordes'; Hos 11^{12} 'Ephraim goeth aboute me with lies' (EV 'compasseth me'); and Tind. in Jn 7^{1} 'After that, Jesus went about in Galile and wolde not go about in Jewry.' Cf. Shaks. Macbeth, I. iii. 34—

'The weird sisters, hand in hand,
Posters of the sea and land,
Thus do go about, about.'

But the third meaning is the most archaic now. It occurs only once in OT, Dt 31^{21} 'I know their imagination which they go about' (עֹשָׂה, AVm 'do,' Driver, 'worketh' [the 'people' being singular], lit. 'maketh'). In Apocr. once also, 1 Mac 11^{1} 'the king of Egypt . . . went about through deceit to get Alexander's kingdom' (ἐζήτησε, RV 'sought'). In NT seven times, Jn $7^{19, 20}$, Ac 21^{31}, Ro 10^{3} (ζητέω), Ac 26^{21} (πειράομαι), 24^{6} (πειράζω), 9^{29} (ἐπιχειρέω). These verbs all mean to 'try,' 'attempt,' and are so tr^{d} elsewhere. Thus in Jn $7^{19, 20}$ ζητέω is tr^{d} 'go about,' but in 7^{25} 'seek.' The earlier V^{s}S have the phrase 'go about' still oftener. Thus in Tind. we find it Mt 13^{29} 'whill ye go aboute to wede out the tares'; Mk 12^{12} 'they went about to take him, but they feared the people'; Lk 17^{33} 'Whosoever will goo about to save his lyfe shall loose it'; Jn 10^{30} 'Agayne they went aboute to take him: but he escaped out of their hondes.' So Cov. in Job 32^{22} 'For yf I wolde go aboute to please men, I knowe not how soone my maker wolde take me awaye'; and Rhem. in Lk 1^{1} 'Because many have gone about to compile a narration of the things that have been accomplished among us.' Hooker begins his Eccles. Polity with the phrase, 'He that goeth about to persuade a multitude, that they are not so well governed as they ought to be, shall never want attentive and favourable hearers.' And it is common in Shaks., as Henry V. IV. i. 212, 'You may as well go about to turn the sun to ice with fanning in his face with a peacock's feather.'

2. Go abroad: There are two meanings: (1) 'Go from home,' 'go out of doors'; Dt 23^{10} 'then shall he go abroad out of the camp' (וְיָצָא אֶל־מִחוּץ לַמַּחֲנֶה). So Shaks. II Henry IV. I. ii. 107, 'I am glad to see your lordship abroad; I heard say, your lordship was sick; I hope, your lordship goes abroad by advice.' (2) 'Go hither and thither'; Ps 77^{17} 'Thine arrows also went abroad' (יִתְהַלָּכוּ 'went hither and thither'—Del., Cheyne; God's arrows being the flashes of lightning); Mt 9^{26}, Jn 21^{23} (ἐξέρχομαι); Lk 5^{15} 'But so much the more went there a fame abroad of him' (διήρχετο). T. Lever (Sermons, Arber's ed. p. 29) uses the phrase more boldly, suppressing the verb 'go': 'loke at the merchauntes of London, and ye shall se . . . their riches muste abrode in the countrey to bie fermes out of the handes of worshypfull gentlemen, honeste yeomen, and pore laborynge husbandes.'

3. Go after: (1) 'Walk behind'; Jos 3^{3} 'When ye see the ark of the covenant of the LORD your God, and the priests the Levites bearing it, then ye shall remove from your place, and go after it' (וְהָלַכְתֶּם אַחֲרָיו). (2) 'Follow'; 2 S 20^{11} 'He that favoureth Joab, and he that is for David, let him go after Joab' (אַחֲרֵי, no verb in Heb., RV 'let him follow'). In NT with Gr. ἀπέρχομαι ὀπίσω Mk 1^{20}, Jn 12^{19}, Jude ^{7}; without ὀπίσω Lk 17^{23}, and with πορεύομαι ὀπίσω Lk 21^{8}. But especially to follow so as to become a votary of, sometimes of J'' in OT (Jer 2^{2}), but most frequently of 'other gods,' the Heb. phrase being הָלַךְ אַחֲרֵי (Dt 6^{14} 11^{28} 13^{2} 28^{14}—the Heb. phrase occurs also 4^{3} EV 'follow,' 8^{19} EV 'walk after'—Jer 2^{23} 11^{10} 25^{6} 35^{15}). The same Heb. is used of following 'strangers' (Jer 2^{25}), 'lovers' (Hos 2^{13}), and the 'strange woman' (Pr 7^{22}); and it has a fig. use in Ezk 33^{31} 'their heart goeth after their covetousness' (RV 'their gain'). In 1 K 11^{6} the same idea is otherwise expressed, 'Solomon . . . went not fully after the LORD' (לֹא מִלֵּא אַחֲרֵי). (3) 'Pursue'; Jos 8^{17} 'And there was not a man left in Ai or Bethel, that went not out after Israel' (יָצָא אַחֲרֵי), Ezk 9^{5} 'Go ye after him through the city, and smite' (עִבְרוּ אַחֲרָיו). (4) 'Seek'; Lk 15^{4} 'go after that which is lost' (πορεύεται ἐπὶ τὸ ἀπολωλός).

4. Go again: always = 'go back' (see AGAIN), as 1 S 25^{12} 'So David's young men turned their way, and went again, and came and told him all those sayings' (וַיָּשֻׁבוּ, RV 'and went back'); 2 K 4^{31} 'Wherefore he went again to meet him' (וַיָּשָׁב, RV 'he returned'). The Heb. is always שׁוּב 'turn,' the Gr. ἐπιστρέφω (Ac 15^{36}).

5. Go along: The expression occurs Nu 21^{22}, Dt 2^{27}, Jos 17^{7}, Jg 11^{18}, 1 S 6^{12}, 2 S 3^{16} 16^{13}, Jer 41^{6}, and always stands for the simple verb הָלַךְ to 'go.' In Jos 17^{7} it is the 'border' that is said to 'go along,' a Heb. idiom taken bodily into the Eng.; it is more frequent as 'go out,' see below.

6. Go aside: 'to go to one side.' (1) Literally, Heb. כּוּר (Jer 15^{5} 'Who shall go aside to ask how thou doest?' RV 'turn aside'); Gr. ἀναχωρέω (Ac 23^{19} 26^{31}), ὑποχωρέω (Lk 9^{10}), ἀπέρχομαι (Ac 4^{15}). (2) Metaphorically, 'to go wrong,' Heb. שָׂטָה sâṭâh (Nu $5^{12, 19, 20, 29}$), כּוּר (Dt 28^{14}, Ps 14^{3} 'They are all gone aside, they are altogether become filthy'). The same idea is expressed by the verb alone in

Article IX (XXXIX Articles, 1571), 'man is very farre gone from originall righteousnes.'

7. Go astray: both literally and figuratively, but always the tr^{n} of a simple verb, mostly תָּעָה 'to err' (Ex 23^{4}, Ps 58^{3} 119^{176}, Pr 7^{25}, Is 53^{6}, Jer 50^{6} [Hiph. 'cause to go astray'], Ezk 14^{11} 44$^{10\,bis.\ 15}$ 48$^{11\,ter}$); also נָדַח (Dt 22^{1} 'Thou shalt not see thy brother's ox or his sheep go astray, and hide thyself from them,' נִדָּחִים 'driven away,' i.e. parted forcibly from the herd through some mishap—Driver); שָׁגָג (Ps 119^{67} 'Before I was afflicted I went astray'); שָׁגָה (Pr 5^{23} and [Hiph.] 28^{10} 'cause to go astray'). In NT always πλανάομαι (Mt 18$^{12.\ 13}$, 1 P 2^{25}, 2 P 2^{15}).

In Gn 6^{3} RVm gives 'in their going astray they are flesh,' the text being 'for that he also is flesh.' The difficulty is with the word בְּשַׁגַּם [Baer בְּשַׁגָּם]. It has been taken as composed of בְּ[=בַּאֲשֶׁר] and גַּם 'also.' So all the Versions, the Jewish interpreters, and most modern expositors. Thus LXX διὰ τὸ εἶναι αὐτοὺς σάρκας, Vulg. 'quia caro est,' Wyc. 'for flehs he is,' Luth. 'denn sie sind Fleisch,' Tind. 'for they are flesh,' Cov. 'for he is but flesh also' (the first version to recognize the גַּם), Gen. 'because he is but flesh,' Bish., Dou. 'because he is flesh,' Olt. 'car aussi ne sont-ils que chair,' Segond 'car l'homme n'est que chair.' But שָׁ is nowhere else found for אֲשֶׁר in Gn, or even in the Pent., and the גַּם 'also' seems superfluous. Hence some modern scholars make the word an inf. of שָׁגַג, and translate somewhat as RVm. Dillmann and Kautzsch consider the word to be corrupt, and refuse to translate; Ball suggests בַּעֲוֹנָם (Lv 26^{39}), and translates 'owing to their guilt they are flesh.'

8. Go a warfare: 1 Co 9^{7} 'Who goeth a warfare any time at his own charges?' (τίς στρατεύεται, RV 'What soldier ever serveth at his own charges?'). Elsewhere the Gr. verb is tr^{d} 'war' (2 Co 10^{3}, 1 Ti 1^{18}, 2 Ti 2^{4}, Ja 4^{1}, 1 P 2^{11}), as 1 P 2^{11} 'abstain from fleshly lusts, which war against the soul'; except Lk 3^{14}, where the ptcp. (στρατευόμενοι) is tr^{d} 'soldiers.' For the Eng. phrase (which comes from Tind. 'Who goeth a warfare eny tyme at his awne cost?') cf. Tindale's Prologe to Leviticus, 'For the holy gost is no dome god nor no god that goeth a mumminge'; and Defoe, Crusoe (Gold. Treas. ed. p. 555), 'We then went to consulting together what was to be done.'

9. Go away: (1) 'Pass away,' 'perish,' Job 4^{21} 'Doth not their excellency which is in them go away?' (נָסַע, RV 'Is not their tent-cord plucked up within them?' for the word tr^{d} 'excellency' means also a 'cord,' and the verb means first of all 'to pull up' a tent-peg or cord, though it thence is extended to the meaning 'break up an encampment,' 'go away.' Davidson translates the whole verse—'If their tent-cord is torn away in them, do they not die, and not in wisdom?' and remarks (Expos. III. iv. 279 f.), 'The striking of the tent is a graphic and not uncommon image for the removal which comes in death'); Jer 6^{4} 'Woe unto us! for the day goeth away, for the shadows of the evening are stretched out' (פָּנָה, RV 'declineth'). (2) 'Turn aside from,' 'desert,' Ezk 44^{10} 'And the Levites that are gone away far from me, when Israel went astray . . . they shall even bear their iniquity' (אֲשֶׁר רָתְעוּ, RV 'that went far from me'); Mal 3^{7} 'Even from the days of your fathers ye are gone away from mine ordinances' (סַרְתֶּם, RV 'ye have turned aside'); Jn 6^{67} 'Then Jesus said unto the twelve, Will ye also go away?' (μὴ καὶ ὑμεῖς θέλετε ὑπάγειν), 12^{11} 'many of the Jews went away, and believed on Jesus' (ὑπῆγον). (3) 'Escape,' 1 S 24^{19} 'For if a man find his enemy, will he let him go well away' (וְשִׁלְחוֹ בְּדֶרֶךְ טוֹבָה, lit. 'will he send him along a prosperous way?').

10. Go a whoring: This strong expression, which comes from Tindale (Wyc. has 'do fornicacioun'), is used to tr. the Heb. verb זָנָה zânâh, 'to commit fornication,' when followed by אַחֲרֵי 'after' (Ex 34$^{15.\ 16}$, Lv 17^{7} 20$^{5.\ 6}$, Nu 15^{39}, Dt 31^{16}, Jg 2^{17} 8$^{27.\ 33}$, 1 Ch 5^{25}, Ezk 6^{9} 23^{30}, and once in Ex 34^{16}, where the vb. is Hiphil, 'make thy sons go a whoring after their gods'); also when zânâh is followed by מִן 'from' (Ps 73^{27} 'Thou hast destroyed all them that go a whoring from thee'), בְּ 'with' (Ps 106^{39} 'went a whoring with their own inventions'), מִתַּחַת 'from under' (Hos 4^{12}), and מֵעַל 'from' (Hos 9^{1}). It is used once without a prep. following, 2 Ch 21^{13} 'And hast made Judah and the inhabitants of Jerusalem to go a whoring' (וַתַּזְנֶה). The Heb. phrase is always a figure of speech, and expresses 'the disloyal abandonment of J″ for other gods'—Driver. It suggests, adds Moore, both the sin of unfaithfulness and the sin of prostitution, the giving up of oneself, body and soul, to other gods. But whether it was a figure always, it is hard to say. In view of the fact that actual prostitution was not an uncommon feature in ancient Semitic cults, Driver thinks the original sense not improbably literal. It depends upon the date of the origin of the expression. Moore believes that it originated with Hosea, 'whose own bitter experience with his adulterous wife became for him the type of the relations of J″ and Israel.' Modern translators try to soften the expression: thus Cheyne in Ps 73^{27} 'every one that wantonly deserts thee.' RV retains, but Amer. RV prefers 'play the harlot.'

11. Go back: Besides the literal sense, notice (1) to 'depart from an engagement or course of action,' Jg 11^{35} 'I have opened my mouth unto the LORD, and I cannot go back' (וְלֹא אוּכַל לָשׁוּב); Ezk 24^{14} 'I will not go back, neither will I spare, neither will I repent' (לֹא־אָפָרַע). (2) To 'decline to a worse way,' Jos 23^{12}, Job 23^{12}, Ps 53^{3} 80^{18}, Jn 6^{66}. Cf. Jer 44^{3} Cov. 'they wente backe to do sacrifice and worshipe unto straunge goddes.'

12. Go beyond is used in two senses: (1) to 'go outside of,' 'pass'; Nu 22^{18} 'I cannot go beyond the word of the LORD my God, to do less or more'; 24^{13} 'I cannot go beyond the commandment (RV 'word') of the LORD, to do either good or bad of mine own mind' (both לַעֲבֹר). Cf. Heywood, Works, i. 210, 'Shoomaker, you goe a little beyond your last.' (2) To 'overreach,' 1 Th 4^{6} 'That no man go beyond and defraud his brother' (τὸ μὴ ὑπερβαίνειν, RV 'transgress,' RVm 'overreach'). So Life of T. Cromwell, IV. v. 120, 'We must be wary, else he'll go beyond us'; and Shaks. Henry VIII. III. ii. 409—

'There was the weight that pull'd me down. O Cromwell,
The king has gone beyond me.'

13. Go for, i.e. 'be accounted,' 1 S 17^{12} 'the man went among men for an old man in the days of Saul' (וְזָקֵן בָּא בָאֲנָשִׁים, RV 'was an old man in the days of Saul, stricken in years among men').

The AV tr^{n} is a bold and apparently an original attempt to render the Heb. literally. The nearest form in the previous versions is that of the Gen. Bible, 'this man was taken for an olde man in the days of Saul.' But the Heb. will not render so. The only literal rendering that the Heb. will stand is, 'and the man in the days of Saul was aged, entered in among men,'—which, as Driver says, affords no intelligible sense. Two suggestions have been made, the one to omit בא, when we get simply 'and the man in the days of Saul was aged among men'; the other, to change באנשים into בשנים, and translate 'and the man in the days of Saul entered into years.' The objection to the second is that the phrase elsewhere is always וקן בא בימים, and Driver, on the whole, prefers the first. (See Heb. Text of Samuel, p. 108 f.; and a severe criticism by Jennings and Lowe of the RV tr^{n}, which they consider to be impossible as a rendering of the Massoretic text, in Expos. III. ii. 63).

The AV tr^{n}, though impossible as a rendering of the Heb., is good idiomatic English. Thus Sidney, Arcadia, p. 10, 'But because a pleasant fellow of my acquaintance set forth her praises in verse, I will only repeat them, and spare mine owne tongue, since she goes for a woman'; and Shaks. Macbeth, III. i. 92—

'We are men, my liege.
Ay, in the catalogue ye go for men.'

14. Go forth: Among other expressions (see FORTH) notice especially 'motion away from a given spot,' in Lk 8^{14} 'And that which fell among thorns are they, which, when they have heard, go forth' (πορευόμενοι, RV 'as they go on their way'). Cf. Lk 5^{8} Rhem. 'Which when Simon Peter did see, he fel downe at Jesus knees, saying, Goe forth from me, because I am a sinful man, O Lord.'

15. Go forward—see under FORWARD.

16. Go hard='go close,' Jg 9^{52}, see HARD.

17. Go in and out: This phrase is found in Ac 1^{21} 'all the time that the Lord Jesus went in and out among us' (εἰσῆλθεν καὶ ἐξῆλθεν ἐφ' ἡμᾶς), and the meaning may be no more than 'passed his time,' though the ἐφ' seems to imply leadership, whence RVm 'over us.' In 9^{28} occurs the fuller phrase 'coming in and going out,' 'And he [Saul] was with them coming in and going out at Jerusalem' (εἰσπορευόμενος καὶ ἐκπορευόμενος, RV 'going in and going out'), where, again, some more definite activity is meant than merely 'spending his time,' probably something like what is now called 'aggressive work.' In OT this fuller phrase occurs repeatedly (Nu $27^{17.\ 21}$, Dt $28^{6.\ 19}$ 31^{2} 33^{18}, Jos 14^{11}, 1 S $18^{13.\ 16}$ 29^{6}, 2 S 3^{25}, 1 K 3^{7}, 2 K 11^{8} 19^{27}, 1 Ch 27^{1}, 2 Ch 1^{10} 15^{5} 16^{1} $23^{7.\ 8}$, Ps 121^{8}, Is 37^{28}, Jer 37^{4}, Zec 8^{10}). While always recognized as an idiomatic expression for a man's active life, it is sometimes clearly used in a more technical sense than that. When Moses says (Dt 31^{2}), 'I am an hundred and twenty years old this day; I can no more go out and come in,' he intimates his failing fitness to be Israel's leader. More distinctly Joshua states (Jos 14^{11}) that in his 85th year he is still fit to be their leader in war: 'As yet I am as strong this day as I was in the day that Moses sent me: as my strength was then, even so is my strength now, for war, both to go out and to come in.' Of David it is said (1 S 18^{13}), 'Saul removed him from him, and made him his captain over a thousand; and he went out and came in before the people,' where the reference must be to military expeditions. Solomon says (1 K 3^{7}), 'I am but a little child; I know not how to go out or come in,' and declares his unfitness to be king. See go out below. The phrase 'go in and out' occurs in Ex 32^{27} in the sense of 'go to and fro' (as RV); and in Jn 10^{9} 'by me, if any man enter in, he shall be saved, and shall go in and out, and find pasture' (εἰσελεύσεται καὶ ἐξελεύσεται, RV 'shall go in and go out') as in Ac 1^{21}, but figuratively to express the liberty of the sons of God.

18. Go on: (1) Continue a course begun, proceed, as in Shaks. Othello, III. iii. 413—

> 'I do not like the office;
> But, sith I am entered in this cause so far,
> Prick'd to 't by foolish honesty and love,
> I will go on.'

Generally of a journey, Gn 29^{1} 'Then Jacob went on his journey' (וַיִּשָּׂא רַגְלָיו, lit. 'lifted up his feet,' as AVm, RVm); so Ac 10^{9} 'as they went on their journey' (ὁδοιπορούντων ἐκείνων, RV 'as they were on their journey'); Mt 4^{21} 'And going on from thence, he saw other two brethren' (προβὰς ἐκεῖθεν, lit. 'going forward thence'). In 1 S 10^{3} the simple verb חָלַף 'to pass on,' is tr^{d} 'go on forward.' In Gn 19^{2} 32^{1}, 1 S 26^{25} 28^{22} we find the fuller expression 'go on one's way.' See Go one's way below. Sometimes the meaning is simply 'continue,' 'persist,' as 1 S 14^{19} 'the noise that was in the host of the Philistines went on and increased' (וַיֵּלֶךְ הָלוֹךְ וְרָב, LXX ἐπορεύετο πορευόμενος καὶ ἐπλήθυνεν); Ps 68^{21} 'such an one as goeth on still in his trespasses' (מְתַהֲלֵךְ בְּ). In Ezr 5^{8} it is to 'advance,' 'make progress,' 'this work goeth fast on and prospereth'; and in He 6^{1} the phrase is fig. 'let us go on unto perfection' (φερώμεθα, RV 'press on'). (2) To go to meet an enemy, generally 'go out,' Job 39^{21} 'he goeth on to meet the armed men' (RV 'he goeth out'). (3) To go forward, towards the front, said of the 'border' of a territory, Nu $34^{4.\ 9}$. See Go out, below.

19. Go out: Besides its uses in modern English, this phrase has some peculiarly biblical senses, which are for the most part due to the freedom with which the verb יָצָא is employed in Hebrew. (1) To go from home: Ru 1^{21} 'I went out full, and the Lord hath brought me home again empty'; so Adonijah is threatened by Solomon, 'on the day thou goest out, and passest over the brook Kidron, thou shalt know for certain that thou shalt surely die'; and of Abraham it is said in He 11^{8} 'when he was called to go out . . . he went out' (ἐξελθεῖν . . . ἐξῆλθεν); while it is one of the rewards of the Christian victor that he will be at home in the Church of which he is made a pillar, and 'shall go no more out' (Rev 3^{12} ἔξω οὐ μὴ ἐξέλθῃ ἔτι, RV 'he shall go out thence no more'). In 2 Ch 18^{21} 'I will go out and be a lying spirit in the mouth of all his prophets. And the Lord said . . . go out, and do even so' (in 1 K 22^{22} 'go forth,' as RV here), the reference is the same as in Job 1^{12} 2^{7} 'So Satan went forth from the presence of the LORD.' Less definitely, Gn 41^{45} 'And Joseph went out over all the land of Egypt'; 2 Ch 19^{4} 'Jehoshaphat . . . went out again through the people from Beersheba to Mount Ephraim' (a formula during the separation of the kingdoms for the old 'from Dan to Beersheba'); and Ps 81^{5} 'This he ordained in Joseph for a testimony when he went through the land of Egypt' (בְּצֵאתוֹ עַל־אֶרֶץ מִצְרָיִם, RV 'when he went out over the land of Egypt,' the ref. being apparently, as in AV, to Joseph's administration (Gn 41^{45}), which is surprising, seeing that modern English commentators almost unanimously find the ref. to be to God).

The passage is difficult; there are three ways of taking it: (a) The ancient VSS tr. 'when he (Israel) went out from the land of Egypt,' as LXX ἐν τῷ ἐξελθεῖν αὐτὸν ἐκ τῆς Αἰγύπτου; Vulg. 'cum exiret de Terra-Ægypti,' after which Wyc. 1388, 'whanne he gede out of the lond of Egipt,' and Dou. 'when he came out of the Land of Aegypt' (with the marg. 'The people of Israel signified by Joseph, as Ps 80^{1}'); and so all the Eng. VSS before AV. But the tr^{n} is quite impossible, the עַל never meaning ἐκ 'out of,' or anything approaching that. (b) 'When he (Joseph, in person) went out over the land of Egypt,' a direct ref. to Gn 41^{45}, which gives no appropriate sense. (c) 'When He (J") went forth against the land of Egypt,' a reference to the death of the firstborn, and especially to Ex 11^{4} 'I will go forth through the midst of Egypt.' So Del., Perowne, Burgess, de Witt, Kirkpatrick, and nearly all recent commentators. Kay thinks that, while the ref. is to God, the special language recalls Gn 41^{45}: as Joseph once went out over the land of Egypt to benefit them, so now, since they have forgotten their benefactor, Joseph's God will go out over the land in righteous judgment. Cheyne believes the present Heb. text to be corrupt, and that the VSS exhibit the true text; he therefore would render, as (a), 'when he (Israel and Joseph) went forth from the land of Egypt.' So Wellh. (in Haupt) who reads מֵעַל for עַל (but is מֵעַל ever used simply of leaving?).

(2) To spread abroad: 1 Ch 14^{17} 'And the fame of David went out into all lands'; Est 9^{4} 'For Mordecai was great in the king's house, and his fame went out throughout all the provinces' (הוֹלֵךְ, RV 'went forth'). (3) In reference to war, the phrase assumes a highly technical sense, so much so that 'to go out' standing alone may be understood to mean 'to go out to make war.' Take the foll. passages in order: Nu 22^{32} (the Angel of the LORD to Balaam) 'behold, I went out to withstand thee'; Dt 28^{25} 'thou shalt go out one way against them, and flee seven ways before them'; Jg 2^{15} 'Whithersoever they went out, the hand of the LORD was against them for evil'; Jg 5^{4} 'LORD, when thou wentest out of Seir, when thou marchedst out of the field of Edom, the earth trembled' (see Moore, who holds the ref. to be to the battle just fought); 20^{37} 'Then all the children of Israel went out'; 1 S 8^{20} 'Nay, but we will have a king over us . . . that our king may judge us, and go out before us, and fight our battles'; 18[5] 'And David went out whithersoever Saul sent him (RVm 'went out; whithersoever Saul sent him, he behaved himself wisely'); 1 K 2[46] 'So the king commanded Benaiah the son of Jehoiada; which went out and fell upon him [Shimei], that he died'; 1 Ch 20[1] 'at the time that kings go out' (both VSS add 'to battle' in italics); Is 52[12] 'For ye shall not go out with haste, nor go by flight'; and Am 5[3] 'The city that went out by a thousand shall leave an hundred.' (4) Another half-technical sense, which is in danger of being confused with the last, is found when 'go out' means 'go out of bondage,' mostly in reference to the exodus from Egypt or to the jubilee release. The chief references to the exodus are Ex 12[41] 14[8], Nu 33[3], Ps 114[1]; to the jubilee release, Ex 21[3 bis. 7], Lv 25[28. 39. 31. 33. 54] 27[21], the fuller expression 'go out free' occurring Ex 21[2. 5. 11]; 2 K 13[5] refers to the deliverance from the Syrian oppression; and Is 55[12] to the return from the Babylonian Captivity, with no doubt a fuller entrance into Messianic blessing. (5) By a peculiar Heb. idiom the 'border' or 'coast' of a territory is said to 'go out,' that is, 'proceed onward' to such a place. So frequently in Jos 15. 16 and elsewhere, the verb עָבַר being generally rendered 'go out' and עָלָה 'go up.' But notice especially the subst. תּוֹצָאָה denoting the end or extremity of a boundary line, generally used in the plu. and tr[d] 'goings out,' but 'outgoings' in Jos 17[9. 18] 18[19] 19[14. 22. 29. 33], which RV turns into 'goings out.' (6) Go out means 'proceed from' in Lv 10[2] 'And there went out a fire from the LORD'; Jer 21[12] 'lest my fury go out like fire' (וְיָצְתָה־אֵשׁ); Mk 5[30] = Lk 8[46] 'And Jesus, immediately knowing in himself that virtue had gone out of him' (τὴν ἐξ αὐτοῦ δύναμιν ἐξελθοῦσαν); Lk 6[19] 'there went virtue out of him and healed them all' (παρ' αὐτοῦ ἐξήρχετο, RV 'came forth from him'); 2[1] 'And it came to pass in those days, that there went out a decree from Cæsar Augustus' (ἐξῆλθεν). Cf. Jer 44[17] Cov. 'what so ever goeth out of oure owne mouth, that will we do.' (7) 'Go out' implies religious separation in Is 52[11], Jer 51[45], 1 Jn 2[19]. (8) 'Go out of the way' in Ro 3[12] means to 'go astray' (πάντες ἐξέκλιναν, RV 'They have all turned aside'). See go the way, below.

20. Go to: This obsolete expression, which is found 11 times in AV, seems to have been introduced by Tindale, who uses it in other places, as Dt 2[24] 'Goo to and conquere and provoke him to batayle'; 2[31] 'goo to and conquere, that thou mayest possesse his londe.' Abbott (Shakespearian Grammar, p. 122) says that the 'to' has an adverbial force, as in 'to and fro'; and as 'go' in Elizabethan English meant motion generally, not necessarily motion from, 'go to' meant little more than our stimulative 'come.' This is practically how Johnson explains the phrase—'Come, come, take the right course,' spoken sometimes sarcastically, sometimes encouragingly. In Shakespeare it is always an exclamation, expressing either scorn, as Winter's Tale, I. ii. 182—or disapproval, as Macbeth, V. i. 51—'Go to, go to: you have known what you should not'; or merely dismissal, as Merry Wives, I. iv. 165—'But, indeed, she is given too much to allicholly and musing. But for you—well, go to'; or even encouragement, Merry Wives, II. i. 7—'You are not young, no more am I: go to then, there's sympathy'; always, however, mixed with impatience. But if 'go to' is a mere exclamation in Shaks. and Elizabethan English generally, it is often more than that in AV, for it must not be forgotten that AV represents a much earlier stage of English than its date of 1611. There it is (except perhaps in Ja) a verb in the imperative, and expresses lively encouragement. This is clearly seen in 2 K 5[5] 'And the king of Syria said, Go to, go, and I will send a letter unto the king of Israel.' Its occurrences are Gn 11[3. 4. 7] (הָבָה voluntative, fr. יָהַב to grant), 38[16] 'go to, I pray thee' (הָבָה־נָא); the only remaining example of הָבָה, Ex 1[10], was tr[d] by Tindale 'Come on,' and this was retained in subsequent versions); Jg 7[3] 'go to, proclaim' (קְרָא נָא 'cry now!'); 2 K 5[5] 'go to, go' (לֵךְ בֹּא, lit. 'go, go in,' perhaps as Ball, 'depart thou [thither], enter [the land of Israel]'; LXX Δεῦρο εἴσελθε); Ec 2[1] 'go to now' (לְכָה־נָּא); Is 5[5] 'And now, go to; I will tell you' (וְעַתָּה אוֹדִיעָה־נָּא אֶתְכֶם); Jer 18[11] 'go to, speak' (אֱמָר־נָא); Ja 4[13] 5[1] 'Go to now' (Ἄγε νῦν). Tindale in his exposition of Mt 5[15-20] (Expos. p. 124) has 'go to and prove it'; and (p. 128) 'Go to, and judge their works'; and in the Prologe to the Pent. he says, 'Then go to and reade the storyes of the byble for thy lerning and comforte,' where the verbal force of the expression is always manifest. But he even uses 'went to' in Nu 11[4] 'And the children of Ysrael also went to and wepte and sayde: who shall geve us flesh to eate?'

'Go to, go to! How she holds up the neb, the bill to him!';

21. Go one's way: This full phrase sometimes represents an equally full expression in the original: thus, Gn 32[1] 'And Jacob went on his way,' Heb. הָלַךְ לְדַרְכּוֹ, so 19[2], Nu 24[25], Jos 2[16], Jg 18[26], 1 S 1[18] 26[25] 28[22], Jer 28[11]. But generally (always in NT) it is the rendering of a common verb with no adjunct. The verbs are אָזַל (Pr 20[14]); נָסַע (Zec 10[2]); הָלַךְ (Gn 12[19] 14[11] 18[33] 24[61] 25[34], Ex 18[27], Jg 19[5. 14], Neh 8[10], Ec 9[7], Dn 12[9. 13]); βαδίζω (Bar 4[19]); πορεύομαι (Lk 4[30] 7[22] 17[19], Jn 4[50], Ac 9[15] 21[5] 24[25]); ὑπάγω (Mt 5[24] 8[4. 13] 20[14] 27[65], Mk 1[44] 2[11] 7[29] 10[21. 52] 11[2] 16[7], Lk 10[3], Jn 8[21] 16[5] 18[8], Rev 16[1]); and ἀπέρχομαι (Mt 8[33] 13[25] 20[4] 22[5. 22], Mk 11[4] 12[12], Lk 8[39] 19[32] 22[4], Jn 4[28] 11[28. 46], Ac 9[17], Ja 1[24]). Sometimes what appears to be the plu., but may be an old genitive, is used, 'go your ways.' The phrase is good idiomatic Eng., and is still used in Scotland and the north of England, but often it is too cumbrous, sometimes singularly so, as in Ja 1[24] κατενόησεν καὶ ἀπελήλυθεν, which Mayor translates 'just a glance and he is off' (RV 'goeth away'). AV has a few times rejected it when found in earlier versions, as Mk 1[20] Tind. 'And they leeft their father Zebede in the shippe with his hyred servauntes, and went their waye after him'; Lk 8[14] Rhem. 'And that which fel into thornes, are they that have heard, and going their waies, are choked with cares.' Shaks. has it often, as Hamlet, III. i. 132—'We are arrant knaves all; believe none of us. Go thy ways to a nunnery.'

22. Go the way: This phrase, which has no connexion with the preceding, is used both literally and figuratively. (1) Ru 1[7] 'and they went on the way to return unto the land of Judah (וַתֵּלַכְנָה בַּדֶּרֶךְ); 2 K 25[4] 'and the king went the way toward the plain' (וַיֵּלֶךְ דֶּרֶךְ הָעֲרָבָה, RV 'went by the way of the Arabah'), so Jer 39[4]; Jer 31[21] 'set thine heart toward the highway, even the way which thou wentest' (דֶּרֶךְ הָלַכְתְּ). (2) Jos 23[14] 'And behold, this day I am going the way of all the earth' (אָנֹכִי הוֹלֵךְ הַיּוֹם בְּדֶרֶךְ כָּל־הָאָרֶץ); so 1 K 2[2]; Job 16[22] 'when a few years are come, then I shall go the way whence I shall not return' (וְאֹרַח לֹא־אָשׁוּב אֵלֵךְ).

J. HASTINGS.

GOAD.—1. דָּרְבָּן (ב without daghesh, cf. קָרְקָן (once) and אָבְרֹן; see Driver, Text of Sam. p. 80, and references there) occurs in a corrupt passage, 1 S 13[21] 'to set the goads.' A fem. form in plur. absolute is found in Ec 12[11], where we read that the words of the wise are as goads (כַּדָּרְבָנוֹת). 2. מַלְמָד (Siegfried-Stade; Moore thinks מַלְמַד probably the absolute form) only in Jg 3[31], where Shamgar is said to have killed 600 Philistines with an ox-goad (בְּמַלְמַד הַבָּקָר). The goad was a pole of some 8 ft. in length, 'armed at one end with a spike, at the other with a chisel-shaped blade for cleaning the plough, and on occasion would make a very good substitute for a spear' (Moore, Judges, 105). See further AGRICULTURE in vol. i. p. 49ᵃ, where the ox-goad is figured, and Schumacher, 'Der arab. Pflug,' in ZDPV xii. 160 f.

In Apocr. 'goad' occurs in Sir 38²⁵ 'How shall he become wise that holdeth the plough, that glorieth in the shaft of the goad (κέντρον)?' In NT 'goad' (RVm 'goads') is substituted by RV for 'pricks' of AV in Ac 26¹⁴ 'It is hard for thee to kick against the goad' (πρὸς κέντρα λακτίζειν; in Ac 9⁵ these words do not belong to the true text). The same figure is employed by Greek and Latin writers (e.g. Pindar, Pyth. ii. 173; Aesch. Agam. 1633, Prometh. 323; Eurip. Bacch. 791; Terence, Phorm. I. ii. 28). J. A. SELBIE.

GOAH (גֹּעָה).—An unknown locality near Jerusalem (Jer 31³⁹). LXX gives, instead of a proper name, ἐξ ἐκλεκτῶν λίθων.

GOAT.—Of the six Heb. words used for the tame goat, one signifies the g. generically, and, where the context indicates it, the she goat. One is used in the masc. and fem. forms to indicate the he g. and she g. respectively. Three are used for the he g. only. One is used in AV for the scapegoat, which was prob. no goat at all, and is therefore transliterated in RV 'azâzêl. Beside these there is one word which undoubtedly signifies the wild g., and another which prob. refers to the same.

1. עֵז 'êz, αἴξ, ἔριφος, capra, hœdus, Arab. ma'z, fem. 'unz. The plu. עִזִּים 'izzîm signifies the g. generically (Ex 12⁵ etc.). In this sense שֵׂה עִזִּים (Dt 14⁴) signifies a head or individual of the goats, גְּדִי עִזִּים (Jg 6¹⁹) a kid of the goats. It is also used for she goats, the context showing the meaning (Gn 30³⁵ 31³⁸ 32¹⁴ etc.). It is also used elliptically for goat's hair (Ex 26⁷ etc.). In the sing. (Lv 17³) it sometimes signifies an individual g., without reference to sex; at others, where the context points out the meaning, a she g. (Gn 15⁹). The Aram. plu. עִזִּין (Ezr 6¹⁷) also refers to goats generically, and the construct state צְפִירֵי עִזִּין signifies 'he goats of the goats' (cf. Dn 8⁵· ⁸).

2. שָׂעִיר sâ'îr, χίμαρος, hircus. This word occurs freq. in Lv and Nu as the designation of the g. of the sin-offering. In its masc. form in construct state with עִזִּים it signifies the he g. (Lv 4²³), and in its fem. שְׂעִירָה sᵉ'îrâh, χίμαιρα, in construction with עִזִּים, the she g. (Lv 4²⁸). The compound expression is in AV rendered 'a kid of the goats,' in RV better, simply 'goat.' Sâ'ir comes from the root שָׂעַר sa'ar=shag or rough hair (cf. Arab. sha'r). In this sense it is used with צָפִיר, one of the words for he g., to indicate his shagginess, Dn 8²¹ (AV 'rough g.,' RV 'rough he g.,' lit. 'the he g. the shaggy').

3. עַתּוּד 'attûd, used only in plu. עַתּוּדִים 'attûdîm (the same as the Arab. 'atûd, plu. a'tidah), τράγοι, κριοί, χίμαροι, hirci. It is trd in LXX of Ps 50⁹ χιμάρους (AV and RV 'he goats,'), and v.¹³ τράγων (AV and RV 'goats'). It is rendered (Gn 31¹⁰· ¹²) AV 'rams,' AVm and RV 'he goats,' LXX οἱ τράγοι καὶ οἱ κριοί, as if the translator were uncertain which was intended, or meant to indicate that both were included, or else read from a different text. 'He goats ('attûdîm, LXX δράκοντες) before the flocks' (Jer 50⁸) signifies leaders. 'Chief ones ('attûdîm, LXX ἄρξαντες) of the earth' (Is 14⁹) is a metaphorical rendering of he goats, AVm 'leaders' or 'great goats,' RVm he goats. 'Punished the goats' (RV 'he goats'), LXX ἀμνούς (Zec 10³) refers to chiefs.

4. צָפִיר ṣâphîr, τράγος, hircus; צְפִיר הָעִזִּים ṣᵉphîr ha'izzîm, τράγος αἰγῶν (Dn 8⁵· ⁸); צְפִירִים ṣᵉphîrîm, χιμάρους (2 Ch 29²¹, Ezr 8³⁵). Aram. צְפִירֵי עִזִּין, χιμάρους αἰγῶν (Ezr 6¹⁷). This word (Aram. and late Heb.), from the root צָפַר ṣâphar, signifying to leap, refers to the he goat alone. It is combined with sâ'ir. See (2).

5. תַּיִשׁ tayish, τράγος, aries, hircus. The same as the Arab. tais, and means a he goat only (Pr 30³¹). Plu. תְּיָשִׁים tᵉyâshîm, τράγοι (Gn 30³⁵ 32¹⁴, 2 Ch 17¹¹, not in LXX).

6. עֲזָאזֵל 'azâzêl, ἀποπομπαῖος, caper emissarius, AV scapegoat, RV Azazel (Lv 16⁸· ¹⁰· ²⁶). See AZAZEL.

Goats have always been a large item in the wealth of the people of Bible lands. Laban had large flocks of goats (Gn 30³³· ³⁵). Jacob gave two hundred she goats and twenty he goats to Esau (Gn 32¹⁴). Nabal had a thousand goats (1 S 25²). Sheep and goats were kept together in flocks (Mt 25³²· ³³). Kids especially were used as food (Gn 27⁹, Jg 6¹⁹ 13¹⁵, Lk 15²⁹). The prohibition against 'seething a kid in his mother's milk' (Ex 23¹⁹ 34²⁶, Dt 14²¹) may refer to the dish known to the Arabs as leben immu, i.e. 'his mother's milk.' It consists of meat, stewed in clabber, with onions, mint, and other condiments. It was probably not intended to prohibit this savoury dish altogether, but to prevent the unnaturalness of stewing a kid in its own mother's milk. (For other possible explanations see W. R. Smith, RS p. 204 n., and Driver on Dt 14²¹). A provision of a similar kind forbade the taking of a hen bird with her brood, or her eggs (Dt 22⁶). The Jews, however, interpret the passage as interdicting them from this mode of cooking flesh altogether. Goat's milk was nevertheless much used then as now (Pr 27²⁷). Goats were readily convertible into money (Pr 27²⁶). The 'bottles' in which wine was kept (Jos 9⁴, Ps 119⁸³, Mk 2²²) were made of g. skins. They were made by cutting off the head and legs, and drawing the carcase out by the neck, and then tying the neck, legs, and vent, and tanning the skin, with the hairy side out. Goat's hair was used in the construction of the Tabernacle (Ex 26⁷ 35²⁶ 36¹⁴) and for other purposes (1 S 19¹³). Its usually black colour is alluded to (Ca 4¹ 6⁵). The intractable and mischievous nature of the goat is contrasted with the gentle and innocent disposition of the sheep (Mt 25³²· ³³). The goat is mentioned in Apocr. (Jth 2¹⁷).

The goats of Bible lands, Capra mambrica, L., have long pendent ears. These are alluded to by Am 3¹² 'as the shepherd taketh out of the mouth of the lion two legs, or a piece of an ear.' Some Syrian goats are white or mottled, but most of them are black. They are destructive to young trees, and are the principal impediment to the propagation of forests on the bare mountain tops, where they find their favourite pasture.

The he goat was used as a symbol of the Macedonian empire (Dn 8⁵). The stately gait of the he goat is alluded to (Pr 30²⁹⁻³¹).

Two words are used for wild goats:—1. יְעֵלִים ye'êlîm. This word occurs in three passages, viz. 1 S 24², where LXX has for 'upon the rocks of the wild goats,' ἐπὶ πρόσωπον Ἐδδαιέμ, Ps 104¹⁸, where it has ἐλάφοις, and Job 39¹, where for 'wild goats of the rocks' it has τραγελάφων πέτρας. This animal is without doubt the ibex. The root יָעַל yâ'al, to climb, corresponds well with its habits. Its Arab. name wa'l is evidently the same as the Hebrew. The animal is also called beden by the Arabs. Its scientific name is Capra beden, Wagn., or C. Sinaitica, Ehrh. It is found in the wilderness on both sides of the Dead Sea, and in Sinai and the Syrian Desert. There is an 'Ain el-wu'ul, fountain of the wild goats, about six hours E. of Khareitun. The word wa'l is used in Pal. for the roebuck. The name En-gedi (Arab. 'Ain-Jidy), fountain of the kid, was doubtless given with reference to this animal. It is about the size of the domestic goat. The horns are from 2½ to 3 ft. in length, curved almost to a semicircle, and reinforced by large rough rings on the front face. Its flesh is said to be excellent. It may have been the venison which Isaac asked Esau to bring him (Gn 27^3).

יַעֲלַת־חֵן the 'pleasant roe,' RV 'pleasant doe' (Pr 5^{19}), is the female ibex, but tr^d by LXX πῶλος, a foal, Vulg. hinnulus.

2. אַקּוֹ 'aḳḳô. This animal is only once mentioned (Dt 14^5). Possibly ὄρυξ, in the LXX rendering of the passage, is the equivalent of 'aḳḳô; but this is uncertain, as the LXX gives only five out of the seven animals mentioned in the Hebrew. Some suppose it to be the roebuck; but this animal is mentioned in the same list under the name yaḥmûr. Others suppose it to be the paseng, Capra ægagrus, Cuv., the wild original of the domestic goat. It is, however, most probably another name for the yâ'êl, or a kindred species.

GOB (גֹּב, גּוֹב).—A locality mentioned only in 2 S $21^{18.19}$, where David fought the second and third of the four battles with the Phil. that are there mentioned. Most copies of the LXX have Γέθ in the first instance (with which agree the Syr. and a few Heb. copies), and Φόμ in the second; while some Hebrew copies have Nob. The parallel passage (1 Ch 20^{4-8}) locates the first of these two battles at Gezer (cf. Jos 10^{33}), and omits to mention the place of the second. Certainly they were not at Nob, but in the land of the Philistines. Wellhausen, followed by Driver and Budde, finds Gob also in 2 S 21^{16}, where he would read וַיֵּשְׁבוּ בְנֹב, 'and they dwelt in Gob,' instead of וְיִשְׁבִּי בְנֹב, 'and Ishbi-benob.' (See Wellhausen's or Driver's Sam., ad loc., and Budde's note in Haupt's OT). W. J. BEECHER.

GOBLET is found only in Ca 7^2 'Thy navel is [like] a round goblet.' The Heb. term is אַגָּן (prob. from a root signifying 'circular,' 'round'). It is used in plur. (אֲגַנּוֹת) in Ex 24^6 of the 'basins' (Socin, Opferbecken) in which Moses collected half of the sacrificial blood. In Is 22^{24} (the only other occurrence of the Heb. word) כְּלִי הָאֲגַנּוֹת is tr^d both in AV and RV 'vessels of cups,' where 'basin-vessels' (Guthe, Beckengeschirr) or 'bowl-shaped vessels' (Cheyne) would be a more accurate rendering. For the Eng. word cf. 'Annotations to Lk 22' in Rhem. NT, 'The new Testament is begonne and dedicated in his bloud in the Chalice, no lesse than the old was dedicated, begonne, and ratified in that bloud of calves contained in the goblet of Moyses.' J. GOD (IN OT).—

i. Existence of God.
ii. Anthropomorphisms.
iii. Names of God.
  (1) Names expressing the general notion of Deity, e.g. El, Elohim.
  (2) Descriptive Titles, e.g. El Shaddai, El Elyon.
  (3) Personal name of the God of Israel, Jehovah (Yahweh).
iv. Idea of God in various periods.
  (1) Pre-Mosaic period.
  (2) From the Exodus to the revolution of Jehu.
  (3) Prophetic period.
  (4) From the destruction of the State onwards.

i. EXISTENCE OF GOD.—The OT belonging to the historical period, many questions now discussed in the history of religion lie behind it. It never occurred to any writer of the OT to prove or argue the existence of God. To do so might well have seemed a superfluity, for all prophets and writers move among ideas that presuppose God's existence. Prophecy itself is the direct product of His influence. The people of Israel in their relations and character are His creation. It is not according to the spirit of the ancient world in general to deny the existence of God, or to use arguments to prove it. The belief was one natural to the human mind and common to all men. Scripture does indeed speak of those who say in their heart there is no God (Ps 14^1 53^1); but these are the fools, that is, the practically ungodly, and their denial is not a theoretical or speculative one, but merely what may be held to be the expression of their manner of life. Even the phrase 'there is no God' hardly means that God is not, but that He is not present, does not interfere in life; and, counting on this absence of God from the world and on impunity, men become corrupt and do abominable deeds (Ps 14, Job $22^{12ff.}$), and for their wickedness they shall be turned into Sheol, the region of separation from God, together with all the nations that forget God (Ps 9^{17}). Yet even this forgetfulness of God by the nations is something temporary. It is a forgetting only, no obliteration of the knowledge of God from the human mind, and these nations shall yet remember and turn unto the Lord (Ps 22^{27}).

Again, as Scripture nowhere contemplates men as ignorant of the existence of God, it nowhere depicts the rise or dawn of the idea of His existence in men's minds. In the historical period the idea of God's existence is one of the primary thoughts of man; he comes possessed of this thought to face and observe the world, and his conception of God already possessed explains the world to him; the world does not suggest to him an idea hitherto strange, that of God's existence. And, of course, the bare idea of God's existence is not the primary thought which Scripture supposes all men to possess; this abstract conception has gathered body about it, namely, a certain circle of ideas as to what God is. And with these ideas the Hebrew took up his position over-against the world. To him God and the world were always distinct. God was not involved in the processes of nature. These processes were caused by God, but He was distinct from them. The Hebrew, however, came down from his thought of God upon the world, he did not rise from the world up to his thought of God. His thought of God explained to him the world, both its existence and the course of events upon it; these did not suggest to him either the existence or the nature of God, these being unknown to him. His contemplation of nature and providence and the life of man was never of the nature of a search after God whom he did not know, but always of the nature of a recognition of God whom he knew. When the singer in Ps 19 says 'the heavens declare the glory of God,' his meaning is that the glory of God, who is and is known and is Creator, may be seen reflected on the heavens. But the psalmist only saw repeated on the heavens what he already carried in his heart. And when in Is $40^{25ff.}$ J″ asks, 'To whom then will ye liken me? Lift up your eyes on high and behold: Who hath created these things? bringing out their hosts by number'—it is assumed as known that J″ is Creator, and that His omnipotence is revealed in the nightly parade of His hosts on the sky, not one failing to answer the roll call, and the inference is that, with this God for their God, Israel cannot despond or be faint-hearted—'Why sayest thou, O Jacob, My way is hid from the Lord? An everlasting God is J″, creator of the ends of the earth; He fainteth not, neither is weary. He giveth power to the faint.' The passage teaches nothing new or unknown; it recalls what is known, reburnishing the consciousness of it, in order to sustain the faith and the hopes of the people. There is, however, in one or two passages an approximation to some of the arguments of Natural Theology. In Ps $94^{5ff.}$ it is said, probably of the excesses of the heathen rulers of Israel, 'They break in pieces thy people,

O LORD. Yet they say, The LORD doth not see. Understand, ye brutish among the people: He that planted the ear, shall He not hear? He that formed the eye, shall He not see?'

The OT as little thinks of arguing or proving that God may be known as it thinks of arguing that He exists. Its position is here again, so to speak, far in front of such an argument. How should men think of arguing that God could be known when they were persuaded they knew Him, when they felt they were in fellowship with Him, when their whole mind was filled and aglow with the thought of Him, and when His Spirit was within them? The peculiarity, however, of the OT comes out when the question is raised, How is God known? And here the characteristic conception of the OT is that of Revelation—if men know God, it is because He has made Himself known to them. The idea of man reaching to knowledge or fellowship of God through his own efforts is foreign to the OT. God speaks, He appears: man listens and beholds. God brings Himself near to men, He enters into a covenant with them, He lays commands on them: they receive Him when He approaches, accept His will and obey His behests. Moses and the prophets are nowhere represented as thoughtful minds, reflecting on the Unseen and ascending to elevated conceptions of Godhead: the Unseen manifests itself to them, and they know it. God reveals Himself to the patriarchs in angelic forms, to Moses in the bush and on the mount, to the prophets in the spiritual intuitions of their own minds. The form of manifestation may change, but the reality remains the same. The conviction in the mind of the prophet, that God revealed Himself and His word to him when the truth broke upon his mind, was not less vivid than that of the patriarch who was visited by angelic messengers when sitting at the door of his tent, or that of Moses who saw the God of Israel in the mount. This view of God's self-manifestation, and that He takes the initiative, is the characteristic conception of the OT. The view may not be peculiar to Israel, for increasing knowledge of the Semitic peoples tends to show that on general questions about Deity, such as His relation to the world and to men's actions, they all thought very much alike; the supremacy of Israel lay, not in these points, but in the ethical nature which they ascribed to their God, and in the redemptive hopes for mankind and the world which flowed from this conception of His nature. Interesting psychological questions are raised by such visions as that of Moses at the bush (Ex 3), that of Jacob at Jabbok (Gn $32^{24ff.}$), and that of Isaiah in the temple (Is 6). Such questions may never be answered, but there are two points not to be lost sight of in estimating the OT conception of Revelation. First, though it is the OT manner throughout to signalize the divine operation alone, and to pass over in silence any preparation or co-operation in the mind of man, we are entitled and compelled to throw back into these ancient histories something of our knowledge of how men's minds operate now when God is moving them. Isaiah's vision was no doubt preceded by reflection on the nature of J" and on the state of the nation, and the inevitable issue forecast. And similar reflections must have occupied the mind of Moses, along with aspirations in regard to himself and his people. These revelations of God to men were never mere objective calls to take a certain place or do a certain duty, there was always a personal element in them, they were a crisis in the individual religious life. It was this new personal relation to God, which was as real in the case of Moses as in that of Isaiah, that was the source of the power which such men wielded over the masses of their fellow-men. More than one commentator has said that Isaiah, in offering a sign to Ahaz in the heavens above or the depth beneath (Is 7^{11}), was playing a dangerous game, and might have been left in the lurch. It is sufficient preliminary answer to say that Isaiah did not think so. But it may be added that there was in Isaiah something of that same consciousness which expressed itself in Christ when He said, 'I know that thou hearest me always.' Therefore, secondly, the reality of the divine influence must be upheld also. The idea of Revelation cannot be regarded as a mere Hebrew conception which, translated into modern thought, means nothing but the natural operations of the mind in the sphere of religion. Such a view leaves unexplained the consciousness of the prophets, the contents of their prophecies, and the religious life which they manifested. But, of course, however much the OT reposes on the ground that all knowledge of God comes from His revealing Himself, and that there is such a revelation, it is far from implying that this revelation of God is a full display of Him as He really is. An exhaustive communication of God cannot be made, because the creature cannot take it in (Job $11^{7ff.}$). At the same time there is no trace in the OT of the idea that God as revealed to men is not God as He really is in Himself, or that His revelation of Himself is meant merely to be regulative of human life, while what He is in truth remains far away in a transcendental background out of which it is impossible for it to advance, or into which it is impossible for men to penetrate. The revelation God gives of Himself is a revelation of Himself as He is in truth, though it may be impossible to reveal Himself fully to men. The OT conception of God is that of a Person with ethical attributes; it nowhere speculates on His physical essence. God is nowhere called spirit in the OT; like men, He has a spirit; but spirit never denotes substance, but always connotes energy and power, especially life-giving power.

ii. ANTHROPOMORPHISMS. — From the earliest period when God is spoken of, He is regarded as a Person. The word J" is a personal name. From the Exodus downward He is so spoken of in contemporary literature: 'Sing unto the LORD, for he hath triumphed gloriously' (Ex 15^{21}); He is one whom men may 'love' (Jg 5^{31}); He is self-conscious, and swears 'by his holiness' (Am 4^{2}), that is, by His Godhead (Gn 22^{16}). The idea expressed by M. Arnold, that the conception of God in Israel was first that of some power external to themselves which they perceived in the world, a power making for a moral order or identical with it, and which they afterwards endowed with personality, inverts the OT representation, in which God is fully personal from the first, while His moral being becomes clearer and more elevated, or, at least, receives fuller expression. The question rather rises whether the very vividness with which God's personality was realized in Israel did not infringe upon other conceptions necessary to a true idea of God, such as His transcendence? Was He not conceived as a magnified human person subject to the limitations of personality among men? Now, of course, all OT statements about God are given in the region of practical religious life. A theology of the schools where the laws of exact thought prevail was unknown in the OT period. There may be observed, indeed, the beginnings of such a theology in the Alexandrian translation, and more clearly in the Aramaic versions and in Jewish writings of this age. These express themselves, in regard to God, in a form that seeks to be more severe and exact, using circumlocutions for the anthropomorphisms of the OT—a fact which indicates that these caused some offence. But in the OT such anthropomorphisms are freely used, as we use them still. And their use is usually justified by the statement that man was made in the image of God. It is possible that by some in Israel, just as by some among ourselves, His personality was so vividly realized as to obscure or repress some other conceptions of Him which also have their rights. But this can hardly be charged against the OT. When it speaks of the hand, arm, mouth, lips, and eyes of God; when He makes bare His holy arm (Is 52^{10}), lifts up a signal to the nations (49^{22}), is seen at the head of the Medes mustering His hosts, and His military shout is heard (13^{4}), all this is but vivid conception of His being, His intelligence, His activity and universal power over the nations whom He directs. The human is transferred to His personality, as it could not but be; it is transferred graphically, as could not but happen when done by the poetical, vivacious, and powerful phantasy of the people of Israel. The language only testifies to the warmth and intensity of the religious feelings of the writers.

Another class of passages deserves attention. God is said to have walked in the garden in the cool of the day (Gn 3^{8}); to have come down to see the tower which men did build (11^{5}); to have been one of three men who appeared to Abraham, and to have eaten that which was set before Him ($18^{1.\ 8}$); to have wrestled with Jacob ($32^{24ff.}$), and the like. Such passages, in addition to being a testimony to the vividness with which God's personality was conceived, are evidence also of the religious feeling that God did reveal Himself to men, and enter into the closest fellowship with them. Different minds may estimate these early narratives in different ways. So far as we consider the experiences, say of Jacob at Jabbok, real, we may suppose that with these early men a spiritual impression always reflected itself in an accompanying extraordinary physical condition, just as among the early prophets the ecstasy was usual, while, among the later prophets, though still occasional (Is 8^{11}), it became rare. And so far as we may consider the details of the description due to the narrator, it may be evidence that he could not conceive a spiritual experience apart from a corresponding physical accompaniment. And if early men so felt, it would not be judicious to deny that God might use an objective phenomenon, such as the burning bush, as a means of awakening the religious mind, just as our Lord used His miracles as a means of reaching the mind of those for whom He performed them. But these local manifestations of God never suggest that He was locally confined. It has been argued that Sinai was the local seat of J″ before the Exodus, and that it was only later that He was believed to have removed to Canaan. In David's day it was certainly believed that Canaan was His 'inheritance' (1 S 26^{19}); and the oldest Pent. narrator speaks of Him 'coming down' upon Mount Sinai (Ex $19^{11.\ 20}$). When the Ark, to which His presence was in some way specially attached, was captured by the Philistines, and Shiloh destroyed, the priests continued His worship with all the old ceremonial of shewbread and the like at Nob (1 S 21^{6}). The multitude of altars scattered over the country, if they did not suggest the positive idea of His ubiquity, suggested, at least, that there was no place where He might not let Himself be found, and the idea was confirmed by new self-manifestations in fresh places, as to Gideon (Jg 6^{20}), to Saul (who seems to have built many altars, 1 S 14^{35}), and to David (2 S 24^{18}). The idea men had of all these places was that expressed by Solomon in regard to the temple: 'The heaven of heavens cannot contain thee, how much less this house that I have builded' (1 K 8^{27}). But while God was thus present on earth, the tempest or the thunderstorm was at the same time a theophany in the heavens. Two beliefs characterize the Hebrew mind from the beginning: first, the strong belief in causation—every change on the face of nature, or in the life of men or nations, must be due to a cause; and, secondly, the only conceivable causality is a personal agent. The unseen power under all things, which threw up all changes on the face of the world, which gave animation to the creature or withdrew it, which moved the generations of men upon the earth from the beginning (Is 41^{4}), bringing Israel out of Egypt, the Philistines from Caphtor and the Syrians from Kir (Am 9^{7}), was the living God. Some phenomena or events, such as the thunderstorm or the dividing of the sea, might be more striking instances of His operation than others. They were miracles, that is, wonders, but they did not differ in kind from the ordinary phenomena of nature, from His making the sun to rise and sealing up the stars (Job 9^{7}), from His clothing the heavens with blackness (Is 50^{3}) and making them clear again with His breath (Job 26^{13}). Everything is supernatural, that is, direct divine operation. The regular alternation of day and night is due to J″'s covenant with them (Jer $33^{20.\ 25}$).

Another class of passages may be referred to. The first class cited vividly suggested the personality of God. The second class added the idea that He manifested Himself to men in place and circumstance, though with no implication that He was locally confined. This third class brings in the idea of the moral in His personality. Thus He repents that He made man (Gn 6^{6}), and also of the evil He intended to do (Ex 32^{14}); He is grieved (Gn 6^{6}), angry (1 K 11^{9}), jealous (Dt 6^{15}), gracious (Ps 111^{4}); He loves (1 K 10^{9}), hates (Pr 6^{16}), and much more. All the emotions of which men are conscious, and all the human conduct corresponding to these emotions, are thrown back upon God. Now, it may be true that from another point of view God must be held free of all passion, and not subject to such change as is implied in one emotion succeeding another. Still, this latter conception if carried to its just conclusions would reduce God to a being not only absolutely unmoral, but even impersonal. The religious mind could express its relations to God in no other way but by attributing to Him a nature similar to its own. Scripture is not unaware that this mode of conception may be pushed too far: 'The Lord is not a man that he should repent' (1 S 15^{29}). What is of importance, however, in these representations of God is the general conception which they combine to suggest, viz. the moral Being of God.

iii. Names of God.—(1) Some names express the general notion of Deity, as 'El, 'Elohim, 'God'; (2) others are descriptive titles applied to Deity, as 'El Shaddai (AV 'God Almighty'), 'El 'Elyôn, 'God Most High'; while (3) from the Exodus, J″ is the personal name of the God of Israel. The names El, Elohim, Shaddai, and J″ are probably all prehistoric, and their meaning is very obscure.

(1) The name El (אֵל) is the most widely distributed of all names for Deity, being used in Babylonian, Aramæan, Phœnician, Hebrew, and Arabic, particularly southern Arabic. It thus belongs to the primitive Shemitic speech before it became modified into dialects, though conceivably one or more of the dialects may have retained in use the root with which it is connected. (a) It has been referred to the Heb. root אוּל 'to be strong,' of which it would be the ptcp., meaning 'the strong.'* (b) Others have referred it to an

* Gesenius.

Arab. root 'úl, meaning 'to be in front' (hence awwal, 'first'), 'to govern,' and assigned to it the sense of 'leader.'* This meaning would be more in harmony with other Semitic names for God, such as baal, 'adôn 'lord,' melek 'king,' etc. It is, however, against such derivations, which should give an unchangeably long ê in el, that the first vowel is short in Bab. 'ilu and in Arab., and changeable in Heb., as אֱלֹהֶיךָ. (c) Some others have suggested a root אלה, either a cognate form to 'úl, 'to be strong,' considering the word an abstract = 'power,' 'might';† or a word connected with prep. אֶל 'unto,' God being the goal towards which men strive.‡ This last meaning is too abstract for a primitive name of Deity, and altogether improbable. No plausible derivation of the term has been suggested. In Heb. prose the word is usually connected with an epithet, as 'the living God' (אֵל חַי), 'the eternal God,' 'God Most High'; but in the prophets and poetry it is used alone for 'god' or 'God,' and in a few cases is found in the plur. 'gods.' It has maintained its place all through the language as well as in other dialects in the formation of proper names.

Elohim is a plur. of which the sing. is אֱלוֹהַּ, Aram. 'ĕlâh, Arab. 'ilâh (with art. 'al'ilâh='allâh, 'God'). The sing. is used in poetry (Ps 18, Dt 32), and occasionally in very late prose. It has been contended (a) that the sing. is an artificial form coined from the plur. Elohim; and (b) that Elohim is really the plur. of el, formed by inserting h, as occasionally happens. But decidedly against (a) is the existence of the similar sing. form in Aram. and Arab., which there is no reason to suppose late; and against (b) is the fact that it is only in plurals of fem. form that there is an insertion of h (Syr. plur. shemohin, 'names,' cannot be held primary, as the word 'name' has fem. plur. in Heb. and western Aram.). El, too, has its own proper plur. 'elîm. The attempt to connect the word with 'elah, 'elon, names of trees,§ may be safely neglected. Whether the term 'ĕlôah be connected with 'el, and what its meaning is, remains uncertain. The use of the plur. Elohim is also difficult to explain. The plur. had so obtained the upper hand in usage that the more archaic sing. was confined to poetry. The plur. can scarcely be a remnant of polytheism; the Shemites did not use the general expression 'the gods' for Deity, like Lat. Dii (the Assyr. 'the Ishtars'='goddesses,' is like Heb. 'the Orions'='constellations,' Is 13[10]); and the suggestion that the plur. was first used of the deities of some particular locality‖ is not without its difficulties, as usually each locality had only one deity. The idea that Elohim expressed the fulness of mights or powers contained in God¶ is too abstract, apart from the uncertainty whether the sing. meant 'might.' After all, perhaps, the plur. may be easiest explained as a plur. of eminence, like 'ădônîm, bĕ'ālîm, 'lord,' tĕrāphîm (1 S 19[13. 16]), and possibly nôgĕsîm, 'ruler' (Is 3[12]). The plur. appears also in Ethiopic 'amlâk, 'God' (unused sing. malek), and in the Amarna letters the plur. ilâni, 'God,' is used in addressing the Egyptian king.

(2) As is the case with El and Elohim, the meaning of El Shaddai is altogether uncertain. Shaddai is probably an epithet, as it qualifies El, just as Elyon, 'Most High,' does. The name is old (Gn 49[25]), and is said by P to have been the patriarchal name of God (Gn 17[1], Ex 6[3]). The fanciful derivation שַׁדַּי (=אֲשֶׁר דַּי) 'the sufficient' was perhaps known to LXX (ἱκανός, in this sense twice in Ru, thrice in Job, once in Ezk), and also the sense 'mighty,' 'almighty' (ἰσχυρός, παντοκράτωρ in Job). If derived from שׁדד, the name would not mean 'the Almighty,' but 'the destroyer,' signifying presumably the storm-god, or possibly the scorching sun-god; if from Aram. שׁדא 'to pour,' it would have the similar sense of the rain-giver.* Such derivations have little to recommend them. Equally far from probability is the conjecture that the word should be read שַׁדִּי 'my lord' (Arab. sayyidi).† In Heb. shēdîm means 'demons' (Ps 106[37]), and Dt 32[17] when naming them adds 'no god.' Such a topsy-turvy of meaning is a triumph of etymology. More recently reference has been made to the Assyr. shadu, 'mountain,' from root 'to be high,'‡ with the suggestion that Shaddai either means 'mountain' (cf. ṣûr, 'rock,' as title of God) or has the adjectival sense of 'most high.' The most that can be said is that the meaning 'almighty' has a certain tradition in its favour.

(3) The name Jehovah is also probably an ancient name (Gn 4[26]), though at the Exodus it received a special meaning by being connected with the Heb. verb 'to be.' (a) The pronunciation 'Jehovah' has no pretence to be right. The word יהוה acquired such a sacredness that, in reading, the name 'ădônāi, 'lord,' was substituted for it;§ hence in MSS and prints the vowels of 'ădônāi were attached to the letters יהוה, and 'Jehovah' (יְהוָה) is a conflate form with the consonants of one word and the vowels of another. It is not older in date than the time of the Reformation (1520). (b) The contracted forms in which the name appears suggest that the original form of the word was יַהְוֶה yahweh or yahve (a Greek transliteration is ἰαβέ). (c) The occurrence of this name or a similar one in Assyr. cannot be regarded as certain. Hommel believes he has discovered in western Shemitic a divine name i, ai, or ya (e.g. I-zebel, Jezebel), which he considers the original form of the name, the Heb. יהוה being a more modern expansion. The last part of his conjecture at any rate cannot be considered probable. (d) The word being prehistoric, its derivation must remain uncertain. It has been connected with Arab. hawa, 'to blow' or 'breathe,' J" being the god who is heard in the tempest—the storm-god; or with the verb hawa, 'to fall' (Job 37[6]), in the causative meaning 'the prostrator'—again the lightning-god; or with Heb. hayah (old form hawah), 'to be' in causative ('make to be'), i.e. 'the creator,' or fulfiller of his promises; and so on. (e) In Heb. writing of the historical period the name is connected with Heb. hayah, 'to be,' in the imperf. Now with regard to this verb, first, it does not mean 'to be' essentially or ontologically, but phenomenally; and secondly, the impf. has not the sense of a present ('am') but of a fut. ('will be'). In Ex 3[10ff.], when Moses demurred to go to Egypt, God assured him, saying, כִּי אֶהְיֶה עִמָּךְ ('EHYEH 'immāk) 'I will be with thee.' When he asked how he should name the God of their fathers to the people, he was told אֶהְיֶה אֲשֶׁר אֶהְיֶה ('EHYEH 'ăsher 'EHYEH). Again he was bidden say, 'אֶהְיֶה 'EHYEH hath sent me unto you'; and finally, 'יהוה YAHWEH, the God of your fathers, has sent me unto you.' From all this it seems evident that in the view of the writer 'ehyeh and yahweh are the same: that God is 'ehyeh, 'I will be,' when speaking of Himself, and yahweh, 'he will be,' when spoken of by others. What He will be is left unexpressed—He will be with them, helper, strengthener, deliverer.‖

The name J" can hardly have been altogether

new to Israel before their deliverance. A new name would have been in those days a new God. The name of the mother of Moses, Yôkebed (Ex 6^{20}), contains the word, and, if not among the tribes generally, the name was probably in use in the tribe of Levi, to which Moses belonged. The view (Tiele, Stade) that Moses became acquainted with the name among the Midianites, into a priestly family of which he had married, has no direct support in Heb. tradition. But the people in Egypt had, no doubt, connexions with the desert tribes on the east of them, as the flight of Moses to Midian suggests. The Kenites, the Midianite relatives of Moses, attached themselves to Israel (Jg 1^{16} 4^{11}). And the Rechabites, who originally may also have been Kenites (1 Ch 2^{55}), were fervent worshippers of J″ (2 K $10^{15ff.}$), and strenuous upholders of the severer nomadic ideal of religious life as against the corruptions which Israel's acceptance of the Canaanite civilization had introduced. Moses, too, demanded liberty to go 'a three days' journey into the wilderness' to sacrifice to the God of the Hebrews (Ex 3^{18} 5^{3}). These things at least suggest the question whether the name J″ was not known also in the Sinaitic peninsula (cf. Ex 18^{11}, Dt $33^{2ff.}$, Jg $5^{4ff.}$).

iv. Idea of God in various Periods.—(1) The pre-Mosaic period.—It has been made a question how much of the narratives regarding the patriarchal ancestors of Israel is history and how much legend. The stories were written down probably between the middle of the 10th and the middle of the 8th centuries, and it has been argued that they reflect in the main the religious ideas of this period. But the historians (J, E) from whom we have them did not invent them, but transcribed them from the national consciousness, and they must in any case reflect the ideas of an age considerably anterior to their own date as literature. The theory that names like Abraham and Sarah are those of extinct deities is perhaps overcome. But how far the wanderings of Abraham, Jacob, and Joseph, and their relations with other peoples, reflect tribal rather than individual movements, is liable to dispute. It is strange that while Edom, Moab, and the like have all one eponymous ancestor, Israel has three, all most unlike one another. Shall we hold them three distinct ideals? Or is Abraham the ideal of what Israel should be, and Jacob the type of that which it was? The story of Jacob and his brother Esau has been read as reflecting the historical relations of the peoples Israel and Edom, and their respective characters. If so, the historian who depicted his own people as crafty, unscrupulous, and godly, and their bitterest enemy as the careless, noble, natural man, was a humorous satirist of the highest rank. Historically, however, his satire must be judged less than just to his own people and more than partial to Edom. Abraham appears a purely personal figure. He may be transfigured by religious idealism, but the name must be traditional.

Apart from the patriarchal histories, sources of information for the condition of prehistoric Israel might be (1) the religious condition of the related peoples, Edom, Moab and Ammon, and Ishmael or the Arabs; and (2) any survivals appearing in post-Mosaic Israel from a lower stage of religion, e.g. stone, tree, and fountain worship, or rites connected with the dead, the possible remains of ancestor worship. Unfortunately, our knowledge of the peoples related to Israel belongs to a period long after the Exodus, being derived from the Bible or inscriptions. The assumption that the tribes which united to form Israel stood at the Exodus on the same religious plane as these peoples has its difficulties. When we consider the elevation at which eventually Israel stood above these nations we hesitate to fix any historical period, particularly so comparatively modern a period as the Exodus, at which they must have stood on a level. However powerful and creative the genius of Moses may have been, he did not create a religion, any more than he did a nation, out of nothing. It is usually assumed that these small peoples, such as Edom and Moab, to which Israel was related, were henotheistic, i.e. worshippers of one god to the exclusion of all others. The assumption seems without foundation. Moab had a chief god Chemosh, but a nation so polytheistic as Assyria had also a chief god, Asshur, and so other nations. A composite god, Ashtar-Chemosh, is named on the Moabite Stone; and as it is only in S. Arabia that Ashtar (Athtar) is masc., the deity here allied with Chemosh is probably Astarte. Neither is it certain that the Baal of Peor or of Meon was Chemosh. Mount Nebo may also be named from the god. Various deities also appear among the Edomites, as Ḳaush or Ḳos and Ḳuzah. The personal names Hadad, Baal-ḥanan, Malikram* are all theophorous. And Dusares (Dhu-shShara, 'lord of Shara') was worshipped at Petra, though this may have been later.† And, of course, the Arabs in addition to a number of gods had the three great goddesses (the daughters of 'Allâh), al Lât (al-ilâhat, 'the goddess' of the sun), al 'Uzza ('the powerful,' possibly the Venus star), and Manât ('fate,' 'fortune,' τύχη, cf. Meni, Is 65^{11}). A monolatrous Shemitic people is not discoverable in the historic period. The territorial position of peoples like Moab and Edom exposed them greatly to influence from neighbouring nations. The name Hadad in Edom may suggest Aramæan influence, and Ashtar in Moab the influence of the Canaanites; but the occurrence of the latter name in a royal document like the inscription of Mesha implies that the worship of Ashtar was national. If these small peoples be supposed to have been originally monolatrous, their history exhibits a degeneration and movement towards polytheism. While the fundamental ideas of Deity may be presumed to have been similar among all the Shemitic peoples, if they could be ascertained, the complete difference in the divine names current among these small nations and in Israel suggests a prolonged period of separate religious development, and renders any comparison of their religion with that of Israel at the Exodus barren of results.

Certain usages are supposed to point to ancestor worship among the Hebrews. The teraphim, a term completely obscure, have usually been considered household gods; though household gods need not necessarily be images of ancestors. In one passage the teraphim appear in a house (1 S $19^{13.\ 16}$); in others they are represented as placed in temples (Jg 17^{5} 18^{14}, Hos 3^{4}). Laban calls them his 'gods' (Gn 31^{30}); that they were of human form or size can hardly be inferred from 1 S 19. Teraphim are usually coupled with Ephod (wh. see), and in Israel were certainly used in consulting J″ and gaining oracles from Him (Hos 3^{4}), though their use is condemned (1 S 15^{23}). Nebuchadnezzar also used them to obtain an oracle from his gods (Ezk 21^{21}). That the 'Elohim' to which the servant was to be brought who desired to remain for ever with his master (Ex 21^{6}) was a family idol,‡ is wholly improbable from the context. The practice of cutting off the hair in mourning for the dead was probably a softening of the former more extravagant custom of tearing out the hair.§ The practice seemed perfectly harmless to the prophets (Is 3^{24} 15^{2}, Mic 1^{16}), though forbidden later (Dt 14^{1}, Lv 21^{5}); but the prohibition may repose on the feeling that the rite was characteristic of a religion alien to that of J″. If Dt 26^{14} mean that food was offered to the dead, such an offering was not of the nature of a sacrifice, but merely an expression of the feeling which the mourner strove to cherish that the departed were not dead, as appears from a multitude of passages in Arab. poetry. The mourner cried to the dead, 'Be not far'! though he had to answer himself, 'Nay, every one that is beneath the ground is far'! (Ḥamasa, 373). When two friends visited the grave of their comrade, and drinking each his cup of wine poured the third upon the grave, they only gave their friend his share as if he were alive (Ḥam. 398). There is no evidence that the dead were thought dangerous, and requiring to be placated by offerings. The name 'Elohim' bestowed on the spectre of Samuel (1 S 28^{13}) is strange, but the single instance can hardly suffice to prove that the dead in general were regarded as 'Elohim'; all other statements regarding the dead, the name rephāim given to them, and the fact that the 'obs twittered and muttered and spoke low out of the ground (Is 8^{19} 29^{4}), indicate that they were regarded as anything but powerful 'gods.' *

Certain things, such as Jacob's vision at Bethel (Gn 28), and names like the 'Oak of Moreh' ('the oracle,' Gn 12^{6}), the 'Oak of the soothsayers' (Jg 9^{37}), have been thought remains of the animistic stage of religion still surviving in the historical period. Certainly, the names Baal 'lord,' Melek Milk, Milcom 'king,' al Lat 'the goddess,' all show that the stage of promiscuous or general animism, if it ever existed, had long been overpast by all the Shemitic peoples. But to primitive minds the difficulty of realizing a deity apart from a local abode or some form would be great, and it was natural to localize the god in some fertile spot, grove or evergreen tree, or fountain of living water, where his beneficent operation was most perceptible. Why great or prominent blocks of stone should have been regarded as his dwelling-place is more obscure. At a later period men perhaps invited the presence of the deity by erecting pillars, mazzēboth, or artificial trees, 'ashērā, when the natural objects were not at hand. This difficulty of realizing a deity without abode and apart from some form explains the use of images, particularly when consulting him for an oracle, and it explains also the erection of a 'house' for the god. The difficulty was felt all through the history of Israel: at the Exodus (Ex 32), in the time of the Judges (Jg $8^{24ff.}$ 17^{3}), and much later (Is 2^{8}), as it has been felt in large sections of the Christian Church. The Ark, to which the presence of J″ was attached, relieved the difficulty without representing J″ under any form. When a house was built in which J″ was present, the Ark lost its significance and disappeared. The Ephod, whatever it was [EPHOD], was used when an oracle was sought. In David's days its use was held legitimate (1 S 21^{9} 23^{6}), afterwards it disappears from the legitimate cultus.

From the Exodus J″'s revelation of Himself was given, and men's thoughts of Him suggested through the national history. He showed what He was in great deeds rather than declared it in words. He was less the God of nature than of human history. Even when He performed wonders in nature it was usually in connexion with the life of the people and for moral ends, but in history His higher ethical attributes and purposes received direct illustration. Further, His operations being on the stage of Israel's national history, were much more conspicuous and easily read than they would have been if performed in the life of individuals. His deliverance of the nation from Egypt revealed His power and redemptive goodness on a scale that left an impression never effaced from the heart of the people. His destruction of the nation, predicted by the prophets and fulfilled, taught once for all that He was the righteous God and moral Ruler of the nations.

The religious development of Israel is virtually a development in the idea of God. As God was the only force in the world, particularly in human history, when a crisis occurred in history some conception of God had to be called in to explain it; and when mysterious problems arose in the national or individual life, the problem was immediately reflected back upon God, and became one in regard to His nature or action. In Israel the religious progress appears in the form of a conflict. And if a conflict implies lower elements and conceptions, it also implies a higher element which was conscious of the lower, and strove either to eject it or transform it. Such a transmuting force existed in Israel from the beginning, producing the results which mankind now inherit. This force may be identified with the moral in the conception of J″. Mere progress in itself does not decide that the progress was natural or supernatural. Our convictions in regard to this point will be formed rather from our contemplation of the results eventually achieved, from contrasting these results with those attained anywhere else, and from the trust we place in the consciousness of the prophets and leaders of Israel who felt that they were inspired. In a general way the religious history of Israel may be divided into three periods, in each of which the conflict resulted in a clearer conception of God, or of J″ the God of Israel:—

(a) The period from the Exodus to the revolution of Jehu.—The revolution of Jehu put its seal on the life-work of Elijah; it gave national expression to his demand: 'If J″ be God, follow him' (1 K 18^{21}). To the mass the struggle probably appeared an external one between two names, two deities; and it issued in the acceptance of the one. The numerical oneness of God was recognized. To Elijah and others the question was not one of numerical unity only, but also of moral nature.

(b) The prophetic period.—The conflict resulting in the recognition of J″ as God alone, at least in Israel, was followed by one more inward. Though Baal as another than J″ was set aside, Baal had incorporated himself in J″. Now, the conflict was not between J″ and another, it was an internal one between J″ and Jehovah-Baal, between two conceptions of Him—the popular and the prophetic. In the popular conception J″ was still mainly their national god, the god of the land, giver of its corn and wine, and whose most pleasing service was sacrifice and offering; while to the prophets He was a purely ethical Being, elevated far above the people, the righteous Ruler, to whom material offerings were inappreciable, and whose service could be nothing but a righteous life. What proportion existed between the prophetic party and the more backward popular mass cannot be known. The prophets now broke with the people as a whole, as they believed J″ had broken with it and determined to destroy it. In earlier times prophets had broken only with particular dynasties and threatened them with destruction. But there was no difference in principle between the earlier and the canonical prophets; the grounds on which J″ rejected a dynasty and the people were alike moral (1 K 22). A hundred years before the time of the canonical prophets, Elijah by his words, 'the children of Israel have forsaken thy covenant,' and by his flight to Horeb, expressed his feeling that the breach was now one between J″ and the people. Yet the breach was not absolute or final. Isaiah's conception of the Remnant appears already in Elijah's days: 'I will leave me 7000 men in Israel' (1 K 19[18]). The destruction of the state, foretold by the prophets, verified the prophetic conception of J″: He was the righteous Ruler of the nations. It verified also their judgment upon the past religious life of the people.

* Against the construction put by Schwally on Jer 16^{7}, see Giesebrecht, Jerem., and Driver, Deut. 292.

(c) From the destruction of the State onward.—The prophetic principles regarding J″ had been conspicuously illustrated in the national history: J″ was God alone; He was righteous; His nature was inscribed in letters of fire across the people's life and experience. But being written on the national history, these principles were as yet, to the individual mind, rather abstract. They were schematic, diagrammatic, seen to be true on the great scale and intellectually, hardly yet felt to be true in the experience of the individual. They had to be assimilated into the personal experience, equated by reflection with the condition of the world, the state of the people, the life of the individual. The process raised great problems, all of which became problems about God. (α) J″ was God alone and righteous, yet He took no pains to assert Himself against the world. He slept; the throne of the universe seemed vacant; the nations knew Him not, and wrought unchecked their cruelties on the earth. (β) So, too, Israel was His people; they possessed the truth; His cause and theirs was one: because the eternal truth was in their hearts they were righteous as against the world, but all appeals to His tribunal were vain; their passionate cries that He would arise and plead their cause, and their passionate hopes, 'he is near that will justify me,' only expired on the air. (γ) And in like manner the individual pined away solitary and deserted: 'Mine eyes fail while I wait for my God' (Ps 69[3]). More daring spirits like Job rose in rebellion: the throne of the world was not vacant, it was filled by an Immorality; the human conscience rose, and, proclaiming itself greater than He, deposed Him from His seat. The OT closed leaving these conflicts still undecided, though not without efforts towards a reconciliation. The people found a peace in hope and the future, and endured as seeing Him who is invisible. The individual spirit, too, caught glimpses of a future beyond the borders of this life, and in the ecstasy of faith could say, 'I know that I shall see God.' A few in their loftiest moments were able to bring the reconciliation into the present and feel it if not think it. Though J″ was seen in the world and in events, He was not exhausted by them, He stood above them and apart. The mind, too, was its own place, it could detach itself from its external conditions. And thus J″ and the soul had fellowship, through no medium, spirit with spirit—'Nevertheless I am continually with thee' (Ps 73[23]).

(2) The Exodus to the revolution of Jehu.—From the Exodus onward J″ was the God of Israel. People and prophets were at one in this. Israel never had any other native God but J″; if portions of the people declined to the service of the local Baals, J″ was always the national God, and a conscience within the people constantly recalled them to His service. From Hosea downwards writers are in the habit of stigmatizing the corrupt worship of J″ at the high places as Baal worship,—as no doubt in principle it was,—but probably strict idolatry, in the sense of worship of other gods than J″, was never very widespread either in the north or south, though towards the decline of the Judæan state various Eastern idolatries were practised by some classes of the people. That J″ was God of Israel was the faith of all, though the faith might mean different things to different minds, or among different classes. To some it might mean merely that J″ was Israel's national God as other peoples had also their gods (Mic 4[5]); to others it might mean something higher. A Shemitic mind might rise to general conceptions very slowly; and while practically J″ was the only God to him, the theoretical notion that He was God alone might not have occurred to him. It perhaps needed that internal conflict which arose through the slowness of the popular mind, and that outward collision with idolatrous nations which occurred in the days of the great prophets to bring the unity of God to speculative clearness. Heb. tradition places the Decalogue at the beginning of Israel's national development, and the prophets by their references to the moral Torah as known to the people from the first, but 'forgotten' by them, appear to follow the tradition. Moses is everywhere regarded as a prophet, and probably his teaching, like that of the prophets, consisted (apart from his lofty conceptions of God) in the main of social and civil ethics. Though the first commandment does not say that J″ is God alone, the negative element, 'Thou shalt have no gods before me,' is without a parallel in the history of religions. J″ was a jealous God. Why was He jealous? Jealousy is the reaction of one's self-consciousness against a wrong done him. What was the idea held of J″ when it was thought His consciousness of Himself would feel other gods beside Him intolerable? If the Decalogue be Mosaic, there was virtual monotheism in Israel since the Exodus, though it might be only among the higher minds, and more latent than conscious. And that which made J″ unique at least, if not alone, was His moral being. Writers of all schools are agreed that ethical elements entered into the conception of J″ from the beginning. There was at least on His nature a crescent of light, which waxed till it overspread His face, and He was light with no darkness at all. When Moses sat judging the people, dispensing right and justice in the name of their God, it could not but appear to the people that He was a God of righteousness. It has been contended that in subsequent history J″ sometimes displayed 'unaccountable humours,' that is, moods of mind and a kind of action not reducible under the moral idea. The arguments for this are not quite cogent. At all events, Israel entered upon national existence with two articles of faith: that J″ was their God alone, and that in His Being He was moral, the impersonation of Right and Righteousness. And emotional energy was given to these two articles by the consciousness of having been redeemed by their God. Behind the people's national life lay the consciousness of redemption as much as it lies behind the life of the Christian.

Israel's self-consciousness as a nation was virtually identical with its consciousness of J″, its God. J″, indeed, was all in all, the people little else than the medium through which He displayed Himself. The old anthology recording Israel's conflicts with the nations is called 'The Book of the Wars of J″' (Nu 21[14]). Meroz is cursed, because it came not 'to the help of J″' (Jg 5[23]). The people's victories are 'the righteous acts of J″, the righteous acts of His rule in Israel' (Jg 5[11]). The furore of enthusiasm for J″ in the song of Deborah reflects back light on the Exodus and the work of Moses. The conceptions regarding J″ found in the oldest literature differ little from those of the prophetic age and subsequent times, except that they are less broadly expressed. (a) The dwelling-place of J″ was often at least conceived as superterrestrial. He 'came down' to see the tower which men did build (Gn 11[5]), and to discover if the wickedness of Sodom corresponded to the cry against it (18[21]), and He rained fire on the cities of the plain from J″ 'out of heaven' (19[24]). To Moses He said He had come down to save His people (Ex 3[8]). But, though heaven was His throne, He manifested Himself over all the earth,—to Abraham in Ur and Canaan; to Jacob in Mesopotamia, to whom He also said, 'Fear not to go down to Egypt; I will go down with thee' (Gn 46[3]); to Moses at Sinai and in Egypt; to His people, going before them into Canaan (Ex 33[15]). There, though His presence was specially attached to the Ark, He also revealed Himself to Joshua as the captain of the Lord's hosts (Jos 5[14]), and by His spirit He ruled the people, raising up judges, inspiring Saul and David. (b) As to His relation to nature, it is said in the oldest Creation narrative that He made heaven and earth, and all the creatures, as well as man (Gn 2). On the highest scale He commands nature, sending a universal flood upon the earth, opening the windows of heaven and breaking up the fountains of the great deep (Gn 7). By some convulsion of nature He 'overthrows' the cities of the plain (Gn 19). Before Joshua He made the sun and moon stand still in the sky (Jos 10[12]); and at His command the stars fight in their courses against Sisera (Jg 5[20]). All earthly and heavenly forces obey Him. He caused an east wind to blow, and rolled back the sea (Ex 14[21]); He brought locusts on Egypt (10[13]), and turned the river into blood (7[19]); He sent hail and fire (9[23]) and darkness (10[22]). In the days of Ahab He scourged the land three and a half years with a drought (1 K 17[1]), and in the time of David devastated the people with a pestilence (2 S 24[15]). (c) In the early literature Israel had not yet entered greatly into relation with the nations; the teaching of Scripture regarding J″'s rule of the nations first appears in the prophets when the great Assyrian and Babylonian empires came upon the stage of the world's history. But the same conceptions appear in the earlier literature as in the later. J″ showed His power over Egypt when He brought out the people with a high hand, slew the firstborn, and overwhelmed the army in the sea. He drove out the nations before Israel, and gave David his victories over Aram and the peoples around. In Israel itself He is the Living God and Ruler. His angel leads the hosts of Joshua and Barak. The government of the people is in His hand. When in early times a crisis arises, He raises up a judge to save the people; when the old order changes, He elects Saul to the throne; and when the age of conflict is over and an era of peaceful development is inaugurated, He 'builds an house' for David, making his dynasty perpetual. Human leaders are but the form in which J″ clothes His own efficiency, for it is His spirit animating them that makes them heroes and saviours, such as were the judges and Saul. The spirit of J″ is J″ exercising efficiency. And though this efficiency is most visible in the external rule of the people it operates also in the sphere of thought, raising up prophets and Nazirites. The external and the inward often go hand in hand, as when David made Jerusalem the spiritual as well as political capital of the kingdom, and when prophets of the Lord like Nathan and Gad became his advisers. (d) J″'s rule of the world and of His people is moral. For his sin Adam forfeited Eden; for their wickedness mankind were drowned by a flood, and the cities of the plain overthrown. Ahab's sin was chastised by a drought, and David's by a pestilence. The histories being so greatly public annals, little is said of the relation of J″ to the individual. But such histories as those of Sarah, Rachel, and Hannah indicate how closely connected J″ was thought to be with family life; and such narratives as the covenants between Jacob and Laban (Gn 31[44ff.]), Abraham and Abimelech (21[22ff.]), Joshua and the Gibeonites (Jos 9[15]), show how He entered into the common life of men. That J″'s treatment of the individual was considered moral everywhere appears, e.g. the brethren of Joseph (Gn 42[21ff.]), Korah (Nu 16[30ff.]), Achan (Jos 7[15]), Hophni and Phinehas (1 S 3[13]), Ahab (1 K 21[20ff.]). In Ex 32[33] J″ says, 'Whosoever hath sinned against me, him will I blot out of my book.' And in narrating the death of Abimelech, the very ancient historian says, 'Thus God requited the wickedness of Abimelech which he did unto his father' (Jg 9[56. 57]). And on reward of righteousness, comp. David's words, 1 S 26[23] 'The LORD render to every man his righteousness.' Cf. 2 S 2[5], 1 K 18[12ff.]. And, finally, (e) the idea of J″'s foresight and predetermination is illustrated in the protevangelium (Gn 3[14. 15]), in the covenant promises to Abraham (Gn 15), in the destinies appointed for Jacob and Esau (25[23] 27[37ff. 39ff.]), and in the place and character predicted for the children of Jacob (Gn 49).

The earlier part of the period from the Exodus to the fall of the house of Omri was a time of warfare with external enemies till J″ gave His people rest under David; and it has been thought that the name 'J″ of Hosts,' or fully, 'J″, God of Hosts' (יי אֱלֹהֵי צְבָאוֹת), may have arisen during this time of conflict—the 'hosts' being those of Israel. It is strange that the name is not found in the Hex., appearing in Samuel, and particularly in the prophets. It is possible that the title had some concrete origin such as is suggested, and that it did not originally refer to the hosts of heaven, whether stars or angels, nor to the general cosmic forces of the universe. In the prophets, however, there is certainly no reference to the hosts of Israel. Between the time of the battle-cry, 'the sword of the Lord and of Gideon' (Jg 7[20]), and the words of Isaiah, 'In returning and rest shall ye be saved' (Is 30[15]), a world had passed away and a new one arisen. The ancient name 'J″ of Hosts' was used as the loftiest name for J″, suggesting His royal majesty and infinite power; but in all likelihood the prophets used the name as a single title without analyzing it, and never asking themselves what the 'hosts' were. J″ of Hosts means God of the universe.*

(3) The Prophetic period.—J″ was pre-eminently the God of human history, and it was in their history that the people learned to know Him. The stages through which the history ran led the people's thoughts ever more from the external to the inward in J″. First, the victories He gave them at the Exodus, at the entrance into Canaan, and in David's days, revealed the might of J″. Then, their defeats in after days, and the dissolution of the state, gave them a sight into His inward being. No prophet or writer ever attributed Israel's disasters to the might of the nations or their gods; they were due to J″ their God Himself. They were chastisements, revealing His moral being. And finally, in the depression that lay on them from the Exile, never uplifted, they learned to transcend both history and external conditions, and to know J″ as a spiritual fellowship. They were ever with Him (Ps 73[23]). They were satisfied with His likeness (Ps 17[15]); J″ was God of the spirits of all flesh (Nu 16[22] 27[16]). His afflictions had already enabled Jeremiah to reach this stage, in whom we see prophecy transfigured into piety.

Under Solomon, Israel entered into the circle of civilized nations. His father David was a fervent Jehovist; fervour was scarcely characteristic of himself in any direction. As he built houses for the gods of the neighbouring peoples among whom he found his wives, he cannot have been a logical monotheist. Neither was Ahab this even a hundred years later, though there is no evidence, but the reverse, that he abandoned the worship of J″. The century after Solomon witnessed the complete absorption of the native population; but if Israel subdued the Canaanites, it was in turn conquered by them. It inherited their civilization, but the heritage included a legacy of debased moral conceptions and practices. J″ took possession of the native shrines, and so became God of the land; but as He was worshipped where the Baals had been before, to many He might seem not unlike them. The confusion was increased by the fact that the name baal, i.e. 'lord,' was applied to J″.* Processes had been going on for long of which we have no clear account. It was in a way a fortunate thing that Ahab introduced the worship of the Tyrian Baal. It brought matters to a pass, and awoke men to see what was at stake. The persecution of the J″ party was no doubt caused by their opposition, for Ahab was no propagandist. Though Elijah was the spokesman of the party, he had a wide movement behind him. Obadiah, the chamberlain, hid 100 prophets of J″ in caves (1 K 18^4). The disaffection had invaded the army. When the people 'limped between two opinions' (18^{21}), it was a struggle between their own convictions and the influence of the court. Some indeed, like the Rechabites, were more radical, seeing in the Baal worship only a feature of the Canaanite civilization accepted by Israel, which they would have swept away, returning to the ancient ideal of a nomadic life. And Hosea appears to express a similar sentiment when he says that J″ shall allure Israel into the wilderness and give her her vineyards from there ($2^{14.15}$). At last the spirit of revolt embodied itself in Jehu, and swept away the house of Omri and Baal together. J″ stood with no rival. It was a great though only an external victory. The scene of conflict now changes to the nature of J″ Himself, and the conflict is waged by the canonical prophets.

The prophets taught nothing new about J″,† though, with history as their lesson-book, they taught many things more clearly. And to many who had been blind to J″'s operations in the past, what they taught may have seemed strange and even incredible. Each prophet has some special truth about J″ to declare, and the truth is perhaps a reflection of his own kind of mind. But as the separate colours combine to form the pure light, all their separate truths unite to reveal the full nature of J″, for it takes many human minds to make up the divine mind. The prophets, like their predecessors, are, first of all, seers; their function is to foresee and predict; their teaching about the nature of J″ only sustains their predictions. The simultaneous rise of four men such as Amos, Hosea, Isaiah, and Micah, each independent of all the others, is a mystery. Amos says, 'The Lord God doeth nothing without revealing his counsel to his servants the prophets' (3^7). But the revelation was probably in some way mediated. Did the prophet's ear catch distant sounds of movements among the nations, unheard by other ears? or was it their thought of J″, ever becoming more powerful and engrossing, that led them to project the calamitous future? Probably it was both combined. It is usually argued that the prophets reached their monotheism along the line of the ethical conception of J″; from being the Unique One J″ became the Only One. Possibly their minds moved along several lines. The prophets of the 8th cent. do not formally declare J″ to be God alone, though they silently ignore all other gods; it is only in the age of Dt and in that of Deutero-Isaiah that J″'s sole Godhead is directly expressed.

It is now a common-place to say that Amos taught that J″ is absolute Righteousness, the impersonation of the moral idea; that moral evil alone is sin; and that the only service J″ desires is a righteous life (though Amos also teaches that J″ is good and compassionate, $2^{9ff.}$ $7^{1ff.}$); and that Hosea represents J″ as unchanging Love, which no ingratitude of His people can weary or alienate (though Hosea does not forget the righteousness of J″, 2^{19}); and that to Isaiah J″ is the transcendent Sovereign and universal Lord (though he, too, recognizes the fatherly goodness and nurture of J″, 1^2 $5^{1ff.}$). Isaiah expresses his conception in the term ḳādôsh, of which 'holy' is a very imperfect rendering. 'Holiness' is not primarily a moral quality, it is the expression of Godhead in the absolute sense. 'The Holy One of Israel' is a paradox, meaning that the transcendent God has become God of Israel. Isaiah in one thought goes beyond his predecessors (but see HOSEA): he insists on religiousness—that the consciousness of J″ should be ever present in the mind. The want of this consciousness, insensibility to the Lord the King, failure to recognize Him in the events of history and human life,—this is sin ($1^{3ff.}$). And it is the cause of all sin, of the levity of human life (5^{12}), and the self-exaltation both of men and nations ($2^{10ff.}$ 9^9 10^{12}). The prophetic ideas form but half their teaching, the greater half lies in their own life and personal relation to God. Taken as a whole, the prophetic teaching amounts to the full ethicizing of the conception of J″. And the moral is of no nationality; it transcends nationality, and is human. The righteous God is God universal, over all. The principles of the human economy have at last clearly reflected themselves in the consciousness of the prophets, and human history is seen to be a moral process. And the idea naturally suggested the other idea of the issue of the process, the eschatology, which is the realizing of perfect righteousness in the world of mankind (Is 1^{26} 9^7). The movement of the prophetic thought towards universalism was aided by the entrance of the great empires of Assyria and Babylon on the stage of history. This gave them a new idea, that of the world; it created a new antithesis, J″ and the world; and it opened a new realm for the rule of the King, all the nations of the earth. Universalism is most broadly taught in Deutero-Isaiah; but there it is a theological deduction from the unity of God. J″ is God alone, the first and the last, initiating all movements and leading them to their issue; and His salvation shall be to the ends of the earth (49^6). The loftiest thoughts of God expressed in Scripture are found in Job and Deut.-Isaiah. In the latter writer all the operations and attributes of J″ are combined to sustain the faith that he is Redeemer of Israel and Saviour of all mankind,—His creation of the earth ($45^{18ff.}$) and man ($42^{5ff.}$), His call of Israel to be His servant and revelation of Himself within it (42^{1-6} 45^{19-25} 49^{1-6}), and its Restoration ($49^{7ff.}$ $50^{4ff.}$),—all these are in order that all the ends of the earth may look unto Him and be saved (45^{22} 49^6 $51^{4ff.}$).

(4) From the Exile onwards.—Attributes.—In the last period of Israel's history new conceptions of God hardly emerge. The period was rather one of assimilation of the prophetic teaching into the individual mind and experience. What the prophets had taught of the nature of J″, of His purpose, and particularly of the eschatological issues of His purpose, formed the subject of reflection, and efforts were made to verify it in experience. The efforts, as has been said, raised problems which, if they baffled solution, led to a more inward knowledge of God (Ps $73^{16ff.}$). The problems were mainly three: God and the world; God and Israel His people; and God and the life and destiny of the individual (see above).

Perhaps in this period fuller and more formal expression is given to the attributes of God. But a detailed account of the divine attributes is of little moment or worth. When the idea is reached that God is a transcendent moral Person, it is but a matter of deduction or analysis to tabulate His attributes, for 'moral' embraces not only righteousness, but goodness, love, and compassion. In earlier times J″ revealed His nature in actions which illustrated some one of His attributes. The very surprising ancient passage Ex $34^{5ff.}$, in which J″ proclaimed His name, that is, His whole being, left little to be added later: 'Jehovah, Jehovah God, merciful and gracious, long-suffering, and abundant in goodness and truth, forgiving iniquity, and transgression, and sin, and that will by no means clear the guilty.' In later times two causes contributed to a more frequent reference to the attributes of God: first, the tendency to reflection on His nature and on His historical operations, and their religious meaning. This tendency appears in Ezk, and Deutero-Isaiah, and downwards. The latter prophet is fond of turning God's creative and historical acts (43^{16}) into attributes; and thus His relation to the world as Creator becomes the basis and guarantee of His relation to it as Saviour ($45^{18ff.}$; cf. the cosmic christology of St. Paul's later Epp.). And, secondly, when the people wrestled with their God over their adverse destiny and hopes deferred, calling to mind His wonders of old (Ps 77^{11}, and the historical Pss), and the 'sure mercies' promised to David (Pss 89. 132), and appealing to Him not to be far (Ps 22), to make no tarrying, but shine forth for their salvation and stir up His might, they naturally often dwell on His attributes, for prayer is mostly calling to God's mind that which He is. Yet, however varied the emotions be in these psalms, in contents they hardly go beyond the prayers of Moses (Ex $32^{11ff.}$, Nu $14^{13ff.}$, Dt $9^{25ff.}$). The ethical being of J″ in combination with His attributes of omniscience and omnipresence is very profoundly realized by the author of Ps 139. (On special points in the various attributes see the separate articles).

The OT can scarcely be used as authority for the existence of distinctions within the Godhead. The use of 'us' by the divine speaker (Gn 1^{26} 3^{22} 11^{7}) is strange, but is perhaps due to His consciousness of being surrounded by other beings of a loftier order than men (Is 6^{8}). Some other things are suggestive, if nothing more. The angel of J″ is at once identical with J″ and yet different from Him. In Ezk and later prophets there is a movement towards hypostatizing the Spirit of God (see ANGEL). The 'word' of God is sometimes spoken of as if it had an objective existence, and possessed a native power of realizing itself. The 'wisdom' of God in some passages is no more an attribute of God, but a personification of His thought. In Pr 8 'wisdom' is God's world-plan or conception, the articulated framework of the universe as a moral organism. Its creation is the first movement of the divine mind outward. Being projected outside of the mind of God, it becomes the subject of His own contemplation; it is 'with' God. It is also His architect in creation, for creation is only the divine wisdom realizing itself. And as one work of creation arises after another embodying it, its self-realization is as if it 'played' before J″, and this play of self-expression was most joyous in the moral economy of man (cf. Jn 1^{1-3}, Eph 3^{9}, Col $1^{16.\ 17}$). Whether the 'servant of the LORD' be a true being, or only a conception personified into a being, he may be defined as the word of God incarnated in the seed of Abraham. And if even the loftiest Messianic conceptions of the OT remain short of the idea that God 'became' man, yet in Is 9^{1-7} J″ is manifested in the fulness of His being in the Messianic King (cf. chs. 7. 11).

A. B. DAVIDSON.

GOD (IN NT).*—The main object of this art. must be to draw in broad outline the doctrine of God in the NT, so as to show more particularly what new elements are added, and what old elements are specially developed or emphasized. The details of the subject may be left to the special arts., but it is important to mark distinctly those points in which NT presents an advance upon OT.

With this object in view, our inquiry will naturally follow some such lines as these—

I. TENDENCIES OF CONTEMPORARY JUDAISM.
  1. Monism.
  2. Transcendence.
  3. Particularist Limitations.

II. TEACHING OF NT.
  1. Attributes of God.
    (i.) Fatherhood.
    (ii.) Love.
    (iii.) Righteousness.
  2. Revelation of God.
    (i.) Through the Son.
    (ii.) Through the Holy Ghost.
  3. Distinctions in the Godhead.
    (i.) The Father and the Son.
    (ii.) The Holy Ghost.

I. TENDENCIES OF CONTEMPORARY JUDAISM.—It is impossible not to be impressed by the intense and passionate loyalty of Jews to the idea of God as they conceived that it had been handed down to them. The repudiation of idolatry could not have been more complete. It was this uncompromising monotheism which formed at once the largest and the purest element in the antipathy which the Jews felt for the heathen world, and in their impatience of its domination. The well-known instance of Caligula's attempt to set up his statue in the temple shows how the whole nation was stirred to its depths by the threat of such a sacrilege (Philo, Leg. ad Gaium, §§ 32–43; Jos. Ant. XVIII. viii. 2–9, BJ II. x. 1–3). And smaller incidents, like the hewing down of the golden eagle from the gate of the temple under Herod (Ant. XVII. vi. 2, BJ I. xxxiii. 2–4), and that of Pilate and the shields (Ant. XVIII. iii. 1, BJ II. ix. 2, 3; Philo, ad G. § 38), illustrate the jealousy with which the slightest approach of heathen profanation was resisted.

Christian apologists have often done scant justice to the intensity of this faith, which was utterly disinterested and capable of magnificent self-sacrifice. Those who believe most firmly that the Christian creed is an advance upon it are yet bound to recognize that it formed the base, broad and deep, on which that creed has been built. Judaism with all its faults and with all its corruptions was yet the religion of the Chosen People. However imperfectly it embodies the leading principles of Psalmists and Prophets, it yet had those principles behind it. It made great mistakes in the estimate and in the interpretation of its own past, but these very mistakes would seem to have been honest, and in the first instance at least mistakes of the head rather than of the heart.

A Christian cannot afford to misjudge or undervalue the better elements in Judaism, even in that branch of Judaism which rejected Christianity. At the same time he cannot help seeing certain weak points in it—points in which it demanded improvement, and which it has been one of the great results of the coming of Christ to improve. This holds good even of one of its best features, its doctrine of God. And that in three respects.

1. Monism.—It was of the essence of the Jews' belief that God is One. The Jew repeated solemnly every day the words of Dt 6^4 'Hear, O Israel, J" our God is one J".' A stress was laid on 'one' to mark the contrast to the gods of the heathen. And it is said that Rabbi Akiba died his martyr's death with this word 'one' on his lips (Weber, Jüd. Theol.[2] § 31, p. 151). Our Lord, as we know, took the same text as a starting-point of His own teaching (Mk $12^{29f.}$). And yet, after all, it expresses, or was apt to express, in the mouth of a Jew a rigid abstract idea of Oneness. The Jews appealed to it at a later date against the Christian doctrine of the Trinity. And it did for them exclude the deeper truth contained in that doctrine—the truth that God is not a mere Monad, self-centred and self-absorbed, without scope for the exercise of the highest affections within itself, but a Monad so distributed as it were within itself as to admit of a perfect interchange and reciprocity of those affections which can exist only as between persons. On this side the Jewish monotheism could not help being bare and dry and inadequate to the true richness and fulness of Deity.

The passages of OT in which the plural is used in reference to the divine action led the Jews to make some small approach towards the Christian conception by the idea of an 'upper or celestial familia or tribunal' (Taylor on Pirke Aboth, ii. 2). Taylor quotes Sanhed. 38*b*: 'The Holy One, blessed is He, does nothing without consulting the familia superna, for it is said (Dn 4^{17}), "This matter is by the decree of the watchers, and the demand by the word of the holy ones."'

2. Transcendence.—At the time of which we are speaking there was a marked and widespread tendency in the higher minds to widen the chasm between God and the world. Philosophy was straining after a conception of the Supreme Good or the Supreme Being as transcending the conditions of finite existence (οὐκ οὐσίας ὄντος τοῦ ἀγαθοῦ, ἀλλ' ἔτι ἐπέκεινα τῆς οὐσίας πρεσβείᾳ καὶ δυνάμει ὑπερέχοντος, Plato, Rep. 509 B). This was especially characteristic of Platonism, which contributed so much to the thought of Philo. And a like effort might be seen in the Oriental religions which were in contact with Judaism on another side. It may not be easy to say how far the movement in Judaism itself was sympathetic to these influences and how far it was internal and spontaneous; but that there was such a movement is evident.

(a) Names of God.—One marked indication of it is the treatment of the divine names. The great covenant name Jehovah (Jahweh) was considered too sacred to be pronounced aloud except in the temple (Schürer, GJV ii. 241, 381; Eng. tr. II. i. 296, ii. 82). Besides the common substitution of Adonai or Elohim in reading, a number of paraphrases were in use, all prompted by the instinct of reverence: 'Heaven,' 'Place,' or 'Space' (ὁ τόπος in Philo), 'the Name,' 'the Holy One, blessed is He' (Taylor on Pirke Aboth, iv. 7). In Greek the usual substitute was Κύριος. This conveyed, of course, indirectly the full connotation of J"; directly, it gave prominence to the idea of sovereignty. This idea meets us in a great variety of forms: 'God, King, Lord of the world'; 'Lord of all,' 'God, Lord of heaven,' 'Lord of the whole creation of the heaven,' 'Lord of lords, of the mighty, of the rulers,' dominator dominus (8 or 9 times in 2 Es); 'Great King,' 'King of kings,' 'King on the lofty throne'; 'Lord of judgment, of righteousness,' deus, dominus omnipotens. In close connexion with the sovereignty of God is His majesty: 'the Great One,' 'the Great Glory,' 'the Holy and Great One,' 'the Honoured and Glorious One,' 'the Mighty One,' fortis, fortissimus (esp. in 2 Es and Apoc. Bar). Less frequent is the idea of creation as an attribute of God (Enoch 81^6 94^{10}, Assump. Mos. 10^{10}), and that of eternity (Enoch 25^3 75^3, Assump. Mos. 10^7; cf. Cheyne on Is 40^{28}). After the simple titles Θεός and Κύριος, probably the commonest in the literature of this period is 'Most High' (ὕψιστος, altissimus, excelsus, ἐν ὑψίστοις κατοικῶν: on this title cf. Cheyne, Bamp. Lect. p. 83 f.). We may take this as the most direct expression of the idea which we call 'transcendence.'

On the names of God the reader may consult the excellent indexes in Charles, Book of Enoch and Assump. of Moses, and Bensly-James, Fourth Bk. of Ezra. There is less material in Pss of Sol and Test. of XII. Patriarchs. A list of the divine names in the earlier part of the Talmud is given in an essay by Löw, Gesamm. Schr. i. 177–186 (Schürer, LThZ, 1891, col. 275).

(b) Removal of Anthropomorphisms.—The older forms of Judaism are well represented in the Targums. In these the growing conception of the transcendence of God is clearly marked. The simple anthropomorphisms which are so common in OT are paraphrased away. The ground is cut from under them at the outset, as the creation of man in the likeness of God (Gn 1^{26}) is changed into his creation in the likeness of the ministering angels. God is represented as taking counsel with the angels, and creating man in their image. In pursuance of this tendency, where God is represented as 'coming down,' as seeing and hearing, etc., we find substituted the vaguer expressions, 'God revealed Himself,' 'it was revealed before God.' When we are told in Gn 18^8 that Abraham's heavenly visitants 'ate' what was set before them, the later (though in this case not the oldest) Targum paraphrases 'it seemed to him as though they ate'; and in like manner in the case of Lot (Gn 19^3). Even the ascription to God of mental acts, such as 'knowledge' (Gn 3^5, Ex 3^{19}) or 'intending' (Gn 50^{20}), is avoided, and that in the older Targum of Onkelos. Other expressions which attribute to God the conditions and even the passions of man are removed (e.g. the 'man of war' in Ex 15^3), anger (Ex 15^8, Ps 10^5), repentance (Ex 32^{12}). Along with these changes go a number of others, the object of which is to spiritualize the realistic descriptions of the intercourse between God and man. In this way even Jacob's wrestling and Moses' speaking with God 'face to face' disappear; and in places where God and man are, as it were, bracketed together a distinction is introduced, e.g. Ex 14^{31} '[the people] believed in the LORD and in his servant Moses' becomes 'believed in the LORD and in the prophecy of Moses'; Nu $21^{5.7}$ '[the people] spake against God and against Moses' becomes 'murmured before J" and disputed with Moses' (Weber, Jud. Theol.[2] pp. 154–157).

The Greek version of OT (Sept.) is several centuries older than the written Targums as they have come down to us. And there, too, a very similar set of changes may be noted. There, too, we find paraphrases for God's 'repenting,' for the descriptions of God as seen, for 'the LORD is a man of war' (Drummond, Philo Judæus, i. 158 f.). The fragments quoted by Clem. Alex. and Euseb. show that one of the earliest Judæo-Alexandrian writers, Aristobulus, whose date is placed at about B.C. 170–150, had already discussed and explained at length the anthropomorphisms in OT (Schürer, GJV ii. 763; Eng. tr. II. iii. 240). And Philo deliberately rejects all real anthropomorphism or anthropopathism, though he regards the use of anthropomorphic expressions as a necessity, especially for the unlearned (Drummond, op. cit. ii. 12–15).

We have thus abundant evidence as to the general set of the current of thought in the century immediately before and immediately after the Christian era. And yet at a later date, and it may be to a certain extent even at this date, other causes were operating to bring back anthropomorphisms of a particular kind. We shall see this when we come to speak presently of the limitations imposed upon Judaism by its excessive self-consciousness of national privilege. However much it might avoid the conceiving of God as made in the likeness of man generally, it had not the same hesitation to conceive of Him as made in the likeness of the ideal Jew (see below, p. 208[a]).

(c) Intermediate Beings.—In proportion as God was removed from direct contact with the world of matter, it became necessary to fill up the gap with intermediate agencies. So Philo: 'God generated all things (out of matter), not touching it Himself, for it was not right for the Wise and Blessed to come in contact with indeterminate and mixed matter; but He used the incorporeal powers whose real name is ideas, that each genus might receive its fitting form' (De Sacrificant. 13; ap. Drummond, Philo Judæus, ii. 113, with a slight difference of translation). Philo thus explains the action of God upon matter by the intervention of certain 'powers,' to which he also gives the Platonic name of 'ideas.' These, again, he sometimes calls 'Logoi,' which, in their turn, are summed up under the comprehensive name of 'Logos,' a quasi-personification of the divine reason. This is familiar ground (see art. LOGOS).

Palestinian theology did not go so far as Alexandrian in the use which it makes of intermediate agencies; but it, too, has and uses them. The most important of these for our purpose are the 'Memra' or Word of J", the Shechinah, and the Holy Spirit.

The Memra is a personification, almost a hypostatizing, not of the Divine Reason, but of the executive Divine Word, on the model of such passages as Is $55^{10.11}$ 'As the rain cometh down, and the snow from heaven, and returneth not thither . . . so shall my word be that goeth forth out of my mouth; it shall not return to me void, but it shall accomplish that which I please, and it shall prosper in the thing whereto I sent it.' This executive Word of God is constantly substituted in the Targum, in places where the OT refers the action directly to God Himself. The introduction of the Memra is the chief expedient for the removal of anthropomorphisms of which mention has just been made. All bodily appearance or bodily action is ascribed, not to God, but to His Memra. It is the medium through which the presence of God among His people is realized. The intervention of God in history is conducted through the Memra. The Memra covers the whole ground over which God is represented as acting, as manifested, as revealed. It is remarkable that this conception, though extremely frequent in the Targums, is not found in the Talmud. But we cannot doubt that it existed, though perhaps on a more limited scale, in the period of the NT.

The place of the Memra is taken in the later Talmudic literature by the Shechinah. In the Targums the two conceptions stand side by side, the Shechinah representing the manifested glory of the divine presence. The Shechinah differs from the Memra as being, at least at this earlier date, impersonal. Prayer and trust are predicated of the one, but not of the other. The Memra does, and the Shechinah does not, take an active part in the redemption of Israel. The Greek equivalent δόξα is of frequent occurrence in the NT (Weber, §§ 38, 39).

In the OT there are a few allusions to the Holy Spirit (see sep. art.). One of the principal is Ps 51^{11} 'Take not thy Holy Spirit from me,' where its function is clearly indicated as keeping alive religion in the soul, and as the special medium of communication between God and the spirit of man. The 'Spirit of God' is repeatedly spoken of as the source of inspiration and revelation. It is, in particular, the moving cause of the utterances, and, so far as they are divinely prompted, of the actions of the prophets and other organs of the Deity. In one OT writing there is a tendency to go further than this, and to make of the Holy Spirit a distinct hypostasis. This is Deutero-Isaiah, where we have such expressions as, 'The LORD God hath sent me, and his Spirit' (48^{16}), and 'They rebelled and grieved his Holy Spirit' (63^{10}; cf. Cheyne, ad loc.). There is hardly any clear advance upon this until we come to NT. The conception is not one that is largely used: ἐν πνεύματι ἁγίῳ occurs once in Ps.-Sol (17^{42}) and 'immitte in me Spiritum Sanctum' in 2 Es 14^{22}. But in neither case is there any attribution of personality. In Targ. and Talm. there is a fluctuating use, the tendency to personify being sometimes greater than it is at others (רוּחַ is both masc. and fem., but more often the latter, the sense of which is more impersonal, Weber, p. 191). The conception cannot be said to have assumed a fixed form at the time when NT literature begins.

Besides these intermediate agencies there is the Messiah ('Son of Man' in Similitudes of Bk. of Enoch), whose function is esp. that of judgment and of the restoration of the chosen people. And there is also the whole celestial hierarchy of angels, which, from the Persian domination onwards, had become more and more defined and elaborated.

The Jew had a valuable corrective against the injurious effects of an exaggerated doctrine of the transcendence of God in the OT doctrine of His omnipresence, though this was not one of the doctrines which took the strongest hold on the Jewish mind. 'In the development of the Jewish religion, this conception of God's omnipresence was only reached at a comparatively late period, and it was for long crossed and obscured by other simpler and more childish notions. To the moral attributes of Deity, to His supreme pity and justice, there are endless references in the Psalter and the Prophets; to the divine omnipresence there are but few And, indeed, there is an element of philosophy and of mysticism in this conception, to neither of which the native Hebrew mind was pre-eminently prone.' Still, the doctrine finds magnificent and classical expression in Ps 139; and it is natural that the modern writer, who seeks for the germs of a belief in the immanence of God as well as in His transcendence, should fall back upon this (see Montefiore in Aspects of Judaism, London, 1895, pp. 107–124). On the relation of immanence and transcendence in the theology of Philo, see Herriot, Philon le Juif, p. 211 ff.

3. PARTICULARIST LIMITATIONS. — Although there was in Judaism this tendency to emphasize the transcendence of God, and although the attitude of mind corresponding to this tendency was one of reverential awe, which is often finely expressed, there was at the same time another set of tendencies which were apt to run counter to this, and to bring back in an unattractive form the very faults from which Judaism was trying to free itself. These counter-tendencies had their root in the overweening estimate of the Law and the rabbinical study of the Law, and of the privileged position of the Jewish people.

The fundamental mistake of Judaism, fraught with disastrous consequences along the whole line of religious belief and practice, was its neglect of the Prophets in comparison with the Law, and its failure to grasp the principle that the Law was to be interpreted in the spirit of the Prophets and not by the rules of a minute literalism. The Jew believed that his Law came from God, and we must do justice to the strength and tenacity of this belief. It is easy to see how many of his errors of interpretation flowed directly from it. But it must be confessed that his zeal was not according to knowledge (Ro 10^2). However well meant in the first instance, it was often strangely devoid of insight (though from time to time flashes of insight may be discerned in it for which we are hardly prepared by the general tenor of the surroundings). But this lack of insight caused the Jew to fall a too ready victim to the warping effect of interested motive. His love of the Law as the gift of God became pride in himself as the exponent of the Law, pride in his race as the recipients of the Law, security in the consciousness of formal obedience as though it dispensed from the prolonged and more difficult task of true spiritual conformity. Not that the rabbinical teachers by any means always lost sight of this, but that through this process of self-deception a standard which, on the face of it, seemed to be extremely high became in practice miserably perverted and low. [We are compelled to use such language, by an impartial study of Judaism in the 1st cent. of the Christian era as it appears not only in Christian writings but in the pages of the Jewish historian. The Christian, however, should remember that, though true, this is not the whole truth; there are exceptions and qualifications].

The Jew's horizon was almost limited by the Law. It absorbed the energies of the strongest minds, and the possession of it created a national self-consciousness which was anything but well adapted 'for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness.' This state of things reacted strongly upon the conception of God. Judaism sought to get rid of anthropomorphisms drawn from common human nature only to substitute for them another set of anthropomorphisms, in some ways less innocent, drawn from rabbinical human nature. It expelled idola tribus, only to fall a prey to idola specus et theatri.

Thus God Himself was regarded as devoted to the study of His own Law, and not only of the Law, but even of the rabbinical developments of the Law. By day He 'is engaged upon the 24 Books of the Torah, the Prophets, and the Hagiographa, and by night He is engaged upon the 6 divisions of the Mishnah. God is even represented as having companions in the study of the Torah. At least we have, according to Baba Mezia, 85^b, even in heaven an assembly, like the high schools on earth, devoted to the investigation of the Torah. Here the great Rabbis sit in the order of their merit and of their knowledge of the Law, studying Halacha, and God studies with them. They dispute with one another and lay down Halacha' (Weber, p. 158).

We may make allowance for such extravagances as this, and see in them only a play of fancy growing naturally out of the view that the Law embodied the Wisdom of God. But we see how the idolatry of the Law tended to contract the range of spiritual vision. And still more mischievous results followed when the Law and all the rest of the divine ordinances were regarded as having for their final cause the profit and glory of Israel.

LITERATURE. — Much material may be found in the larger works on the Life of Christ and the history and condition of the Jewish People (Edersheim, Schürer, etc.), or the works of Siegfried and Drummond on Philo (to which may be now added Herriot, Philon le Juif, Paris, 1898); in the editions of Pseudepigrapha, to which reference has been made above; and in Taylor's Pirke Aboth. But the most convenient and complete of all the collections bearing directly on Jewish thought and theology is the posthumous work of Ferdinand Weber, formerly called System d. altsynagogalen palästinischen Theologie (Leipzig, 1880), and in the new and improved edition brought out under the superintendence of Schnedermann, Jüdische Theologie auf Grund d. Talmud u. verwandter Schriften (1897). Weber, though of Jewish origin, wrote from the Christian standpoint; and the reader who desires to see what is to be said from the Jewish side will find it attractively presented in Montefiore's Hibbert Lectures (London, 1892), and in artt. in JQR.

II. THE TEACHING OF THE NT.—We thus have as the starting-point for the teaching of NT an idea of God very tenaciously held, up to a certain point high and pure, and still bearing at times, though fitfully and uncertainly, the marks of its inspired origin; but as a rule contracted and petrified, with far too much of the life and warmth of the old belief of Psalmists and Prophets dried out of it, and in many minds seriously infected with a cancerous growth of self-love and self-righteousness. How did Christianity vivify, restore, enlarge, and enrich this idea? It did so (1) by asserting with greatly increased breadth and emphasis certain of the attributes of Godhead; (2) by presenting in the person of Jesus Christ a special revelation, brought home in the most palpable of forms, of the nature of God as expressed in these attributes; and (3) by opening the eyes of men to the truth that God is not, as was supposed, a simple Monad, but that within the Oneness of His Being there were included certain distinctions which made possible a constant flow and return of the highest and purest affections, dimly shadowed in the like affections of men, and putting a crown to the divine perfections.

1. THE ATTRIBUTES OF GOD. — In respect to the attributes of God the teaching of NT grows directly out of that of OT, but in each case greatly strengthens, deepens, and extends that teaching. The leading particulars in which it does this are as follows:—

(i.) Fatherhood.—Perhaps there has been a tendency to minimize too much the part which the conception of God as Father plays in OT (Holtzmann, Neutestl. Theol. i. 48 ff.). Not only is the relation of God both to Israel as a whole and to the individual Israelite compared to that of a father (Dt 1^{31} 8^5, Ps 103^{13}), but God is frequently represented as the Father of Israel (Dt 32^6, Jer $3^{4.\ 19}$ 31^9) and of Israelites (Is 63^{16} 64^8, Wis 2^{16} 14^3, Sir $23^{1.\ 4}$, To 13^4). We have also the correlative expressions: Israel is 'God's son,' Ex $4^{22f.}$ (cf. Wis 18^{13}, Sir 37^{12}), Hos 11^1, Jer 3^{19} 31^{20}, Ps 89^{27}, and individuals in Israel His 'children' (Dt 14^1). Some of these passages are enunciated with full prophetic πληροφορία (Ex $4^{22f.}$, Hos 11^1, Is 63^{16}), and must be numbered among the axiomatic utterances of OT religion. We note also, that while the relation of son to father is predicated both of Israel as a whole, and mediately through the nation of individual Israelites, it is also predicated with especial force of the theocratic king whom, with the sequel of the history before us, we regard as a type of the Messiah (Pss 2 and 89).

There was therefore no lack of points of contact and connexion between the teaching of OT and of NT. And yet the doctrine of NT assumes such different proportions as almost to amount to a new revelation. So far as the idea of the Divine Fatherhood really entered into the popular consciousness, it was chiefly as an item in the general sense of privilege. Even that had its good side, and this good side was the saving virtue of Judaism. But the virtue and its corruption lay too near together. Over wide tracts of Judaism the former was very largely swallowed up by the latter. A new impulse was needed if the idea of the Fatherhood of God was to retain its highest qualities of warmth and intimacy, and was at the same time not to be the privilege of a chosen few, but was to be brought home to the common consciousness of mankind.

No one doubts that Christianity has succeeded in doing this. From the beginning of NT to the end the lesson of God's Fatherhood is presented in such mass and volume as to identify it with the very essence of Christianity in a sense which does not apply to any other religion. And this is a clear case in which all subsequent teaching does but reflect the teaching of the Founder. One of the leading features in that teaching is the (inherited) conception of God as King (the kingdom of God as representing His penetrating and pervasive sovereignty); but side by side with this, and in full equality with it, is the conception of God as Father. No name of God was more constantly on the lips of Christ; and no other name so dominated the whole thought of God, as He not only cherished it for Himself, but bequeathed it to His disciples. Fatherhood is no longer one attribute among many, but it is a central attribute which gives a colour to all the rest. It is characteristic of Jesus that He repeatedly argues downwards from this attribute as furnishing a safe basis for deduction (Mt $6^{26.\ 32}$ 7^{9-11} 10^{29-31} etc.).

The idea of the Fatherhood of God is presented in the teaching of our Lord upon three planes. (a) God is Father of all mankind. His fatherly attributes are displayed even to 'the unthankful and the evil' (Lk 6^{35}, cf. Mt 5^{45}). (b) He is in a special sense the Father of believers, disciples of Christ. In the uncertainty which attends the exact circumstances of many of His discourses, it may be often doubtful as to how far the phrase ὁ πατὴρ ὑμῶν extends beyond these. Probably, as a rule its application starts from the inner circle. But it is also probably not confined to this. It is certainly impossible in view of such sayings as Mk 9^{40} ('he that is not against us is for us') to regard it as bounded by any hard-and-fast line. All those to whom Jesus speaks are potential disciples. The two classes run into each other. To both God stands in the relation of Father; but the fulness of His love is naturally felt by those who have learnt to come to Him as His children. (c) There is, however, yet a third sense in which the Fatherhood of God is unique. Jesus does not speak of 'our Father' as embracing both Himself and His disciples, but of 'My Father' and 'your Father.' In this He takes up the special sense in which (as we have seen) the terms 'Father' and 'Son' were applied to the theocratic King. The ministry of Jesus begins with an announcement from heaven: 'Thou art My beloved Son, in Thee I am well pleased' (Mk 1^{11}). And this announcement is repeated on another culminating occasion (Mk 9^{7}). It is by virtue of this unique relationship that the revelation of God which Jesus gives is also unique (Mt 11^{27}). It contains further implications as to the nature of the Godhead. To both these points we shall return.

All the three planes of Fatherhood and Sonship reappear in the teaching of the apostles. The first is, as with our Lord Himself, the least prominent. Still it is not absent (Ac 17^{28}), and it must always be remembered that if the Fatherhood of God is in the first instance and in the fullest sense for Christians (Ro 8^{15-17}, Gal 4^{6}, 1 P 1^{17}), they hold their privileges in trust for the rest of the world. The fulness of the Gentiles, and after it the fulness of Israel, is some day to be brought in (Ro $11^{25ff.}$). The peculiar Sonship of Christ is very prominent in the apostolic writings. It is clear that the apostles too, and we may say the whole Church, regarded the relation indicated by it as unique. It is the full recognition of this by virtue of which Christians are Christians (see below, p. 214[b], and art. CHRISTOLOGY).

(ii.) Love.—One of the points included under the Fatherhood of God is the extension of a Father's love to all who stand to Him in the relation of children. There had been a school of Prophets and Psalmists, of which Jeremiah seems to have been a leader, who laid especial stress on the 'loving-kindness' of J", i.e. the feeling of kindness and compassion which grows out of the covenant relation, the love of God for Israel as the covenant people. In the NT the horizon widens: God is a Father, not to Israel alone, but to all who claim their sonship. Towards them He turns, not paternal severity, but paternal love. The writers of NT generalize this love, so that one of them says in set terms 'God is love' (1 Jn 4^{8}). Here is another salient characteristic of Christianity. As it insists far more than every other known religion that God is Father, so also is it the one religion which lays down in this emphatic way that 'God is love.'

There are two distinguishing features in this proposition that 'God is love.' (a) The argument on which it is mainly based is that supplied by the death of Christ. St. John lays down this in his Gospel: 'God so loved the world, that he gave his only-begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on him should not perish, but have eternal life' (Jn 3^{16}, an enlargement by the evangelist of the discourse with Nicodemus). In the First Ep. when he returns to the idea he draws the same inference from the same premises a little more widely stated: 'Herein was the love of God manifested in us, that God hath sent his Only-begotten into the world, that we might live through him' (1 Jn 4^{9}). And it is a noticeable fact that St. Paul, to whom this attribute of the Godhead is no less prominent, grounds it also upon the stupendous sacrifice of the death of Christ: 'God commendeth his own love towards us, in that, while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us' (Ro 5^{8}, cf. vv.$^{5-7}$ and 8^{31-39}).

(b) The unwavering confidence of the biblical writers in the love of God may indeed be set down to revelation. The philosopher who sought to infer the character of the Author of Nature inductively from His works would not be able to adopt this tone. The waste which attends the processes of nature is accompanied by too much suffering. He might on the whole, and upon a balance of 'for' and 'against,' decide that the evidence for a benevolent purpose preponderates, and he might also see reason to think that that purpose became clearer in the progressive evolution of things; but further than this he could not go. He could not speak of benevolence as absolute; he could not say 'God is love.' The belief expressed in these words is not the product of an induction. None the less, when once it is entertained, and entertained on such grounds as those which the NT writers assign for it, the phenomena of the world may then be found compatible with it. The Christian may still cling to his belief, and trust that what is at present dark to him will be made clear in God's good time.

(iii.) Righteousness.—There can be no mistake as to the meaning and implications of the Fatherhood and Love of God. The case is different as to His Righteousness. Righteousness is a word of such varied signification that the exact sense in which it is used in any particular passage may really be doubtful; and there are certain places in NT where its meaning, as applied to God (δικαιοσύνη θεοῦ), has been a subject of much discussion.

We may say that there are really four leading senses which the phrase δικ. θεοῦ will bear. It may mean (a) 'rightness' or 'goodness' in general, including all moral excellence; or (b) in a narrower sense 'judicial righteousness,' the strict application of the standard of right by the judge; or (c) an application of that standard which is not strict but leans to the side of mercy towards the offender, and takes especial care of the weak and defenceless. Lastly, (d) there are a number of passages in the writings of St. Paul where it has been thought that δικ. θεοῦ ceases to be strictly an attribute of God at all, and comes to mean rather a state of man in the sight of God. This use we must consider. But it will be best to make our way upwards from the easier senses to the more difficult.

(a) It may be doubted whether there are any passages in NT where δικ. θ. is used precisely in this wide sense (unless we regard the case discussed below as in effect an application of it). But δικ. is frequently used of men in the sense of general uprightness or virtue; and this is brought into relation to God almost as if it were δικ. ἐνώπιον αὐτοῦ, 'righteousness in his sight,' or 'of which he approves.'

In Lk 1^{75} we have λατρεύειν αὐτῷ ἐν ὁσιότητι, κ. δικαιοσύνῃ ἐνώπιον αὐτοῦ, where ἐνώπ. αὐτ. strictly defines λατρεύειν, but in effect gives the wider meaning to δικ. In Mt 6^{33} it is a question whether the reading of most critical texts (incl. WH) τὴν βασιλείαν καὶ τὴν δικαιοσύνην αὐτοῦ (sc. τοῦ θεοῦ) can stand, and whether we ought not, with Lachmann, Weiss, and Holtzmann, to prefer the reading of cod. B, τὴν δικ. κ. τ. βασ. αὐτοῦ. In that case τ. δικ. would be absolute; to 'seek God's righteousness' would be an expression without parallel in the Gospels; we should have to connect it with Is 54^{17} quoted below. Ja 1^{20} comes under the next head, and in 2 P 1^{1}, where righteousness is referred to Christ, the sense is akin to (d).

(b) The simple judicial sense, though deeply rooted in language and always present in the background of thought, is not prominent in NT except in Rev. It naturally has a place in St. Paul's speech at Athens (Ac 17^{31}). It occurs also in 2 Ti 4^{8} and in Rev $16^{5.\ 7}$ $19^{2.\ 11}$. And the same idea is conveyed by δικαιοκρισία in Ro 2^{5}.

(c) The more distinctive senses in which righteousness is predicated of God come under the last two heads, and one of these, as has been said, is still somewhat of a problem. Both these remaining senses are certainly based upon the use of OT, and to understand them we need to recall the conditions of society in OT times. The OT covers a period of transition from comparative barbarism to comparative civilization. In all the earlier and less settled portions of such a period the rallying-point of society was the judge. It was a matter of the greatest moment that he should be strong enough to deal out even-handed justice without fear or favour. He would be beset by turbulent and powerful chieftains, who would make his task an extremely difficult one. By degrees it would be increasingly felt that the judge (or the king as judge) was the one refuge for all the weak and defenceless classes—the poor, the fatherless, the widow, the stranger; and his more characteristic functions would seem to be, not so much the safeguarding of equal rights, as the special protection of those who most needed protection. For king or judge to discharge this function in the face of all the dangers and uncertainties of his own position must often have required no little force and elevation of character. Hence we are not surprised to find either the great importance attached to righteousness as a name for this quality, or that it came often to mean vindicating the rights of the oppressed or dealing gently and leniently with the weak. We are apt to put righteousness in contrast to mercy, as Marcion opposed the 'just or righteous God' (δίκαιος) to the 'good God' (ἀγαθός); but to the Heb. 'just' or 'righteous' often meant 'merciful.'

These senses can be abundantly illustrated from OT. One conspicuous passage may be given out of many: Job 29^{14-17} 'I put on righteousness, and it clothed me: my justice was a robe and a diadem. I was eyes to the blind, and feet was I to the lame. I was a father to the needy; and the cause of him that I knew not I searched out. And I brake the jaws of the unrighteous, and plucked the prey out of his teeth' (cf. vv.$^{9-13}$).

It was an inevitable process that this use of the word 'righteousness' as applied to men reacted upon its application to God. More and more as time went on, esp. in Deutero-Isaiah and certain psalms, the righteousness of God comes to be, not His strict justice, but His healing, rescuing justice. He is not 'a just God and yet a Saviour,' but 'a just God and a Saviour' (Is 45^{21}; cf. δίκαιος καὶ δικαιῶν, Ro 3^{26}). The two conceptions of 'righteousness' and 'salvation' are very frequently placed in juxtaposition: Ps 24^{5} 'He shall receive a blessing from the LORD, and righteousness from the God of his salvation'; $31^{1.\ 2}$ (cf. 71^{2}) 'Deliver me in thy righteousness. . . . Be thou to me . . . an house of defence to save me'; 71^{15} 'My mouth shall tell of thy righteousness and of thy salvation all the day'; 98^{2} 'The Lord hath made known his salvation: his righteousness hath he openly showed in the sight of the nations'; 143^{11} 'In thy righteousness bring my soul out of trouble'; Is 46^{13} 'I bring near my righteousness, it shall not be far off, and my salvation shall not tarry'; 51^{6} (cf. ^{8}) 'My salvation shall be for ever, and my righteousness shall not be abolished'; 56^{1} 'My salvation is near to come, and my righteousness to be revealed'; 59^{17} (cf. 61^{10}) 'He put on righteousness as a breastplate, and an helmet of salvation upon his head'; 63^{1} 'I that speak in righteousness, mighty to save.'

In the Pseudepigrapha, speaking generally, the 'righteousness of God' is, as a rule, His judicial righteousness, as seen in the rewarding of the righteous and the punishment of the wicked. But we do also occasionally find its merciful side put forward, as in 4 Ezra (ed. Bensly-James) 8^{36}: In hoc enim adnuntiabitur iusticia tua et bonitas tua, domine, cum misertus fueris eis qui non habent substantiam operum bonorum.

It is to be noticed also that in connexion with the righteousness of God there arises the idea of a righteousness in man derived from God. Thus in Is 54^{17} 'This is the heritage of the servants of the Lord, and their righteousness which is of me, saith the LORD.' And a like use is found in Bar $5^{2.\ 9}$ 'Cast about thee the robe of the righteousness which cometh from God (τῆς παρὰ τοῦ θεοῦ δικαιοσύνης); set a diadem on thy head of the glory of the Everlasting. . . . For God shall lead Israel with joy in the light of his glory with the mercy and righteousness that cometh from him' (δικ. τῇ παρ' αὐτοῦ).

There do not seem to be any instances in NT of a use of the 'righteousness of God' quite on the same footing with that in Deutero-Isaiah and the Psalms. But when we consider the collection of passages just quoted from these and from other books, we seem to be upon the line of antecedents of a very marked and characteristic doctrine, which is associated specially with St. Paul.

(d) The Pauline doctrine. We have spoken of this doctrine as still constituting a problem in the exegesis and theology of NT. It is a problem which has been sharply accentuated in recent years, but, if not yet wholly solved, it would appear to have been at least placed on the road to solution.

In Ro 1^{17} St. Paul formulates the thesis of the Epistle. It is an announcement to the world of the righteousness of God revealed in the gospel from faith to faith (δικαιοσύνη γὰρ θεοῦ ἐν αὐτῷ [sc. τῷ εὐαγγελίῳ] ἀποκαλύπτεται ἐκ πίστεως εἰς πίστιν). Here the key-phrase is evidently δικ. θεοῦ; but what exactly does it mean?

A few years ago there seemed to be a strong consensus of the best exegetes (Meyer, Weiss, Lipsius, Godet, Oltramare, and in England, Vaughan, Liddon, Beet, Moule, unequivocally, and Gifford with rather more qualification) in favour of taking δικ. θεοῦ as a righteousness, which though in some sense or other God's ('a righteousness of which God is the author,' most Comms.), yet denotes more directly a state of man ('of which man is the recipient'). And whatever may be urged against this view, the arguments for it are so strong that it seems impossible to regard it as devoid of a substantial basis of truth. St. Paul appears to make his own meaning more explicit in Ph 3^{9}, where he substitutes the phrase τὴν ἐκ θεοῦ δικαιοσύνην ἐπὶ τῇ πίστει. And if it is said that this is the view of a later Epistle, and that it is differentiated from Ro by the insertion of ἐκ, the same antithesis of ἡ τοῦ θεοῦ δικ. and ἡ ἰδία δικ. occurs in Ro 10^{3}, where in spite of the absence of ἐκ the former phrase can hardly be ambiguous. And other arguments derived from the transition from δικ. θ. to ὁ δίκαιος in the quotation from Habakkuk in Ro 1^{17}, and from the evident parallel in $3^{21.\ 22}$ (where δικ. θ. is defined by δικ. θ. διὰ πίστεως, κ.τ.λ.), are hardly less cogent.

We must therefore include in the conception a righteousness which, whatever its origin, at least ends by denoting a state of man. But, on the other hand, it is no less impossible to explain δικ. θ. as in the first instance anything else than the personal righteousness of God. This is the sense of the phrase in the immense majority of the cases in which the word is used in OT and in other writings outside the Epp. of St. Paul. A phrase so familiar and so deeply rooted in the common language of men could not be violently wrenched from its usual associations and transferred to others without more explicit warning than any that is given.

At the same time those appear to be equally wrong who (like Häring in the treatise mentioned below) insist that the phrase can only have one meaning in such a way as to compel a choice between the two alternatives. When they speak of 'one meaning,' what they have in view is a definite logical tying-down of that meaning which is not necessitated by language. The array of logical possibilities set out by Häring (pp. 14–17) certainly was not present to the mind of St. Paul, nor was he compelled to discriminate everything that may be capable of discrimination. Language has in its earlier stages an elasticity of use which it may by degrees lose.

To understand the real drift of St. Paul, we ought to bear in mind, not so much the distinctions which we can draw, as those which had been actually drawn when he wrote. He really sums up a long previous development. He sums it up, and the language which he uses bears traces throughout of its several phases; but at the same time he puts upon it a new stamp; he focuses, concentrates, and defines it in a new sense of his own.

It may be worth while to note how the previous phases of which we have been speaking enter into his conception. They would do so in some such order as this—

(α) The broad fundamental meaning of δικαιοσύνη is conformity to right. As applied to God it is the sum of all moral excellence, of which He is the standard to Himself. Even when the word is used in narrower senses, this still remains in the background of the apostle's mind, and from time to time comes more to the front.

(β) In a primitive state of society, the decisions of the chieftain or king acting as judge are the standard of right. And the virtue most highly valued in the judge is that of equal dealing between man and man. There was therefore a tendency for the broad idea of righteousness in the ruler to contract into the narrower idea of justice.

(γ) In such a state of society, however, something more than simple justice was needed. The king or chief was the one efficient champion of the weak against the strong, of the poor against the rich, of the friendless against the powerful. Thus in the opinion of the common people, or of the masses, the form of righteousness for which they looked was even more than justice, care for the weaker side.

(δ) In direct dealings with the poor and weak, where the question was rather of what we should call criminal than of civil law, the virtue of the judge would be mildness and lenience, not exacting the full penalties for misdoing; in other words, treating an offender as innocent, or not so guilty as he really was.

(ε) Such acquittal or remission of punishment would be the act of the judge, of his own free grace pardoning the guilty. When the judge, for whatever reason, dismisses the culprit, pronouncing him 'righteous,' or free from guilt in the eye of the law, it is really the judge himself who, by his verdict, is the author of that righteousness or guiltlessness, and not the person acquitted. And the motive which impels the judge to this is his own personal righteousness of character, manifested under the particular aspect of lenience in judging.

(ζ) This is the process that really takes place when the sinner is indicted before the judgment-seat of God; and that not merely at the final judgment, but whenever his state in God's sight is considered. The motive which prompts the absolution is no righteousness of the sinner's own, but the righteousness of God.

(η) When we attempt to analyze the nature of that righteousness, we might, on a superficial view, identify it with the narrower sort of judicial righteousness which is seen in the mild treatment or forgiveness of the guilty. But the righteousness of God, as St. Paul regards it, is something much more than this. The mildness of a judge may have in it no higher ingredient than a certain easy good nature because it is indifferent to guilt. The forgiving righteousness of God is not of this kind. It embraces nothing less than the whole scheme of salvation, in which the central feature is the atoning death of Christ. The absolution of the sinner is no act of momentary indulgence, but a deliberately contemplated incident in a vast and far-reaching plan which has for its object the restoration of the human race.

(θ) The leading factor in it, then, is the supreme energizing righteousness of God, which in the course of its operation includes several minor kinds of righteousness, and which ends by attributing to the sinner a condition of righteousness which he has very imperfectly realized for himself. So that from his point of view it may well be called a righteousness not his own, but 'of' or 'from God.' We have seen that as far back as Deutero-Isaiah and Baruch there were traces of this conception (ἡ παρὰ τοῦ θεοῦ δικαιοσύνη). St. Paul therefore was not the first to introduce it. But it is a mistake to regard it as forming the whole or even the main part of his conception.

LITERATURE.—On this part of the subject the reader may consult the commentators on Romans, and in particular those mentioned above; also Pfleiderer, Paulinismus; Holsten, Evang. d. Paulus; Ritschl, Rechtfertigung u. Versöhnung. The stand which has recently been made for explaining δικ. θεοῦ of the personal righteousness of God is associated in this country esp. with the late Dr. James Barmby, Pulpit Comm. on Ro., and Expositor, 1896, ii. 124 ff., and Dr. A. Robertson in The Thinker, Nov. 1893; cf. Exp. Times, Feb. 1898, p. 217. In Germany an art. by Kölbing to somewhat similar effect appeared in SK, 1895, p. 139 ff., followed by a monograph on the subject by Prof. Häring of Tübingen (ΔΙΚΑΙΟΣΥΝΗ ΘΕΟΥ bei Paulus, Tübingen, 1896). Further literature is given on p. 5 of this treatise. The German writers were quite independent of the English, who preceded them in time. On the history of the OT conception there is a valuable tract by Dalman, Die richterliche Gerechtigkeit im AT, Berlin, 1897, which suggested much of the line of treatment followed above.

2. THE REVELATION OF GOD.—The more theological writers of NT clearly lay it down that in Christianity a new revelation is given of the nature and character of God. They connect this new revelation, (i.) with the coming of Christ, and (ii.) with the special outpouring of the Holy Ghost.

(i.) The Revelation through Christ.—The new disclosure of truths about God differed from all previous disclosures, inasmuch as it was no longer confined to a divine prompting of the minds of men, but was made through the incarnate presence of the Son of God Himself. After having in time past spoken to the fathers 'in' the prophets, God had at last spoken 'in' One who was not only prophet but Son (He $1^{1.2}$). This distinction of the New Covenant is emphasized most by St. John, but it is also expressed unequivocally by St. Paul, and Ep. to Hebrews, and the Synoptic Gospels refer to it sufficiently to confirm the evidence of the Fourth Gospel that the principle underlying it was brought out by our Lord Himself.

We may take two passages of St. John as typical of a great number of others: Jn 1^{18} 'No man hath seen God at any time: God only-begotten [reading μονογενὴς θεός with ℵBCL, etc., Tregelles, Weiss, WH, RVm] who is in the bosom of the Father, he hath declared him'; and 14^{7-11} 'If ye had known me, ye would have known my Father also: from henceforth ye know him, and have seen him. Philip saith unto him, Lord, show us the Father, and it sufficeth us. Jesus saith unto him, Have I been so long time with you, and dost thou not know me, Philip? he that hath seen me hath seen the Father: how sayest thou, Show us the Father? Believest thou not that I am in the Father, and the Father in me? the words that I say unto you, I speak not from myself: but the Father, abiding in me, doeth his works. Believe me that I am in the Father, and the Father in me: or else believe me for the very works' sake.'

These passages might be said to be a compendium of a great part of the Gospel, and we may add the Epp. of Jn. This will appear from observing the number of parallels which exist for almost every clause. 'No man hath seen . . . he hath declared,' 'he that hath seen me hath seen'; cf. 3^{32} 5^{37} 6^{46} 13^{20} 15^{24} 17^{25}, 1 Jn 1^{1-3} 2^{23}. 'Who is in the bosom of the Father,' 'I in the Father, and the Father in me'; cf. 8^{16} 10^{38} 14^{20} 16^{32} 17^{21-23}. 'Not from myself'; cf. 5^{19} 7^{16} 8^{28} 12^{49}. 'Doeth his works'; cf. 4^{34} $5^{19-21.\ 36}$ 9^{4} 17^{4}.

St. Paul does not enlarge upon this aspect of the Incarnation of the Son to the same extent as St. John. Still, he expresses it quite unambiguously when he describes Him as εἰκὼν τοῦ θεοῦ τοῦ ἀοράτου (Col 1^{15}), a term which he had used in an earlier Epistle (2 Co 4^{4}) in such a way as to show that the conception was even at that date fully established. It is also implied in the ἐν μορφῇ θεοῦ ὑπάρχων of Ph 2^{6}. The fulness of the revelation made through Christ is the subject of 1 Co 1^{30} ὃς ἐγενήθη σοφία ἡμῖν ἀπὸ θεοῦ (cf. 1^{24} Χριστὸν θεοῦ δύναμιν καὶ θεοῦ σοφίαν; also $2^{6.7}$), Eph 1^{8-10}, Col 2^{3} ἐν ᾧ εἰσὶν πάντες οἱ θησαυροὶ τῆς σοφίας καὶ γνώσεως ἀπόκρυφοι.

In close agreement with the language of St. Paul is He 1^{3} ὢν ἀπαύγασμα τῆς δόξης καὶ χαρακτὴρ τῆς ὑποστάσεως αὐτοῦ. On the exact force of these expressions (which are parallel to if not suggested by Wis $7^{25f.}$) see Westcott, etc., ad loc. The purport of them is that Christ, visible and active, brought home to the sight and minds of men the essential nature of God. This is an expansion in a more 'ontological' or 'metaphysical' sense of the opening words of the Epistle. This sense is too deeply ingrained in the language of NT to be eliminated.

Although, as has been said, it is the more theological writers who lay the greatest stress upon this aspect of the Son as revealing the Father, there is one conspicuous passage of the Synoptics in which it is clearly implied. The verse Mt 11^{27}, with its very close parallel in Lk 10^{22} (both passages should be taken with their full context), is in form so like the characteristic sayings of Christ; it fits into and interprets such a number of other passages (Mt 16^{16}, Mk 2^{10} 4^{41} 9^{7} etc.), and, while in remarkable agreement with the general verdict of the primitive Church, stands so apart from the particular tendencies of the Synoptic Gospels that it would be wanton to doubt its genuineness. To make the picture of Christ on earth consistent, we need to see in it not merely the beneficent Teacher, but the Son of God, as this name is understood by the writers of deepest insight.

(ii.) The Revelation through the Holy Ghost.—If we look at the Fourth Gospel from another point of view, we shall find it dominated by the consciousness of a double revelation. That through the Incarnate Son of which we have just been speaking is one; that through the Holy Ghost is the other. Looking back over the space of time that had elapsed since the Ascension, the writer sees that a great force has been at work in the Church, the effect of which he regards as a direct fulfilment of prophecies by our Lord Himself before His departure. A second 'Advocate' ('Comforter' AV, RV) was to come after He was gone. It was to be a dispensation like His own, and was to be characterized by a like dissemination of truth, not so much wholly new truth as a revival and reinvigorating in the minds of the apostles and others who came within its range of truth already taught by Himself: 'These things have I spoken unto you, while yet abiding with you. But the Comforter, even the Holy Spirit, whom the Father hath sent in my name, he shall teach you all things, and bring to your remembrance all that I said unto you.' . . . 'Howbeit when he, the Spirit of truth, is come, he shall guide you unto all the truth: for he shall not speak from himself; but what things soever he shall hear, these shall he speak: and he shall declare unto you the things that are to come. He shall glorify me: for he shall take of mine, and shall declare it unto you. All things that the Father hath are mine: therefore said I, that he taketh of mine, and shall declare it unto you' (Jn $14^{25.\ 26}$ 16^{13-15}). There is an accent about all the passages in which the writer refers to this subject which is far more like the accent of real experience than a product of pure reflection without concrete experience behind it. The writings of the Fourth Evangelist contain no express reference to the Day of Pentecost and the history recorded in the Acts, but they contain a number of allusions which are well explained by that history. St. Luke in like manner has no express mention of the Paraclete, but both his Gospel and the Acts bear frequent testimony to the work of the Paraclete under His other name, the Holy Spirit. Here as in the Fourth Gospel we have a historical retrospect of facts and impressions recalled after a considerable lapse of time, but in the Epp. of St. Paul we are in the midst of the events, and we are allowed to see into the inner mind of one of the leading actors in them. From the language of St. Paul we may learn what is meant by being 'taught all things and having all things brought to remembrance,' or rather as he had not been an immediate disciple of Christ we are enabled to understand the πληροφορία with which he spoke. He certainly felt that the Gospel which he preached had its source outside himself. Nowhere, perhaps, does this come out more clearly than in the first of all his Epistles. Writing to the Thessalonians he says, 'For this cause we also thank God without ceasing, that when ye received from us the word of the message, even the word of God, ye accepted it not as the word of men, but, as it is in truth, the word of God, which also worketh in you that believe' (1 Th 2^{13}). This is the central principle of the apostolic preaching. It is the 'demonstration of the Spirit and of power' of which he speaks elsewhere (1 Co 2^{4}). And the substance of the preaching is just the new revelation about God and Christ and the Holy Spirit, and their united work for the salvation of men. 'Things which eye saw not and ear heard not . . . unto us God revealed them through the Spirit: for the Spirit searcheth all things, yea, the deep things of God' (1 Co $2^{9.10}$).

Thus the method of divine revelation in the NT is very similar to that in OT. It is brought about through the action of the Holy Spirit upon certain selected instruments, with just the difference on which stress is laid in Ep. to Hebrews, that whereas, under the Old Covenant, God had spoken in and through the prophets, under the New He spoke 'in' and through the Son, and those expressly chosen and trained by the Son.

LITERATURE.—On the training of the apostles to be the vehicles of the new revelation, see Latham, Pastor Pastorum (Cambridge, 1890). Reference may also be made to the Bampton Lectures for 1893 on 'Inspiration,' and other works on the same subject.

3. DISTINCTIONS IN THE GODHEAD.—In the previous sections of this article we have had gradually to discriminate between the operation and functions of what we now call the different 'Persons' in the Godhead. At the time of which we are speaking (the period covered by NT) there was no such conception in the general mind as that of 'personality.' The term 'person' was just coming into use through the defining influence of Roman Law acting upon popular language (the distinction of persona and res appears to have come in during the 1st cent. B.C., shortly before the time of Cicero). But a long process had to be gone through before the idea of personality acquired an exact connotation; and that process was to a large extent involved in the theological controversies on the subject of the Trinity, the result of which was the formulated doctrine of Three Persons in One God, as we have it in what is commonly known as the Athanasian Creed.

It would be an anachronism to expect a definition of the doctrine in NT. And yet the doctrine is really a working out of data contained in NT. It is a rendering of these data intelligible to the consciousness as part of a reasoned and formulated whole. The Christian theologian is well aware that the only expression possible to him is approximate: he applies to the whole construction the dictum of St. Augustine; he says what he says, non ut illud diceretur sed ne taceretur (De Trin. v. 9). But he is almost compelled to say something, and the deliberate judgment of the Church has been that he is warranted in saying so much as he does.

In any critical study of that which we call by anticipation the doctrine of the Trinity in the NT, the starting-point must undoubtedly be the benediction in 2 Co 13^{14} 'The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the communion of the Holy Ghost, be with you all.' In this verse we have an utterance of the mind of the apostle, which he knows will find an echo in the minds of his readers at a fixed point in time and place, probably about twenty-six and in any case not more than twenty-eight years after the Ascension. We are left to draw our conclusions as to the belief of the Church at this time. It is, of course, true that the object of the passage is not dogmatic. If it had been, its significance would have been less. It is not the expounding of any new doctrine. It is not even the expounding of doctrine at all. It is only an invocation of blessing. But the peculiar form which this invocation takes, points to much previous preparation in thought and teaching; it points to a settled, and we are obliged to think, uncontested belief, common alike to the writer and his readers.

The peculiarity of the belief consists in the remarkable way in which a group of spiritual blessings, such as man is accustomed to look for directly from God, is not referred to the Godhead conceived singly as a Monad, but distributively as Three, and yet Three so bracketed together as to be at the same time One. No graduated interpretation of the Three Names is possible. If it were, we should have Beings who were not Man and yet not wholly God. In the Arian Controversy an attempt was made to establish this interpretation; but it utterly and hopelessly failed.

The other alternative remains, that St. Paul and the Church of his day thought of the Supreme Source of spiritual blessing as not single but threefold—threefold in essence, and not merely in a manner of speech. How did he come to think thus? How was it that a Church so far from the centre of things and at so early a date was prepared to receive without question an assumption which to us seems to make such large demands upon the intellect?

It was certainly not a matter of course. We have seen that there was a certain tendency to hypostatize the Word of God, the Wisdom of God, the Spirit of God, even the Glory of God. The Messiah was thought of as more than human if less than in the full sense divine. But all these conceptions were fluid and tentative. Jewish theology had no fixed and settled belief in regard to them. Even if we add to OT the other writings current at this period, Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha, the Jewish Apocalypses and the Sayings traditionally handed down of the oldest Rabbis, still we should not find anything to suggest a combination of the three terms handled with the precision with which St. Paul handled them.

One passage there is which would abundantly account for St. Paul's language if we could accept it as historical. That is the command to the apostles at the end of the first Gospel to go and baptize all nations 'into the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost' (Mt 28^{19}). This belongs to a comparatively late and suspected part of the Gospel. But one tradition may be later than another and more limited in circulation, and yet not be any less authentic. Now, the Didaché shows us that we no sooner cross the frontier of the apostolic age than we find baptism into the Threefold Name in full possession of the field (Did. vii. 1, 3). The tradition is continuous. It is taken up by Justin (Apol. i. 61), and Tertullian expressly tells us that the person baptized was dipped three times in recognition of the Threefold Name (Prax. 26). The practice, then, is at least very old. And it is no slight confirmation of the statement in the first Gospel that if it were true it would supply just the explanation that we want at once of the established rite and of St. Paul's language. In any case we seem compelled to assume that there was some foundation for both in the teaching of our Lord Himself. If there was not, at what point in the six-and-twenty years can the usage (doctrinal or liturgical) have been introduced in a manner so authoritative as to impose it upon St. Paul and the Churches of his founding? We may greatly doubt if any satisfactory answer can be given to this question.

On the other hand, the moment we assume that our Lord did really give this alleged command, and that He really did prepare for it by some corresponding teaching, a number of other facts are accounted for. We find the very teaching of which we are in search in many places of the Last Discourse as recorded by St. John (Jn $14^{16.\ 26}$ 15^{26} $16^{7.\ 10.\ 13.\ 15}$). And with such teaching in the background a variety of phenomena in St. Paul's Epp. fall into their place which would otherwise be very intractable.

(i.) The Father and the Son.—The Epistle (2 Co) ends with a triple benediction, and it begins with a double benediction. 'Grace and peace' are invoked upon the Corinthian Christians 'from God our Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ.' We observe here the same sort of bracketing of the two Divine Names as in the case of the Three. Although there is a distinction of names, and although there may be a certain distinction and special distribution of function, the source of spiritual blessing is in its essence One.

The fact that there is this alternation within the same Epistle of the Two names and the Three, shows that the one expression is in no way inconsistent with the other. A like alternation is found side by side in several other of St. Paul's Epistles. For instance, in 1 Co 12^{4-11} we have the Triad: Lord, God, Spirit; in 1 Co 1^3 and 8^6 we have (in the latter passage very expressly) the Duad: God [the (our) Father] and Lord [Jesus Christ]. In like manner, in Ro $8^{14-17.\ 26-30}$ we have the Triad, though not formally drawn out, just as clearly presupposed as in vv.$^{31-39}$ (cf. 1^7 etc.) we have the Duad; and a like relation appears in Eph 2^{18} $3^{2-5.\ 14-17}$ 4^{4-6} 5^{18-20} compared with $1^{2.\ 3.\ 17}$ $2^{\text{ult.}}$ 5^5 $6^{6.\ 23}$.

Nor is this alternation confined to the Pauline Epistles. It is seen again in 1 P $1^{2.\ 3-12}$ 4^{13-19} by the side of 1^{17-21} 2^5 $3^{15-18.\ 20-22}$ etc.; and it is as conspicuous in 1 Jn 5^{4-8} compared with the general tenor of the Ep., which is constantly setting 'the Father' and 'the (His) Son' over-against each other. We may also compare Jude $^{20.\ 21}$ with $^{1.\ 4.\ 24.\ 25}$; Rev 1^{4-6} 2^{26-29} $3^{5.\ 6.\ 12.\ 13.\ 21.\ 22}$ with 5^{6-13} 7^{9-17} etc. And we are further reminded that in the Didaché baptism in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit is spoken of almost in the same breath with baptism in the name of Christ (Did. vii. 1, 3 and ix. 5).

There is thus an easy transition from the one way of speaking to the other. There is really a threefold usage. The apostles and early Christians generally speak of God, of God the Father, and God the Son, of God the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, according to the context and the particular purpose with which they are writing; but the three modes of expression, so far from being mutually exclusive, are, in fact, closely connected and correlated. And it is noticeable, that while there is this free and natural interchange of the three terms, no fourth term is ever added to the three as at all upon the same footing. The mental bracketing of which we have spoken appears to subsist throughout. The usage, although it is in some respects wide and varied, is yet in others strictly circumscribed, and is regulated by fixed laws. When we look into it more closely we seem to become aware of a gradual development and expansion, if not in the original presentation of the doctrine, yet in the order in which the different parts of it—so to speak—become consciously and definitely realized by the apostles and first disciples. If (as we have seen reason to think) they had received fuller teaching on the subject directly from the Lord Himself than is contained in our extant Gospels, this did not prevent them from grasping the truth only by degrees, and the very gradualness with which it was grasped would account for some of the first statements being lost to us. It is the later teaching of events calling the earlier teaching to remembrance (Jn 14^{26}) which has preserved for us so much of this as we have. It is a matter of common experience that there are lessons latent in the mind which only become vividly realized when something occurs to bring them home, or when the logic of thought naturally reaches them.

In the case of the apostles the logic of thought started from Christ, the Incarnate Christ, whom they had seen with their eyes, and their hands had handled in the days of His flesh. If Christ was God, then it was certain that there must be in the Godhead some such distinction as that which we call personal; the attributes of personality attached to Him as unmistakably as to the apostles themselves. And if beneath these there lay a substratum of unity with the Power which ruled the heavens, that unity must still be such as admitted of personal distinction.

The language which the apostles use is thoroughly accounted for by the evidence of their own senses, taken with the utterances of Jesus Himself. The keyword which is constantly upon His lips is the name 'Father' with its correlative 'Son.' These terms established themselves from the very first in the Christian consciousness as the true expression of the mutual relation. That they must have done so appears from the fundamental place which they had in the theology of St. Paul, in spite of all the independence which he claims for its origin. No better argument exists for the view that at the time when he wrote his extant Epistles he had already some form of evangelic document before him. In any case he must have been familiar with an extremely solid and unanimous tradition. To that tradition it is not too much to say that all Christian speculation on the wider relations of the Godhead goes back. The central point in all subsequent argument is the relation of 'Father' and 'Son.' And the difference which in all ages has marked off a loyal from a disloyal interpretation of the data of Christianity has been this, that the one insisted upon a real Fatherhood and a real Sonship, which the other has attempted to explain away. This was the principle at issue in the Arian Controversy. And there has probably never been a controversy argued out more thoroughly or with a more abundant expenditure of both intellectual and moral force. The outcome of it was the definite and triumphant affirmation of the position that the Father is essentially Father and the Son essentially Son. The most abstruse clauses in the Athanasian Creed are nothing but the emphatic assertion and the systematic safeguarding of this.

(ii.) The Holy Spirit.—In framing their doctrine of the Holy Spirit, as in framing their doctrine of the Son, the apostles had before their minds a definite series of facts. There was a certain group of phenomena which they consistently referred to the action of the Spirit. The phenomena of what we call 'inspiration,' the divine influence of which they were conscious in preaching and teaching; the special and remarkable 'gifts' (χαρίσματα) which distinguished in an eminent degree the first generations of Christians; and, generally speaking, the felt communion of the human spirit with the divine, were regarded by them as manifestations of the activity of the Holy Ghost. If we read the three chs. 1 Co 12–14 we see that St. Paul felt himself to be in the midst of such activity; and there are many other allusions to it. The Early Church appears to have dated the energies at work within it in a special sense from the first Pentecost after the Ascension. They called this an 'outpouring' of the Holy Ghost, seeing in it a fulfilment of prophecy (Ac $2^{17.\ 18.\ 33}$, Tit 3^{6}).

But how was it that they came to speak of the work of the Holy Spirit as the work of a person? That they did so appears not only from such incidental passages as Ro 8^{26}, 1 Co 12^{11}, Eph 4^{30}, but still more from the great Trinitarian texts 2 Co 13^{14} and Mt 28^{19}, in which the Holy Ghost is placed on precisely the same footing as the Son and the Father. We have seen that this can have been no momentary freak of language, but that it must have had a broad foundation in the consciousness of the apostolic Church. Between the fluid usage of contemporary Judaism and the fixed usage of the apostles and their successors there intervenes the teaching of Jesus. And it seems impossible not to refer to this the impulse which determined the direction of Christian thought upon the subject. The fragments of that teaching which have been preserved for us in the Fourth Gospel (Jn $14^{16ff.\ 26}$ 15^{26} 16^{7-14}) seem to imply a yet fuller context which has been lost; but of themselves they are sufficient to warrant the faith which the Church has evidently held from the first, though as the centuries went on it was compelled to define it with increasing distinctness.

There are two classes of passages in NT relating to the Holy Ghost. On the one hand, there are those of which we have been speaking, where the Third Person (of later theology) is clearly distinguished from the First and Second, and represented as confronting them. And, on the other hand, there are passages in which the Third Person is as closely associated with the First and Second.

The Spirit is repeatedly spoken of as the 'Spirit of God.' And the relationship indicated by this phrase is explained in 1 Co $2^{10f.}$ as analogous to that of the spirit in man. 'For the Spirit searcheth all things, yea, the deep things of God. For who among men knoweth the things of a man, save the spirit of the man which is in him? even so the things of God none knoweth, save the Spirit of God.' But He who is thus described as the 'Spirit of God' is also described as the 'Spirit of Christ.' So notably in Ro $8^{9f.}$ 'But ye are not in the flesh but in the Spirit, if so be that the Spirit of God dwelleth in you. But if any man hath not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his. And if Christ is in you,' etc. Here 'Christ' takes up the 'Spirit of Christ,' and that, again, takes up the 'Spirit of God' (defined a little later as the 'Spirit of Him that raised up Jesus from the dead') in such a way as to show that, at least for the purpose of the writer, the three terms are convertible. Nor is this the only place in which we read of the 'Spirit of Christ' (cf. 1 P 1^{11}), or 'of Jesus' (Ac 16^{7} RV), or 'of Jesus Christ' (Ph 1^{19}), or 'of [the] Son' (Gal 4^{6}), or 'of the Lord' (=Christ, 2 Co 3^{17}).

Again, we have to remember that the conception of the incarnate Christ is referred to the direct operation of the Holy Ghost (Lk 1^{35}), and that His endowment with the fulness of divine power for His ministry is also dated from the descent of the Holy Ghost at His baptism. This is the 'anointing with the Holy Ghost' of Ac 10^{38} as the sequel to which He is 'full of the Holy Spirit' (Lk 4^{1}), and acts through the Holy Spirit (Mt 12^{28}, Ac 1^{2}, He 9^{14}); He also communicated the Holy Spirit to the apostles (Jn 20^{22}).

There is thus another side to the mystery of the Triune God. Although in one sense Three, He is in another no less One. There is such a mutual interaction, such a fundamental unity, as prevents distinction from amounting to separation. The Three Persons are not three individuals. There are not three Gods, but One God.

This is the evident drift of the data which NT has handed down to us; and it is to these data that the later theology has sought to do justice. They find their most complete and ripest interpretation in the balanced clauses of the Quicumque. Those clauses are, no doubt, relative to the line of thought which leads up to them. Compared to some aspects of the biblical teaching, they will appear secondary where this is primary. It is more important for the great mass of Christians to have it brought home to them that God is love, that the proof of His love is the incarnation and death of His Son, and that He does impart of His own righteousness to men, than that (e.g.) the Son is 'not made nor created, but begotten.' But the significance of this latter proposition is that Christ is truly Son. And the question whether He is truly or only figuratively Son is a vital question, as vital now as it was in the days of Nicæa or Chalcedon. The question was quite sure to be raised, and, being raised, it has to be answered. The phrasing of the answer may vary with the philosophy of the time, but its substance cannot be any other than that which has been so deliberately adopted and ratified.

LITERATURE.—No considerable monograph on the doctrine of God as Triune has appeared since Baur's Die christliche Lehre von der Dreieinigkeit u. Menschwerdung Gottes, 3 vols., Tübingen, 1841–1843, and G. A. Meier, Die Lehre von der Trinität in ihrer historischen Entwickelung, 2 vols., Hamburg u. Gotha, 1844. A thorough discussion of the beginnings of the doctrine in English is still a desideratum. There is an instructive chapter on the Holy Spirit in Milligan, The Ascension of Our Lord (1892), pp. 166–226. [The literature on the previous sections of this art. has been given under each section].

W. SANDAY.

GOD, CHILDREN (SONS, DAUGHTERS) OF, are biblical phrases for near and blessed relations to God, but used with various applications and meanings. In NT the words 'children' (τέκνα) and 'sons' (υἱοί) are distinguishable in meaning: the former, in which the idea of origin is most prominent, is the favourite expression of St. John; while the latter, emphasizing rather the notion of relation and privilege, is the one used by St. Paul. But even in NT the distinction is not an absolute one; and in OT, though both ideas are found, the words are not definitely marked off.

It is therefore advisable to consider both phrases together, while marking their various shades of meaning: and their significance may best be understood by examining the places where they occur, as nearly as possible in their historical order.

A. IN THE OT.—In OT this cannot be done with certainty, because of the doubts and differences of opinion among scholars as to the dates of many of its books. But a pretty sure starting-point can be found in the Bk. of Hosea, the date of which, in the reign of Jeroboam II. of Israel, is universally admitted. In this prophecy the relation of Israel to God is depicted, first, as that of a wife to her husband (chs. 1–3). This describes the nation or land as a whole, and individual Israelites are represented as her children, who as born to God are children of God. The unfaithful wife is repudiated (2^{2}); but when led to repentance, as described in that parable (2^{6-23}), so wonderfully parallel to our Lord's of the Prodigal Son, she again obtains mercy, and is once more the people of God ($2^{1.\ 23}$). In anticipation of that blessed restoration, it had been declared (1^{10}) that the children of Israel would be called 'sons of the living God.' They are so named as born of her whose husband is J", i.e. who is in covenant with God.

So, when the same figure of the conjugal relation of God to Israel is used by Ezk, the actual children of the nation are called God's children for the same reason (Ezk $16^{20.\ 21}$ 'thy sons and thy daughters whom thou hast borne unto me . . . my children,' 23^{37} 'their sons whom they bare unto me'). In these and similar passages, the notion of birth or origin is evidently the prominent one; and in Ezk 16^{21}, though the Heb. word is 'sons' as in the preceding verse, the LXX like the EV have rendered it by τέκνα, 'children.' As thus conceived, to be children of God is the same thing as to be born members of the nation or community that is in covenant with God. This notion of being God's children may probably be traced in the words of the Pharisees to Jesus, 'We were not born of fornication; we have one Father, even God' (Jn 8^{41}), i.e. we are members of a people in covenant with God and true to him.

But Hosea also gives another conception of Israel's relation to God in 11^{1} 'When Israel was a child, then I loved him, and called my son out of Egypt.' With this must be taken Ex $4^{22.\ 23}$, where God says to Pharaoh, 'Isr. is my son, my firstborn: and I have said unto thee, Let my son go that he may serve me; and thou hast refused to let him go: behold, I will slay thy son, thy firstborn.' Here 'my son'='my people' in God's previous words to Moses; and there is no emphasis on the idea of birth or origin; for 'firstborn' evidently conveys the notion simply of most precious or beloved, as in Zec 12^{10}. It is the relation of Israel to God, and the value God puts on him, that is indicated: and so appropriately 'son,' not 'child,' is the word employed. The context that follows in Hos $11^{3.\ 4}$ shows that fatherly training and teaching are included in the notion, and in $^{8.\ 9}$ fatherly pity and love. But throughout it is the people as a whole that is here called God's son. The relation that was before depicted as that of a wife to her husband, is now spoken of as that of a son to his father.

These two figures are still more closely connected in the first great discourse of Jer (chs. 2. 3), where the fundamental idea is that Israel has been J"'s unfaithful wife, while yet on her repentance she is invited to say, 'My father, thou art the guide (or companion) of my youth' (Jer 3^{4}). The phrase, 'guide, companion, or friend of youth,' is used in Pr 2^{17} for a husband, and prob. that is its significance also in Jer 3^{4}; and the employment of the words 'my father,' as parallel, is not unnatural in a state of society when the head of the house stood almost in the same relation to his wife as to his children. In Jer 3^{14} 'Return, O backsliding children, saith the Lord, for I am a husband unto you: and I will take you one of a city, and two of a family, and I will bring you to Zion,' we have the people as a whole viewed as J"'s wife, and its members as his children; and so also in vv.$^{19.\ 20.\ 22}$. But here the Israelites are called children of God, not, as in Hos and Ezk, simply as born of the people which is J"'s wife, but as taken by him one by one, and returning to him with personal repentance. The idea of physical origin has passed away, and the notions connected with sonship seem to be mainly divine pardon, protection, and inheritance.

This whole passage also shows how the figure of God's marriage to Israel served an important purpose, in elevating the notion of the relationship from a merely physical to a moral and spiritual one. The heathen peoples, esp. in the Semitic race, conceived themselves as children of the deity in a grossly physical sense, as appears even here (Jer 2^{27} 'which say to a stock, Thou art my father; and to a stone, Thou hast begotten me'). The conjugal relation, as founded, not on nature, but on a covenant of love, involving duties and responsibilities, gave a foundation for the moral appeals of the prophets, and made possible such a transition as we see in Jeremiah's teaching, to a higher view of sonship to God as an individual privilege.

A similar and perhaps more direct transition, from the collective to the individual relation, is made in Dt 14^{1} 'Ye are the children of (lit. sons to) the LORD your God . . .,' v.^{2} 'For thou art an holy people unto the LORD thy God, and the Lord hath chosen thee to be a peculiar people (i.e. a people of his own possession), above all peoples that are on the face of the earth.' Here sonship is ascribed to the Israelites individually on the ground that the people as a whole is holy, i.e. separated to God by his special choice of them to be his own possession (see Ex $19^{5.\ 6}$). The notion of birth or origin is here entirely absent, and that of privilege and corresponding duty is the one conveyed by the name 'sons of God.'

Dt also contains a passage remarkably rich in ref. to the sonship of Isr. in the song ascribed to Moses in ch. 32. Here God is called the people's Father because he bought, made, and established it (vv.$^{6.\ 15}$), begat, gave birth to (v.^{18}), led and nourished it (vv.$^{10-14}$). These expressions refer to the divine action in forming Israel into a nation by delivering it from Egypt and training it in the wilderness. On the ground of this, the individual Israelites are called 'his sons and his daughters' (v.^{19}), 'children' (v.^{20}); and they are blamed for their provocation. But it is indicated that they who deal corruptly with God are not his children (v.^{5}), and that God will take others to be his people so as to provoke them to jealousy (v.^{21}), while the nations are called to rejoice with (or as being) his people (v.^{43}). Here we see distinctly a moral significance attached to the title 'sons' or 'children of God.' Though it belongs properly to Israelites, it is forfeited by them if they are not faithful to God, and it may be given to men of other nations as well. Hence it is sometimes given specially to the godly, as in Ps 73^{15} 'the generation of thy children'; Pr 14^{26} 'In the fear of the Lord is strong confidence; and his children shall have a place of refuge.' See also the comparison in Ps 103^{13}. On the other hand, the privilege is ascribed to Gentiles, especially in the prophecies of their calling in the later book of Isaiah. God still calls Israelites 'my sons' (Is 45^{11}), because they are sons of Zion (49^{17}), who has been married to J" though put away for a time (50^{1} and 54). But she is to receive children of whom she shall say, 'Who hath borne me these?' (49^{21}), i.e. God and his Church are to have people from among the Gentiles sharing the blessings of Israel and enhancing her glory. Or, if those unexpected children are merely the exiled and forgotten Israelites, their sonship is now entirely independent of physical descent. 'For,' they say, 'thou art our Father, though Abraham knoweth us not, and Israel doth not acknowledge us: thou, O Lord, art our Father; our Redeemer from everlasting is thy name' (Is 63^{16}, cf. 64^{8} 65^{1} 66^{19-21}). Even if sonship is not here directly extended to the Gentiles, the principle is laid down which implies that. But it is not on the ground of nature or creation that this is done, but expressly on that of redemption and grace, only a redemption not merely external and national, like that of Israel from Egypt, but spiritual and therefore universal.

In Mal 1^{6}, J″, appealing specially to the priests, calls himself a father and a master, as looking for the honour and fear given to earthly fathers and masters. In ch. 2^{10} the prophet asks, 'Have we not all one Father? hath not one God created us?' as a basis for a rebuke to the Jews for marrying heathen wives, v.^{11} 'Judah hath profaned the holiness of the Lord which he loveth, and hath married the daughter of a strange god.' Here plainly the fatherhood is not conceived as extending to all men, and the creation spoken of is the formation of Israel as a nation, as in Is 43^{1} 44^{2} and elsewhere. In the time of Malachi it was necessary to insist on the separation of the restored Jewish community from the surrounding idolaters, and he makes no mention of the calling of the Gentiles. But he indicates (ch. $3^{16.\ 17}$) that the true children of God are they that fear him, of whom the Lord says, 'I will spare them as a man spareth his own son that serveth him.'

Thus the OT affords a rich variety of statements about sonship to God as ascribed to men, which seem to exhibit successive stages in a development and elevation of the idea. (1) From the first it appears to be raised above the gross physical notion by the conception of it as origin from the people that is married to J″. Then (2) it is conceived as being members of the people that J″ has created as his son; (3) as being taught and trained by J″ as a father; and (4) as not constituted by mere natural descent, but by the fear of the Lord, and so possible for those who are not by birth members of the people of Israel.

Before proceeding to consider how this line of teaching is completed by Christ and his apostles, it will be proper to refer to a few passages in OT where the name 'sons of God' is given apparently to superhuman beings. In Job 38^{7}, where J″ challenges Job for ignorance of his wonderful works, he describes the creation of the world as being, 'When the morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy.' The parallel seems to be similar to the usage by which the hosts of God denote sometimes the stars and sometimes the angels: and since in Job 1^{6} and 2^{1} Satan, undoubtedly conceived as a superhuman spirit, is described as presenting himself among the sons of God, it is probable that in all these places the name is given to angels, and is used to indicate their nature, as the more common name 'angels' still retained its original reference to their office as messengers of God. It would indicate beings akin to God as being spiritual and superhuman, though derived from and inferior to the Creator. They are also called his 'holy ones' (Dt 33^{2}, Ps 89^{5}), and his 'hosts' (Ps 103^{21} etc.). In Ps 29^{1} and 89^{6} 'sons of the mighty' should prob. be rendered 'sons of God' or 'of gods,' but it is not a usual form of the name when used of the true God. The phrase is sometimes used in the way in which in Heb. 'son of man' is simply 'man,' 'son of oil' = fruitful, 'sons of flame' = sparks; and as in early times the Israelites did not doubt the existence of the deities of the nations around them, they called them gods (e.g. Ex 15^{11}), which was afterwards softened into 'sons of God,' or 'of gods' (Ps 89^{6}), and then into 'angels of God' (as in LXX Ps $97^{7.\ 9}$).

The passage in Gn 6^{1-4} has been variously understood from very early times, and no interpretation is free from difficulty, but modern scholarship inclines to the view that by 'sons of God' are meant angels.

In Ps $82^{1.\ 6}$ 'sons of the Most High' is synonymous with 'gods,' and is applied to rulers and judges in the congregation of God as invested by him with power, and called to rule in his name.

B. IN THE NT.—As the Bible contains no distinct doctrine about angels, it is impossible to form any definite conception of the relation implied in the name 'sons of God' given to them in OT, esp. as the usage is not followed out in NT, where in the Ep. to Hebrews it is denied that God ever gave the name 'my son' personally to any of the angels, that being the more excellent name obtained by him who is the effulgence of God's glory and the very image of his substance (He 1^{3-5}).

1. THE TEACHING OF JESUS.—While keeping silence as to the sonship of angels, Jesus and his apostles have much to say as to the truth and blessedness of men being sons or children of God. In the teaching of our Lord himself the fatherhood of God occupies a very large place, and is far more fully exhibited than in OT. Jesus came to reveal God, and the name in which he summed up his disclosure of his character was 'the Father.' He is the Father by way of eminence as being full of love, pity, and kindness, such as Jesus himself showed in his own person. And this love extended to the most unworthy and sinful, and to Gentiles who were outside the commonwealth of Israel. Thus it is assumed in Christ's teaching that the blessing of being sons of God is not limited to the Jewish nation, though that is nowhere expressly said, and though Jesus declares that such prayers as the Gentiles offer are not to be made by those who know God as their Father in heaven (Mt $6^{7.\ 8}$). To be called sons of God is one of the blessings of the kingdom of God which he proclaimed, promised to its members, esp. as peace-makers and as loving their enemies (Mt $5^{9.\ 45-48}$). As that kingdom is to be open to all nations (Mt 8^{11}), and to men simply as sinners (Mt $9^{12.\ 13}$), it is free to all or any to be sons of God, and in that aspect his Fatherhood may be called universal; he has a fatherly heart towards all men, loves and pities all, and freely forgives the most sinful when they return to him. This is the lesson of the Parable of the Prodigal Son (Lk 15), and it is a most gracious and blessed one. In order to be entitled to call God our Father we need no other warrant than that we are sinners, willing to confess our sin and ask his forgiveness.

The blessings of being sons of God acc. to Jesus' teaching are forgiveness and gracious reception when we come to God as penitents; the assurance that God will hear our prayers, and give us good things when we ask him (Mt 7^{11}); that he cares for our welfare, and that we can trust him to provide for all our earthly needs, so that without anxiety about these we may make it our great aim to be like him (Mt 6^{31-34}); the Spirit of our Father to speak in and through us when we are called to speak for Christ (Mt $10^{19.\ 20}$); and, finally, the full enjoyment of the kingdom (Lk 12^{32}, Mt 25^{31}).

Jesus always uses the term 'sons,' not 'children,' of God, thus directing our attention to the nature of the relation rather than to the origination of it. His main teaching is that we stand to God in a relationship in which we can trust him as loving us and caring for our soul's welfare, and can speak to him with freedom and confidence. Plainly, too, this is a personal and individual relation. We have such privileges each for ourselves, and not merely as members of any nation or community.

At the same time, Jesus teaches that this relation of sonship to God is connected with his own person, and to be enjoyed through him. He claimed for himself a peculiar sonship, speaking of God as 'my Father' in a way that, according to Jn 5^{18}, exposed him to a charge of blasphemy for making himself equal with God; and he made our entering the kingdom of God depend on our not only calling him Lord, but doing the will of his Father in heaven (Mt 7^{21}), and that is the same as doing his words (ib. ^{24}). He declared that no one knew the Father but the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son wills to reveal him (Mt 11^{27}); and he revealed the Father, not only by his words, but by his whole character and life. Hence he invited the weary and heavy-laden to come to him and learn of him, and this was his call in general to all who would enter the kingdom of God. He desired men to see in his own person and life what real sonship to God was, what childlike trust, what loving obedience, what zeal for his Father's honour and patient submission to his will it involved, and what rest and peace it brought with it. Into this blessedness he desires to bring men, and he recognizes those who will do the will of his Father in heaven as his brethren (Mt 12^{50}). They are sons of God through him and with him. Their follow ing him implies a renouncing of earthly goods and even of life itself, such as is impossible to man and possible only to God (Mk 10^{27}). Hence to enter the kingdom of God requires a conversion and becoming as little children, which in Jn $3^{3.5}$ Jesus calls being begotten anew of the Spirit.

Thus our Lord's teaching about sonship to God, though it is entirely of a practical religious character rather than scientific and theological, yet involves as its basis two ideas that he could not in his earthly life fully develop. One is that true sonship to God is a participation of his own unique relation to the Father, which is the archetype of all filial relationship to God, and the other is that it becomes ours through the impartation of a new life from God, in the strength of which we are enabled to renounce our own self-centred life. The former of these ideas is suggested by the fact that while Jesus habitually calls God his own Father, he as expressly calls those his brethren, whom he teaches to address God as 'our Father.' This shows that though he (e.g. Jn 20^{17}) makes the distinction between his own relation to God expressed in 'my Father,' and ours expressed by 'your Father,' he does not mean that God is our Father in a quite different sense from that in which he is his, for in that case we would be only nominally and not really his brethren; but he would intimate that while his Sonship is indeed unique as being original and absolutely perfect, we partake of it through him. But this could not be fully explained as long as the truth about his own person could not be clearly revealed.

The other idea is implied in Jesus' teaching that God's sons are those who trust him and are like him, and that for us this implies a great change of mind and heart, a turning our back on our worldly selves, such as can be effected only under the influence of a power from God. But this, too, could not be made plain till the coming of the Spirit, whom Jesus promised to complete his teaching.

The outcome of that teaching is to be seen in the apostolic Epistles, and in these we find the former idea developed more especially by St. Paul and the latter by St. John.

2. The Teaching of Paul.—St. Paul views Christianity chiefly in its bearing on the personal relation between man and God. Apart from the salvation of Christ, that relation is that of a transgressor of the eternal moral law to the righteous Lawgiver and Judge, hence it is a state of condemnation and death. From that he is redeemed by the propitiation which consists in the obedience and sacrifice of Christ the Son of God. The truth that our Redeemer is God's own beloved Son is repeatedly emphasized in connexion with his sacrifice as enhancing the love of God and the self-emptying grace of our Lord; and St. Paul undoubtedly regarded Christ's Sonship as not merely an official or Messianic, but a pre-existent and eternal relation to God. But in his view Jesus' death is our redemption only in virtue of our being one with him in it by faith, so that by it we die to sin and to the law, and are freed from its curse. Since, then, we are redeemed from our natural state of condemnation as sinners by dying in and with the Son of God, who loved us and gave himself for us; since we live now only in him, our relation to God is henceforth the same as his, we are sons of God in Christ Jesus, because by faith, sealed in baptism, we have put on Christ (Ga' $3^{26.27}$). It has been questioned whether here and in Ro 6^3, where St. Paul uses the limiting (?) pronoun 'as many as' and the phrase 'baptized into Christ,' instead of the usual one 'baptized into the name of Christ,' he refers to the outward rite of water baptism at all, and not rather to the inward washing from sins by real union to the Saviour. Most commentators, however, consider that there is no reasonable doubt that by baptism into Christ he means the sacrament. But if this be so, the apostle certainly assumes that it was received in faith and sealed a real union to Christ, which is the ground of our sonship.

The sonship of believers in Christ, St. Paul connects with the OT view of the Israelites being God's sons in virtue of the covenant and promise to Abraham (Gal 3^{29}), and he proceeds to explain the special privileges brought by Christ by comparing the position of Israel under the law to that of children under age, who, though really sons and heirs, have not practically more liberty than servants, but are under guardians and stewards by whom they are governed and their property is managed. So God's children, before Christ came, being immature, were in subjection to what St. Paul calls 'the rudiments of the world,' i.e. elementary teaching by precepts relating to outward things, such as meats, times, and seasons. But it is remarkable that the apostle speaks of the Gentiles also as in their heathen state having been under such rudiments (Gal $4^{3.9}$), so that we may infer that he recognized a certain divine training even of them, as elsewhere he speaks of them being a law to themselves (Ro 2^{14-16}). He views Christ's coming and work both as giving sonship to those who were only servants, and also as giving full filial rights to those who were children under age. But not as if it were the former only to Gentiles and the latter to Jews as such; but that it was a real gift of sonship to all, whether Jews or Gentiles, who were without God; and to all who were really seeking him, in whatever nation, though they might be very immature in their spiritual life, it was the bestowal of the full privileges of sons of full age having free and direct access to God as their Father. This view is in accordance with the highest conception attained in the OT, that in Deutero-Isaiah from which and other prophetic Scriptures St. Paul quotes in his discussion of the relations between Israel and the Gentiles in Ro 9–11.

In order to bring out the privilege of being made sons of God, St. Paul employs the notion of adoption as recognized in the Roman law. See Adoption.

Among the privileges flowing from sonship in Christ he mentions the bestowal of the Spirit, as the Spirit of God's Son, or of adoption, who cries in us, i.e. moves us to cry, 'Abba, Father' (Gal 4^6, Ro 8^{15}), and with this is connected the access we have with boldness to God as our Father (Eph 2^{18} 3^{12}). Another benefit flowing from sonship is the inheritance which we have in and with Christ (Gal $3^{26.29}$ 4^7, Ro 8^{17}). This means that the glory that is to be revealed is as sure to us as if we had a right to it in strict law, and at the same time is the free gift of the Father's love. In connexion with this St. Paul develops the idea that believers in Christ, though poor, afflicted, and persecuted in this world, yet really have the Messianic blessings promised in the OT as those of the kingdom of God, because they can rejoice in their tribulations, since these are means of their perfection, and are inconsiderable in view of the promised glory (Ro 5^{3-11} 8^{18-36}, 2 Co 4^{16}–5^9). The further notion that afflictions are chastisements sent by God in love, and for our real and truest good, is expressed in the Ep. to Hebrews (12^{5-11}) as a special blessing of God's children more distinctly than in the Pauline Epistles. For St. Paul does not conceive our relation to God as that of young children needing discipline, but rather as that of sons of full age in a relation of freedom and love to our heavenly Father. Hence he is not fond of the expression children (τέκνα) unless when the form of his argument from OT leads him to use it, as in Ro 9[7. 8]. So, too, he does not use the idea of our being begotten anew of the Spirit to describe the beginning of Christian life; he conceives it rather as a new creation or a raising from death. In Tit 3[5] the word 'regeneration' is not the common expression for what is generally so called, and it is not certain that it refers to the new birth of individuals.

3. The Teaching in Hebrews. — Here again the notion of children is more prominent than that of sons, and the idea in ch. 12 is the position of young children needing education and chastisement. This writer also has in view the beginning of the relation in a birth rather than in adoption, for he calls God the Father of spirits in contrast with the fathers of our flesh (12[9]). It is unnatural to suppose that he meant by these words to teach the philosophical doctrine that men derive from their earthly parents only their bodies, and their spirits directly from God. Whether this be true or not, the idea of the writer was manifestly the religious one, that while our relation to our earthly parents is physical, our relation as children to God is spiritual. But that he does not conceive this relation as a universal one, is plain from the fact that he speaks of the possibility of being without chastisement, and so being bastards and not sons (v.[8]), here using the Pauline term for the relation.

There is one utterance of St. Paul, in his speech at Athens (Ac 17[28. 29]), where he says of all men as such that they are the offspring (γένος) of God, because he has made us with the purpose that we shall know him; he is not far from any one of us, since in him we live and move and have our being. This relation is clearly not the same as that which the apostle in his Epistles ascribes to Christians when he says they are sons of God through faith in Jesus Christ. It does not include the blessings of freedom, of the spirit of adoption, or of being heirs of God. Hence, if this universal relation is to be called sonship, it must be clearly distinguished from that Christian sonship of which he speaks most frequently and most fully. But if it be considered that St. Paul does not use the word 'sons' (vioi), but the more indefinite one 'offspring' (γένος), that he borrows this from a Greek poet, and that the only use that he makes of the statement is to show that since we are so like God it is foolish to think that the Deity can be represented by material images, it cannot but appear very precarious to infer from this expression that St. Paul would say that all men are sons of God, or that the relation that is formed by our creation in God's image deserves to be called sonship. He does indeed teach that all things were created through and in the Son of God, who appeared on earth as Jesus Christ (Col 1[15-17]); and he declares in the warmest and most glowing language the love and kindness, goodness and patience of God towards all men, seeking to lead them to repentance. If we think that these truths are fairly expressed by saying that God is the Father of all men, and they his sons, we may, on our own responsibility, use these phrases; but we should remember that St. Paul does not use them in such a sense, but means by being sons of God something far more blessed.

The Palestinian apostles do not use the Pauline term 'adoption'; but they describe in different ways how men are made 'children' of God, employing that word rather than 'sons,' because they emphasize the spiritual birth by which we are renewed.

4. The Teaching of James.—In the Ep. of James (1[17]) God is called the Father of lights, from whom cometh down every good giving and every perfect boon, and to whom must not be attributed any temptation to sin, because he is unchangeable in goodness. Then it is added: 'Of his own will he brought us forth by the word of truth, that we should be a kind of first-fruits of his creatures' (1[18]). The 'we' here are clearly those who, as afterwards said, have 'the implanted word,' which is able to save their souls (1[21]). This reminds us of Jesus' Parable of the Sower and the Seed, where the word of the kingdom is compared to seed having a living power of germination and producing new life, and the fruit of the good seed is said to be the sons of the kingdom (Mt 13[38]), in opposition to the sons of the evil one. In Ja 1[27] God is called the Father absolutely, to show that he is truly and purely worshipped by visiting the widows and fatherless in their affliction; and in 3[9], where is exposed the inconsistency of blessing God while we curse men, God is called the Lord and Father; but, as if to leave no doubt that all men are included, they are described, not as children of God, but as made after the similitude of God. It is maintained by many that since all men are made in God's image, and cared for by him with infinite goodness and love, they are all his children; and if they think it best to use the phrase in that sense, no one can object to their doing so, and the thing meant is most certainly taught in Scripture; but it does not appear that the apostles called it by the name of sonship, and it does appear that they described believers as sons of God in a higher sense because born again by his word and Spirit.

5. The Teaching of Peter.—In 1 P 1[3] it is said that 'the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, according to his great mercy, begat us again to a living hope by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead, into an inheritance incorruptible, undefiled, and unfading, reserved in the heavens for us.' This by itself might be merely a rhetorical way of saying that the historical fact of Jesus being raised to life after his death and burial awakened in the souls of his followers a hope of immortal blessedness that made them practically new men, animating them with new life. But when we read further on in the same chapter (1 P 1[23]), 'having been begotten again, not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible, through the word of God which liveth and abideth for ever,' we can hardly doubt that the apostle means to describe a change that is wrought, not merely by the impression made by an event even as great and important as the resurrection of Christ, but by an influence working directly on our souls, and making us, as afterwards described (2[2]), as newborn babes in our religious life and relation to God. This corresponds to what Jesus taught of the need of being turned, so as to become as little children (Mt 18[3]), as well as of being begotten of the Spirit (Jn 3[3-8]). It seems, therefore, to be in ref. to this new birth that St. Peter speaks of Christians calling God, the impartial Judge, Father (1 P 1[17]), not as in the AV, 'if ye call on the Father,' but 'if ye call him Father who without respect of persons judgeth according to every man's work.' It is plainly not all men by whom God is to be addressed as Father, but believers in virtue of their having been begotten again. So, too, they are called to show themselves obedient children (1[14]), or children of obedience. Throughout, the idea of birth is the prominent one, rather than that of the relation and privileges of sons. These are not developed as they are by St. Paul and by the writer to the Heb., the only one specially mentioned being the inheritance (1 P 1[4]). It is in harmony with this conception of believers being children of God because born or begotten of him, that in 2 P 1[4] they are said to become partakers of the divine nature. Also we may observe that in 1 P God is distinctively called the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ (1[3]), and the notion of our being in Christ and dying with him to sin is also in the writer's mind (2[24] 4[1]). The opening sentence is formed after the pattern of that of the Ep. to the Eph.; but while St. Paul blesses God because he has foreordained us to adoption (Eph 1[4]), St. Peter seems to have expressed the same idea of sonship by divine gift, in the more concrete form of a begetting.

6. The Teaching of John.—The teaching of St. John on this subject combines the elements of the Pauline and Petrine, though it is more akin to the latter, and uses the term 'children' rather than sons of God. The keynote to it may be found in the Prologue to the Gospel (1[12, 13]), 'to as many as received him (the Logos) he gave the right to become children of God, even to them that believe on his name: which were begotten, not of blood nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God.' Here we have the right to become children of God bestowed by Christ, which answers to St. Paul's statement, 'God sent forth his Son . . . that we might receive the adoption of sons.' The word 'adoption' is not employed; but the right to become children expresses the same thing in less technical language. Further, this is said to be given to those who receive Christ by believing on his name. St. Paul had also written, 'Ye are all sons of God by faith in Jesus Christ; for as many of you as have been baptized into Christ have put on Christ' (Gal 3[26f.]). Thus for St. John, as well as for St. Paul, our sonship to God is through union to Christ the only-begotten Son, and that union is effected by faith.

But St. John adds to this the conception found in St. James and St. Peter of a birth or begetting of God, which he emphatically distinguishes from the natural birth in every aspect of it. Those who believe in Christ's name are they who were begotten of God; and that this is not done by the process of natural generation is shown by a threefold contrast: not of blood, i.e. they did not become sons of God through or in virtue of their being of the one blood of which God has made all mankind. Neither was it by any movement or impulse of their own nature, whether the spontaneous tendencies of its animal faculties ('the will of the flesh'), or even the voluntary acts of personality ('the will of man'). The contrast is more briefly and pointedly expressed in our Lord's discourse with Nicodemus as between being begotten of the flesh and of the Spirit (Jn 3[6]). St. John seems to conceive the Divine Spirit as a principle or power of life and holiness proceeding from God, given to Jesus Christ in all its fulness and by him communicated to his disciples. It is not unworthy of notice that Iren. and Tertull. apply Jn 1[13] to Christ, apparently reading the verb in the singular ('who was born'); and though that reading is only found in some Lat. MSS and cannot be received, yet in 1 Jn 5[18] our Lord, according to the most natural interpretation, is called 'he that was begotten of God.'

St. John seems chiefly anxious to show that the believer's being a child of God necessarily involves likeness to God in character and life; and hence, while he ascribes this privilege to the wonderful love of the Father (1 Jn 3[1]), and to our being united to Christ by faith (Jn 1[12]), he dwells most fully on the truth that our sonship is due, not merely to the gracious act of adoption by the Father and our being made one with the Son through faith, but also to our receiving a new life from the Spirit of God, which communicates to us that very principle of love which is the essence of God. In 1 Jn 2[29] he says, 'every one that doeth righteousness is begotten of him,' and the uniform usage of the apostle seems to show that he means of God, though it is of Christ that he has been speaking just before. Wherever there is real righteousness in any man it is derived from him who is the archetype and source of all righteousness. Then, after expressing his joyful sense of the greatness of the Father's love and the reality of the sonship that it bestows, he returns to the subject of the inconsistency of that sonship with sin and its inseparable connexion with righteousness, and at 3[9] he says, 'Whosoever is begotten of God doeth no sin, because his seed abideth in him, and he cannot sin because he is begotten of God.' The statement is evidently an ideal one, describing the Christian life in its ultimate perfection when we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is (v.[2]). But it is put in the present, because that perfection is really given in principle and germ to all who are begotten of God even now. The impossibility of their sinning is not to be achieved by any further or additional gift or power, but by the life from God that is given at the first, when it comes to its full maturity. That principle of sinlessness is called the seed of God which abides in his children. This seems to denote a spiritual life derived from God, whereby, as it is put in 2 P 1[4], we become 'partakers of the divine nature'; it is what Jesus indicates when he says, 'That which is born of the Spirit is spirit' (Jn 3[6]). The divine nature acc. to St. John is love (1 Jn 4[8, 16]), and this love is implanted in us when God gives us of his Spirit. So in a spiritual sense our being begotten of God is not a mere metaphor, but a proper statement of what is a real communication of the most essential life of God. But, while giving this high transcendent view of the nature of believers' sonship to God, St. John is careful to insist that its reality must be proved by the practical test of conformity to the moral law in the common affairs of daily life. He does not allow the mystical union with Christ and God to obscure the distinct personal relations between us and God. There is to be a day of judgment, and one of the blessings of the children of God is to have confidence in that day, and not to be ashamed before Christ at his coming. In the present life the relation of the children of God to him as their Father, implies confession of sin and prayer for others as well as themselves, and requires perfect truth and frankness. The blessings of sonship to God are summed up by St. John in the one great idea of eternal life.

The world outside of Christ is described as lying in the evil one (1 Jn 5[19]), of the evil one, children of the devil (3[10]); but Christ is the propitiation for the whole world (2[2]); and as the love of God is manifested in sending his Son to be a propitiation for our sins (4[10]), it is implied that God's fatherly love has a universal aspect, though all men are not really, in St. John's view, God's children.

Literature.—The subject of our sonship to God has not been much discussed until recent times, though it came incidentally into consideration in connexion with the Sonship of Christ, as in Athanasius' Orat. agst. Arians (esp. Or. ii.), and in the systems of theology, as in Calvin's Inst. (I. xiv. 18, II. xiii. 1, III. ii. 23), and practical treatises, as Thomas Goodwin's On the Work of the Holy Ghost. In modern times such writers as F. D. Maurice, F. W. Robertson, etc., have made great use of the idea that all men are children of God, to exclude the doctrine of God's judicial dealings. R. S. Candlish discussed the subject in his Cunningham Lectures on the Fatherhood of God, maintaining that sonship belongs to believers, and is founded on that of Christ. T. J. Crawford in his Fatherhood of God criticised these positions, and maintained a twofold sonship—one universal, founded on Creation, and another special, bestowed on believers in Christ. Another work that appeared at the same time is The Divine Fatherhood, by C. H. H. Wright, taking mainly Dr. Candlish's view. The other side is strongly maintained in A. M. Fairbairn's Christ in Modern Theology.

In these discussions the subject was connected more or less with far-reaching questions of systematic theology, and the notion of sonship to God plays an important part in the Dogmatik of R. A. Lipsius. Its exegetical discussion belongs properly to the Bib. Theol. of the NT, and reference may be made to the works, on that subject, of Schmid, Weiss, Beyschlag, also to Wendt's Teaching of Jesus, and to Bruce's The Kingdom of God and St. Paul's Conception of Christianity. There is a very interesting special study of St. Paul's conception of adoption in relation to Rom. law by W. E. Ball in the Contemp. Rev. Aug. 1891. J. S. CANDLISH.

GOD FORBID.—See FORBID.

GODHEAD.—This word occurs three times in AV. Ac 17[29] 'We ought not to think that the Godhead is like unto gold, or silver, or stone, graven by art and man's device' (Gr. τὸ θεῖον); Ro 1[20] 'For the invisible things of him from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made, even his eternal power and Godhead' (Gr. θειότης); Col 2[9] 'For in him dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily' (Gr. θεότης). In each case the Gr. word is appropriately employed, and the one could not have been used for the other, so that to give 'Godhead' as the tr[n] of them all is most unhappy.

In Ac 17[29] τὸ θεῖον, 'the Divine,' is chosen by St. Paul in his speech to the Athenians as a familiar philosophical expression which enables him to carry their thoughts easily with him. Even they, with scarcely a personal conception of God, ought not to debase their conception to the level of men's handiwork. Hence RVm 'that which is divine' is better than text 'the Godhead,' though 'the Divine' would have been better. Wyc. errs on the other side when he offers 'godly thing' (after Vulg. Divinum). Tindale gave 'godhed,' and was followed by all the Versions except the Rhemish, which has 'the Divinitie,' though 'Godhead' is given as an alternative in the Annotation to the verse. The Gr. expression occurs nowhere else in biblical Greek, though the adj. θεῖος is common in LXX and occurs in 2 P 1[3. 4] (EV 'divine').

Lightfoot (on Col 2[9]) expresses the difference between θειότης and θεότης thus: θειότης is the quality, θεότης the essence of God. The distinction is best seen by observing that θεότης comes from θεός 'God,' while θειότης comes from θεῖος 'Divine.' Therefore Sanday-Headlam (on Ro 1[20]) more happily: θεότης=Divine Personality, θειότης=Divine nature and properties (cf. Bengel [on Col 2[9]]: 'Non modo divinæ virtutes, sed ipsa divina natura,' and see Trench, NT Synonyms, p. 6 ff.). It is at once seen how appropriately St. Paul uses θειότης in Ro 1[20] where he speaks of such attributes of God as can be read in the book of Nature; and how appropriately θεότης in Col 2[9] where he asserts of the Son that in Him dwells the fulness of the entire (revealed and unrevealed) Personality of God. The Latin Versions were forced to use divinitas for both words. But its insufficiency to represent θεότης was early felt, and Augustine says (De Civ. Dei, vii. 1): 'Hanc divinitatem vel, ut sic dixerim, deitatem: nam et hoc verbo uti jam nostros non piget, ut de Græco expressius transferant id quod illi θεότητα appellant.' The same feeling is now finding expression in English, and theologians prefer to speak of the Deity rather than of the Divinity of Christ, since the former word alone gives Him the full Personality of God. The Eng. Versions from Wyclif to AV make no distinction, but use 'Godhead' at both places, except that the Rhem. NT has 'Divinitie' at Ro 1[20]. Yet Beza (on Col 2[9]) had shown the distinction: 'Non dicit, τὴν θειότητα, id est divinitatem, sed τὴν θεότητα, id est deitatem.' Luther also was content with 'Gottheit' for both words; but De Wette gives 'Göttlichkeit' for θειότης; while Weizsäcker gives 'Gottesgüte.' RV has 'divinity,' retaining 'Godhead' for θεότης.

Each word occurs once only in NT. Nor is θειότης found in LXX, and θειότης only once, Wis 18[9] (καὶ τὸν τῆς θειότητος νόμον ἐν ὁμονοίᾳ διέθεντο, AV 'and with one consent made a holy law,' AVm 'or a covenant of God or league,' RV 'and with one consent they took upon themselves the covenant of the divine law,' RVm 'Gr. law of divineness'). On this Westcott (Lessons of the RV of NT, p. 111 f.) draws attention to 'the care taken by the Revisers to represent words of a single occurrence in the original by words of single occurrence in the Eng. version.' Besides 'divinity' in Ro 1[20] for θειότης and 'Godhead' (for which he seems to prefer 'deity') in Col 2[9] for θειότης, he mentions 'apparition' for φάντασμα Mt 14[26], Mk 6[49]; 'awe' for δέος He 12[28]; 'billows' for σάλος Lk 21[25]; 'concealed' for παρακαλύπτεσθαι Lk 9[45]; 'conduct' for ἀγωγή 2 Ti 3[10]; 'confute' for διακατελέγχεσθαι Ac 18[28]; 'demeanour' for κατάστημα Tit 2[3]; 'discipline' for σωφρονισμός 2 Ti 1[7]; 'disrepute' for ἀτελεσμός Ac 19[27]; 'effulgence' for ἀπαύγασμα He 1[3]; 'goal' for σκοπός Ph 3[14]; 'impostor' for γόης 2 Ti 3[13]; 'to interpose' for μεσιτεύειν He 6[17]; 'justice' for ἡ Δίκη Ac 28[4]; 'to moor' for προσορμίζεσθαι Mk 6[53]; 'sacred' for ἱερός 1 Co 9[13], 2 Ti 3[15]; 'to shudder' for φρίσσειν Ja 2[19]; 'stupor' for κατάνυξις Ro 11[8]; 'to train' for σωφρονίζειν Tit 2[4]; 'tranquil' for ἥρεμος 1 Ti 2[2]; 'undressed' for ἄγναφος Mt 9[16], Mk 2[21]; and 'without self-control' for ἀκρατής 2 Ti 3[3].

In modern English the word 'Godhead' is mostly confined to a neuter sense, as if it were the proper tr[n] of τὸ θεῖον, and of that alone. In older English it was a synonym for 'divinity,' which, as we have seen, was not distinguished, as it is scarcely distinguished yet, from 'deity.' The Rhem. NT has the marg. note to Jn 6[66] 'Heretikes beleeve not the real presence because they see bread and wine, as the Jewes believed not his Godhead because of the shape of a poore man.' Tindale (Works, i. 200) speaks ironically of 'the Pope's godhead.' And Chaucer (Knightes Tale, 1523) uses the word as a syn. for 'deity'—

> 'If so be that my youthe may deserve,
> And that my might be worthy for to serve
> Thy godhede, that I may been oon of thyne,
> Than preye I thee to rewe upon my pyne.'

GODLESS.—This word is found but once in AV, 2 Mac 7[34] 'O godless man'; Gr. ὦ ἀνόσιε; RV 'O unholy man,' as EV translate the same adj. in 1 Ti 1[9], 2 Ti 3[2], its only occurrences in NT.

But RV has given 'godless' as the tr[n] of חָנֵף ḥânêph, in preference to AV 'hypocrite' in Job 8[13] 13[16] 15[34] 17[8] 20[5] 27[8] 34[30] 36[13], Pr 11[9], Is 33[14]; and the same translation might have been given in the three remaining passages: Is 9[17] (AV 'hypocrite'); 10[6], Ps 35[16] (AV 'hypocritical'), where, however, RV gives 'profane.' For there is no doubt that 'hypocrite,' though it is the tr[n] of all the versions since Wyclif, misses the meaning. The verb is used in the Qal in the sense of 'be polluted,' whether of land (Is 24[5], Jer 3[1], Ps 106[38] so tr[d] in EV, except Is 24[5] AV 'defile,' but Mic 4[11] of Zion, EV 'defile') or of persons (Jer 23[11], EV 'be profane'); and in the Hiphil 'to pollute' of land (Nu 35[33] bis AV 'pollute'—'defile,' Jer 3[2] AV 'pollute,' 3[9] AV 'defile,' RV always 'pollute'), and of persons (Dn 11[32] AV 'corrupt,' RV 'pervert,' RVm 'make profane'). Hence the idea of the adj. is separated from God so as to be openly hostile; not 'hypocritical,' but 'profane,' 'godless.' There are two substantives, each of which occurs once, חֹנֶף Is 32[6] (AV 'hypocrisy,' RV 'profaneness'), and חֹנֶפָה Jer 23[15] (AV 'profaneness,' AVm 'hypocrisy,' RV 'profaneness'). J. HASTINGS.

GODLINESS is in NT the equivalent of the Gr. term εὐσέβεια (1 Ti 2[2] 3[16] 4[7. 8] 6[3. 5. 6. 11], 2 Ti 3[5], Tit 1[1], also Ac 3[12] [RV], 2 P 1[3. 6. 7] 3[11]), except in one passage (1 Ti 2[10]), where θεοσέβεια is used. 'It properly denotes,' says Ellicott, 'only "well-directed reverences"' (Trench, Synon. § 48), but in the NT is practically the same as θεοσέβεια, and is well defined by Tittmann (Synon. i. p. 146) as "vis pietatis in ipsâ vitâ vel externâ vel internâ" (cf Eusebius, Præp. Evang. i. p. 3). Thus, then, εὐσέβεια conveys the idea, not of an "inward, inherent holiness," but, as Alford (on Ac 3^{12}) correctly observes, of an "operative cultive piety"' (Pastoral Epistles, p. 27). The substantive is used by St. Paul only in the Pastoral Epistles; and Pfleiderer (Paulinism, Eng. tr. ii. 210) maintains that in these writings, the Pauline authorship of which he denies, εὐσέβεια takes the place of the Pauline πίστις as 'the fundamental idea of the Christian holy life.' Weiss, however, denies this, and holds that 'as εὐσέβεια occurs along with πίστις (1 Ti 6^{11}), it is clear that it must rather be the basis of life from which true faith springs' (Bib. Theol. of NT, Eng. tr. ii. 129). St. Paul's use of the term 'ungodly' (ἀσεβής), in Ro 4^5 5^6, as descriptive of all mankind apart from Christ, would suggest that the more distinctively Christian sense of the term 'godly' is to be preferred in St. Paul's letters, as equivalent, not to reverence for God generally, but to the Christian feeling towards God as the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ. On the other hand, in Ac $10^{2.7}$ the adjective εὐσεβής, translated 'devout,' is used to describe a man who, though a worshipper of God, was not even a Jewish proselyte. In the Sept. εὐσέβεια is used in some passages (Pr 1^7, Is 11^2) as the equivalent of the phrase 'the fear of the Lord,' but in others θεοσέβεια (Gn 20^{11}, Job 28^{28}). Thoughout the OT man's duty towards God is defined as fearing God (Schultz, OT Theol. Eng. tr. ii. p. 55); and in the 'Wisdom' literature the fear of the Lord (יִרְאַת יְהוָה) is assumed as the fundamental principle of piety and morality (Job 28^{28}, Ps 111^{10}, Pr 1^7 8^{13}, Ec 12^{13}. See Oehler's OT Theol. Eng. tr. ii. p. 446). For the use of the adjective or adverb 'godly' in 2 Ti 3^{12}, Tit 2^{12}, 2 P 2^9 see the following article. Elsewhere in St. Paul's letters the same word is used in AV to render either the genitive θεοῦ (2 Co 1^{12} 11^2, 1 Ti 1^4) or the phrase κατὰ θεὸν (2 Co $7^{9.10.11}$); while in 3 Jn ^{6} 'godly sort' = ἀξίως τοῦ θεοῦ, a use of the adjective which the meaning of the substantive does not warrant; and it is to be regretted that the RV retains this rendering in some passages. It must be added that in some OT passages (Ps 4^3 12^1 32^1) the adjective 'godly' is used to render the Heb. word חָסִיד, which not only describes God's relation to man, but also describes the mutual relations of men (see Cheyne, Hosea, 62 n.); and the use of this word shows that the OT phrase 'the fear of the Lord' does not mean any slavish dread of God, but a reverence which does not exclude love. The NT godliness also means a reverence that includes all the emotions which the revelation of God in Christ inspires. A. E. GARVIE.

GODLY is used both as an adj. and as an adverb. The adj. occurs only four times in OT: (1) thrice as tr^{n} of חָסִיד, which is properly 'kind,' but from the prominence of this quality in God, and in them that are like Him, comes to mean 'pious,' 'godly'; so Ps 4^3 32^6, and as subst. 'the godly man' Ps 12^1; and (2) once as tr^{n} of אֱלֹהִים 'God,' Mal 2^{15} 'a godly seed,' lit., as AVm 'a seed of God.' The proper equivalent of 'godly' in Gr. is εὐσεβής, which in Sirach is one of the characteristics of the 'wise man' (ὁ σοφός), as distinguished from the 'fool' (ὁ μωρός) who is ἀσεβής 'godless'; and in the plur. this practically becomes a subst. equivalent to 'the Wise.' Thus Sir $39^{26.27}$ 'The principal things for the whole use of man's life are water, fire, iron, and salt, flour of wheat, honey, milk, and the blood of the grape, and oil, and clothing. All these things are for good to the godly (τοῖς εὐσεβέσιν); so to the sinners (τοῖς ἁμαρτωλοῖς) they are turned into evil.' This word, which occurs thrice in NT, is only once tr^{d} 'godly,' 2 P 2^9 'The Lord knoweth how to deliver the godly out of temptation' (εὐσεβεῖς); in Ac $10^{2.7}$ it is tr^{d} 'devout' by both AV and RV, the word being applied to Cornelius and to one of his soldiers. The TR gives εὐσεβής in Ac 22^{12} in reference to Ananias, but edd. after the best MSS prefer εὐλαβής, which elsewhere (Lk 2^{25}, Ac 2^5 8^2) is tr^{d} by EV 'devout,' as here. In He 12^{28} the subst. εὐλάβεια is tr^{d} 'godly fear,' for which RV gives 'reverence,' RVm 'godly fear.' But in 5^7 (the only other occurrence of the Greek word) RV tr. ἀπὸ τῆς εὐλαβείας, 'for his godly fear,' AV 'in that he feared.' (See this passage discussed in Expos. Times, vi. 434, 522; vii. 4, 118, 502). In 2 Co 1^{12} 11^2, 1 Ti 1^4 'godly' is the tr^{n} of θεός 'God' (cf. Mal 2^{15} above); thus 2 Co 1^{12} 'in simplicity and godly sincerity' (ἐν ἁπλότητι [edd. ἁγιότητι] καὶ εἰλικρινείᾳ [T WH -ίᾳ] θεοῦ [edd. τοῦ θεοῦ], RV 'in holiness and sincerity of God'); 11^2 'I am jealous over you with godly jealousy' (θεοῦ ζήλῳ, RV 'with a godly jealousy,' RVm 'Gr. a jealousy of God') ; 1 Ti 1^4 'Neither give heed to fables and endless genealogies, which minister questions rather than godly edifying (οἰκοδομίαν) which is in faith' (RV 'a dispensation of God,' οἰκονομίαν θεοῦ, RVm 'a stewardship of God'). The AV of 1611 omits 'godly' from the last passage (evidently by an oversight, for it is found in all the versions from Tindale to the Bishops), and it was not inserted till 1638. Wyc. has 'edificacioun of god,' and Rhem. 'the edifying of God,' after Vulg. 'ædificationem Dei.'* Elsewhere 'godly' as an adj. is the tr^{n} of some attributive phrase in the original. In 2 Co 7^9 'after a godly manner,' 7^{10} 'godly,' and 7^{11} 'after a godly sort,' all represent κατὰ θεὸν 'according to God' as AVm (RV changes 7^9 into 'after a godly sort'); and in 3 Jn ^{6} 'after a godly sort' stands for ἀξίως τοῦ θεοῦ, lit. 'worthily of God,' as RV.

As an adverb 'godly' was once in common use, as Tindale, Pent. 'A prologe' (Mombert's ed. p. 12), 'Every man must worke godly and truly to the uttermoste of the power that god hath geven him: and yet not truste therein'; and Preface to AV, 1611, p. 5, 'The godly-learned were not content to have the Scriptures in the Language which themselves understood.' 'Ungodly' was used in the same way, as Mt 22^6 Tind. 'The remnaunt toke his servantes and intreated them ungodly and slewe them'; and T. Lever, Sermons (Arber's ed. p. 118), 'Do ye not se how that prebendes whiche were godly founded as moste convenient and necessarye lyvyngs for preachers to healp the byshoppes and the persons too enstructe the people, be now ungodly abused to corrupte the byshoppes?' But there was a feeling against using the same form as adj. and adverb. Hence 'godlily' was sometimes used, as Knox, Hist. 136, 'That by his grave counsell, and godly exhortation, he would animate her Majestie constantly to follow that which godlily she had begun'; and sometimes the word was avoided. In Pr. Bk., Collect for Good Friday, 'That every member . . . may truly and godly serve thee' is found in all edd. from 1549 to 1662, but in the Scotch Liturgy 'godly' was changed into 'worthily.' 'Godly' is used as an adv. thrice in AV, 2 Mac 12^{45} 'there was great favour laid up for those that died godly' (μετ' εὐσεβίας, RV 'in godliness,' RVm 'on the side of godliness'); 2 Ti 3^{12}, Tit 2^{12} (εὐσεβῶς). GOEL (AVENGER OF BLOOD).—'Goel' (Heb. גֹּאֵל gô'ēl) is an important technical term of Hebrew jurisprudence. The primary meaning of the root

* For examples of the way in which RV has endeavoured to express this idiom (originally Hebrew) in English, see Westcott, Lessons of RV of NT, p. 32 ff.

גָּאַל is 'to make a claim,' vindicare, in the sense of claiming something that has been lost or forfeited, 'to resume a claim or right which has lapsed' (Driver); hence the goel is etymologically 'the claimant,' vindex, in practice 'the next of kin.' We shall consider the rights and privileges of the goel, (i.) in civil and (ii.) in criminal law.

i. In civil law the following were the chief rights and responsibilities of the goel. (a) When, through stress of circumstances, a Hebrew was compelled to sell part of his patrimony, it was the duty of 'his kinsman that is next to him' (RV)—in ordinary language his next of kin—'to redeem (גאל) that which his brother had sold' (Lv 25^{25}). This duty is in accordance with one of the fundamental ideas at the basis of the Hebrew law of real estate, by which land was the inalienable property of the clan (מִשְׁפָּחָה). According to the priestly legislation, indeed, the clan or tribe was in its turn the feudatory of J", from whom, as the real owner of the soil, the land was held in fee (Lv 25^{23}). In the particular case under consideration, the various degrees of kinship are not stated, but they were no doubt identical with those laid down for the analogous case next to be considered (under b); that is, the right of redemption (מִשְׁפַּט גְּאֻלָּה Jer 32^{7}) appertained first to full brothers of the vendor; whom failing or who renouncing, it passed to his uncles on the father's side; whom failing, to their sons, i.e. the vendor's cousins on the father's side; whom failing, to 'any that is nigh of kin unto him of his family' (מִשְׁפָּחָה Lv 25^{49}). From the historical instance of the purchase by Jeremiah of his cousin Hanamel's property in Anathoth (Jer 32^{8-12}), it appears that the goel, or next of kin, had the right of pre-emption, or the right to the refusal of the property before it was exposed in the open market, as well as the right of redemption after it had been sold. In either case the prophet was his cousin's goel. Under this head, as it seems to us, must be placed the much-disputed case of Ruth the Moabitess (which many authorities regard as a case of levirate marriage), for the first and chief part of the transaction before the elders of the city (Ru $4^{1ff.}$) is clearly the redemption of 'the parcel of land which was our brother Elimelech's' (4^{3-6}). To this, the primary duty of the goel, the taking of Ruth in marriage is to be regarded as subordinate. Nothing is said of the precise relationship subsisting between Naomi — who here, contrary to the Pentateuchal laws, appears as her husband's heir—and the true goel, nor between him and Boaz, to whom, on the former renouncing, the right of redemption fell. Throughout the Bk. of Ruth our translators have rendered the Hebrew gō'ēl by 'kinsman.'

(b) A second duty of the goel in civil law was to redeem, not the property, but the person, of his kinsman, in the event of the latter being compelled by poverty to sell himself as a slave to a stranger or a sojourner (Lv 25^{47-49}). The order in which kinship was to be reckoned has already been given. For the details of the transactions under this and the foregoing head, see the art. JUBILEE. From this function of the goel as a 'redeemer' there has proceeded an extensive use of the verb ga'al in the sense of 'redeem,' with God Himself for the subject. Thus God is said to redeem Israel from the bondage of Egypt (Ex 6^{6} 15^{13}, Ps 74^{2} etc.) and from exile in Babylonia. The idea of J" as His people's goel is a special characteristic of Deutero-Isaiah (41^{14} 43^{14} $44^{6.\ 24}$ and oft.), as is the correlated idea of His people as the redeemed (גְּאוּלִים) of J" (51^{10} 62^{12} 63^{4}, cf. 35^{9}).

(c) A third duty of the goel is mentioned incidentally in the course of an ordinance supplementing a previous law regarding certain cases of restitution (Lv 6^{1-7}, MT 5^{21-26}). The new law provides for a case where the injured person may have died before payment of the conscience-money; in which case the money, it is assumed, is to be paid to the goel of the deceased (Nu 5^{8}), whom failing, to the priest.

ii. In criminal law the next of kin had laid upon him the duty of enforcing the claim for satisfaction for the blood of a murdered kinsman; in this capacity he received the special name of the gō'ēl had-dām, 'the avenger (AV also 'revenger') of blood.' The custom of blood-revenge, as it is called, is almost world-wide in its range, and is especially characteristic of society in a certain stage of its development (see esp. the work of A. H. Post, Entwickelungsgeschichte des Familienrechts, §§ 15–18 'Die Blutrache,' with the modern literature on p. 113). It rests ultimately on the two fundamental principles of the sacredness of human life (cf. Gn $9^{5.\ 6}$ 'whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed'), and the solidarity of the clan or tribe in primitive societies. When, with the advance of civilization and the gradual evolution of the state, the duty of safeguarding the rights of the community passes to the state, blood-revenge is obsolescent or obsolete. Hence blood-revenge as practised by imperfectly organized communities has often been compared to war waged by modern states for the vindication of their rights. The Semitic peoples have practised this custom from prehistoric times, and the earliest Hebrew legislation, that of the Book of the Covenant (see below), found it in full operation. Indeed it is not too much to say that the aim of the Hebrew legislators, from first to last, was so to regulate the practice that the shedder of blood should be, as far as possible, protected from the hasty and unconsidered vengeance of the next of kin, by providing for the judicial investigation of each particular case, and the safe-keeping of the accused until such investigation was completed.

Among the Hebrews, then, in primitive times, the murdered man's next of kin, i.e. his goel, was bound by tribal custom to avenge his blood by compassing the death, not merely of the murderer himself, but of all his family; for the family was in these early times the unit of society, and so the murderer's guilt was shared by all his family (cf. Jos 7^{24}, 2 K 9^{26}). Such, at least, is the Arab custom, and the law of Dt 24^{16} seems first to have limited the responsibility for a crime to the criminal alone (2 K 14^{6}). The Book of the Covenant deals with crimes of violence by formulating, first of all, the general principle of a life for a life (Ex 21^{12}; cf. Gn 9^{6}); it then proceeds to impose an all-important restriction on the exercise of indiscriminate blood-revenge, by emphasizing the distinction between accidental (v.^{13}) and deliberate manslaughter (v.^{14}). In both cases the manslayer is presumed to flee to the altar of the local sanctuary from the vengeance of the goel (cf. 1 K 1^{50} 2^{28}); but when deliberate murder has been done, the criminal must forthwith be handed to the goel (so we must infer), as the representative, not merely of the kin of the murdered man, but even of God Himself, the Supreme Avenger (Ps 9^{12}, MT ^{13}). This natural distinction between wilful murder and accidental homicide is elaborated in both the later codes (for the legal distinction see Homicide and Murder under CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS), which are chiefly distinguished from the older and simpler code above referred to by the provision of the cities of refuge (for which see REFUGE, CITIES OF), where the manslayer was to find protection from the hasty vengeance of the goel ('lest the avenger of blood pursue the manslayer while his heart is hot,' Dt 19^{6}), until it should be decided whether he was guilty of murder or of accidental homicide (Nu 35^{9-34}, Dt 19^{1-13}, Jos 20). Another important restriction consisted in the new proviso that two witnesses, at least, should be required to establish the crime of murder (cf. Nu 35^{30} with Dt 19^{15}). The right of pronouncing whether a particular case was one of accidental or intentional homicide seems to have been vested in the elders (Dt 19^{12}), as the official representatives of the community (עֵדָה Nu $35^{12.\ 24.\ 25}$) to which the accused belonged. The elders of the city of refuge to which he had fled must have formed, according to Jos 20^{4},* a court of first instance. On the accused being, after trial, found guilty of wilful murder, he is handed over to the goel, whose function, as restricted by successive legislation, has now become little more than that of a public executioner. If the verdict, on the other hand, is that of accidental homicide, the congregation (עֵדָה) was authorized 'to deliver the manslayer out of the hand of the avenger of blood,' and to 'restore him to his city of refuge,' where he was obliged to remain till the death of the then high priest (Nu 35^{25}). Until this event the accused was in so far still at the mercy of the goel, that, if he were found by the latter 'beyond the border of his city of refuge,' he might be put to death with impunity (Nu $35^{26.\ 27}$).

A characteristic feature of blood-revenge, as thus regulated by Hebrew legislation, is the very limited extent to which compensation for blood (even when accidentally shed) by a money payment was admitted. Among many widely different peoples, money-compensation—the Greek ποινή, the Saxon wergeld—was legally admitted, but among the Hebrews such compensation or ransom (כֹּפֶר) was expressly forbidden for the case of wilful murder (Nu 35^{31}), and was admitted only in the case of a man or woman gored to death by an ox (Ex 21^{30}).

It is impossible to say how long the custom of blood-revenge by means of the goel remained in force among the Hebrews. The case stated by the woman of Tekoa in 2 S 14^{6-11} reveals its prevalence in the reign of David, and, at the same time, is instructive as showing how the growing power of the central authority had already begun to exercise a salutary control over this ancient practice. According to the Chronicler, Jehoshaphat required all cases of bloodshed to be brought before the new high court of justice in the capital (2 Ch 19^{10}); but, unfortunately, we cannot be sure how much of this narrative is historical and how much a reflection of the practice prevailing in the Chronicler's own time (cf. Kittel, Hist. ii. p. 284).

From the technical sense of one enforcing the claims of justice in the special case of bloodshed, as explained above, the term goel in later Hebrew acquired the more general signification of 'advocate,' one who enforces the claim of the oppressed (Ps 119^{154}) and the orphans (Pr 23^{11}). In this more general sense the word is perhaps to be understood in the difficult passage Job 19^{25} 'I know that my goel liveth' (see Budde, in loc.).

GOG (גּוֹג).—1. The eponymous head of a Reubenite family, 1 Ch 5^{4}. 2. See following article.

GOG (גּוֹג, Γούγ).—The 'prince of Rosh, Meshech, and Tubal,' from 'the land of Magog,' and representative of the northern hordes who were to invade W. Asia in the day 'when Israel dwelleth securely' (Ezk 38. 39, cf. Rev 20^{8}). George Smith proposed to see in him Gagi, the ruler of the land of Sakhi, who is mentioned in the annals of the Assyr. king Assurbanipal. But the situation of Sakhi is unknown, and the Heb. name corresponds with that of the Lydian king who is called Gyges by the Greeks, and Gugu in the cuneiform inscriptions. Gyges was the first king of W. Asia Minor who became known to the Assyrians, and consequently his name may perhaps have become a title applied by them to the subsequent kings of that part of the world. The Cimmerians (Gomer) are included in the army of Gog; and as the invasion of Asia Minor by them brought about a great displacement of population, one result being the retreat of the Moschi and Tibareni (Meshech and Tubal) from Cappadocia to the shores of the Black Sea, it is possible that the irruption of the northern barbarians into Syria was connected with that event. (See MAGOG, and cf. Schrader, KAT^{2}, and the Comm. of Davidson and Bertholet, ad loc.).

GOIIM (גּוֹיִם) is the Heb. word which in EV is variously rendered 'Gentiles,' 'nations,' 'heathen' (see Preface to RV of OT). In the obscure expression in Gn 14^{1}, where AV has 'king of nations,' RV retains Goiim (possibly a corruption from Guti) as a proper name, although RVm offers the alternative rendering 'nations.' The same difference in rendering between AV and RV is found also in Jos 12^{23}. See, further, GENTILES, and next article.

GOIIM (גּוֹיִם), 'Nations,' the name of the kingdom of Tidal (Gn 14^{1}). The name of Tidal has been found by Pinches in a mutilated cuneiform tablet, where it is written Tudghula; and as in another broken tablet of the same series it is said that Kudur-Laghamar or Chedorlaomer, 'the king of Elam,' had 'collected the Umman Manda' or 'barbarian nations' in order to attack Babylon, it seems probable that it was of these Umman Manda that Tudghula was king. They represented the Kurdish tribes on the northern frontier of Elam. (See the paper of Mr. Pinches on Certain Inscriptions and Records referring to Babylonia and Elam, in the Transactions of the Victoria Institute, xxix. 45–81).

GOLAN (גּוֹלָן).—This appears to have been always a prominent place, and many historical facts about it are known, still its site has never been recovered. It was in Bashan, and belonged to the territory of Manasseh (Dt 4^{43}, cf. Driver, ad loc.). It was a Levitical city and likewise a city of refuge (Jos 20^{8} 21^{27}). About the beginning of our era it is mentioned in connexion with certain battles or sieges, and at that time, if not earlier, it had given its name to a district of such size that the territory was divided into Upper and Lower Gaulanitis, which together formed the E. boundary of Galilee (Jos. Wars, I. iv. 4, 8; III. iii. 1, 5; IV. i. 1; Schürer, HJP I. i. 304 n). The terms 'Upper' and 'Lower' no doubt divided the region from N. to S.; still the upper region is not distinguished by highlands, as might be supposed; for the entire country, while rolling, maintains a pretty uniform level.

One division of the region E. of the Sea of Galilee is known at present as Jaulân (see Schumacher, Survey of the Jaulân, 1888), and this name represents the Gaulanitis of NT times and the Golan of Heb. history. With these indications it might be supposed that the task of recovering the place itself would be an easy one; but this is a case where modern research does not afford us much help. Nor does any light come from the meaning of the word, something surrounded, hence a district. Possibly, the political disturbances which visited that country from time to time, and the introduction of other settlers in place of the Jewish inhabitants, have obliterated all traces of the exact locality.

We have an indication in the Talm. (Makkôth, 9*b*), to which prob. some weight should be given, that Golan was due E. of Kedesh-naphtali, or rather that the cities of refuge were situated in pairs over-against each other, E. and W. of the Jordan. As this indication is true in the case of Shechem and Ramoth-gilead, there is no reason why it should not be true also in the other two cases.

The present writer has searched the region pretty thoroughly for the site of this ancient city, but has been unable to decide the question beyond dispute. Nawâ has been suggested; and the objection raised to it, that 'it is much too far to the east,' has no weight, since it is about the same distance to the E. as Ramoth-gilead. It might be a valid objection to say that it is too far south.

It must be remembered that the country just E. of Ramoth-gilead was not thickly settled, and hence was not very wide at that point, while E. of the Sea of Galilee it broadened out to nearly three times that width; and this would be an imperative reason for appointing, as the N. city of refuge, a place much farther to the E. than either of the others on that side of the river. This fact, together with the indication from the Talmud, would point to es-Sanamein as a possible site for Golan. The question of the actual site of this city of refuge is one, however, that is yet to be determined. S. MERRILL.

GOLD.—The essential word for gold in Heb. is zāhābh (in Aram. parts of Ezr and Dn dĕhabh, Arab. dhahab). Four other words occurring in Job are tr^d 'gold' in AV, viz. bezer, Job 22[24], RVm 'ore' (the same word occurs in v.[25] ‖ keseph 'silver'); šĕgôr, 28[15]; pāz, 28[17]; and kethem, 28[19] (the last two often used elsewhere; cf. כֶּתֶם אוֹפִיר Job 28[16], Ps 45[10], Is 13[17]; זָהָב א׳ 1 Ch 29[4], and אוֹפִיר alone, Job 22[24b]). Another word for gold is hârûz, the usual Phœn. word, but in Heb. confined to poetry, Ps 68[13], Pr 3[14] 8[10. 19] 16[16] (Driver, Text of Samuel, p. xxviii). It probably comes from a root meaning 'to be yellow.' By some the Phœnician word is thought to be the source of the Gr. χρυσός.

That Syrians early had command of sources of gold is evident from the wealth of gold vessels and ornaments taken by the Egyptians in their depletion of Syria under the 18th dynasty. The gold of Egypt came at first from Nubia, and later from the eastern desert; but that of Syria probably came from Midian. At the first Midianite war the Israelites are said to have given as an offering about half as many shekels of gold as the girls of the captives taken (Nu 31[52]). This would imply an offering of about three shekels from each family destroyed, and therefore a much greater wealth as a total. Again, Gideon personally gets 1700 shekels of gold ear-rings from the slaughtered Midianites (Jg 8[26]), besides the rich spoil of gold from the royal trappings. That great wealth and ability should have existed there, is very likely, considering the civilization of the Amu on the Egypt. monuments, who probably came thence; and the conquest of Egypt by foreigners (Khyan, Yakub-el, and others) most likely from the same land. The absence of gold in the looting of Palestine under Joshua (the only piece named being an ingot of fifty shekels at Jericho, Jos 7[21]) is probably due to the thorough exhaustion of the country by repeated pillaging under Ramses III. The quantities of gold mentioned are not at all improbable, looking to the wealth otherwise recorded. Putting amounts roughly into monetary value, we see

Tahutmes III. First year, plunder of Syria	£20,000
Later years, perhaps	30,000
One year from Nubia	28,000
Other years, perhaps	22,000?
In one reign received	£100,000?
Ramses III. offered to Amen, mainly from Syria, £120,000; probably total plunder	1,000,000?
Total amount stated for Tabernacle	90,000
Spoil of Midian, offered £16,000; total at least	100,000?
Gideon (Jg 8[26]) gets £2000; total at least	10,000?
Hezekiah gives Sennacherib	90,000

These values will give a general idea of the amounts of gold dealt with in OT accounts, and their relation to the plunder which the Egyptians got in powerful reigns.

There does not appear to be any common word for alloys of gold in Heb.; and probably, therefore, the electrum or gold-silver alloy, so usual in Egypt, was not frequent in Palestine. See also METALS, MINING. W. M. FLINDERS PETRIE.

GOLDSMITH is the tr. of צֹרֵף in both AV and RV of Neh 3[8. 31. 32], Is 40[19] 41[7] 46[6], and of RV in Jer 10[9. 14] 51[17], where AV has 'founder.' From early times elaborate gold work was made in Egypt; and the exquisite delicacy and finish of the jewellery found at Dahshur, of about B.C. 2500, shows that nothing has been gained in technical ability since that date. The special feature of this jewellery is the cloisonnée work of hundreds of minute pieces of coloured stones, each cut to a precise shape, and each inserted in a perfectly fitting socket, made by invisible delicate soldering of thin strips of gold. The preparation of the base, and the cutting of the inserted pieces, are alike beyond anything done in later ages. The same system was employed throughout Egyptian history in varying degrees of delicacy; and such work must have been the starting-point for Hebrew and Phœnician gold work.

In the account of the tabernacle both cast and beaten gold are mentioned. The hammering out of the lampstand, lamps, and trimmers from one talent of gold is specified particularly (Ex 25[31ff.]). The talent was probably 135 lb. troy, about 160 cubic in. of gold; allowing 20 cubic in. for the lamps and fittings, and as much for the foot, this would imply (if the whole were about 3 ft. high) that the stem and branches of the lampstand were about ¾ in. thick, including the ornaments. Such a weight, therefore, is quite consistent with this strength required, and the conditions of working such a mass. The form of the lampstand is so familiar from the Arch of Titus that we need not refer to it here. The hammer-work of the two cherubim (Ex 25[18]) does not involve any special difficulties, as they were doubtless joined; and Egyptians were long before this adepts at soldering gold. But there is a question involved in the gold plating of the tabernacle boards (Ex 26[29]). The total gold used was 29 talents, of which 1 was used for the lampstand, and we must allow at least 2 for the cherubim and mercy-seat. This leaves 26 talents for plating. The area of the boards and bars is about 1860 square cubits, that of the furniture only 54 cubits. This implies that the gold-plating was only $\frac{1}{300}$th of an in. thick. Such would be quite impossibly tender for a skin on heavy weights, such as the boards (which weighed at least 4 cwt. each), unless it were very firmly attached; otherwise, if a nailed sheathing, it would be soon torn by moving. The gilding, therefore, on such a scale as is stated, would need to be by the usual Egyptian method of sticking rather thick gold-foil firmly on to the wooden basis. The ark and altars may have been more thickly plated, as their area was but a small portion of the whole.

The very practical nature of these statements of quantities has an important bearing on the historical character of the account, which we do not enter on here.

The making of wire is expressly described as done by cutting sheet gold into narrow threads (Ex 39^3); and such wire for embroidery must have drawn somewhat more from the amount of the gold stated above.

One mention in Kings deserves notice. The shields of gold which were carried by the royal bodyguard (1 K $14^{26.\,27}$) weighed 3 manehs each (1 K 10^{17}). This is about 16 cubic in., and if the shields were about 2 ft. in diameter they would be but $\frac{1}{30}$th of an in. thick; they were therefore not entirely of gold, but had a back of bronze or wood. Such work is rather implied by the expression 'gold fitted upon the carved work' of the temple doors (1 K 6^{35}). It appears to have been repoussée work of gold, with a wooden backing to support it and maintain the shape, helped by an intermediate coat of stucco or plaster as in Egyptian work. W. M. Flinders Petrie.

GOLGOTHA (Γολγοθά, from Heb. גֻּלְגֹּלֶת 'skull,' Aram. גֻּלְגַּלְתָּא).—The Hebrew name of the place where the crucifixion took place, Κρανίον and Calvaria being the Greek and Latin equivalents. Calvary is mentioned only in AV of Lk 23^{33}, being replaced by 'the skull' in the RV.

Mt 27^{33} AV 'A place called Golgotha, that is to say, a place of a skull.'
,, RV 'A place called Golgotha, that is to say, the place of a skull.'
Mk 15^{22} AV, RV 'The place Golgotha, which is, being interpreted, The place of a skull.'
Lk 23^{33} AV 'The place which is called Calvary.'
,, RV 'The place which is called The skull.'
Jn 19^{17} AV 'A place called the place of a skull, which is called in the Hebrew, Golgotha.'
,, RV 'The place called the place of a skull, which is called in the Hebrew, Golgotha.'

Three evangelists agree in calling the spot the place 'of a skull,' while St. Luke calls the place 'The skull.' This difference may appear to allow of two explanations as to the name of the locality.

(1) It may have been the place of public execution, where bodies were allowed to be devoured by birds and beasts, etc. (Gn 40^{19}, 2 K 9^{35}, Herod. iii. 12), and thus have acquired this name. It was probably distinct from the place of stoning, because at this time the Jewish Sanhedrin, though it could condemn, could not put to death (Ant. xx. i. 1), without the intervention of the Roman governor (Jn 18^{31} 'The Jews therefore said unto him, It is not lawful for us to put any man to death'). Our Lord was crucified under Pilate for sedition against Cæsar, owing to the clamour of the Jews, in order to avoid a tumult (Mt 27^{23}). This method of punishment for this offence among the Jews was common at this time (Ant. xvii. x. 10, BJ ii. xiv. 9). On account of the Jewish law (Dt 21^{23}), the corpses of Jewish criminals executed by crucifixion were allowed burial (Mt 27^{58}, Jn 19^{38}); and this was omitted only under very exceptional circumstances, as when the Idumæans, called in by the Zealots during the civil war at Jerusalem previous to the destruction of the city by the Romans, 'cast away their dead bodies without burial, although the Jews used to take so much care of the burial of men, that they took down those that were condemned and crucified, and buried them before the going down of the sun' (BJ iv. v. 2).

(2) The name may have been derived from the appearance of the place itself, from its round and skull-like contour, the Hebrew word Golgotha being applied to the skull from its rounded form. There is no indication, however, in the Bible that Golgotha was a knoll or hillock, and the expression 'Mount Calvary' appears to have come into use after the 5th cent. The Itiner. Hieros. speaks of it as 'Monticulus Golgatha.' Rufinus has the expression 'Golgothana rupes' (Hist. Ecc. ix. 6), and Bernhard again has 'Mons Calvariæ.' At that time the usage appears to have become fixed, and is found in works of all later pilgrims and writers (Robinson, BRP^{2} i. p. 376).

The place of execution, both with the Romans and the Jews, was without the city or camp (Plaut. Mil. Glor. ii. 4. 6; Dt 17^5, 1 K 21^{13}, Ac 7^{58}, He 13^{12}, Lv 24^{14}, Nu 15^{36}), and accordingly 'the place where Jesus was crucified was nigh to the city' (Jn 19^{20}). The use of the definite article 'the place of a skull,' 'the place which is called The skull,' indicates that it was a known spot, probably the ordinary place for crucifixion of malefactors. Golgotha was in a conspicuous position, as it is related that multitudes 'came together to this sight,' and it could be seen by those 'who stood afar off' (Mk 15^{40}, Lk 23^{49}); and it was near a highway leading from the country, where people were passing to and fro (Mt 27^{39}, Mk $15^{21.\,29}$, Lk 23^{26}). It was also near a garden and tombs (?): 'Now in the place where he was crucified there was a garden; and in the garden a new tomb, wherein was never man yet laid'; and the tomb was 'nigh at hand' (Jn 19^{41}); it was Joseph's 'own new tomb,' the tomb of a rich man of Arimathæa (Mt 27^{60}).

The traditions which relate to Golgotha are very numerous, but there are none recorded earlier than the 4th cent. There can be no doubt that the present traditional site of Golgotha is that which was recovered by Constantine, but beyond this there can be no certainty. Eusebius alone of the writers of the 4th cent. describes this circumstance (Euseb. Life of Constantine, iii. 25) connected with the finding of the Holy Sepulchre; he was living in Palestine at the time, and was present at the dedication of the Church of the Resurrection, A.D. 335. This is summarized by Besant and Palmer (Jerusalem, p. 58) in the following words: 'In the time of Constantine a report existed that the spot then occupied by a temple of Venus was the site of our Lord's burial-place. Constantine took down the temple, meaning to build the church upon it; but, in removing the earth, supposed to be defiled by the idol-worship that had taken place upon it, they found to their extreme astonishment the cave or tomb which is shown to this day. Then came the building of the Basilica.' Most of the historians in the 5th cent. relate the discovery of the Holy Sepulchre with that also of Calvary, and attribute it to the aged empress Helena, the mother of Constantine. 'There is a tradition that Adam was buried under Mount Calvary. This tradition is mentioned and condemned by Jerome (Comm. in Matth. lib. iv. c. 27) and other early ecclesiastical writers. But the pilgrims, Breydenbach, Zuallardo, and Cotovicus, not only say that the head of Adam was found here, but some (as Bernardino) would have us believe that it is still to be seen in the fissure of the Apse

(The Holy City, pt. II. ch. iii.). The tradition further went, that at the crucifixion drops of Christ's blood fell on the skull of Adam and restored him to life (Mt $27^{52.53}$, Eph 5^{14}; Epiphanius, Adv. Hær. xlvi. 5; Sæwulf, Early Travels in Palestine, pp. 39, 66; W. Tyr. lib. 13, p. 851).

There are many arguments in favour of the traditional site of Golgotha in addition to the tradition already referred to, but, until it can be ascertained whether it is within or without the city wall of the time of Christ, the whole question must still remain in doubt. The road from the tower of Antonia leading into the old road from the city to Jaffa would probably have passed close to the site, and on this road, outside the Jaffa gate, public executions have taken place in quite recent years, up to 1868. There are rock-cut tombs in the immediate neighbourhood, including that of the Holy Sepulchre.

During recent years several sites to the north of the city have been suggested as the site of Golgotha, in order, apparently, to comply with the view that the place of execution should be situated on the north side of the city (Lv $1^{10.11}$); but, though this may have been necessary for the Jewish place of stoning, there is nothing to indicate that the place of crucifixion during the Roman occupation was located according to Jewish ritual, or that it was identical with the place of stoning.

A knoll above 'Jeremiah's grotto' has been suggested by Otto Thenius in 1849 (followed by General Gordon, Colonel Conder, and others) as the genuine Calvary, on the ground principally that it is the place of stoning according to modern Jewish tradition. C. WARREN.

GOLIATH. — The giant whom David slew at Ephes-dammim (1 S 17). In the account of the fight he is spoken of as a Phil. from Gath. He was so politically, but it does not follow that he was of the ordinary Phil. blood. Presumably, he was of the rephaite or giant breed, elsewhere spoken of as living at Gath (2 S 21^{15-22}, 1 Ch 20^{4-8}), and was descended from the ancient Avvim or Anakim (see ANAKIM, AVVIM, GIANT, RAPHA, REPHAIM). The Heb. text makes him 6 cubits and a span in height. Josephus and some MSS of the Sept. reduce this to 4 cubits and a span. On general principles the Heb. reading is the more authoritative, and it fits best the figures given for the tremendous weight of his armour and weapons. Counting the cubit at 21 in., this would make him over 11 ft. high, and over 9 ft. high if we count the cubit a handbreadth shorter. If he was measured in his armour, from the ground to the top of his helmet-crest, this is not incredible, though he is probably the largest man of whom we have any authentic record.

The details of the fight are familiar, and need not be repeated here. It is often said that the account is quite Homeric. It is especially so in the boastful speeches the two champions make before the combat begins. The proposed condition of the fight was that the side whose champion was overcome should submit to the other. This was not done, for some reason. Instead, Israel fell upon the Philistines and defeated them with great slaughter. The incident in 2 S 23^{9-12}, 1 Ch 11^{12-14}, belongs to this battle, for Pas-dammim (1 Ch 11^{13}) is Ephes-dammim; and it shows that the Israelites had hard fighting, and not merely an unresisted pursuit. It also shows that David in later years remembered his first comrades in battle.

The story of David and Goliath is a favourite theme in the Rabbinical and the Arabian literature, where it is illuminated with no end of grotesque and extravagant additions.

The Goliath of 2 S 21^{19} is a different person; but see DAVID, vol. i. p. 562^{b}, ELHANAN, LAHMI.

GOMER (גֹּמֶר, Γάμερ, Γόμερ).—1. Gomer, the son of Japheth and father of Ashkenaz, Riphath, and Togarmah (Gn $10^{2.3}$), is the Gimirrâ of the Assyr. inscriptions, the Cimmerians of the Greeks. The Cimmerians were an Aryan people who inhabited the Crimea and the adjoining districts of southern Russia, and in the 7th cent. B.C. poured through the Caucasus into W. Asia (Herod. iv. 12). They attacked the northern frontier of the Assyr. empire in concert with the Minni, the Medes, the people of Sepharad (Sapardâ), and other populations whose territories they had already overrun; but in B.C. 677 their leader, Teuspa (Teispes), was defeated by Esarhaddon, and they were driven partly eastward, where they overthrew the old kingdom of Ellipi and built Ecbatana, partly westwards into Asia Minor. Here they sacked Sinôpê and Antandros, which they held for 100 years, and finally invaded Lydia. Gyges or Gugu, the Lydian king, sent an embassy to Nineveh for help; in the end, however, he was slain in battle, and his capital, Sardis, captured by the invading hordes. His successor, Ardys, succeeded in exterminating or driving them out of the country. Meanwhile Phrygia had been occupied by them, and the temple of Artemis at Ephesus burned by their leader, Lygdamis (who seems to be the Tugdamme of the inscriptions of the Assyr. king Assurbanipal). Lygdamis was subsequently slain in Cilicia (Strabo, i. 3, 16), but Cappadocia had been so completely conquered by them as to bear henceforward among the Armenians the name of Gamir. In Ezk 38^{6} Gomer is included in the army of Gog.

GOMORRAH (עֲמֹרָה, LXX and NT Γομόρρα or Γόμορρα; see Winer-Schmiedel, § 6, 8*b*; Arab. ghamara, 'to overwhelm with water').—One of 'the cities of the Plain'; its position along with that of Sodom and the other three is now pretty generally admitted to have been in the Arabah, or plain, which lies to the north of the Dead Sea. Of the five original cities, all but Zoar (or Bela) were destroyed by fire from heaven (Gn 19^{3-29}). The situation has been verified by Tristram, who, on placing himself in the required positions, was able to recognize the view described as it was regarded by Lot on selecting his future residence (Gn 13^{10}), and by Abraham during the destruction of the doomed cities (19^{27}).* According to Josephus the vale became Lake Asphaltitis on the destruction of Sodom (Ant. I. ix.), but in another place he indicates that the country of Sodom borders upon it (Wars, IV. viii. 4). It has elsewhere been shown that the Dead Sea does not owe its existence to miraculous interposition (see DEAD SEA); and the view that the waters cover the sites of the cities of the Plain is now generally discarded. Certain ruins about a mile from the shore of the Dead Sea north of Râs el-Feshkhah, marked Khumrân (or Gumrân) on the Survey Map of Palestine, have been supposed by de Saulcy to mark the site of Gomorrah, and the position as well as the name lend probability to the view.

Throughout Scripture the cities of the Plain are used as examples of the judgments which fall on nations and cities in consequence of crime, and as warnings to mankind. In the time of Abraham and Lot the wickedness of these cities appears to have reached its climax (Gn 18^{20}), and in several passages is referred to as an example to be shunned (Jer 23[14], 2 P 2[6], Jude[7]), and a warning for the future (Dt 29[23], Is 1[9] 13[19], Jer 49[18] 50[40], Am 4[11], Ro 9[29]). But our Lord warns us that the rejection of the gospel message carries with it a greater degree of guilt than that of the cities of the Plain (Mt 10[15]). E. HULL.

* Land of Israel[2], pp. 363–366. The arguments of Tristram on this subject appear quite conclusive, and should be studied by those who have not had the opportunities of this writer of personal inspection of the localities.

GOOD, GOODS.—The word 'good' is chiefly the rendering in OT of טוֹב, which is a verb, an adj., and a subst.; and in Apocr. and NT chiefly of ἀγαθός and καλός; and its meanings are determined far more by the meanings of those terms than by the native genius of the Eng. language. In other words, we have to deal with biblical English, some of whose peculiarities have been adopted into the common speech, through the influence of AV (though not always in their proper sense), and some have not.

1. As an adj. 'good' is used to express the following ideas:—

1. Agreeable, pleasant: Gn 3[6] 'And when the woman saw that the tree was good for food'; 31[24. 29] 'Take heed that thou speak not to Jacob either good or bad'; 49[15] 'And he saw that rest was good'; 1 S 25[8] 'We come in a good day'; 29[9] 'And Achish answered and said to David, I know that thou art good in my sight, as an angel of God'; Job 13[9] 'Is it good that he should search you out?'; Ps 45[1] 'My heart is inditing a good matter'; 133[1] 'Behold, how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity'; Pr 15[23] 'A word spoken in due season, how good is it!'; 24[13] 'My son, eat thou honey, because it is good'; Ro 16[18] 'By good words and fair speeches [they] deceive the hearts of the simple' (χρηστολογίας καὶ εὐλογίας, RV 'smooth and fair speech,' Sanday-Headlam 'fair and flattering speech'; it is the only occurrence of χρηστολογία in bibl. Greek). In this sense we find 'good tidings' 2 S 18[27], Lk 2[10], 1 Th 3[6]; 'good news' Pr 15[25]; 'good report' Pr 15[30], Ph 4[8] (εὔφημος, Lightfoot, 'winning,' 'attractive').

2. Of good quality (as compared with others of its kind), highly esteemed: Gn 1[4] 'And God saw the light that it was good'; 2[12] 'And the gold of that land is good'; 43[11] 'Take of the best fruits in the land' (RV 'choice'); 1 K 2[32] 'Who fell upon two men more righteous and better than he, and slew them with the sword'; 10[18] 'Moreover the king made a great throne of ivory, and overlaid it with the best gold' (RV 'finest'); Ps 111[10] 'A good understanding have all they that do his commandments'; Ec 7[1] 'A good name is better than precious ointment' (Heb. 'a name'); Sir 26[21] 'Having the confidence of their good descent'; Mt 7[17] 'Every good tree bringeth forth good fruit'; 12[12] 'How much then is a man better than a sheep?' (RV 'of more value,' Gr. πόσῳ διαφέρει); Lk 5[39] 'No man also having drunk old wine straightway desireth new; for he saith, The old is better' (TR χρηστότερος, most edd. χρηστός whence RV 'good'); Ac 10[22] 'of good report' (Gr. μαρτυρούμενος, RV 'well reported of'); 23[1] 'I have lived in all good conscience' (πάσῃ συνειδήσει ἀγαθῇ); 1 Co 12[31] 'Covet earnestly the best gifts' (TR κρείττονα; edd. μείζονα, RV 'greater'); Ph 2[3] 'Let each esteem others better than themselves'; 1 Ti 3[7] 'To have a good report'; Ja 2[3] 'Sit thou here in a good place' (κάθου ὧδε καλῶς).

3. Profitable, advantageous: Pr 31[18] 'She perceiveth that her merchandise is good' (RV 'profitable'); Ec 9[4] 'A living dog is better than a dead lion'; 10[11] 'and a babbler is no better' (RV 'then is there no advantage in the charmer'); Mt 18[6] 'It were better for him that a millstone were hanged about his neck' (RV 'it is profitable'); Lk 14[34] 'Salt is good.' And the phrase 'good for nothing' Jer 13[10], Wis 13[10], Mt 5[13].

4. Befitting, appropriate: Gn 40[16] 'When the chief baker saw that the interpretation was good'; Ru 2[22] 'It is good, my daughter, that thou go out with his maidens'; 2 S 17[7] 'The counsel that Ahithophel hath given is not good at this time'; Pr 19[2] 'That the soul be without knowledge, it is not good'; Ec 7[11] 'Wisdom is good with an inheritance'; Mt 17[4] 'It is good for us to be here'; Mk 14[21] 'Good were it for that man if he had never been born'; 1 Co 5[6] 'Your glorying is not good.'

5. Happy, prosperous: Ps 112[5] 'A good man showeth favour' (טוֹב־אִישׁ חוֹנֵן, RV 'Well is it with the man that dealeth graciously'; Perowne, 'Happy is the man'; but AV may have understood the word in the moral sense). In OT טוֹב is an epithet of the heart, but EV tr. otherwise: 1 K 12[7] ‖ 2 Ch 10[7] 'glad'; Est 5[9] 'glad'; Pr 5[15] AV 'merry,' RV 'cheerful'; Ec 9[7] 'merry.' But we find in Apocr., Sir 30[25] 'A cheerful and good heart will have a care of his meat and diet'; and Bar 4[30] 'Take a good heart, O Jerusalem.' Cf. the phrase 'of good cheer' (= in old Eng. 'of happy countenance,' since the 'cheer' was the 'face'), generally as an imperative, 'Be of good cheer!' Est 15[9], Wis 18[6], Bar 4[5], Mt 9[2] 14[27], Mk 6[50], Jn 16[33], Ac 23[11] 27[25]; but also Ac 27[22] 'I exhort you to be of good cheer'; 27[36] 'Then were they all of good cheer'; and, in a somewhat different sense, Sir 18[32] 'Take not pleasure in much good cheer.' So Herbert, Temple, 'Employment,' 16—

> 'Life is a businesse, not good-cheer.'

6. Kind, gracious: 1 S 25[15] 'But the men were very good unto us, and we were not hurt'; 2 Ch 30[18] 'The good LORD pardon every one'; Ps 86[5] 'For thou, Lord, art good, and ready to forgive'; Nah 1[7] 'The LORD is good, a stronghold in the day of trouble'; Sir 35[8] 'Give the Lord his honour with a good eye' (ἐν ἀγαθῷ ὀφθαλμῷ); 2 Mac 11[6] 'They and all the people with lamentation and tears besought the Lord that he would send a good angel to deliver Israel'; Tit 2[5] 'Keepers at home, good, obedient to their own husbands' (RV 'kind'). Cf. Milton, Lycidas, 184—

> 'Henceforth thou art the genius of the shore,
> In thy large recompense, and shalt be good
> To all that wander in that perilous flood.'

And PL viii. 651—

> 'Thou to Mankind
> Be good and friendly still, and oft return!'

7. Upright, righteous, morally and religiously good: 1 S 12[23] 'I will teach you the good and the right way'; Mic 6[8] 'He hath showed thee, O man, what is good'; 7[2] 'The good man is perished out of the earth'; Mt 5[45] 'He maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good.'

8. Of quantity, considerable: 'A good way off,' Gn 21[16], Mt 8[30]; 'a good way from,' Jg 18[22]; 'for a good space,' 2 Mac 7[5]; 'a good while,' Gn 46[29], Ac 18[18]. But 'good measure' (Lk 6[38]) is 'abundant measure'; and to 'give good ear' (Wis 8[12]) is to be very attentive. In 2 Es 16[21] occurs the phrase 'good cheap,' 'Behold, victuals shall be so good cheap upon earth, that they shall think themselves to be in good case' (so RV; Lat. erit annonæ vilitas). 'Cheap' is from the Anglo-Saxon céap, a market, a price; and Abbott (Shaks. Grammar, 132) thinks the phrase may arise from the omission of the prep.: 'good cheap' = 'at a good price' (for the buyer), 'at a bargain,' as in Shaks. III Henry VI. v. iii. 14—

> 'The queen is valued thirty thousand strong';

Merch. of Venice, III. i. 57—'He hath disgraced me and hindered me half a million.' But the oldest explanation is to refer the phrase to the French bon marché. So Palsgrave (1530), Introd. 49,

'Marché, a bargene or a marketstede or cheepe, as good cheepe, bon marchie.' And this is the explanation accepted by Murray (Oxf. Eng. Dict. s.v. 'cheap'). That the prep. may go with it, however, is shown by Caxton, Chron. Eng. ccxvii. 205, 'They toke the kynges prises for hir peny worthes at good chepe.' The meaning is simply 'cheap' (that word being now an adj., which was formerly a subst., a somewhat rare change in English). Thus Sir D. Lindsay, ii. 197—

'To sell richt deir, and by gude-chaip,
And mix ry-meill amang the saip,
And saiffrone with oyl-dolie.'

The phrase is not uncommon in early authors: Lever, Sermons, 1550 (Arber's ed. p. 130), 'For they that be true merchauntemen to by and sell in dede, shoulde and doo provide great plentye and good chepe by honest byenge and sellynge of theyr wares'; Rutherford, Letters (cxvi.), 'Law and justice are to be had by any, especially for money and moyen; but Christ can get no law, good cheap or dear'; and Herbert, Temple, 'Providence,' 97—

'Hard things are glorious, easie things good cheap.'

'Better cheap' was also used, as Lever in the same sermon as above (p. 130), 'Take awaye leasmongers, regrators and all suche as by byinge and sellynge make thyngs more dere, and when they be gone, all thyngs wylbe more plentye and better chepe.' So Rutherford, Letters (ccxv.), 'I trow that (if I were as I have been since I was his prisoner) I would beg lodging for God's sake in Hell's hottest furnace, that I might rub souls with Christ. But God be thanked, I shall find him in a better lodging. We get Christ better cheap than so.'

In He 11^{12} occurs 'as good as dead,' another phrase in which 'good' is used to express extent, quantity rather than quality. The Gr. is simply the perf. ptcp. of the verb (νενηκρωμένος), which in Ro 4^{19}, in a precisely parallel passage and construction, is tr^{d} in AV simply 'dead,' but RV gives 'as good as dead' there also. The phrase is from Tindale, whom most versions follow; but Wyc. has 'nygh deed,' Gen. 'dead,' Rhem. 'quite dead.' It is good idiomatic Eng., though Moon (Revisers' English, p. 123) speaks of 'the strange contradiction in the use of the word good for bad'; but it probably expresses less emphasis now than formerly. Cf. Tindale's use of 'a good' for 'in good earnest,' 'thoroughly,' Dt 9^{21} 'And I toke youre synne, the calfe which ye had made, and burnt him with fire and stampe him and grounde him a good, even unto smal dust.'

2. The uses of 'good' as a subst. may be given under three heads—

1. Material Possessions, goods: Gn 45^{20} 'The good of all the land of Egypt is yours'; 1 Ch 29^{3} 'I have of mine own proper good, of gold and silver' (RV 'I have a treasure of mine own of gold and silver'); 1 Jn 3^{17} 'Whoso hath this world's good' (τὸν βίον τοῦ κόσμου, RV 'this world's goods'). Cf. Chaucer, Parlement of Foules, 462—

'And but I bere me in hir servyse
As wel as that my wit can me suffyse,
Fro poynt to poynt, hir honour for to save,
Tak she my lyf, and all the good I have.'

So Ex 22^{8} Tind. 'Yf the thefe be not founde, then the goodman of the housse shalbe brought unto the goddes and swere, whether he have put his hande unto his neighbours good'; Dn 11^{13} Cov. 'For the kinge of the north shal . . . come forth . . . with a mighty hoost and exceadinge greate good' (רְכוּשׁ, AV 'riches,' RV 'substance'); and Adams, Practical Works, i. 52, 'His heart is proportionably enlarged with his house: his good and his blood riseth together.' But in this sense the expression is more frequently 'goods' or 'good things,' as Ec 5^{11} 'When goods increase, they are increased that eat them'; Gn 45^{23} 'Ten asses laden with the good things of Egypt.'

2. Material and moral blessing, benefit: Ps 119^{122} 'Be surety for thy servant for good'; Ec 5^{11} 'What good is there to the owners thereof?' Ad. Est 15^{10} 'Who saved our life and continually procured our good'; Wis 5^{8} 'What good hath riches with our vaunting brought us?' Sir 2^{9} 'Ye that fear the Lord, hope for good'; 2 Mac 11^{15} 'Then Maccabeus consented to all that Lysias desired, being careful of the common good' (τοῦ συμφέροντος φροντίζων); Ro 15^{2} 'Let every one of us please his neighbour for his good to edification' (RV 'for that which is good'). Cf. Shaks. As You Like It, II. i. 17—

'And this our life, exempt from public haunt,
Finds tongues in trees, books in the running brooks,
Sermons in stones, and good in everything.'

In this sense we find 'good things' in Sir 39^{25} 'For the good are good things created.' And the phrase 'to come of good' occurs 2 Mac 14^{30} 'Perceiving that such sour behaviour came not of good, he gathered together not a few of his men, and withdrew himself from Nicanor' (ἀπὸ τοῦ βελτίστου). Cf. Shaks. Henry V. IV. viii. 4—'Captain, I beseech you now, come apace to the king; there is more good toward you, peradventure, than is in your knowledge to dream of.'

3. Moral or spiritual good, goodness: Gn 2^{9} 'the tree of [RV adds 'the'] knowledge of good and evil'; Ps $14^{1.3}$ 'There is none that doeth good'; Is $7^{15.16}$ 'to refuse the evil, and choose the good'; 2 Es 2^{14} 'I have broken the evil in pieces, and created the good'; Sir 33^{14} 'Good is set against evil, and life against death'; Ro 3^{8} 'Let us do evil, that good may come'; He 5^{14} 'those who by reason of use have their senses exercised to discern good and evil.' In this sense 'the good' sometimes is plu., 'good persons,' as Pr 14^{19} 'The evil bow before the good' (טוֹבִים); sometimes, however, sing., as Sir 12^{7} 'Give unto the good (τῷ ἀγαθῷ), and help not the sinner.'

These different meanings of 'good' are all illustrated in the history of the interpretation of Ps 16^{2}. The Mass. Heb. is טוֹבָתִי בַּל־עָלֶיךָ; its translations may be ranged in three classes according as טוֹב 'good' is understood.

1. Goods: LXX ὅτι τῶν ἀγαθῶν μου οὐ χρείαν ἔχεις [B omits whole clause]; Arab. 'And indeed thou needest not my goods'; Vulg. 'Quoniam bonorum meorum non eges'; Wyc. [1380] 'For of my goodis thou nedist not'; [1388] 'For thou hast no need of my goodis'; Cov. 'My goodes are nothinge unto the,' followed by Rog., Cran., Bish.; Dou. 'Because thou needest not my goods,' with marg. note, 'Christ's passion was not needful nor profitable to God but to man'; Burgess, 'My goods are at thy disposal' (reading בעלתך 'lorded over [owned] by thee' for בל־עליך 'not over thee').

2. Good: Syr. 'My good is from thee'; Symm. ἀγαθόν μου οὐκ ἔστιν ἄνευ σοῦ; Jerome, 'Bene mihi non est sine te'; D. Kimchi, 'My good is not (obligatory) upon thee'; Ewald, 'Thou art my highest good!'; J. A. Alexander, 'My happiness is not independent of thee'; Del. 'Besides thee there is for me no weal'; Perowne, 'I have no good beyond thee,' who is followed by RV, Jennings, and Kirkpatrick; Kay, 'My prosperity has no claims on thee'; Thrupp, 'My happiness! there is naught in comparison of thee'; Cheyne, 'Without thee my welfare is naught'; or (Parchment ed.) 'Welfare have I none without thee'; De Witt, 'I have naught that is good beside thee'; Segond, 'Tu es mon souverain bien!' Kautzsch, 'Es giebt für mich kein Gut ausser dir!' Wildeboer (in Feestbundel aan Prof. M. J. de Goeje, Leiden, 1891: see Cheyne in Expos. Times, iii. 164, and in Expos. III. Ser. v. 78), 'Thou art the good of [the people which thy prophet called] thy wedded one' (reading בַּעֲלָתֵךְ); but later (in Theol. Tijdschrift, Nov. 1893: see Taylor in Expos. Times, v. 384), 'Thou art my Lord, the treasure of her whom thou hast married' (reading בַּעְלָתֵךְ); King, 'My good, beyond which there is none.'

3. Goodness: Aq. ἀγαθωσύνη μου οὐ μὴ ἔστι σέ; Gen. (after Calvin), 'My welldoing extendeth not to thee' (with marg. note, 'Though we can not enriche God, yet we must bestowe God's gifts to the use of his children'); J. Kimchi, 'The good which I am doing does not extend so far as thee'; AV, 'My goodness extendeth not to thee'; Ost. 'Le bien que je fais ne vient point jusqu' à toi'; Sharpe (p. 8), 'My goodness! nothing beside thee' [is good], but (p. 151), 'Adonai art thou, O my goodness, there is nothing beside thee to the holy who are in the land' (p. 387, 'to the saints who are in the earth').

The word goods had formerly a wider application than it has now. Thus Dt 28[11] 'And the LORD shall make thee plenteous in goods'; 2 Ch 21[14] 'Behold with a great plague will the LORD smite thy people, and thy children, and thy wives, and all thy goods.' RV changes 'goods' of AV into some other word in the foll. places: Gn 24[10] 'all the goods of his master were in his hand' (כָּל־טוּב, RV 'all goodly things,' RVm as AV); 31[18] 'And he carried away all his cattle, and all his goods which he had gotten' (כָּל־רְכֻשׁוֹ אֲשֶׁר רָכָשׁ, RV 'all his substance which he had gathered'); Nu 35[3] 'the suburbs of them shall be for their cattle, and for their goods' (לִרְכֻשָׁם, RV 'for their substance'); Dt 28[11] 'plenteous in goods' (לְטוּבָה, RV 'for good'); 2 Ch 21[14] 'all thy goods' (כָּל־רְכוּשֵׁךְ, RV 'all thy substance'); Neh 9[25] 'houses full of all goods' (כָּל־מָלְאִים כָּל־טוּב, RV 'full of all good things'); Job 20[10] 'his hands shall restore their goods' (אונו, RV 'his wealth'); 20[21] 'therefore shall no man look for his goods' (עַל־כֵּן לֹא־יְחִיל טובו, RV 'Therefore his prosperity shall not endure'); Zeph 1[13] 'their goods shall become a booty' (חֵילָם, RV 'their wealth'); Sir 14[5] 'he shall not take pleasure in his goods' (ἐν τοῖς χρήμασιν αὐτοῦ, RV 'in his possessions'); Mt 24[47] 'Verily I say unto you, That he shall make him ruler over all his goods' (ἐπὶ πᾶσι τοῖς ὑπάρχουσιν αὐτοῦ, RV 'over all that he hath'); Lk 15[12] 'the portion of goods that falleth to me' (τὸ ἐπιβάλλον μέρος τῆς οὐσίας, RV 'the portion of thy [RVm 'the'] substance'); He 10[34] 'took joyfully the spoiling of your goods' (τῶν ὑπαρχόντων ὑμῶν, RV 'your possessions'); Rev 3[17] 'I am rich, and increased with goods' (πεπλούτηκα, RV 'have gotten riches'). GOOD, CHIEF.—According to Scripture, the chief good for man is of a moral and spiritual nature. The fact that man was made in the image of God (Gn 1[27]) is determinative. God is the highest and best of beings; and man, His image, while recognizing the relative goodness which is conveyed through material blessings, e.g., discerns the chief good, that which answers to our deepest needs, and leads us to the goal which our own nature establishes for us, in the region of the unseen, the spiritual and divine. God is revealed in the OT as holy, and Israel is chosen to be a holy people to Himself. The chief good is thus secured to the nation as a nation, by faithfulness in worshipping the God of Israel and in keeping His law. It consists in God's favour and friendship, and victorious aid against the nation's enemies; it appears in the acquisition of blessings which, in the absence of a clearly conceived doctrine of immortality, can only take the form of worldly prosperity (Dt 28[1ff.]). The enigmas with which faith is often confronted, if it remains at any such low stage of development, are exemplified in the Bk. of Job; but there too, as we see, the struggle for light and peace goes on, not without success.

At all times the individual must have had his personal religious needs, and God must have had a regard for him, simultaneously with the favour which He showed to Israel. Accordingly, in many parts of OT a supreme good is represented as brought near to the soul of the godly person. It is obtained by worshipping the true God, and turning from sin to the righteousness of the law; and so healthful and comforting is it in the experience of its possessor that it is described by a special term, blessedness, a mode of designation which is still preserved. Other good things procure for men a measure of happiness, but only the chief good of religion confers blessedness (Ps 1. 23. 32[1, 2], Pr 3, Is 55, etc.). The overthrow of the Jewish nation at the period of the Captivity taught the members that if a true blessing was thereafter to be looked for at all, it must be sought by pious individuals in the privacy of their own souls, and in the pursuit of righteous purposes such as God could approve (Jer 31[31ff.], Ezk 18).

Christ came preaching the kingdom of God. Men were invited to seek first the kingdom of God and His righteousness. In that case they might have nothing, but yet they would have all; they should trust their Father in heaven, and suppress anxiety (Mt 6[31ff.]). But, again, the Infinite Spirit is not sufficiently known even to the heart that turns to Him as Father. Christ has declared Him. Jesus was perfectly righteous in His human circumstances, and presented in Himself a copy of the divine nature which is level to our apprehension. In seeking the perfect blessing, men have thus to learn of Christ (Mt 11[29]), to acknowledge Him as the Light of the world (Jn 8[12]), to receive Him as the Bread that came down from heaven (Jn 6[27ff.]), etc. Further, the righteousness and love of Christ were proved to be invincible and infinite by His voluntary endurance of death. The fullest revelation of divine goodness is seen in the cross of Christ, and through it man obtains the chief good, viz. full forgiveness, and power to live a life which approaches the perfect standard (1 Co 1[18ff.], Gal 6[14], Eph 2[13ff.], Col 1[15ff.], He 12[1ff.], 1 P 2[19ff.]).

It is implied in Scripture that material possessions and intellectual advancement are good, and are legitimate objects of desire and pursuit. It is even an imperative duty to seek them, the obligation of the Christian being to do the most good he can, and therefore to call into requisition the best means attainable. People should use the world (1 Th 4[11]), and if any will not work, neither ought he to eat (2 Th 3[10]). Men require to be not slothful in business (Ro 12[11]). It follows that the intellect, which enables us to subdue the world, ought to be cultivated. But then all powers and possessions have to be subordinate to the paramount aims of Christian love and righteousness. The chief end and privilege of man is to glorify God (Col 3[17], 1 P 4[10, 11]).

The chief good which is attainable by man in this world is only relatively to be so described. A Christian spirit is indeed better than all riches; it knows a peace which the world cannot give or take away (Jn 14[27]); its faith overcomes the world (1 Jn 5[4]); and through Christ, its Light, it derives instruction and blessing from everything that affects it, and often, as it were, sees heaven opened (2 Co 3[18]). Hence it finds all gloomy pessimistic views of life unwarrantable. But sin and pain survive till death, even in all believers. A good which is absolute and unqualified is not to be tasted therefore on earth. The Christian, however, has the comfort and stimulus of the highest hope. A good which is perfect is anticipated as the reward of the glorified saints. It consists in their everlasting service of God (Rev 7[15ff.] 21[3, 4]). G. FERRIES.

GOODLY, GOODLINESS.—Though 'goodly' was at one time used adverbially also, it is employed in AV as an adj. only. There it is found with two different meanings (and the mod. meaning, considerable, pretty large, 'a goodly number,' is not one of them).

1. Fair to look upon, fine, handsome. In this sense it is applied to persons, as Gn 39[6] 'Joseph was a goodly person, and well favoured'; * of

* Tindale's tr[n]; Heb. יְפֵה תֹאַר, lit. 'fair of form'; LXX καλὸς τῷ εἴδει; Vulg. 'pulchra facie,' and Wyc. 'fayr in face,' which limit the meaning, the same epithet being used of fruit (Jer 11[16]); RV 'comely.' The Heb. epithet is often used of women, as of Rachel (Gn 29[17], where the whole phrase is exactly the same as is used here of Joseph, EV 'Rachel was beautiful and well favoured'), of Abigail (1 S 25[3], where EV give 'of a beautiful garments, as Ex 39[28] 'goodly bonnets of fine linen'; of trees, as Ps 80[10] 'the boughs thereof were like the goodly cedars' (אַרְזֵי־אֵל, lit. as AVm and RV 'cedars of God'); of cities (Dt 6[10]), mountains (Dt 3[25]), horses (Zec 10[3]); and not only of majestic things, but of vessels (2 Ch 36[10. 19]), precious stones (Mt 13[45], Lk 21[5]), and even 'heritages' (Ps 16[6], Jer 3[19]). It is also used of a price (Zec 11[13]) paid for a slave, 'a handsome price!' spoken ironically there. In illustration we have Cov. using the word of Jerusalem, Ezk 16[13] 'marvelous goodly wast thou and beutifull, yee even a very Queene wast thou'; and of Tyre, 27[4] 'thy builders have made the marvelous goodly.' The Douay describes a cup so, Ps 23[5] 'Thou hast fatted my head with oyle: and my chalice inebriating how goodlie is it!' and Bacon horse-trappings (Essays, 'Of Masques,' p. 158), 'For Justs and Tourneys and Barriers, the glories of them are chiefly . . . in the Goodly Furniture of their Horses and Armour.' Fuller illustrates 2 S 23[21] 'he slew an Egyptian, a goodly man' (lit., says Kirkpatrick, 'a man of appearance,' a notable man, which is explained in 1 Ch 11[23] to mean 'a man of great stature,' with the addition 'five cubits high'), when he says (Holy Warre, II. vii. p. 51), 'And though the Goths had a law, alwayes to choose a short thick man for their King; yet surely a goodly stature is most majesticall.'

2. Fair in speech, agreeable: Gn 49[21] 'Naphtali is a hind let loose: he giveth goodly words' (אֹמֵר שָׁפֶר), a difficult passage, see Spurrell: the EV comes from Tindale, and is a good tr[n] of the MT).* Cf. T. Lever, Sermons (Arber's ed. p. 73), 'Iudas pretence was wondrous goodly, to sell the oyntment for a great summe of money, to relieve the poore with.'

The compar. and superl. of the adj. are also used in AV, 1 S 9[2] 'And he had a son whose name was Saul, a choice young man and a goodly: and there was not among the children of Israel a goodlier person than he'; 1 S 8[16] 'your goodliest young men'; 1 K 20[3] 'thy wives also and thy children, even the goodliest, are mine'; 1 Mac 8[8] 'the goodliest countries.' So Shaks. Tempest, I. ii. 483—

> 'I have no ambition
> To see a goodlier man.'

Chaucer, Troilus, ii. 880—

> 'Ma dame, y-wis, the goodlieste mayde
> Of greet estat in al the toun of Troye.'

The subst. goodliness occurs but once, in a beautiful passage where it is a most appropriate translation, Is 40[6] 'All flesh is grass, and all the goodliness thereof is as the flower of the field.' The meaning of the Eng. word (which comes from the Bishops' Bible) is evidently 'that which makes it fair to look upon,' beauty, charm, as in Hooker, Eccles. Polity, v. 15, 'What travail and cost was bestowed that the goodliness of the temple might be a spectacle of admiration to all the world!' The RV retains the word. But the Heb. is חֶסֶד heṣed, which everywhere else (and it is very common) means kindness. Nearly all mod. commentators (Ges., Hitzig, Del., Nägels., Cheyne, Dillm., Orelli, and Oxf. Heb. Lex.) accept this solitary instance as sufficient, supporting it by saying, as Cheyne, that its synonym hên has the double sense of favour and gracefulness. So Cov. 'bewtie'; Gen. 'grace'; and apparently Ja 1[11] εὐπρέπεια. On the other hand, LXX gives δόξα; Vulg. 'gloria,' after which Wyc. and Dou. 'glorie,' and so the verse is quoted in 1 P 1[24]: hence Lowth emends the Heb. to הוֹדוֹ, and Ewald to כְּבֹדוֹ (whom Briggs follows), getting 'the glory thereof,' which does not seriously alter the translation or the meaning. Salmond (on 1 P 1[24]) happily illustrates the thought from Landor: 'There are no fields of amaranth on this side the grave; there are no voices, O Rhodopè, that are not soon mute, however tuneful; there is no name, with whatever emphasis of passionate love repeated, of which the echo is not faint at last.'

J. HASTINGS.

countenance,' Gen. simply 'beautiful,' LXX again ἀγαθὴ τῷ εἴδει σφόδρα), and of Esther (Est 2[7] יְפַת־תֹּאַר וְטוֹבַת מַרְאֶה, EV 'fair and beautiful,' AVm 'fair of form and good of countenance').

* The reading of most VSS and edd. is, 'Naphtali is a slender terebinth giving forth goodly boughs'; but G. A. Smith, in Expos. IV. Ser. vii. 166, prefers the MT, saying that it is 'beautifully expressive of a people in the position of Naphtali.'

GOODMAN.—The ordinary word for a 'man' in Heb. (אִישׁ) is once tr[d] 'goodman' in AV, Pr 7[19] 'the goodman is not at home.' This has passed from Cov. through the Bishops' to AV, and it is accepted by RV. The Gen. and Dou. have 'my husband is not at home'; and so Wyc. 1388, 'myn hosebonde is not in his hows'; but 1382, 'Thir is not a man in hir house,' after Vulg. 'Non est enim vir in domo sua.' This is exactly how the word 'goodman' has been used in Scotland from the beginning of written speech at least, and how it is in constant use still. Jamieson quotes from Douglas, Virgil, 255, 14—

> 'To Vulcanis hir husband and gudeman,
> Within his goldin chalmer scho began
> Thus for to speik.'

Once Shaks. uses the word in the same sense, putting it into the mouth of the low-born Christopher Sly, Taming of the Shrew, Ind. ii. 107—

> 'Sly. Where is my wife?
> Page. Here, noble lord: what is thy will with her?
> Sly. Are you my wife, and will not call me husband?
> My men should call me lord: I am your goodman.'

The word is found also in NT as tr[n] of οἰκοδεσπότης, 'master of the house.' This Gr. word occurs 12 times in the Synoptics and nowhere else (Mt 10[25] 13[27. 52] 20[1. 11] 21[33] 24[43], Mk 14[14], Lk 12[39] 13[25] 14[21] 22[11]; in the last passage τῆς οἰκίας is added). The Vulg. rendered by 'paterfamilias' everywhere except Mk 14[14] 'dominus domus,' and so Wyc. gave 'housbond man' everywhere except Mk 14[14] 'lord of the hous.' Tindale introduced the phrase 'goodman of the house,' using it everywhere except Mt 10[25] 'lorde of the housse,' 13[27. 52] 20[1] 21[33] 'householder.' Cov. preferred 'good man of the house' in Mt 10[25], and 'householder' in 20[11]; otherwise he followed Tind., whom the rest of the versions before the Rhemish copied exactly. The Rhem. gives 'householder' in Mt 13[52] 20[1] 21[33], Lk 12[39]; 'master of the house' in Mk 14[14], Lk 14[21]; elsewhere 'goodman of the house.' AV follows Tind. except in Mt 10[25], Lk 13[25] 'master of the house.' The result is sometimes curious. Thus, as Trench points out, in the parable of the Labourers in the Vineyard, the 'householder' of Lk 20[1] becomes the 'goodman of the house' in 20[11]. RV has redressed this anomaly, but still presents three different translations of the word, 'master of the house' in Mt 10[25] 24[43], Lk 12[39] 13[25] 14[21]; 'householder' in Mt 13[27. 52] 20[1. 11] 21[33]; and 'goodman of the house' in Mk 14[14], Lk 22[11].

The word is a combination of 'good' and 'man' (not, says Skeat, a corruption of Anglo-Sax. gumman as suggested by Aldis Wright); and it is probable that the meaning 'master' arose from the meaning 'husband,' in which, it must be remembered, it is one of many similar combinations, as good-father, good-sister, etc.; in fact, all relatives by marriage were once so designated in England, and are still so designated in Scotland. How completely the adj. portion was swallowed up in the complete word * is illustrated by Trench

* Being now one word, 'goodman' should be accented, as Earle remarks (Philology, p. 616), on the first syllable, like chapman, and so distinguished from the two separate words 'good man.' In AV of 1611, however, it is given as 'good man everywhere except Pr 7[19] and Lk 22[11] where it is 'good-man.'

(On the AV of the NT, p. 96) in the line from Golding's Ovid, i.—

'The goodman seeks the goodwife's death.'

But it often furnished a word-play: Thus Cotgrave, Dict. s.v. 'Maistre'—'Also a title of honour (such as it is) belonging to all artificers, and tradesmen; whence Maistre Pierre, Maistre Jehan, etc.; which we give not so generally but qualify the meaner sort of them (especially in countrey townes) with the title of goodman (too good for many).' So Shaks. Twelfth Night, IV. ii. 141—

'Like a mad lad,
Pare thy nails, dad;
Adieu, goodman devil.'

And Fuller, Holy State, 'as he is called goodman, he desires to answer to the name, and to be so indeed.' Tindale uses the word once in the Pent., Ex 22^{8} 'the goodman of the housse shal be brought unto the goddes' (בַּעַל־הַבַּיִת, EV 'the master of the house'). Rutherford more than once describes Christ as 'the goodman of this house, His dear Kirk.' J. HASTINGS.

GOODNESS.—See GOOD and RIGHTEOUSNESS.

GOPHER WOOD (עֲצֵי־גֹפֶר 'ăṣê-gôpher, ξύλα τετράγωνα, ligna lævigata, Gn 6^{14}).—We have no clue from the etymology of the cognate dialects as to the kind of tree referred to. Celsius (Hierob. i. 328) argues that it is the cypress, from the similarity of sound between gopher and κυπάρισσος. Vossius argues that it was a resinous tree, from the similarity of sound between גֹּפֶר and כֹּפֶר 'resin.' Dillmann opposes Lagarde's view that גֹּפֶר is a contraction or clerical error for גֹּפְרִית gophrîth = 'pitch.' In any case it was a wood suitable for shipbuilding, and the ark was constructed of it. In ZATW, 1898, Heft i. p. 163, Cheyne suggests that the cuneiform phrase which underlies Gn 6^{14} was misunderstood, but that some variety of cedar is intended. G. E. POST.

GORGET.—In 1 S 17^{6} Goliath is described as having 'a target of brass between his shoulders'; in the marg. it is a 'gorget.' The 'gorget' was a piece of armour for protecting the gorge or throat. Spenser has the word in FQ IV. iii. 12—

'His weasand-pipe is through his gorget cleft.'

And Jonson, Catiline, iv. 2 (Cæsar pointing to Cicero)—

'See how his gorget peers above his gown,
To tell the people in what danger he was.'

Sir Walter Scott has it in Woodstock (Ch. I.), and in the Lay, v. 22—

'Undo the visor's barred band,
Unfix the gorget's iron clasp,
And give him room for life to gasp.'

GORGIAS (Γοργίας).—A general of Antiochus Epiphanes, who is described as 'a mighty man of the king's Friends' (1 Mac 3^{38}), and a captain who 'had experience in matters of war' (2 Mac 8^{9}). When Antiochus set out on his Parthian campaign (B.C. 166 or 165), his chancellor, Lysias, who was charged with the suppression of the revolt in Pal., despatched a large army to Judæa under the command of Ptolemy, Nicanor, and Gorgias. The Syrians met the Jews under Judas Maccabæus at the entrance to the hill-country of Judæa, and encamped at Emmaus. From this point G., with a body of 6000 men, attempted to make a night attack upon the Jews; but Judas, hearing of his advance, hastily quitted his camp, and, falling suddenly on the camp of the Syrians in the early morning, defeated them with great loss. When G. returned from a vain pursuit among the mountains, he found the Syrian camp on fire, and the Jews drawn up ready for battle; and, without risking an encounter, he fled to the Phil. country (1 Mac 3^{40}–4^{25}; Jos. Ant. XII. vii. 4; 2 Mac $8^{12\text{-}29}$). From 2 Mac $10^{14\text{ff.}}$ it appears that G., who is described as commandant of the district (στρατηγὸς τῶν τόπων), remained in that country after his defeat, and continually harassed the Jews by means of his mercenary troops, assisted by the Idumæans. Two or three years later Judas led an expedition against Gilead, and, in the absence of his brothers, entrusted the command of the Jews to two officers, Joseph the son of Zacharias, and Azarias. Contrary to Judas' orders, they attacked the Syrians in Jamnia, but were repulsed by G. with heavy loss (1 Mac $5^{16\text{ff.}\ 55\text{-}61}$; Jos. Ant. XII. viii. 6). In 2 Mac $12^{32\text{-}37}$ this defeat is barely mentioned, but we are told how Judas defeated G., and how the accursed (τὸν κατάρατον) G. himself was nearly taken prisoner by a Jewish horseman named Dositheus. The description of G. in 2 Mac 12^{32} as 'governor of Idumæa' is perhaps an error for 'governor of Jamnia' (so Grotius, and cf. Jos. Ant. XII. vi. 8). H. A. WHITE.

GORTYNA (<εἰς> Γόρτυναν A, Γορτῦνα ℵV, 1 Mac 15^{23}).—The most important city in Crete, after Gnossus, situated about midway between the two ends of the island. After the successful embassy sent by Simon Maccabæus to Rome (B.C. 139), the Roman Senate drew up a decree in favour of the Jews, guaranteeing the independence of their territory. Among a number of small autonomous states and communes to which copies of the decree were sent, G. is mentioned. From this we may infer that Jewish residents were then to be found in Crete. For the evidence that G. was at that time an independent community, see Marquardt, Röm. Staatsver. i. 333 f. H. A. WHITE.

GOSHEN.—1. Named in connexion with the conquests of Joshua in the south of Judah (Jos 10^{41} 11^{16}, both D^{2}). Its exact situation has not been discovered. It was a district (אֶרֶץ), not a city. 2. A town in the hill-country of Judah (Jos 15^{51}, P). Its site is unknown. 3. See next article.

GOSHEN (גֹּשֶׁן city ?, Gn $46^{28.\ 29}$, the point at which Jacob aimed in going down into Egypt; and land of G., Gn 45^{10} $46^{28\text{-}34}$ $47^{1.\ 4.\ 6.\ 27}$ 50^{8}).—The country in Egypt in which Joseph proposed that his father and brethren should dwell during the famine, that they might profit by the wealth of Egypt, and be near to him (Gn 45^{10}), which Pharaoh accordingly granted to them (47^{6}), and in which the children of Israel remained, with their flocks and herds, through the oppression, until the Exodus (Ex 9^{26}, cf. 12^{32}). It was suitable for a pastoral tribe, which would be, as such, an abomination to the Egyptians (Gn 46^{34}). It evidently lay on the Syr. frontier (Gn 46^{28}), and was considered appropriate for the temporary settlement of foreigners. When it is described as 'the best of the land' (Gn 47^{6}), that was no doubt from a shepherd's point of view, and it is generally considered that the Pharaoh who welcomed Jacob to Egypt belonged to one of the foreign dynasties, known as the Hyksos or Shepherd dynasties, and who were themselves hated by the Egyptians. The LXX, made, it must be remembered, in Egypt, has important readings. 'In the land of G.' (Gn 45^{10}) is ἐν γῇ Γέσεμ Ἀραβίας, so also 46^{34}; in the later passages the defining word Ἀραβίας is dropped. In the Apocr. book of Judith ($1^{9.\ 10}$) γῇ Γέσεμ appears to be roughly all the borderland of Egypt E. of a line drawn from Tanis to Memphis, i.e. all the E. borderland of the Delta, with perhaps a good slice of the Delta itself, within the Pelusiac arm of the Nile. Acc. to the LXX the city of G. should be Heroopolis; Gn 46[28] 'and he sent Judah before him unto Joseph, to show the way before him unto G.; and they came into the land of G.,' is simply συναντῆσαι αὐτῷ καθ' Ἡρώων πόλιν, εἰς γῆν Ῥαμεσσή, 'to meet him (Joseph) at Heroopolis, into the land of Ramesse'; and in the next verse '(Joseph went up to meet his father) to G.' καθ' Ἡρώων πόλιν, at Heroopolis. Hence we see that the Jewish view and tradition in the last centuries before Christ made the city of Heroopolis, near what was then the head of the Red Sea, the point at which Joseph met Jacob. Heroopolis is now fixed by Rom. milestones at Tell el-Mashkûta in the Wady Tumîlât, and is probably identical with Pithom. It was the first important station in Egypt on the S. road from Syria, and therefore a very likely place for such a meeting. But the city of G. can hardly have been identical with Heroopolis, even to the Jews; this mention of Heroopolis must rather perhaps be considered as the translators' improvement on the original.

The land of G. is to them the land of Gesem of Arabia. Now, from Ptolemy we know that Arabia was the name of a nome on the E. border of the Delta, with the capital Phacussa; and acc. to Strabo, Phacussa was the point at which the canal to the Red Sea branched from the Nile. At the spot which best answers to this description, viz. Saft el-Henneh, monuments have been found naming Per-Sopd and Ḳes, or Ḳesem. In the nome-lists of Ptolemaic times the xx[th] nome has the capital Per-Sopd, or Ḳesem, and is itself called Sopd. There can be no doubt that this is the nome of Arabia, and that Ḳesem is the equivalent of the LXX Gesem. In some cases the name of the city seems to be written Ḳes, which then can be at once identified with the principal element in the Gr. Phacussa. It would thus appear that Saft el-Henneh is the ancient Per-Sopd, Phacussa, Ḳes, and Ḳesem. There is, however, evidence of another kind that partly contradicts this. Farther N.E., beyond the entrance of the Wady Tumîlât, there is an important village called Fâḳûs, once capital of a large district corresponding to the Arab. nome, and identified by the later Copts with Phacussa. It is difficult to avoid the conclusion that the Arab. nome had two capitals—one Per-Sopd = Saft (el-Henneh), the other Ḳes or Ḳesem = Fakûs. Strabo would then have confused the two capitals in making Phacussa instead of Per-Sopd the point at which the canal branched off. If Jacob aimed at reaching Fakûs, he would probably have followed the N. route, close to the sea, since the S. route, to Heroopolis, would have taken him considerably out of his way. Why, then, does the LXX introduce Heroopolis for G.? It will be seen that the subject is still surrounded with almost incredible difficulties. When we know what ancient site was occupied by the modern Fakûs, where considerable mounds still exist, it will be possible to speak with greater certainty.

With regard to the extent of the land of G., if Judith is to be taken as authoritative, it included at least four Egyptian nomes outside the Delta, viz. the Sethroite on the N.E. frontier, the Arab. and the Heliopolitan, and that of Heroopolis in the Wady Tumîlât. Possibly, however, it should be restricted to the Arab. nome, perhaps from about Belbeis to Fakûs, although the Wady Tumîlât ought also to be included. By comparing Gn 47[4. 6.] with [11] we find that the land of Ramesse and the land of G. are almost or quite identical.

It is, of course, possible that G. is an entirely foreign name, unknown to the ancient Egyptians, and that the LXX translators were only making conjectures as to its identification. Of two things we may be certain, that it lay on the E. border of the Delta, and furnished excellent pasture; and if it did not produce luxuriant harvests of corn and vegetables, like the ancient Arab. nome, we find that the Israelites dwelling there were at least plentifully supplied with 'leeks, onions, and garlic' (Nu 11[5]).

GOSPEL.—Anglo-Sax. Godspell = 'God story' (not 'good story'),—the tr., from Anglo-Sax. times, of εὐαγγέλιον in NT. In Homer, in the sing., and in Attic Gr., in the pl., it signified a reward or a thank-offering for good tidings. In later Gr. (Plutarch, in the pl., Lucian, in the sing.) it signified also the good tidings itself. In LXX, 2 S 4[10], the Attic meaning and the plural occur: in the two remaining instances (sometimes quoted for the sense good news), 2 K 18[22. 25], it is probable that the non-classical fem. sing. εὐαγγελία ought to be read (cf. vv. [20. 27], where this form is certain). In NT the neut. sing. alone is found (in Lk never; in Ac twice; in Rev once; in Jn—Gosp. and Epp. —never, whether subst. or vb.), and in the sense of good news only; a sense, moreover, always specialized, in accordance apparently with the Deutero-Isaian εὐαγγελίζομαι, as may be gathered from the quotation and comment in Ro 10[15. 16], 'How beautiful are the feet τῶν εὐαγγελιζομένων ἀγαθά! But they did not all obey τῷ εὐαγγελίῳ.'

The content of this NT gospel had two stages. (1) In the mouth of Christ and of those whom, while He was on earth, He sent forth to proclaim it (Mt 10[7], Lk 9[2] 10[9] [Mk 16[15]]), it was the good tidings of the kingdom of God (Mk 1[14. 15], Mt 4[23] 9[35]) which He had come to establish; and this is called in Mk 1[14] 'the good tidings of God,' i.e. coming from God (cf. 1 P 4[17]); in Ac 20[24] 'the good tidings of the free favour of God'; in 1 Ti 1[11] 'the good tidings of (i.e. about) the glory (i.e. the manifested perfection) of the blessed God.' This good tidings about the kingdom Christ had also associated inseparably with His own person: Mk 8[35] 10[29] 'For my sake and the gospel's': hence it is likewise called in Mk 1[1] 'the gospel of (i.e. about) Jesus Christ'; and thus it enters upon the second stage in its meaning.

(2) After Christ's death and resurrection it became the good tidings (not so much brought by, and proclaimed by, as) about Christ (cf. Ro 1[1] 'The good tidings from God about [περί] His Son'); see 1 Co 9[12]; also 'the good tidings of (about) the glory (the manifested perfection) of Christ,' 2 Co 4[4]; or, simply, 'the good tidings,' 1 Co 9[18]. So the apostolic (chiefly Pauline) use may be defined as the good tidings, coming from God, of salvation by His free favour through Christ. See Eph 1[13] ('of our salvation'), Eph 6[15] ('of peace'). Probably, though not so certainly as Weiss seems to think, the word (like our word preaching) sometimes expresses not so much the content itself as the act of proclaiming it: in this way we may perhaps explain the genitives of those who preach and those who hear in such passages as 2 Co 10[14] 'We came as far as unto you in the gospel of Christ,' 2 Co 4[3] 'our gospel,' Ro 2[16] 16[25] 'my gospel,' i.e. our, my, exposition of the gospel; and Gal 2[7] 'I have been intrusted with the gospel (the preaching of the gospel) to the uncircumcision, even as Peter with the gospel to the circumcision'; not the content being different, but the sphere and the emphasis (cf. 1 Co 15[11] 'Whether it be I or they, so we preach, and so ye believed'). In each of the passages where 'my gospel' or 'my preaching of the gospel' occurs, the writer appears, according to the context, to be laying stress on some particular point which it has been his way to expound with special fulness as having been emphatically borne in upon him at the time of his preaching, or as closely affecting the case of the people to whom he is writing. Thus Christ the Judge, the characteristic of the early missionary preaching (Ac 17^{31}), is the element on which he lays stress in the 'our gospel' of 1 Th 1^{5} (cf. vv.$^{7-10}$ and 2 Th 1^{6-10}). Again, in Ro 2^{16}, after his theme has been the equal responsibility of Jew and Gentile as doers of law, he recalls his proclamation of the fact that God will judge by Jesus Christ all men alike, not by their outward situations but by their inward attitudes (τὰ κρυπτά). Once more, in 2 Ti 2^{8}, in order to encourage Timothy in the midst of suffering, the writer shows how, in 'his Gospel,' he lays stress upon the glorified state of Jesus the man and Christ the king,—king by royal descent and fulfilling prophetic anticipation. (Cf. 2 Co 4^{3} τὸ εὐαγγέλιον ἡμῶν, and v.^{5} Χριστὸν Ἰησοῦν Κύριον, the Lordship of the raised Christ being, in fact, the sum of the Pauline preaching, Ph 2^{10}). In none of these passages is there a single sign that he is hinting at a specific difference in the content of the gospel preached by himself and by the Twelve.

The later sense of εὐαγγέλιον, a gospel in writing, and then one of the Four Gospels, does not appear in NT, though the way may be prepared for it by the usage in Mk 1^{1} (see above). A second stage may be noted in the Didaché, c. xv.: 'Reprove one another, not in anger, but in peace, as ye have it in the gospel.' Here it seems to stand for a written body of Christian truth. Immediately afterwards we read: 'Your prayers and your alms and all your deeds so do ye as ye have it in the gospel of our Lord.' This might be a written collection of the teachings of Christ. Harnack—taking into account the text of the Lord's prayer (viii. 2), also said to be 'as the Lord commanded in his gospel,' and xi. 3, 'Touching the apostles and prophets, according to the ordinance (δόγμα) of the gospel so do ye'—suggests the Gospel of the Egyptians as the source (Texte ii. Proleg. 69 ff. and 79). The plural εὐαγγέλια, of the Four Gospels, does not occur till Justin Martyr (Apol. i. 66).

Literature.

This article will be taken up mainly with the subject of the Origin and Composition of the Four Canonical Gospels and their credibility as historical witnesses. These are points which can best be discussed for the four together, owing to the nature of the evidence, which is in part the same, or of similar character for all, in part arises directly from comparing them. Such an assignment of the space at command will, nevertheless, be felt to be disproportionate when the manifold interest of the Gospels, their exquisite beauty, the richness of the moral and spiritual instruction which they convey, and their preciousness to the Church, are considered. Yet it is rendered inevitable by the recent course and present position of critical inquiry, and the intrinsic importance of the questions as to the authorship of the Gospels, their relations to one another, or the sources used in them. The amount of controversy which there has been on these subjects during the last 100 years has been enormous, and the evidence bearing on them is exceedingly complex. The attempt to discuss them, even with that degree of fulness which seems to be required in an article such as this, will render it impossible here to treat the Gospels from other points of view. At the same time, it ought to be remembered that there is hardly any aspect under which the Gospels may be regarded, which may not contribute some element that ought to be taken into account in a full appreciation of their character even as historical documents. In particular, it is necessary for this purpose that there should be a sympathetic and discerning study of their doctrinal teaching and of its relation to the faith of the early Church generally, as it may be gathered from other sources.

I. Tradition as to Authorship. — The first three Gospels do not within their actual compass (i.e. apart from the titles) give any precise indication of their authorship. As to the fourth, in a concluding passage which appears to be an addition to the original work, it is alleged to have been written by the disciple 'whom Jesus loved, which also leaned back on his breast at the supper' (cf. Jn 21^{24} with v.^{20}), and to whom other allusions of the same kind in the course of the work doubtless also refer.

It cannot be asserted that the titles κατὰ Μαθθαῖον, etc., proceeded from the authors themselves. The names rest, indeed, on as good MS evidence as any part of the text. But, from the nature of the case, they might have been prefixed at some time subsequent to the issue of the first copies. They unquestionably represent, however, the belief of the most important Churches before the time when Irenæus wrote the first three books of his great work on Heresies, which he composed during the episcopate of Eleutherus (circ. A.D. 175–190). For a general consideration of the evidence up to this time we must refer to the art. NT Canon. It must suffice here to say, (1) that although our four Gospels did not at once attain that position of unique authority which they held not long after the middle of the 2nd cent., yet it is easiest to explain the history of their reception in the Church on the supposition that they were authentic records of the apostolic age concerning the life and work of Jesus Christ, and that they were this to a degree of fidelity and fulness, in which no other documents even then existing could compare with them; and (2) that the testimony of tradition raises a strong presumption in favour of the belief that they had severally some real connexion with the men whose names they bear. The formulas themselves, κατὰ Μαθθαῖον, etc., or εὐαγγέλιον κατὰ Μαθθαῖον, etc., need not as first used have implied more than this. They would be compatible with the belief that the work in question contained virtually the teaching of the man specified, though he had not himself written it down.

Further than this the external evidence by itself will not take us; nevertheless, it furnishes an important element for the solution of the problem.

There are two or three more circumstantial traditions in regard to the composition of the Gospels which need to be mentioned, because they have, as we shall presently see, served to suggest or been used to confirm some of the chief theories designed to explain the internal phenomena of the Gospels. The most important are contained in two fragments, preserved in Eusebius' HE (iii. 39), of a work of Papias which may probably have been written about A.D. 140. Often as they have been quoted, it may be well to give them here. The first relates to a writing by Mark—

'This also the presbyter used to say: Mark having become the interpreter (ἑρμηνευτὴς γενόμενος) of Peter, wrote down accurately—not, however, in order (τάξει)—as many as he remembered of the things either spoken or done by Christ. For he neither heard the Lord nor attended on Him, but afterwards, as I said, (attended on) Peter, who used to give his instructions according to what was required, but not as giving an orderly exposition (σύνταξιν) of the Lord's words. So that Mark made no mistake in writing down some things as he recalled them. For he paid heed to one point, namely, not to leave out any of the things he had heard, or to say anything false in regard to them.'

The second fragment is as follows—

'Matthew, however, wrote the Oracles in the Hebrew tongue, and every man interpreted them as he was able.'

The presbyter, on whose authority the former of these statements is made, was named John; and though he is to be distinguished from the apostle of that name, he was a companion of apostles and a personal follower of the Lord. Papias himself had conversed with this man, as we learn from another fragment (ib.). And from what we are told in that fragment as to the means by which Papias gathered information, it is reasonable to suppose that his statement as to Matthew's record was derived from the same or a similar source.

The more extreme critics of the earlier part of the present century used to argue that these accounts could not refer to our second and first Gospels. It is, however, coming to be admitted very widely among students of early Christian history that the statements in question would, at least at the time when Papias was writing, be connected with our Mt and Mk; for it is hard to imagine that these could in the interval between that time and the third quarter of the 2nd cent. have been substituted for other works bearing the same names, and could have completely expelled such predecessors. This, however, does not preclude the possibility that there may have been differences greater or less between the writings to which Papias referred the traditions preserved by him and the works concerning which the statements under consideration had been originally made. There was more particularly room for difference between the Greek Gospel according to Mt and the Hebrew work spoken of, which would not be readily detected owing to the general ignorance of Hebrew among Greek-speaking Christians. The description given of the work seems to point to a record in which discourses and sayings of Jesus decidedly predominated over mere narrative. The word λόγια, indeed, means 'oracles' and not 'discourses.' But while the term 'the oracles' might well from the first have been applied to our Lord's words, it is hardly likely that it should so early have been applied to a writing of the NT as such. Moreover, even when the inspiration of the NT had come to be as clearly recognized as that of the OT, the term 'the oracles' would not have been a fitting one for a single work, simply on the ground that it formed part of the collection.

Passing by Lk, concerning the composition of which tradition has nothing very significant to tell us, we subjoin an interesting statement regarding Jn. Clement of Alexandria relates (ap. Euseb. HE vi. 14), as a tradition handed down from the elders of former times, 'that John last of all, perceiving that the outward facts had been set forth in the Gospels, being urged on by his friends and inspired by the Spirit, composed a spiritual gospel.'

II. Internal Phenomena.—Thus far we have spoken of the evidence supplied by tradition. It remains to be seen to what extent this confirms or is confirmed by the characteristics of the Gospels themselves. We proceed, therefore, in the first place, to consider the signs of relationship between the first three Gospels and the manner in which these are to be accounted for, or in other words the Synoptic Problem.

i. The Synoptic Problem.—(1) The facts to be explained. On comparing the first three Gospels, we observe in them a remarkable amount of similarity, both in the substance, the general arrangement and the precise order of their narratives, and the actual words and phrases employed. The general view of the course of events given in these Gospels is almost exactly the same, from the ministry of the Baptist onwards, the subject with which Mk opens. Not only so, but to a great extent they omit the same and record the same deeds and discourses and incidents. This common character becomes specially noticeable when we compare them with Jn, the contents of which are widely different; and the suitability of the name Synoptic, which has been given to the first three, comes home to us with special force when that contrast with the Fourth is borne in mind. Nevertheless, even had we possessed the first three only, the amount of agreement between them would have called for explanation. For they are very brief accounts of a very full though comparatively short life. Moreover, they all make summary references to journeyings, periods of preaching and teaching, the working of many miracles of which they relate no details. The fact that out of all this possible material they preserve so largely the same selection, and that they deliver it so nearly in the same form, must be due to some cause or causes.

So far we have spoken in general terms of the resemblances between the first three Gospels. But, in the closer study of the fact, resemblances between pairs of them have also to be taken into account. The two most important groups of phenomena are in fact (a) the resemblances of Mk with Mt and Lk, either together or separately, and (b) the wholly additional matter common to Mt and Lk, but not contained in Mk.

(a) With regard to the former, it is to be observed that by far the larger number of the narratives and pieces of discourse contained in Mk are given also in both Mt and Lk, and nearly all in either one or the other. Also that for the most part the order of narrative is the same in all three; so that we may speak of a Synoptic outline. The exceptions are somewhat more considerable in Lk than in Mt; but it is noteworthy that they are almost entirely different in the two. Further, the same mode of relating incidents, conversations, and sayings is frequently to be observed in all three, to the extent even of the same sequence of clauses, the same words and phrases being adopted; but, even where this is not the case, there is very frequently similar close parallelism between Mk and one of the others; and, as before, this holds most often between Mt and Mk.

(b) The additional matter, referred to above, which is common to Mt and Lk, consists for the most part of discourses and sayings. In a considerable portion of it the resemblance even in language is very great; in other parts of larger total extent the similarity of form is noticeably less, though the substance is the same. In place, however, of that similarity of order which we remarked upon in the case of the relations of Mt and Lk with Mk, we find in that of the matter now under consideration a great diversity of arrangement. In Mt we seem to see a disposition to mass it in discourses of some length, while in Lk various portions of it are given as belonging to various occasions. Again, they combine it very differently with the Synoptic outline.

Besides the features which have been mentioned, there are some others that are less strongly marked, of which it will be most convenient to defer the notice till we have occasion to speak of the attempts which have been made to explain them, and which have served to fix attention on them. It is, indeed, true of those broader characteristics also, which have been described, that the clear and accurate observation of them has progressed hand in hand with the discussion of their causes. And it is one of the most certain gains to be expected from the study of the problem before us, that (whether we succeed in solving it or not) we cannot fail, through framing and testing our hypotheses, to become better acquainted with the actual contents of the Gospels, and to have both their common substance and their individual traits imprinted more deeply upon our minds.

We will proceed to take a rapid survey of the theories that have been devised to account for the phenomena.

(2) The theories that have been propounded.—Explanations of three kinds may be employed, while the principles involved in each may also be in various ways combined. The three chief kinds were all in one way or another tried within the first 30 years, from the time when, rather more than a century ago, active speculation on the subject began.

(a) Direct dependence of one or of two of our present Gospels on the third, or of one on both the other two, might be assumed. This was the simplest kind of explanation of resemblances between them that could be given, and that which therefore lay most ready to hand. It had been employed by Augustine long before in one of the earliest examples of an interest, which was but momentary, in the literary criticism of the Gospels (De Consensu Evangelistarum, i. 2). He speaks of Mark as the 'pedisequus et breviator' of Matthew. When, however, towards the latter part of the 18th cent. the critical study of the relations of the Gospels to one another began in earnest, the theory was also put forward that Mk's was the original Gospel, which the others had expanded, while some even claimed this position for Lk. But the most celebrated theory of this period was Griesbach's, according to which Mk was regarded as a compilation from both Mt and Lk (Commentatio quâ Marci evangelium totum e Matthæi et Lucæ commentariis descriptum esse monstratur, A.D. 1789–90).

(b) Resemblances might be traced to the use of common documents, and more room was left in this way than by the last kind of explanation for the differences between the Gospels to have arisen, which are remarkably intermingled with their resemblances. Eichhorn, whose twofold hypothesis was for a long time the most notable one of the type which we are now considering, made special efforts to account for the differences. He supposed that there was one chief document, an Urevangelium, or primitive Gospel, to which various additions, derived from oral teaching, were made as time went on. The sections common only to two Gospels were explained by two evangelists having used the same copy. These were the governing ideas of his theory, both in its earlier and later form. At first (A.D. 1794) he attributed the differences between the Synoptic Gospels to the translation of the primitive Gospel by different persons (the evangelists themselves and others), and the verbal similarities to the use in part of the same translations by the evangelists, along with different ones and with the original. But the process here imagined of translation and of the cross use of other translations was felt to be too complicated. It was difficult, also, in this way to account for the large amount of the same or closely similar language. This pointed to a common Greek basis. Accordingly Eichhorn, in a revised form of his theory, assumed a single translation of the primitive Aramaic Gospel into Greek, and supposed this Greek document to have received additions and modifications, extending in his imagination the operation of this cause of variations, to make up for that of a multiplicity of translations which he had abandoned.

(c) The common source was supposed to be an oral tradition to which a high degree of fixity had been given. Oral tradition could readily account for differences. But could it account for the strange resemblances? A theory based on it could claim to be scientific only in so far as it could suggest and render probable the existence of special historical conditions in the case in question, which would make it natural that the tradition should be characterized by a fixity of form approximating to that of a written document, though still possessing somewhat greater pliability. Such a theory seems to have been first conceived, and was certainly first clearly set forth, by J. C. L. Gieseler, the celebrated Church historian, in his Historisch-kritischer Versuch über die Entstehung und die fruehesten Schicksale der schriftlichen Evangelien (A.D. 1818). Most of those who have found in oral tradition the key to explain the characteristics of the Synoptic Gospels, have, if they have shown any just appreciation of the nature of the problem to be solved, reproduced in the main very closely the features of Gieseler's conception and his arguments. There was not room in this case for the same diversity as in the forms which could be given to the hypotheses of direct dependence and of common documents. At the same time, even the oral theory has been to some extent elaborated since Gieseler's time to meet a fuller analysis of the phenomena.

The name which must be mentioned next, in order that the course which investigation into the origin of the Gospels has actually followed may be rightly apprehended, is that of the great Schleiermacher. Instead of Eichhorn's single parent document, he assumed a number of more or less extensive compilations of narratives, the idea of which, and his name for them (διηγήσεις), he took from Lk 1[1]. This theory, which has been called Diegesentheorie, he put forth in his work on Lk (1817). The view, however, of his which has exercised a determining influence on subsequent criticism is not this, but his interpretation of the fragment of Papias concerning Mt, published in SK (1832). It was to the effect that Matthew put together only a collection of discourses and sayings which was afterwards embodied in our Mt. Next very naturally came the suggestion that this document was the source also of the matter in the third Gospel which it has in common with the first, and which is not in the second. And we find this view more or less clearly indicated by Credner (1836) in his Einleitung (§§ 87–89 and 91, pp. 201–206). He supposes also that the reminiscences of Peter's teaching alluded to in the other fragments of Papias were worked up by another writer into our Mk (ib. § 90).

The step most needed, however, in order that any decided progress should be made in solving the Synoptic problem was, that a clearer and juster view than had so far prevailed of the relations between Mk and the other two Synoptics should be attained. And the way to this had already been opened by C. Lachmann in his article, 'De Ordine Narrationum in Evangeliis Synopticis,' in SK p. 570 ff., 1835. He contended for the 'priority' of Mk, though he left open the question whether it was prior in the sense of representing an earlier form of the oral Gospel than the two others, or as having more simply and fully embodied a document used by the other two. C. H. Weisse, in his Die Evangelische Geschichte (1838), adopted the latter alternative, and combined with it the view that, along with this document, Matthew's 'Logia' was also used both in our first and our third Gospel. Here for the first time was that 'two-document hypothesis' which has since, and especially during the last 40 years or so, found so much favour. In the same year as that in which the above-named epoch-making book of Weisse's appeared, C. G. Wilke published a work on the theme, Matthäus oder Marcus, in which he did good service on behalf of Mk's priority, and of the documentary as against the oral hypothesis.

Nevertheless, the Tübingen School, which was just then rising into importance, and which for a considerable period held the most prominent place in the world of criticism, so far as Christian Origines were concerned, had committed themselves to the position that Mt was the first and Mk the last of the Synoptics. Later members of the school gave up the priority of Lk, but not of Mt. In the method of this school, the examination of the simple literary phenomena of the Gospels played only a very subordinate part. So far as these critics discussed the Gospels themselves and compared them, their object was chiefly to show how the several Gospels, by virtue of their individual characteristics, fitted in with and illustrated their own more general theories as to parties among the early Christians, and their tendencies. They endeavoured to distinguish the bias of each writer which had led him to mould the narrative in a particular way; and on the ground thereof they assigned to each document its age and the measure of historical importance which they were willing to accord it. They insisted in an exaggerated way on the peculiarities of the several Gospels, and drew unwarranted inferences therefrom; nevertheless, their work may be of use in preventing us from overlooking the individuality of the several Gospels, which in some other speculations is too much ignored.

The disposition of this school was to proceed to broad generalizations which had neither been reached nor verified by a careful and impartial examination of all the facts. In spite of the great ability of the chief men among them, and the permanent mark which they have left upon the study of early Christian history, their theories have in the main been overthrown, and that largely by men almost as 'free' as themselves from orthodox prepossessions. And in no respect has this been more signally the case than in regard to their criticism of the Synoptic Gospels.

The chief critical work of the last 40 years or so has been the lineal continuation and development of that of Weisse and Wilke. That is, the general tendency of it has been to establish more firmly the position that either the three Synoptic Gospels all made large use of a document which is to be seen with fewest additions, omissions, or changes of any kind in Mk; or that Mk itself is virtually that document; and further, that there existed another very early 'source,' a collection mainly of discourses and sayings, to which the matter common to Mt and Lk is to be traced.

Among the large number of critics, however, who would agree in these propositions when stated thus in general terms, there are not unimportant differences. The most considerable, perhaps, is that while (α) many, agreeing with Weisse, suppose that both the first and third evangelist had and used this collection in the same, or substantially the same form, and that the diversity in the mode of the presentation of the common matter in the Gospels is due to the different treatment of the same document by the two evangelists, (β) there are others who suppose that the collection must have come into the hands of the third in a markedly different form from that in which the first had it. The former view is that which has been most before the world: it is held by H. J. Holtzmann (Die Synoptischen Evangelien, 1863; Einleitung in NT, 1886), B. Weiss (Marcus-Evang. 1872; Matthäus-Evang. 1876; Leben Jesu, 1882; Einleitung, 1886), H. Wendt (Lehre Jesu, 1886), and others. But some eminent names may be cited on the side of the second view,—Reuss (Hist. of NT, p. 190 ff.), Lipsius (his views on the Synoptic problem are described by his pupil Feine, JB für Protest. Theol. 1885, pp. 1, 2). Weizsäcker may be said to hold an intermediate position (Untersuch. pp. 129–220).

Differences there are, also, among critics of the former of these two groups. One of the chief of these relates to the question whether the 'Logia' is most faithfully reproduced, especially as to order and arrangement, in Mt or Lk. Holtzmann and Wendt are on the side of Lk, B. Weiss of Mt. There are differences, again, as to the character and contents of the 'Logia.' Thus Holtzmann traces to it some portions of Lk which are peculiar to that Gospel as well as those common to Lk and Mt; while Weiss insists that historical circumstances must have been narrated in it as well as discourses.

Another important subject of controversy relates to the part of Mark, the disciple of Peter, in the composition of our second Gospel. In B. Weiss' view, Mark's Gospel, derived chiefly from his reminiscences of Peter's teaching, was itself the document used (along with the 'Logia') by our first and third evangelists. On the other hand, the matter common to the three Synoptics may be supposed to be derived from a document older than any one of them. This only leaves room for Mark to have introduced touches here and there. Again, B. Weiss supposes that Mark himself (as well as the first and third evangelists) made use of the 'Logia,' though to a much more limited extent, and that thus the first and third used the 'Logia' both directly and also in a measure mediately through Mk. But for this complicated theory he has found few adherents. [Resch (Agrapha, p. 27 f.) and Titius (Theol. Studien in honour of Weiss, Göttingen, 1897) may be mentioned as adopting it.]

Other critics, again, hold that the third evangelist must have known and to some degree made use of our Mt as well as his principal and older sources. Such arguments as may be adduced for this view have been most fully set forth by E. Simons in his monograph, Hat der dritte Evangelist den kanonischen Matthäus benützt? 1880.

The endeavour has also been made in recent times to supplement the theories as to the relations of the Synoptic Gospels by tracing back varieties of form to different translations of the oldest Hebrew document. This attempt has especially been carried out by A. Resch in his laborious investigations, in the course of which he examines the citations of our Lord's teaching in the whole range of early Christian literature, and compares them with parallels in the Gospels. See his

'Agrapha' in Texte u. Untersuch, v. Heft 4, 1889; and Aussercanon. Paralleltexte, x. Heft 1 and 3, 1893–95.

In England the oral theory has been far more widely accepted than it seems ever to have been in Germany, though among ourselves also it has, to a considerable degree, lost its hold in recent years. English readers will, however, rightly require that it should be kept in view in any discussion of the problem. The most recent advocate of it is the Rev. A. Wright (see his Composition of the Four Gospels, 1890; Synopsis of the Gospels, 1896; and Problems in NT, 1898). He has given to the theory a new development by supposing that the catechetical instruction of Christians in the facts of the Gospel history was carried out in a very systematic manner, and that there existed different schools of catechists. To the present writer it seems that no form of the oral hypothesis can furnish an adequate explanation of the phenomena of the Gospels; yet he believes that the influence of the period of oral teaching needs to be taken into account, in dealing with the whole problem of the origin of the four Gospels, far more than it commonly is by the adherents of the various documentary hypotheses.

The decision of most of the questions included in the subject before us must depend on the patient examination of a mass of particulars which cannot be set forth here. But it may be well to indicate in general terms the nature and bearing of the evidence on some of the chief points at issue. We pass on, therefore, to consider—

(3) The Source or Sources of the matter and order common to the three Synoptic Gospels.—It will not be profitless, in the first place, briefly to give the reasons for which Griesbach's theory has been generally abandoned. That theory is at first sight tempting. It seems to account readily for the fact that not only do we find in Mk so much that is common also to Mt and Lk, but that traits and words and expressions which occur, some in Mt, some in Lk, in narratives that are parallel, are frequently found in combination in Mk; so that this Gospel, while it is on the whole shorter, is generally fuller in the narratives it does contain. It is not impossible that in some, and even a good many cases, words, etc., from Mt or Lk may have been introduced, e.g. by the hand of an editor, into the second Gospel as we have it. But the theory of compilation cannot explain the phenomena as a whole. For (a) to carry out the process of analysis and combination to the extent required by this hypothesis would be a very complicated and difficult task, such as no one, especially in that age, would be likely to undertake. The supposition that Mt and Lk reproduced Mk, or the document embodied therein, with some abbreviations and alterations which are largely different because they acted independently, is a far simpler one. Moreover, it accounts for a large part of the similarity between Mt and Lk themselves, which, on Griesbach's theory, is left wholly unexplained. (b) The reasons that can be alleged, on Griesbach's theory, for Mk's relinquishing the order of narratives in Mt to follow Lk, and vice versâ, and for his omission of so much which those Gospels contain, though he is supposed in other cases to have combined them, appear to be very arbitrary. (c) A mere compiler could hardly have been able to give to his work the force and freshness and vividness which peculiarly characterize Mk.

We turn to the question whether the chief source common to the three was a certain tradition of oral teaching or a document. In judging of the adequacy of the former to account for the facts, it seems important, first of all, to distinguish between the effect which oral teaching might have, on the one hand, in determining the general character of the selection and presentation of the matter recorded, and, on the other hand, in securing a fixed order of sequence in the relation of particular incidents and pieces of discourse. Now, the contents and general form of the Synoptic outline, as we see it most simply in Mk, is such as might naturally arise from the circumstances and needs of the preaching of the gospel, as soon as its message was delivered to those who had not themselves known Jesus. In the earliest days after Pentecost, among the people of Jerusalem and the crowds from Galilee to whom the great Prophet of Nazareth had been a familiar figure, it was enough for the apostles to testify that He had risen from the dead. Even to a man like Cornelius, whom the fame of His deeds could not but have reached in a more or less distinct and accurate form, it might be enough to say, 'The word which he sent unto the children of Israel, preaching good tidings of peace by Jesus Christ (he is Lord of all)—that saying, ye yourselves know, which was published throughout all Judæa, beginning from Galilee, after the baptism which John preached; even Jesus of Nazareth, how that God anointed him with the Holy Ghost and with power; who went about doing good, and healing all that were oppressed with the devil; for God was with him. And we are witnesses of all things which he did, both in the country of the Jews and in Jerusalem; whom also they slew, hanging him on a tree' (Ac 10^{36-39}). But more and more, as years passed, and as the gospel was carried to fresh circles, men would wish to have particulars about the life and work of Jesus; and it would be necessary that a right impression of Him and His ministry should be imparted, in order that the meaning of His cross and resurrection should be in any measure understood. For this purpose an expansion would be needed of that brief summary which has just been quoted. The preachers would seek to set before their hearers in a comprehensive manner, and within such limits as oral teaching imposed, a view of the person of Jesus in its attractive grace and holiness and goodness, as He had been known to themselves and to the multitudes who followed Him, to enable them to realize His supernatural character, as it was evidenced by His wonder-working power, and the authority with which He spake. A detailed chronicle was not what was wanted; they wished simply to impart a clear conception of His mission and His credentials. The desired end could be best attained by a sketch which should give prominence to the salient features of His work, and which, while it contained some comprehensive descriptions of His occupations at different periods, and of the impression produced by His teaching and miracles, and marked a few chief epochs in His ministry, should be confined, for the rest, to an account of some important incidents and sayings, selected as examples out of a mass of others that might have been told. When they passed to the last days of His life, and His death, the mode of treatment would naturally be different. Here it would be no longer a question merely of illustrations. Besides all other reasons for giving a fuller narrative, such as the natural interest of the closing scenes, and the deep impression which all their details had made on the minds and hearts of the preachers themselves, it was necessary to press home and to justify the idea of a suffering Messiah. In addition to these aims, which tended to impart a particular form to the accounts orally delivered, the close intercourse maintained among the original group of Christian missionaries, even after they had begun to move about, and the similarity of the conditions under which this group at least was doing its work, and the influence which a few of the stronger characters would exert, together with the simplicity of mind and want of general education of the early disciples, would tend to establish and confirm a habit of telling the story in a particular way common to them all.

Now, the general mode of presenting the life and work of Jesus Christ in the Synoptic Gospels corresponds to that which has just been described. In other words, it is such as we might have expected, if the characteristics of the oral method of communicating the facts most needful to be known came to be imprinted on the written narrative. The form of the common record is not that which would have been naturally adopted by a writer who approached his subject and made use of his materials in the spirit and manner of a chronicler or biographer.

The range of the parallelism between the Synoptics must be considered in this connexion. The fact that it begins with the ministry of the Baptist may well be accounted for by all three having used a document which began thus. But even so, the cause of this being made the starting-point in such a document seems worthy of consideration, especially when we observe how that of the apostolic preaching as described in Acts was wont to be the same (cf. Ac 1^{22} $13^{24. 25}$). We can understand that it was a natural one for those who had such an aim as has been above suggested. The mystery of Christ's birth could not be freely spoken of at first to the unconvinced. On the other hand, the testimony of His great predecessor, whose work had made such a wide impression, afforded a fitting point of departure for commending Jesus to the faith of men. In this respect also, then, the habits of the period of oral teaching seem to have left their mark.

Considerations which are in part analogous may help also to explain why the parallelism between the Synoptics terminates where it does in the midst of the evidences of the resurrection. All three describe in a very similar manner the visit of the women to the tomb, and the appearance of the angel (Lk two angels) to them. After this point they differ widely. The assumption that they used a common document, which ended abruptly here, will go far to account for this. Still it is remarkable that it should have terminated in this fashion, and also that the difference in the concluding narratives should be so wide as it is. The early history of the preaching of the gospel may possibly again furnish a clue to the right explanation. At first the apostles were mainly occupied with bearing testimony to the resurrection of Jesus. They were themselves profoundly convinced of this great fact, and they called upon men to believe it on their word. They did not care to enter upon an elaborate tabulation of all His appearances; such would not be demanded of them. They would speak now of one, now of another. Subsequently, as we have said, the need for some account of the life and teaching and death of Jesus arose. The two things were in a measure distinct, and might for a time be kept so. Moreover, a certain method of narration might, under the conditions which we have indicated, have been commonly observed in the latter case, such as may never have existed in regard to the testimony to His resurrection.

The correspondences between the Synoptics in words and phrases show that they are connected by derivation from common sources of information, which were in Greek. This, however, does not of itself put the oral theory out of court, though it has sometimes been supposed to do so. For when we remember that the Aramaic-speaking territory in Palestine was surrounded by a belt of Greek-speaking districts, and also that many Hellenists yearly visited Jerusalem, we can see that from very early days—from the moment, indeed, that the Church began to expand—an oral tradition in Greek must have arisen, corresponding to that in Aramaic.

The resemblance, however, between the three Synoptic Gospels extends far beyond those broad features of which above we have so far been speaking. If the additional matter in Mt and Lk be omitted, there will be found remaining in each of them, with, comparatively speaking, very few exceptions, the contents of Mk given in exactly the same order,—the same sequence being maintained not merely in respect to events which stood in close historical connexion, but also in respect to sections which do not appear to have been so united. This seems clearly to point to the use of a common document. It is specially difficult to understand how, after insertions, sometimes of considerable length, the common thread could again and again have been taken up in the first and third Gospels exactly where it had been dropped, solely under the operation of tradition. But it is exactly what would happen if the writers had a document before them.

A comparison of the language, the words, the succession of clauses, the structure of sentences and paragraphs in the Synoptic Gospels, leads to the same conclusion. The extent of the element common to all three is remarkable. But, in order that the evidence bearing on the question at issue may be appreciated, it is necessary that attention should be fixed, not so much on this, as on the resemblance of Mt and Lk separately to Mk. Between these pairs, and especially between Mt and Mk, there will be found to be close similarity, amounting frequently to identity, saving a few words here and there, in sentence after sentence and passage after passage. Moreover, the character of the resemblances should be noted. We can understand that even in oral tradition striking sayings should have been preserved in a fixed form; and there would be special reason for fidelity in repeating all the teaching of the Lord. But there is also in the Synoptic Gospels an amount of close agreement in ordinary narration which is very difficult to explain by oral transmission, because there could be no sufficient motive for the care necessary to secure it.

Advocates of the oral theory allege the retentiveness of Eastern memories, and the habit of preserving orally the Rabbinic traditions, or the instances, common among Mohammedans, of being able to repeat the whole or large portions of the Koran. But it should be remembered that what has to be explained in the present case is, not the preservation of a record after its very words had come to be regarded as sacred, but the process itself of forming the fixed tradition. Could it have been fixed down to so many mere turns of expression as the result of the work of the apostles' teaching and preaching freely? And would either they or their immediate fellow-workers in instructing others have had any reason to insist on the reproduction of what they taught with that sort of uniformity?

Again, it is said that the oral theory alone will account for the differences between the Gospels. But the force of this argument seems to depend on adopting a point of view which is too much that of our own time. The writers of our Gospels would feel themselves to be far more nearly on a level with those of the documents (assuming that they had such before them) which they used, than men of later generations could. And it is the natural tendency of historians who embody matter from other writings in their own works to abbreviate parts of it, to improve the style, or at least to alter it in accordance with their own habits of expression, and at times, after picturing to themselves the scenes described, to represent them in their own way. Many of the differences between Mk and the two other Synoptic Gospels are of this character. This is especially the case in regard to Lk, the differences between which and Mk are, as has been said, the greatest. Moreover, even in the case of intentional quotation, there was in ancient times less desire for scrupulous accuracy in regard to the exact words used than there is at the present day.

(4) The Source or Sources of the matter common to Mt and Lk.—The phenomena here are in various respects different from those examined under the last head, and other considerations have to be applied to them. The material in question forms such a distinct mass that even on the oral hypothesis it must be supposed to have been collected and shaped separately from that account of the life and work of Christ upon which our attention has so far been fixed, and to have been subsequently in the first and third Gospels combined therewith. And indeed we may, with at least as good reason as before, attribute an important share to the influences of the period of oral teaching in forming the body of tradition now in question, though the needs to be met were different from those which called forth a general presentation of our Lord's work. Disciples who were familiar with the main facts of His life would be impelled to recur again and again to His precepts, which were to be the guide and support of their lives. Those sayings especially would be called to mind and repeated which set forth the character that was to distinguish the true followers of Christ, or which gave an authoritative decision in matters of ordinary conduct, or which inculcated the spirit that was to govern the members of the infant Christian communities in their relations with one another, or prescribed the rules that were to guide the missionaries of the gospel, or which afforded a solace and stay under persecution and sorrow, or, lastly, which spoke of that great consummation, that coming of the Lord and judgment upon an evil world, for which their hearts yearned so eagerly. In view of these wants, it would be exceedingly probable that sayings, parables, and discourses upon these themes should soon come to be put together and handed on in the shape of larger or smaller collections even before they were written down (cf. Weizsäcker, Apost. Zeitalter, pp. 369–401). They would form, as it were, a body of divine law, treasured in the communities of Christians. The form and contents of the discourses in Mt specially suggest this origin. Other traits appear in Lk which would also be natural after such a history of the preservation of the material.

But can the resemblances between these two Gospels be explained solely on the oral theory? Those who think so have a stronger case here than in regard to the resemblances between the same Gospels and Mk. There the close parallelism between the sequence of sections furnished a strong argument against that theory; here the great dissimilarity of arrangement is a serious difficulty in the way of the hypothesis that the same document was used by both evangelists. There, again, the similarity is found in ordinary narrative; here the matter in question consists almost entirely of Christ's own teaching, which would be likely to be preserved with special accuracy even in oral repetition. Nevertheless, there is in a considerable portion of the passages under consideration an amount of verbal agreement which it is hard to account for without supposing some intervention of writing.

By those who suppose that the use of a single documentary source, which contained all this matter, will explain the phenomena, efforts are made to reconstruct that document through a critical comparison of Mt and Lk. In each it may certainly have been altered in different ways and at different points; and it will be fair to remember that the divergence between the two Gospels, as they now lie before us, would in all probability be greater than that between either of them and the common source. Further, many pieces of teaching in it may have been introduced by formulas such as 'Jesus said,' which specified no particular occasion. The recently discovered Oxyrhynchus fragment affords an illustration of sayings so compiled. The very different positions which the same sayings occupy in the first and third Gospels may thus be less inconsistent with their derivation from a common document than we at first fancy. Possibly, it would not have been necessary for either of the evangelists to do such violence to the source as we may be inclined at first to fancy, in pursuing different plans in the arrangement of their material. That the first was inclined to mass together similar material, seems to be rendered probable by the fact that there are one or two cases in which pieces of teaching from Mk and from another source seem to have been woven together in Mt, which in Lk remain separate. Thus Lk has an account of a charge to the Twelve (9^{3-6}) which is closely parallel to Mk 6^{8-13}. He has also an address to the Seventy in ch. 10. Now, the substance of vv.$^{9-12}$ of the latter is found woven with the substance of Mk 6^{8-13} in Mt 10^{7-16}. Something of the same kind may perhaps be observed on comparing Mt 24. 25, Mk 13^{1-37}, Lk 21^{5-36} 17^{22-37} 12^{39-46} 19^{12-28}. Yet, to show how cautious we must be in drawing inferences, it may be worth while to observe that in Lk 10^{12-15} compared with Mt 10^{15} and 11^{20-24}, the usual parts, so to speak, of the two evangelists are reversed.

In connexion with the question before us, the greater or less clearness and naturalness of the contexts in which the same sayings occur in Mt and Lk respectively must also be taken into account. But this is a subject on which there is wide diversity of view. To the present writer it seems that the connexions are far more often obscure and difficult in Lk than in Mt. But however this may be, and when every allowance has been made which our ignorance of the actual form of the common document may suggest, it remains very difficult to believe either, on the one hand, that any one in the circle in which the first Gospel must have been composed should have employed the amount of literary art and labour necessary to construct the discourses found in that Gospel out of fragments; or that, on the other hand, the third evangelist, if he had those wholes before him, should have felt it to be his duty to break them up.

Moreover, the hypothesis that the two evangelists derived all this matter from the same document, is as incapable as the oral theory of explaining the singular phenomenon referred to above as to the degree of agreement in different parts (see i. (1) (b)). For the character of the subject-matter in the two classes of parallel passages affords no reason for either evangelist having preserved it with so much less fidelity in the one case than in the other. It would seem to be more possible to account for the facts by supposing that two compilations which had in the main an independent history, though copies of some of the same written fragments have passed into each, have been embodied in the first and third Gospels respectively.

(5) Some subsidiary features of relationship.—There are no groups of facts indicative of connexion between the Synoptic Gospels, or between pairs of them, which are at all comparable in extent and prominence with those discussed under the two last headings. A few others, however, which need investigation must be briefly noticed.

(a) In spite of the signs of 'priority' in Mk on the whole, there are cases in which Mt or Lk or both of them have a stronger appearance of originality in particular words, or turns of expression, and even in the character of a whole section. Mk 1^{40-45} 2^{1-12} 3^{1-6}, compared with their parallels, may be taken as examples. Similarly, there are instances in which Mk has words or phrases not like his usual style, and which occur more frequently in one or both the others (e.g. ὁ πατὴρ ὁ ἐν τοῖς οὐρανοῖς in Mk 11^{25} = Mt 6^{14}. It appears only here in Mk, but is common in Mt).

(b) Again, although the records of Christ's teaching are so much more limited in Mk than in Mt and Lk, that Gospel has, in certain cases, accounts of discourses which, so far as they extend, are closely parallel with Mt and Lk; at the same time, the accounts of these two are longer and, to a greater or less degree, parallel with one another. Here, plainly, Mk is not the source, and does not in all respects most fully represent it (e.g. cf. Mk $1^{7.8}$ with Mt 3^{7-12} and Lk 3^{7-17}; Mk 3^{22-30} with Mt 12^{24-37} and Lk 11^{15-26} and 12^{10}).

(c) In narratives in which Mt and Lk are on the whole closely parallel with Mk, they yet have little touches, phrases, etc., in common, which are not in Mk (e.g. cf. Mk 2^{3} with Mt 9^{2} and Lk 5^{18}; Mk 2^{9} with Mt 9^{6} and Lk 5^{23}; Mk 2^{22} with Mt 9^{17} and Lk 5^{37}).

Holtzmann's assumption, in his Synopt. Evang., that although the source common to the three Synoptic Gospels is on the whole most nearly reproduced in Mk, yet there are cases in which it has been more exactly preserved in the other two, seems capable of explaining many at least of these phenomena in a simple manner. It should, further, be remembered that some discourses or incidents of which that document may have contained accounts, may also have been elsewhere recorded in a fuller or slightly different form, and that Mt and Lk may have known of these other records, and have adopted them, or at least been influenced by their recollection of them, in particular instances.

These considerations render it unnecessary to suppose, with B. Weiss, that Matthew's 'Logia' (if we may for convenience so speak) was used in the composition of Mk, as well as in Mt and Lk, though in Mk only to a very much smaller extent. They also go far to destroy the force of such evidence as is alleged in support of the view that our first Gospel was known and made use of by our third evangelist. The wide differences between the two render it very difficult to suppose this to have been the case. Ways of accounting for coincidences between them which do not assume knowledge of one Gospel by the writer of the other are therefore to be preferred. In addition to those already suggested, it may be observed that accidental agreement, revision by later hands, and unintentional assimilation of the texts of the two by copyists, may well in conjunction be responsible for a considerable number of the instances. Others explain the class of phenomena to which we are referring, by the supposition (alluded to above, p. 237) that the third evangelist knew the first. Holtzmann himself has adopted this view, thus rendering his earlier hypothesis, that the original common document differed in certain respects from Mk, and is at times more exactly reproduced in the first and third Gospels, to a great extent unnecessary, as he has explained in his Einleitung, pp. 363, 364. It is only suggested, however, that the third evangelist was influenced by 'reminiscences' of Mt, which is in itself a confession that the evidences of dependence are somewhat vague and scanty. We believe that we shall have the majority of critics on our side in asserting that they are altogether too slight to withstand the case that may be made out, on pure grounds of general probability and apart from any theory of inspiration, against any knowledge of the first Gospel by the writer of the third, from the wide divergences between them.

(6) Features peculiar to the Synoptic Gospels severally, and summary with regard to the composition of each.

As the question of the composition of Mt is the most complex and difficult, we will reserve it till the last, and begin—

(a) With Mark. It will, I believe, be very generally allowed by critics at the present day that the Mark who is referred to in NT had a part of some kind in the composition of our second Gospel; for the tradition to that effect is too strong to be altogether set aside. But what was that part? It is well known that this Gospel is distinguished by many touches which it is specially natural to attribute to recollection of St. Peter's teaching. But did these form part of the work which was used in the composition of Mt and Lk, and were they eliminated by the writers of these Gospels? In other words, was our Mk itself, as we have it, one of the original documents into which the Synoptic Gospels are to be analyzed? Or, on the other hand, did Mark himself take a document—the same which was used in Mt and Lk—and revise it, though much more slightly, only adding to it traits here and there which he had derived from his close intercourse with St. Peter? It cannot be said that criticism has as yet even approximated to a decision on this point. If a well-assured position in regard to it is ever reached, it must be mainly through a careful examination and weighing of all those individual points in which Mk differs from the other two Synoptic Gospels in parallel contexts, in order to ascertain whether they can best be explained as the result of alteration in Mk, or revision in the two others. But, in regard to point after point, several considerations have to be borne in mind; there is also a possibility sometimes of other explanations of the facts; and throughout, the bias of each critic is apt to tell in favour of one theory or another, so that it is an exceedingly difficult matter to form a sound general impression.

(b) The question of the authorship and composition of the third Gospel cannot be separated from that of the Acts of the Apostles. It is generally admitted, on the ground of remarkably plentiful indications of style and other characteristics, that the composition of these two books was the work of the same hand; and further, that the second of them includes accounts of some of St. Paul's missionary journeys by one who was himself a companion of his at the time. But the question of the authorship is at first sight rendered complex by evident signs that other sources have been used as well in certain parts of both works. It will, however, I believe, be found to be much simpler than is generally supposed. For those portions of the Acts, or certain of them, which are allowed to be by a companion of St. Paul are, if I mistake not, marked to an eminent degree by those special words and expressions which are found throughout the two works, though in many parts they are scattered sparsely. That is to say, the man who wrote those memorials of journeys in which he himself accompanied the apostle, was the same who put together accounts, written and oral, which he obtained from others, of the life and teaching of Christ and the early history of the Church, and in reproducing them left upon them some marks of his own literary habits. (See Expositor, 1893, pt. i. p. 336 f.) If, then, the author of the Gospel and the Acts was a companion of St. Paul, it will be readily allowed that he was none other than Luke, who is singled out by tradition.

St. Luke has placed a short introduction at the beginning of his Gospel (1^{1-4}) which is full of significance both as to the method in which the knowledge of the life and teaching of Christ was preserved generally, and as to the purpose of his own book. He distinguishes virtually two periods in the history of the transmission of the facts up to the time at which he was writing. First they were delivered orally by those who 'from the beginning were eye-witnesses and ministers of the word'; then after a time attempts began to be made to write down what had been thus learned, or portions of it. Individual members of the Church were also more or less fully and carefully instructed in the facts.

Advocates of the oral theory have asserted that St. Luke treats the written accounts to which he refers as no longer possessing importance. They find this meaning in the aorist ἐπεχείρησαν. But the force of the aorist will be fully recognized if we regard it as emphasizing the difficulty of the task and the tentative character of the efforts to perform it. Unquestionably, his aim was to supply something more adequate. But there is nothing in his language inconsistent with the supposition that he was prepared to make use of any suitable written material that came to his hand, as well as of traditions orally delivered. And it is in every way most natural to suppose that he would do this.

If the arguments described above (i. (3)) be sound, the record which is most nearly represented in Mk, or that Gospel itself, was one of the chief documents that he used. He may besides this have had another document, whence mainly he derived that subject-matter which is common to him with Mt—a document where it was arranged to a great extent in a manner different from that in which we find it in the first Gospel. Or, again, he may have obtained it by an independent labour of collection, by himself transcribing short pieces which had been early committed to writing, or by making extracts from longer accounts, such as those to which he seems to refer in his preface, and also by writing down some things immediately from oral tradition. In one or other of these ways, also, he acquired those additional parables, pieces of teaching, and incidents, special to his Gospel which he introduces into the Synoptic outline, including them more particularly in the long insertion between Christ's departure from Galilee (9^{51}) and His final ascent to Jerusalem (19^{31}), the point at which Lk again begins to run parallel to the other two Synoptic Gospels. His account of the birth of John the Baptist, and the birth and early years of our Lord, may very probably have been taken from some special written narrative. It has a peculiarly Aramaic colouring and other features of its own. It would have been a very congenial occupation to a man such as from his two works we know the author of the third Gospel to have been, to make notes of information that he received concerning the life and work of Jesus, to copy out and keep precious pieces of His teaching. He may have begun to do this long before he set forth the material he had amassed in his Gospel, or even thought of doing so; and visits to Palestine, as on the occasion when St. Paul was seized at Jerusalem and imprisoned at Cæsarea, would give him very favourable opportunities for going on with this work.

(c) The question as to the composition and authorship of the first Gospel is rendered specially complicated by the fact that there is a strong and unwavering early tradition that the Apostle Matthew wrote in Hebrew, while the relations of our Mt with the other Synoptics, and especially with Mk, which are evidently through the Greek, are of a kind to preclude the idea that, as it stands, it is a mere translation. The manner in which these facts are recognized and dealt with by such an eminent advocate of the oral theory as Westcott is very instructive. 'The parts,' he writes, 'of the Aramaic oral Gospel which were adopted by St. Matthew already existed in the Greek counterpart. The change was not so much a version as a substitution; and frequent coincidence with common parts of St. Mark and St. Luke, which were derived from the same oral Greek Gospel, was a necessary consequence' (Introd. p. 228 n.). It is, however, very difficult to conceive how the process suggested could have been carried out in such a way as to produce the actual phenomena. It is much simpler to suppose that, with the view of supplementing a Greek document which existed already (viz. Mk or the document most nearly represented by it), he translated from a Hebrew (or Aramaic) Gospel, which may well have been composed by, or may at least in some way have been connected with the teaching of, the Apostle Matthew. But we seem to have no means of deciding whether such a work contained other portions corresponding to the matter in Mk. It may have done so, and the touches peculiar to Mt and that Hebraic tone and disposition to emphasize the connexion between the new dispensation and the old, which are more or less noticeable in it as a whole, may be thence derived. The manner also in which the subject-matter taken from the different sources has been combined in the Greek Mt may have been influenced by the order in the Hebrew work. For although Papias' description of St. Matthew's work as 'The Oracles,' as well as the nature of the matter which there is most reason to suppose taken from it, make it highly probable that it was specially characterized by the records it gave of Christ's teaching, its contents need not have been strictly confined to this. Some light might be thrown on these points if we knew more of the Gospel according to the Hebrews; for it is not unnatural to surmise that this heretical Gospel may have been based upon, or have borne some similarity to, the Hebrew Mt. Unfortunately, our knowledge of this work also is so scanty that no conclusions can be safely drawn from it. (All that is known respecting the Gospel according to the Hebrews has been recently put together and reviewed by Harnack, Chron. i. p. 625 ff.).

Once more, however, it is difficult to conceive in a simple manner how the Greek Mt could have been translated from a Hebrew original, even in those parts where it is not parallel with Mk; for its observed relations with Lk have also to be taken into account. How does there come to be in these two Gospels that singular combination of parallel passages whose verbal similarity is such that they could not have been obtained through independent translation, with others sufficiently different to be so accounted for? We may, perhaps, get a hint of the circumstances under which this resulted from Papias' reference to a time when there was no received representative of Matthew's Hebrew work, but each translated it as he could. Such a state of things may well have led to the translation of different portions having been written down at different times. Some of these translated fragments may have become current before others, and so have been embodied in both Mt and Lk.

Finally, it is to be observed that, in spite of the difficulties which we have discussed in regard to the connexion between our Greek Mt and a Hebrew source, it is marked by features which fully justify us in regarding it as that setting forth of the Gospel history in Greek which kept closest both in spirit and in form to the mode of presenting the Gospel in the Aramaic-speaking Church.

ii. The Fourth Gospel, especially in its relation to the Synoptic Gospels.—It is impossible to review here the whole subject of the authorship and historical character of the Fourth Gospel, and many points connected therewith may be more naturally treated in the article specially devoted to this Gospel. In a general article on the Gospels, however, it will be suitable, and even necessary, that we should compare the first three Gospels as a class with the fourth, and consider some of the questions raised by the contrast which they present. Some of the chief difficulties felt in regard to the genuineness and authenticity of Jn are in point of fact due to, while others have been mainly suggested and are emphasized by, its differences from the Synoptics. It is also not less true, though it has been less commonly noticed, that there are features in the Synoptic Gospels which are not easily understood when they are viewed in the light of Jn; for the superior credibility of the respective accounts is by no means always on one side.

We will therefore touch on the main respects in which the representations of the life and work and person of Christ in Jn and the Synoptic Gospels need to be examined in relation to one another, and then discuss briefly the problem how the subject as a whole should have come to be presented in these two ways, and whether it is consistent with the truth of each, and with the traditional authorship of the Fourth Gospel.

(1) The march of events, manner in which Christ's person and office were manifested, and method and effects of His ministry.—That Synoptic outline, to which allusion has already been made, is of a simple character. Immediately after the baptism of Jesus and His temptation in the wilderness have been recorded, it proceeds to the opening of His ministry in Galilee, and is entirely occupied with His works and teaching in that district and the neighbouring parts to the east and north, till His final departure therefrom. It seems then to conduct Him continuously to Jerusalem for that Passover at which He suffered, though it does so by more or less protracted and circuitous journeyings, in the course of which He is still seen engaged in His work of teaching and healing. For anything the Synoptic Gospels say, we might suppose that Jesus paid no visit to Jerusalem during His ministry till that time when He was crucified. Further, we note that between the two limits, the first proclamation of the gospel in Galilee and His crucifixion, not one of them gives chronological marks properly so called. They scarcely even note the passing of the seasons. (There is an indication of the occurrence of a springtime, Mt 12^1 = Mk 2^{23} = Lk 6^1, and there are one or two allusions to observances which were connected with particular times of year). It is true that the more carefully we study the Synoptic Gospels, the more clearly do we perceive in our Lord's work as they represent it certain stages and turning-points which follow one another according to a very natural order of development. And we may conclude that their arrangement of His words and deeds corresponds in the main to successive periods in His life. But these periods can be ascertained only by a study of the internal character of the narrative.

In the Fourth Gospel, on the other hand, the flight of time during Christ's ministry is marked, not indeed by ordinary chronology or references to events of external history, but by the mention of several Jewish feasts. This Gospel is in fact chiefly taken up with records of what happened during the visits of Jesus to Jerusalem on the occasion of these feasts. In a word, the centre of interest in the Synoptic Gospels is Galilee, in the Fourth it is Jerusalem and Judæa.

When the two plans of narration are compared, it is found possible to fit them together, without forcing, to an extent which is remarkable, considering the difference between their plans, and the absence of any indication on the part of the fourth evangelist as to how the contents of his Gospel are to be combined with the Synoptic record. He represents Jesus as in the neighbourhood of John the Baptist subsequently to His baptism, and as then returning to Galilee. The first visit to Jerusalem which he describes is for a Passover that happened soon after this, and before (as it would seem) the commencement of His regular ministry in Galilee (Jn 1^{29}–2^{12}). In the holy city itself and in Judæa, at the time of this feast, Christ's public work began, according to Jn (2^{13}–4^3). He returns to Galilee by the most direct route, through Samaria, and preaches there during His brief stay ($4^{4\text{-}42}$). So we are brought to a point ($4^{43\text{-}54}$) corresponding with the beginning and early days of the ministry in Galilee described in the Synoptic Gospels. The fourth evangelist then proceeds to give an account of a visit to Jerusalem for a Jewish feast. It is the only one occurring during the period of the Galilæan ministry, and curiously in this single instance he does not specify what feast it was (ch. 5). In 6–7^9 we have narratives connected with Galilee, some of the main incidents of which are given also in the Synoptics, and which belong, according to all the evangelists, to the latter part of His ministry there. Jn gives notes of time; this section in his Gospel relates to the interval between the approach of a Passover (March), for which Jesus did not go up to Jerusalem, and the following Feast of Tabernacles (September), when He finally left Galilee. In contrast with the impression given us by the Synoptic Gospels, Jesus, according to Jn, went straight to Jerusalem for this feast, and His journey thither must have been swift (Jn $7^{2\text{-}14}$). There followed at the beginning of winter the Feast of Dedication, for which Jesus was also there. It is not easy to decide how much of Jn 7^{14}–10^{39} is connected with the former, how much with the latter, of these feasts; how much, again, belongs to the intervening weeks, or whether Jesus spent the whole of this time in Jerusalem and its immediate neighbourhood, or retired for any part of it to a greater distance. The interval between the Feast of Dedication and His last Passover He spent in Peræa, where He still taught and won disciples ($10^{40\text{-}42}$), and in the north-east corner of Judæa (11^{54}), saving His visit to the neighbourhood of Jerusalem for the great miracle at Bethany ($11^{1\text{-}44}$). The Synoptic Gospels are so far in agreement with Jn that they indicate a ministry in this same region before the final going up to Jerusalem (Mt $19^{1.2}$ = Mk 10^1, Lk less definitely). The Synoptic and Johannine narratives begin to correspond more closely at the approach to the city on this last visit, though there are still many divergences in detail.

As regards the main and most characteristic difference thus far noticed between the first three Gospels and Jn, it is fair to say that all considerations of historical probability are in favour of Christ's having made frequent visits to Jerusalem, such as are related by the latter. As a religious Jew, and especially one who would not be detained by any of the occupations of a secular calling, He would naturally attend many of the feasts. It is, moreover, inconceivable that, having His great prophetic mission to discharge, He would confine His teaching till the last few days of His life to the north and east of Palestine, and never seek to declare His message in the great centre of the religious life of the chosen people, where the effects of doing so would be so much farther-reaching, and all the local associations would add to the significance of His words and deeds. Again, the catastrophe described by the Synoptic Gospels themselves, and the manner in which it was brought about,—the enmity of the ruling priests, lawyers, and Pharisees in Jerusalem,—must have been prepared for. The work of Jesus in the country districts could hardly of itself have threatened their authority in such a way as to inspire their determination to destroy Him. The two or three days of teaching in Jerusalem which preceded their formal conspiracy against Him would have been altogether insufficient to bring their hostility to a head, if there had not been already deep-seated hatred. Various slight indications in the Synoptic Gospels, such as instances of His having disciples and friends in Judæa, may be also more easily explained if He had actually taught there during the earlier part of His ministry.

We pass on to consider the representation of the history, viewed not so much as a series of events as in its moral and spiritual aspects. From the Synoptic Gospels it appears that Jesus made the formation of a little band of devoted disciples and their instruction and training a primary aim of His earthly ministry. (See esp. Mk $3^{13.\ 14}$, Mt $13^{10-17.\ 51.\ 52}$, Mk 4^{34}, Mt 10). In Jn this work is more minutely and fully related. We see the first gathering of a few around Him (1^{35-51}), which would naturally precede any formal call to definite service, such as that which is referred to Mt 4^{18-22} = Mk 1^{16-20}. From the beginning almost of His public ministry He moves about surrounded by a few who have attached themselves to Him (Jn $2^{2.\ 12}$ 3^{22} $4^{2.\ 8.\ 27}$). The impression made on them by His deeds and words is specially recorded (Jn $2^{11.\ 17}$ 4^{27}). The conditions necessary for the slow growth and due probation of their faith were not interfered with by the singularly full and exalted declarations concerning His person and work made even by the Baptist ($1^{29.\ 36}$), and throughout by Himself to disciples (1^{51} 3^{13-15}), and also in the hearing of a wider circle as early as the second recorded visit to Jerusalem (5^{17-47}). For, distinct though these claims might be, their nature and the language in which they were expressed were so new, and His course of conduct as a whole corresponded so little with common expectation, that to apprehend His meaning rightly was a matter of great difficulty, and the faith even of those most favourably disposed to receive Him, or who had already given Him their allegiance, was put to a severe test thereby. The reality of the trial appears alike in Jn and the other three (comp. Jn 6^{66-71} with Mt 16^{13-19} = Mk 8^{27-30} = Lk 9^{18-20}). In each account the faith of the Twelve is recognized as a great victory, and they are contrasted with others. A class of persons who had for a time taken up the position of disciples, but who afterwards fell away through the perplexity which He caused them,—through becoming disappointed in Him,—is clearly portrayed in Jn (6^{60-65}; and cf. 7^{3} $8^{31ff.}$ $11^{45.\ 46}$ 12^{11}), though in the Synoptic Gospels they hardly come before us. Jesus Himself saw that some of those who professed to be disciples were of this unreliable character, before either they themselves or others knew it (2^{23-25}). That there should have been this class is in every way probable, under the conditions of the case, and in view of facts like the wide popularity for a time of the Prophet of Nazareth, which the Synoptic Gospels, too, relate. But it is almost inconceivable that any one writing at the end of the 1st or beginning of the 2nd cent. should have described them in a manner so true to historical circumstances, except from actual recollection of instances. There was no motive or guidance for doing so in the trials of the Church at that time. Those who fell away then did so under the influence of the love of the world, or of philosophy, or the fear of persecution. A moral in regard to the last-named cause of defection might be pointed from examples of secret believers who were afraid to confess Christ, and such are spoken of in Jn (12^{42} 19^{38}; cf. also 7^{13}), but they are a distinct class from those mentioned above, whose conduct was such as would have occurred among those who were compelled to judge of the claims of Jesus during His lifetime, but not afterwards.

The chief points on which the conflicts of Jesus with the Jews turn in the Synoptic Gospels, appear also in Jn (cf. Mt 12^{38-45}; Mt 16^{1-4} = Mk 8^{11-13}; Lk $11^{16.\ 29-32}$ with Jn 2^{18}). They make charges of demoniacal possession (cf. Mt 9^{34}, Mt $12^{24ff.}$ = Mk $3^{22ff.}$ = Lk $11^{15ff.}$ with Jn $8^{48.\ 49.\ 52}$ $10^{19.\ 20.\ 21}$). They charge Him with disregarding the Sabbath (cf. Mt $12^{1ff.}$ = Mk $2^{23ff.}$ = Lk $6^{1ff.}$, Mt $12^{9ff.}$ = Mk $3^{1ff.}$ = Lk $6^{6ff.}$, Lk $13^{10ff.}$ $14^{1ff.}$ with Jn $5^{10.\ 16.\ 18}$ $7^{22.\ 23}$ $9^{14.\ 16}$). At the same time the difference in the illustration which Christ uses as an argumentum ad hominem in Mt 12^{11} and in Jn 7^{22} should be noticed, and the exquisite suitability of each to the particular scene of controversy. The one would come home to the countryfolk of Galilee, to whom such a case of conscience may even have been already familiar; the force of the other would be felt by the Jews of Jerusalem, with their high sense of the importance of such points of ceremonial law.

As regards the character of the miracles in Jn, it is curious that he does not relate any example of the cure of one possessed with a devil—which, according to the Synoptic Gospels, was one of the commonest kinds of our Lord's miracles. This is the more singular because teaching as to an important aspect of Christ's mission could be deduced from such miracles, and was so by Christ Himself, according to the Synoptic narrative (Mt 12^{25-30} = Mk 3^{23-27} = Lk 11^{17-26}). On the other hand, the first miracle recorded in Jn (2^{1-11}) is of a different type from any in the Synoptics. The other miracles in Jn are either the same as, or similar in kind to, those which they relate. The miracle of raising Lazarus, however, seems to surpass in wonder the raising of Jairus' daughter and of the widow's son, though on consideration it may well be questioned whether it does so to an appreciable extent. But it is in any case remarkable that so great a miracle, and one which, according to Jn, served to precipitate the action of the Jewish Sanhedrin, should be omitted in the Synoptic account. While recognizing this, it may be well to notice that the miracle of Christ which must seem the most stupendous of all from the point of view of naturalism,—'that of feeding the multitude,'—is related by all four evangelists.

Speaking generally, although Jn gives us a profounder view of the meaning of our Lord's work, and unfolds the great drama of the belief and unbelief which He provoked, with a more awful sense of its import than the Synoptic Gospels do, yet, in respect to the broad features of the history, they are either in essential agreement, or are not necessarily inconsistent with one another.

(2) Comparison in detail of passages in which the first three and the fourth Gospels are parallel or approximate to one another, or are in conflict.—We must be content with touching on a few points of special interest.

(a) The work of the Baptist (cf. Jn 1^{19-36} with Mt 3^{1-17} = Mk 1^{2-8} = Lk 3^{1-17}). Alike in the Synoptic outline and in Jn, the work of the Baptist is the starting-point of the history. But on comparing their accounts it is to be noticed, that while we have in the former a general description of the Baptist's preaching before the baptism of Jesus and of that event itself, the latter takes up the history at a time a little (probably a few weeks) later, when the Baptist had reflected on the signs which accompanied the baptism of Jesus, and when he could not only speak of 'the Coming One,' but point Him out. It does not appear from the Synoptic account who saw the signs and heard the voice. The words spoken from heaven have in Mk and Lk the form of an address to Jesus; nevertheless, it cannot be supposed that these evangelists, any more than Mt, imagined them to have been spoken simply for the assurance of Jesus. All three, we cannot doubt, record them as a proof of His Messiahship. From Jn it may be inferred that the knowledge of these signs rested on the evidence of the Baptist, who declared what he had seen and heard. To him the revelation was granted, as to one fitted by his exceptional spiritual enlightenment to receive it, not to all the bystanders, or, at all events, not to them with the same clearness. And this assuredly was in accord with the laws of God's spiritual kingdom. The views of the person and work of Christ taught or implied in the Baptist's language will be referred to below.

(b) The cleansing of the temple (Jn 2^{13-22} cf. with Mt $21^{12.\ 13.\ 23}$ = Mk $11^{15-17.\ 28}$ = Lk 19^{45-48} 20^{2}). It is a well-known difference between the Synoptic Gospels and Jn, that while he records a cleansing of the temple at the very beginning of the public work of Jesus, they place their corresponding narrative among the events of the last week of His life. There is nothing inherently difficult in the supposition that such an act should have been performed by Jesus at each of these epochs in His ministry. If on an early visit to Jerusalem He saw the traffic desecrating the temple courts, as He must in all probability have done, it would be natural that He should be moved to righteous indignation against it. Nor need He have felt restrained by the fear of too soon proclaiming His Messiahship. By such an act He did not obviously do this; it was one which any prophet might have performed. The consciousness of a character higher even than that of a prophet is revealed only in words of mysterious import. It is likely enough also that the abuse would again in a short time appear, in spite of His rebuke. If, however, we assume that the difference between Jn and the other Gospels as to the time of the cleansing arose through reminiscences, which were fundamentally the same, having been combined and connected in diverse ways, the account of the fourth evangelist is certainly not the less reliable of the two. For he must have known that given by the first three, since, even if he were not acquainted with their Gospels, the fact of their all recording this tradition implies its being widely spread; and he would not have departed from it, whether in order to correct or to supplement their narrative, except on the ground of possessing good information. It is to be added that in respect of vividness, and of the appropriateness with which the scene and the several parts of the action are represented, the superiority is on the side of Jn. One or two differences in the two accounts appear to accord with the difference of time.

(c) The feeding of the five thousand and crossing of the lake (Jn $6^{1-14.\ 15-21}$ cf. with Mt $14^{13-21.\ 22-33}$ = Mk $6^{30-44.\ 45-52}$ = Lk 9^{10-17}). This is the narrative in which Jn and the Synoptic Gospels are most closely parallel. As is commonly the case in Jn, the relation of the miracle is followed by teaching concerning spiritual mysteries, which appear to be suggested by the miracle, so that we are led almost to regard it as an acted parable. But the fact that the Synoptic Gospels record the miracle, without giving any corresponding discourse, shows that the fourth evangelist cannot be rightly accused of inventing the miracle as a basis for the discourse, and if he did not in this case, there is the less reason to suppose that he did so in others. Jn agrees in many points of detail and in some phrases with the Synoptic Gospels, esp. with Mk and Mt. It is possible that these may be due in part to acquaintance with these Gospels, or with the document embodied in them. But a common tradition would equally well account for such correspondences as may be observed. Indeed, this is the most probable explanation of the relation between Jn $6^{12.\ 13}$, Mt 6^{20}, Lk 9^{17}. He would seem to give here in a fuller form the incident of which they have preserved a partial reminiscence.

Even in this narrative, where the resemblance between the four evangelists is greatest, Jn is still very independent. And many of the touches peculiar to him are such as would be imparted by an eye-witness. There is greater particularity in his account, e.g. words which, according to the Synoptic Gospels, were spoken to or by the disciples generally, were, according to Jn, addressed to or spoken by individuals amongst them. The more lifelike character of his account of the conclusion of the incident of the miracle should also be noticed. There was a scene of excitement and enthusiasm, and Jesus, after His wont, quietly withdrew (Jn vv.$^{14.\ 15}$). This we can understand far better than that the multitudes should have been willing to disperse, simply on being bidden to go, after witnessing such a work (Mt v.^{23} = Mk vv.$^{45.\ 46}$).

(d) The closing scenes. It will be impossible to do more than allude to a few of the divergences from and additions to the Synoptic Gospels which we find in Jn. As regards the much discussed subject of the Day of the Crucifixion, it must suffice to say that, whatever may be the difficulties arising from the Synoptic language concerning the Last Supper, the view that Jesus was crucified on the 14th of Nisan, which is the natural inference from Jn's language, must be accepted as the most probable. On this assumption, his statements throughout are clear and self-consistent, while they are supported also by some indications in the other Gospels. To pass on, there are many signs of accurate knowledge in Jn's whole account of the last evening with the disciples, the arrest, and condemnation of Jesus. For instance, the preliminary investigation before Annas, and the fact mentioned in Jn and nowhere else that he was the father-in-law of Caiaphas, fit well with all the statements contained in Josephus regarding the succession of members of the family of Annas to the office of high priest during Annas' own lifetime. Again, when Jesus is brought to Pilate, we obtain from Jn a clear and thoroughly probable view of the scene and of the successive acts of the drama. The prisoner, as was natural, is conducted at once within the governor's house, while the Jewish rulers remain outside for a ceremonial reason (18^{28}). Pilate passes to and fro. In vv.$^{29-32}$ he is outside parleying with the Jews; in vv.$^{33-37}$ he proceeds with the examination of the prisoner; vv.[38-40] Pilate again parleys with the Jews. 19[1-5] Jesus is mocked and led out to them; vv.[6-16] they succeed by their clamour in securing His condemnation. In Mt 27[11-26] = Mk 15[1-15] the positions and the parts of the several actors are not nearly so distinctly indicated.

(3) The peculiar doctrinal character of Jn.—It is necessary to inquire whether the representation given us in the Fourth Gospel of the teaching of Christ, or the belief of others, has been affected by the special doctrinal point of view of the writer in a way to destroy its substantial truth.

We may first notice some signs that he was, to say the least, not wholly unconscious of the importance of preserving faithfully the language and thought of the time concerning which he was writing. The most striking is the fact that the term 'the Logos,' which, as he uses it in the Prologue, gives the very keynote of the Gospel, is nevertheless nowhere put by him into the mouth either of Jesus or any other speaker. But, again, he distinguishes more than once between the manner in which the disciples viewed acts and words of Christ at the time, and afterwards in looking back upon them (2[22] 12[16], cf. also the Lord's words to Peter, 13[7]). He does not read the full belief of a later time into the earliest days of discipleship. It should be noticed also that the evangelist need not be supposed to give 3[16-21] and [31-36] as parts of the words spoken respectively by Christ and by the Baptist. On the contrary, they seem rather to be comments by the evangelist himself, which are not intended by him to be viewed in any other light.

At the same time, the way in which the record almost insensibly passes into exposition in these cases, suggests that the two may sometimes be even more closely conjoined. It is natural, and often almost necessary, under the limits of space to which all are subject, for any writer or speaker, in giving the substance of what has been spoken by others, so to report them as to bring out that which he conceives to have been the significance of their words. There might, no doubt, be a special tendency to do this on the part of one who, like the writer of the Fourth Gospel, had the definite object of impressing truth in which he profoundly believed. That which he had even quite soundly inferred as the conclusion from all that he had experienced and learned, might thus have unduly influenced him in his account of what was said on some particular occasions. Two instances in which it seems specially likely that his own perception of the meaning of Christ's work may be affecting his record, are the words which he assigns to the Baptist (1[29]), and to the Samaritans (4[42]). It is difficult to suppose that even the former, much less the latter, could already at that time have attained to a belief in Jesus as the Saviour 'of the world.' We will go on to compare Jn 1[30] with the somewhat similar saying in the Synoptic Gospels (Mt 3[11] = Mk 1[7] = Lk 3[16]). In view of the stress laid in other passages in Jn on the pre-existence of Christ, it seems most probable that the evangelist himself would have held that this truth was conveyed in the words ὅτι πρῶτός μου ἦν. Yet this phrase is an enigmatical one; it does not strictly express any idea but that of essential priority, which might be in point of rank as well as of time. So regarded, it does not differ widely from the phrase in the Synoptic Gospels, ἰσχυρότερός μου, which also is enigmatical. Each brings out a somewhat different view of Christ's superiority. It would have been easy for the fourth evangelist to have made the assertion by the Baptist of the doctrine of Christ's pre-existence more distinct. Thus, although he may have been in a measure influenced in the form which he gives to the Baptist's words by the desire to teach through them an important article of faith, he has in doing so evidently been kept under control by his sense of historical truth.

We proceed to consider briefly the contents of Christ's own teaching as it is recorded in Jn.

(a) His unique relation to the Father—the unfolding of all that was comprised in the words 'My Father.' In the matter common to Mt and Lk one passage is included (Mt 11[25-30] = Lk 10[21, 22]) which is characterized by the thoughts and many of the expressions on this subject that we are accustomed to regard as most distinctly 'Johannine.' Mt 24[36] = Mk 13[32] supplies another instance of the use of ὁ υἱός and ὁ πατήρ as absolute terms. The preservation of this teaching, even though to such a limited extent, in the Synoptic Gospels, goes far to establish the credibility of the fuller record in Jn. If Christ dwelt on this theme at all, there is every reason to think that He must have done so more often and largely than they indicate. That He did so is also rendered probable by a striking, even though indirect, piece of evidence in St. Paul's Epistles. St. Paul more than once uses the phrase 'the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ' (Ro 15[6], 2 Co 1[3] 11[31], Eph 1[3], Col 1[3]). This remarkable expression may most naturally have had its origin in the historical fact that Jesus was accustomed to dwell upon the theme that God was, in an altogether unique sense, His Father.

(b) Christ's attitude to the Mosaic Law. It is certain that we derive in part a different impression on this subject from the Synoptic Gospels and Jn. There is nothing in the former corresponding to the phrases 'your law' (Jn 8[17] 10[34]) and 'their law' (15[25]). In their record of our Lord's condemnation of the legalism of the scribes and Pharisees, the distinction between the law of Moses itself and the additions made to it in tradition appears more clearly (Mt 15[2-9] = Mk 7[1-13]). In one saying recorded in Mt (23[2, 3]), Christ even maintains the authority of the scribes on the ground that they are the representatives of Moses. There seems, at first sight, to be nothing in the Fourth Gospel equivalent to the assertion in Mt 5[17-19] (= Lk 16[17]) concerning the permanent validity of every point of the law; while in it the spiritual meaning of the OT, and the superiority of Christ to Moses (e.g. 7[19-23]), are far more fully brought out.

Nevertheless, on a close examination, there appears to be fundamental similarity between their respective representations. The saying concerning the permanent validity of the law in Mt is immediately followed by the great passage which shows what Christ meant by its true fulfilment; while the words in Jn 10[35] 'the scripture cannot be broken'—where 'the scripture' referred to is one occurring in what has just before been described as 'your law'—appear to involve a principle equivalent to that laid down in the saying in Mt 5[17-19]. Further, the remarkable correspondence in the thought of Mt 19[8] = Mk 10[5-9] and of Jn 7[22] should be noted. In both a distinction is drawn between the law of Moses and a more primitive law.

(c) Eschatology. The Jewish form of eschatological expectation is more marked in Christ's teaching given in the Synoptic Gospels than in Jn. In the latter we are especially taught that spiritual and eternal laws and principles are great facts of the present, and that judgment is ever being executed through their continuous and mysterious operation. So far as our thoughts are turned to the future consummation, they are especially fixed on the blessedness of completed union with Christ, and the circumstances attendant upon His coming drop out of sight. The Synoptic Gospels may be taken as witnesses to the fact that Jesus did make use of the current imagery in speaking of the things to come. But the view can hardly seem improbable to any one, that, on this subject at all events, the mind of the Master is more fully reflected in Jn.

(d) The maxims in regard to conduct which the Synoptic Gospels—more especially Mt and Lk—contain, are among the most precious portions of these Gospels. In the earlier part of Jn this element is absent, but it receives a large amount of recognition in the discourses at the Last Supper. Here the law of Christian love, and the duty of humbly ministering to others ($13^{1\text{-}15.\ 34.\ 35}$, $15^{12.\ 17}$), and generally of keeping Christ's commandments (14^{15} 15^{10}), are insisted on. Here, also, sayings on the conditions and privileges of discipleship occur, identical with, or closely parallel to, some of those which are found in other contexts in the first three Gospels. (Cf. Jn 12^{25} with Mt $16^{25.\ 26}$ = Mk $8^{35.\ 36}$ = Lk $9^{24.\ 25}$, and cf. also Mt $10^{37.\ 39}$ = Lk 17^{33} and Lk 14^{26}. Again, cf. Jn $13^{13.\ 14}$ with Mt 10^{24a}, Lk 6^{40}; and Jn 13^{16} and 15^{20} with Mt 10^{24b}. Again, cf. Jn 13^{20} with Mt 10^{40} = Lk 10^{16}). The encouragements to pray in these chapters of Jn should also be compared with sayings on prayer in the Synoptic Gospels.

(4) The style of Christ's teaching.—The difference between Jn and the Synoptic Gospels in this respect seems not to be so great in reality as is often imagined. Justin Martyr's description of our Lord's teaching as consisting in 'short, pithy, and abrupt sayings,' applies, no doubt, with special truth to the Synoptic records of it. But in Jn, too, its style is essentially proverbial or 'gnomic.' The sentences are short and oracular. The discourses consist of a series of separate propositions, and the development of the thought is effected, not through a ratiocinative argument of an ordinary kind, but by slightly altering the form of a proposition, or by placing it in a different connexion.

Again, the use of parables appears from the first three evangelists to have been specially characteristic of Christ. He employed them, however, more particularly in addressing the multitudes; and this part of His teaching is hardly at all recorded in Jn. Moreover, we have in Jn one genuine parable ($10^{1\text{-}6}$), followed in vv.$^{7\text{-}10}$ by its interpretation. Jn $10^{11\text{-}18}$ appears to be the interpretation of another parable, the parable itself being omitted by the evangelist (see Weizsäcker, Untersuch. pp. 252, 253). Or perhaps it may be truer to say that parable and interpretation are here merged in one. Although He was wont to teach His disciples by expounding to them the parables which they heard Him address to the people (Mt $13^{10ff.}$ = Mk $4^{10ff.}$ = Lk $8^{9ff.}$, Mk 4^{34}), it would be natural that He should vary His method in some such way as we have suggested, when His instruction of the Twelve did not take the form of a supplement to what He had spoken to others.

It has further to be remarked that Christ's own office is the theme of the figures in Jn. The parables related in the Synoptists are concerned most frequently with other subjects, especially the kingdom of God and its laws. Yet this one also is not absent from His thoughts there (cf. the physician, Mt 9^{12} = Mk 2^{17} = Lk 5^{31} and Lk 4^{23}; the servant of J″, Lk $14^{16ff.}$; the king's son, Mt $21^{37ff.}$, Mk $12^{6ff.}$, Mt $22^{2ff.}$; the judge, Mt $25^{31ff.}$).

The different aspects under which the life and work and person of Christ are presented in the Synoptic Gospels and Jn may be reconcilable. We have given some reasons for thinking that they are so in great measure. But the question remains, how the existence of such differences in the records can be explained. And it may be observed that it is one for which even those need to seek an answer who admit only, as the majority of modern critics do, that the Fourth Gospel contains considerable historical elements.

Now, the Fourth Gospel has a clearly defined aim ($20^{30.\ 31}$, and cf. $1^{1\text{-}14}$), which goes far to explain the selective method on which the writer has proceeded in constructing his Gospel. When in addition to this we take into account the fact that he must almost certainly have been acquainted with the contents of the Synoptic Gospels, and that he would at least feel under no obligation to recount what was already recorded, and that he may even have avoided the repetition of it when it did not fall in conveniently with the plan of his own work, and that in point of fact he is in the habit of assuming in his readers the knowledge of things that he does not narrate, little difficulty can be created by his omissions.

The difficulty is rather to understand how the first three evangelists should omit so much that we find in Jn. The same reasons did not exist in their case for passing over facts as in that of Jn. To some small extent, indeed, they were influenced in what they relate by the bent of their own minds and the special needs of those whom they addressed. But the very fact that the matter and arrangement of all three are so largely the same, shows that their contents and form must have been in the main determined by some other cause than individual purpose or bias. Their fragmentariness must be due to the limited character of the material that had come to their hand. We have seen that the historical circumstances under which the documentary sources of the Synoptic narrative were shaped, were of a kind to circumscribe their range. But in order to explain the phenomenon now before us—the contrast between the Synoptic and Johannine accounts—it seems necessary to suppose further that the knowledge embodied in the latter had, at the time the first three Gospels were composed, been delivered only within a comparatively limited circle. It is difficult to imagine that even Mark and the editor of the Greek Mt would have remained unaffected by it if it had been widely spread through a considerable part of the Church. And it is impossible to believe that Luke would, seeing that he evidently had sought for information in different directions, and desired to give a certain completeness, so far as he could, to his narrative. There appears to be nothing unnatural in this supposition. The needs of simple Christians, and of the mass of the unconverted, which had led originally to the shaping of the oral instruction in a certain way, and which through it had influenced the character of the earliest documents, would continue to be most generally felt. The number of those able to appreciate the deeper teaching would be small.

III. The Date of our Gospels and of the Sources embodied in them.—In endeavouring to arrive approximately at the date of the Gospels, it is necessary to consider both the testimony of tradition and internal indications.

1. The Synoptic Gospels.—If, as is probable, the fragment of Papias about Mt is a report of what he had heard many years before from John the Presbyter, and preserves for us the recollections of the latter concerning a period already past when Papias met him, the composition of our Greek Mt would seem to fall within the 1st cent. General considerations respecting the history of the position of this Gospel in the Church point to its belonging at least to the 1st cent. It has often been argued, on the ground of Mt 24^{29}, that the Gospel was composed before the destruction of Jerusalem in A.D. 70; but the words in question may be explained by the fidelity with which the original source has been preserved. Nor do there seem to be other indications in the Gospel which enable us to assign it with confidence to a time either before or after that or any other date.

On the ground of the strongly supported tradition which connects the Second Gospel with Mark, we may somewhat more nearly determine the time of the composition of this Gospel. It would seem, according to the oldest form of the tradition, to have been after St. Peter's death that Mark wrote it, and consequently we cannot place its composition much before A.D. 70. The lower limit will be that of the period after this for which Mark, who must have been in middle life at the date just named, is likely to have lived. Internal indications do not help us in this case any more than in the last.

The lower limit for the composition of the Third Gospel is fixed by a consideration similar to that in the last case. Its author was a companion of St. Paul for some years, and there is in point of fact no reason to doubt the tradition which identifies him with Luke, named in St. Paul's Epistles. This Gospel consequently cannot have been written much later than A.D. 80. On the other hand, the greater precision with which the siege of Jerusalem is referred to than it is in Mt and Mk (see Lk 19^{43} 21^{20}), seems to show that in this Gospel the original form of the prophecy has been somewhat lost, owing to knowledge of the particular circumstances of the event.

But we have seen that sources, documentary and other, are embodied in the Synoptic Gospels. In order, then, to judge how near we are in reality brought to the events related, we have to inquire into the historical character of the matter which the evangelists used, and the faithfulness with which they have reproduced it. This is a fruitful field for study. It is only possible here to say that the subject-matter of the Synoptic Gospels is marked by traits which show that the information proceeds direct from those who have lived amid the surroundings described. The characteristics of Jewish life and thought in Palestine in the first half of the 1st cent. of our era are reflected in the narrative with a truth which could not have been otherwise imparted.

The fact that our Gospels were put forth far from Palestine, in the midst of the Græco-Roman world, and subsequently to, or at the earliest only a short while before, the destruction of Jerusalem, —that great catastrophe which profoundly affected the Jews everywhere, and above all in Palestine, and the Christian Church itself,—becomes (strange to say) a guarantee of their truth. Placed as the evangelists were when they wrote, they could not have accurately reproduced the features of an age which had passed away, as they are found to have done, except from immediate knowledge of their own, the reports of those who possessed it, or the use of documents based on it. Attention may be directed to the following points:—(α) The distribution in Pal. of the Jewish population on the one hand, and of the Grecized cities and regions on the other. It will be found that our Lord's work is confined, saving in a very few cases, which are of the kind that may be truly said to be exceptions that prove the rule, to the pre-eminently Jewish districts. In Galilee itself the incidents of His ministry are connected with Jewish villages and village-towns, not with the places known in the outside world. We may infer what Christ's own plan was for the work of His brief ministry on earth. Only the first evangelist lays stress on it; the records of the second and third, and we may add of the fourth, equally reveal it, but they do so, to all appearance, unconsciously. And although we can on reflection see clearly the reason for such a course of action, it is not one which would have naturally suggested itself to men who, like the third and fourth evangelists at least, were deeply impressed with the universality of the gospel. (β) The political and social circumstances, the strangely mingled Jewish and Roman institutions and remaining effects of the period of Grecian rule, the relations of the jurisdictions of Herod and the Roman governor and the Jewish priests and elders, and the influence of the Pharisees and scribes. (γ) The popular Messianic expectation, and the temper of different classes in respect to it, its various forms and the beliefs connected therewith. (δ) The subtle correspondences in form between the teaching of Jesus and that of Jewish Rabbis, combined with the vital differences in spirit.

The teaching, again, of our Lord is much of it such as could have been given only by Himself in His own lifetime, or is marked by the prominence of terms and ideas which speedily ceased to be much in vogue in the Church. This serves to show that the character of the record generally can have been comparatively little affected by the thought and language of the Church in a subsequent generation.

The following may be taken as illustrations:—(α) The use of the term and idea 'the kingdom of God' in the Gospels (see The Jewish and the Christian Messiah, by the present writer, pp. 226, 227). (β) The use in the Gospels of the title 'the Son of Man' (see ib. pp. 243, 244). (γ) The use of the term μαθηταί (see Weizsäcker, Apost. Zeitalter, p. 36).

In order that the Gospels may be tested in the respects indicated with the greater precision, those portions of them which appear to be derived from common sources, or from a source peculiar to one or other evangelist, or which are the setting or the remarks furnished by the several evangelists individually, should be separately examined.

2. The Fourth Gospel.—The history is contemplated in this Gospel from a point of view acquired through long reflection and experience, and through sharing in the ever-widening work and conflicts of the Church. And yet familiarity with Palestine and with the thought and feeling of its population at the time to which the record refers, is manifested in it not less markedly than in the others. If these two characteristics—the immediate knowledge of the facts, and a wide and large conception of their significance—belong, as appears to be the case, to one and the same person, we must suppose that he was one of the immediate disciples of Jesus whose mind underwent a remarkable growth during his subsequent life. There is next to nothing in the character of John the son of Zebedee, as we see it in the Gospels and the early chapters of the Acts, which marks him out as fitted to be the writer. And the allusion to him in Gal 2^9, as one of the apostles of the circumcision, may seem unfavourable to the belief that he was so. But tradition, which assigns to him the authorship, also represents him as having lived to a great age, and having passed his later years amid the influences of Ephesus. This leaves room for a change in his apprehension of the truth. And, strange as this change from the mode of thought of the Twelve in the early days of the Church at Jerusalem to that of the writer of the Fourth Gospel may seem to us, it is one well within the bounds of possibility, and hardly to be reckoned greater than some of those of which there have been instances among religious thinkers in our own century. It is to be added, that if the characteristics of this Gospel have been correctly described above, the difficulty as to the authorship would be in no way lightened by supposing that the writer was not the son of Zebedee. For there is no other of the earliest Palestinian disciples who, so far as we know, could more easily have become prepared to write the Fourth Gospel.

[The trustworthiness of the traditions as to the old age of John the son of Zebedee has been called in question, more especially of late by Harnack in his Chron. d. Altchrist. Lit. i. pp. 320 ff. and 656 ff. For a discussion of this question see NT CANON.]

IV. THE HARMONY OF THE GOSPELS.—A comparison of the Gospels, very different for the most part in its method and object from that which we have been reviewing, has been associated with the name of the Harmonists. Starting from the assumption that the inspiration of Holy Scripture involves its complete immunity from error even in the most unimportant historical details, they endeavoured to reconcile all inconsistencies in parallel accounts in the Gospels, and, when this was found to be impossible, they inferred that different incidents or occasions were referred to. For many years past, however, even those thoughtful students of the Gospels who have believed in the absolute infallibility of every part of Scripture, as well as others who had no wish to deny this thesis, have felt dissatisfied with the expedients resorted to by the Harmonists; and have been more inclined to say that our knowledge is not full enough to admit of such a process being soundly applied, and to suggest that if we were acquainted with all the circumstances the apparent discrepancies would vanish.

Recent criticism is seldom ready to admit that variations in two narratives which have a general resemblance, or in the form and setting of sayings which in substance are the same, point to two similar but distinct events, or to the repetition at different times of the same teaching. It is in the habit of attributing such variations to the natural action of tradition, where they were not due to one or other of the evangelists themselves. It would even account thus for the recurrence of similar sayings (or incidents) in the same Gospel. A tradition, it says, came to be embodied with greater or less differences of form in each of two documents which have been used by the evangelist; he has given the two reports of the same fact as if they were reports of distinct facts. And its chief interest in these 'doublets,' as they are termed, is that they may be a means of discovering more about the original documents. There are cases in which such an explanation appears probable. On the other hand, modern critics overlook far too much the consideration that history does sometimes repeat itself, and in particular that all men who feel that they have a message for mankind necessarily insist often on the truths which they are most anxious to inculcate, and in doing so use again and again the same language. Thus Christ must in all probability have spoken some of His most striking sayings many times. And this may well have been the cause of some at least of the variations and repetitions in our records. We are not, however, entitled to reject any of the above explanations on the ground of an à priori theory as to the nature of inspiration. The truth, so far as it is possible for us to ascertain it, can be reached only through the careful weighing of probabilities.

[The following may be taken as instances in connexion with which the various methods of explanation described above may be considered:—Mt 8^{5-13} cf. with Lk 7^{1-10} and with Jn 4^{46-54}; Mk $4^{21.\ 22}$ with Mt 5^{14-16} 10^{26} and with Lk $8^{16.\ 17}$ 11^{33} 12^{2}; Mk 4^{25} with Mt 13^{12} 25^{29} and with Lk 8^{18} 19^{26}.]

A truer kind of harmony may be sought for in the Gospels than that which, in the supposed interests of the Faith, men have too often mistakenly attempted to establish. We may inquire whether there is, or is not, amid all differences an essential inner agreement, or at least compatibility; whether the several representations of our Lord's Person and Life in them do not give in combination an image marked by unity and completeness. If we can trace in the Gospels such a harmony, we shall have herein the best guarantee that we could desire of their historical truth, and shall derive therefrom the noblest conception that could be formed of the common inspiration of their fourfold testimony.

LITERATURE.—In the following list an attempt is made to enumerate the works which are most important for the study of the problem of the Origin and Composition of the Gospels, in the form which it has now assumed. Works of which the interest is due mainly to their place in the history of past controversy are not here mentioned; some of them have been named in the preceding article. In addition to books which aim at thoroughness of treatment, a few of a more popular kind have been given. Foreign works which have been translated into English are referred to by English titles, but the dates are those of the originals. It must not be supposed that the books enumerated are in all cases devoted exclusively to the maintenance of the particular views under which they are classed; e.g. 'Introductions' contain reviews of the history of opinion. But it has not been thought worth while in most cases to mention the same work more than once.

GOTHIC VERSION.—See VERSION.

GOTHOLIAS (Γοθολίας), 1 Es 8^{33}.—Jesias son of Gotholias returned with Ezra. His name in Ezr 8^{7} is ATHALIAH, which was thus both a male and female name (2 K 11^{1}). The form is derived from the Heb., the Γ taking the place of the initial Ayin, and not through the Greek of Ezr ('Αθελεί, 'Αθλιά).

H. ST. J. THACKERAY.

GOTHONIEL (Γοθονιήλ).—The father of Chabris, one of the rulers of Bethulia (Jth 6^{15}).

GOURD (קִיקָיוֹן kîḳâyôn, κολοκύνθη, hedera).—There are three opinions in regard to the plant intended in Jon 4^{6-10}.

(a) That of Jerome, expressed in the Vulg. rendering hedera (ivy),—an opinion with no support, etymological or botanical, and denounced by Augustine as heresy.

(b) That of Celsius (Hierob. ii. 273), that it was the kharwa', Ricinus communis, L., the castor-oil tree. The grounds for this opinion are philological. Dioscorides (iv. 164) describes the κρότων, i.e. the castor-oil tree, under the name of κίκι, and the Talm. calls castor-oil שֶׁמֶן קִיק shemen ḳîḳ. The plant which God provided to overshadow Jonah, however, was a vine, which seems from the context to have trailed over his arbour, and not a small tree like the castor-oil plant, which could not, by any stretch of the imagination, be regarded as a vine.

(c) That of the LXX, κολόκυνθα (see Wild Gourds below), the bottle-gourd, Cucurbita lagenaria, L., the ḳar'ah of the Arabs. This has the advantage of answering the botanical conditions perfectly. Jonah had constructed a booth, such as the 'lodge in a garden of cucumbers' (see CUCUMBER), of poles and leaves. He sat in the shade of this booth. But the leaves soon withered, and he was exposed again to the blazing sun of Mesopotamia. It is quite customary to plant the bottle-gourd by such booths, or by the trellises near houses. It grows very rapidly, and its broad leaves form an excellent shade. Such a vine, growing over Jonah's booth, suits well the narrative. The rapidity with which the leaves of these gourd-vines die and wither and curl up is also eminently appropriate.

Wild Gourds (פַּקֻּעֹת paḳḳu'ôth, τολύπη, colocynthides). These are the fruits of a vine growing in the fields ($2\,K\,4^{39}$). The root of this word signifies to burst open. This etym. would suit the squirting cucumber, Ecballium Elaterium, L., in Arab. kiththâ el-ḥimâr. This plant is very common, and its juice is a drastic cathartic, and in large quantities an irritant poison. But it could not, with any propriety, be called a vine. It is a perennial erect herb, with a brittle stiff stem and branches, and is quite destitute of tendrils. This would make the term גֶּפֶן, gephen, wholly inappropriate to it.

Cucumis prophetarum, L., which grows in the deserts around the Dead Sea, and southward to Sinai, has been suggested. But the small size of its ovoid fruit, only an inch long, does not correspond to the colocynthides of the Vulgate.

The authority of the LXX and the Vulg. is in favour of the colocynth, Citrullus Colocynthis, L., the ḥanḍol of the Arabs. This plant is a cucurbitaceous vine, growing prostrate on the ground, or trailing by its spiral tendrils over shrubs and herbs. It has a lobed leaf, and a melon 3 to 3½ in. in diameter, which dries when ripe, and when opened discloses a fungous, intensely bitter pulp, containing smooth shining seeds. This pulp is also a drastic cathartic, and, in quantities, an irritant poison. The colocynth corresponds well to the requisites of the passage, that it should be a vine, bearing gourds (colocynthides) of a noxious quality. This plant, which is called in Greek κολοκυνθίς, must not be confounded with κολοκύνθη, which is the cultivated gourd. The knops ($1\,K\,6^{18}$ marg. gourds, 7^{24} פְּקָעִים pĕḳâ'îm) may have been imitations of this fruit. G. E. POST.

GOVERNANCE.—This old form of 'government' occurs occasionally in the versions before AV, as Jer 23^{10} Cov. 'Yee the waye that men take, is wicked, and their governaunce is nothinge like the holy worde of the Lorde'; and it has been retained in AV and RV (from Cov.) in $2\,Es\,11^{32}$ 'it had the governance of the world' (potentatum habuit); and $1\,Mac\,9^{31}$ 'Jonathan took the governance upon him at that time' (ἐπεδέξατο τὴν ἡγησιν). The word occurs also in the Pr. Bk., as in Morn Prayer, Third Collect, for Grace, 'That all our doings may be ordered by thy governance,' retained from 1549 in all editions. Sir T. Elyot in The Governour, ii. 109, says, 'Finally the Atheniensis, . . . toke to them a desperate corage, and in conclusion expelled out of the citie all the said tyrantes, and reduced it unto his pristinate governance.' And Chaucer, Hous of Fame, 958—

> 'Lo, is it not a greet mischaunce,
> To lete a fole han governaunce
> Of thing that he can not demeine?'

J. HASTINGS.

GOVERNMENT. — The forms of government among the Hebrews, though they developed with the course of their history, never became as strict or constitutional as among Western nations. It should therefore be kept in mind that the technical terms used in this article must be allowed some elasticity of meaning to suit Semitic institutions. These forms may be treated in the following order:—1. Those of the nomad period, extending from the Exodus out of Egypt to the settlement in Palestine. 2. The new organization due to the change from a nomad to a settled and agricultural life. 3. The institution and nature of the monarchy. 4. The semi-political independence of the Jewish communities among foreign nations. 5. The religious community of Judæa in post-exilic times.

1. When first the Hebrews appear in historical records as an organized body, their government is simple and in accordance with that of other Semitic nomads. During their wanderings in the peninsula of Sinai and East of the Jordan, there are two units of organization—the family and the tribe. A third factor is due to the temporary needs of their circumstances; it is the leadership of Moses. This chieftainship, however, was only for a special purpose, its power was personal rather than constitutional, and was controlled and modified by the claims of kinship in family and tribe. The suspicion of any attempt to make it more aroused rebellion at once (cf. the JE account of the revolt of Dathan and Abiram in Nu 16, especially v.[16]). The officials appointed by Moses at the suggestion of his father-in-law were doubtless selected with due regard to tribal feelings (Ex $18^{21ff.}$). A thorough study of these two units of society is necessary for the understanding both of this and the succeeding periods of Hebrew history (cf. FAMILY, especially ii. c, TRIBE, and the literature given at the end of this article). The father as head (רֹאשׁ) of the family had full power of life and death over all its members (cf. Gn 22, Jg $11^{34ff.}$). The ruler of the tribe was probably, as among the Bedawîn of to-day, one of the heads of families who was distinguished for his courage or his hospitality. His authority, both in legal and in military matters, was personal, and his judgments were observed just in so far as his influence was powerful. This position of authority might continue in the same family for generations, but might be lost at any time, and pass to others owing to loss of prestige. The laws observed were those of custom only, and did not exist in a written form. Matters of strife between different families were referred to the tribal chief; and if his decisions were in accordance with the customs of the tribe, or otherwise commended themselves to the people, the person condemned submitted, or became an outcast from his own people. If there were no custom to guide the judge, or the case were very difficult, an appeal might be made to the god by means of the sacred lot or oracle. The leadership in time of war naturally fell to the head of the tribe; and a special duty of hospitality was laid upon him, but otherwise he lived like any other head of a family. There is no mention of any revenue being assigned to him as an official.

2. The second period extends from the entrance into Palestine to the institution of the monarchy, and includes the history related in the Books of Joshua, Judges, and the first part of the Book of Samuel. It was a time of unrest, change, and adjustment. It is marked by the decay of the tribal feeling as such, and the transference of its traditions to local organizations and forms of government. This was due to the fact that a man's neighbours became of much more interest to him than his fellow-tribesmen in his new settled life. The most important person at this time was the 'judge' (שֹׁפֵט). The Hebrew word denotes 'deliverer' or 'ruler' (on the different uses of the word שָׁפַט see Journal of Biblical Literature, viii. 130–136). The former meaning does not concern us here. With the latter compare the title sufetes used in Carthage (Livy, xxviii. 37, xxx. 7) and other cities of North Africa (CIL viii. Nos. 7, 765, 10,525). The 'judges' were thus men who by their prowess became influential, and so ruled over their tribes (cf. Moore, Judges, pp. xi–xiii). An attempt to continue this office in the same family failed (Gideon and Abimelech). With this attempt we are introduced to a new word for ruler, מֶלֶךְ 'king.' What the original sense of the word was (cf. McCurdy, HPM i. § 36) does not concern us, as it had probably lost its original force when it was adopted by the Hebrews. The chief difference between a local or tribal king (מֶלֶךְ) and a 'judge' (שֹׁפֵט) seems to have consisted in the idea of hereditary transmission of office involved in the former (Jg 8^{22}). This idea of continuity of office may have been derived from an application of the title 'king' to the god. This was a common practice among the Semitic peoples (cf. for Phœnicians and others, W. R. Smith, RS, 1st ed. p. 67 ff., 2nd ed. p. 66 ff.; for the Hebrews, G. B. Gray, Studies in Hebrew Proper Names, p. 115 ff.). Among the changes due to the new settled life, it may be noticed that the 'elders' (זְקֵנִים), who in the older tribal organization were the heads of the families, now became an upper class, corresponding to the 'elders' (זְקֵנִים) or 'princes' (שָׂרִים) of the Canaanitish communities (Jg 8^{14} 9, cf. Nowack, Heb. Archæol. i. 304). It was also probably in imitation of a Canaanitish custom that a city and its 'towns' (literally 'daughters' בָּנוֹת, i.e. suburbs) were sometimes united for purposes of common protection and government (Nu $21^{25.\ 32}$, Jos 17^{11}, cf. 2 S 20^{19}). Another prominent figure in the almost formless government of this time was the 'seer' (רֹאֶה), whose intimate relation to the deity was supposed to bestow on him a kind of second sight (cf. Saul's first visit to Samuel in 1 S $9^{6ff.}$), and led men to appeal to him for decisions in matters of dispute. Samuel may be looked upon as both 'seer' and 'judge.'

3. The institution of the monarchy is generally regarded as marking a crisis in Hebrew history; and in the historical writings of OT it is looked at and judged from the standpoint of the later religious beliefs. But it did not mean a breaking from the earlier family and tribal customs—now transferred to local organization—which persisted to the end, and prevented the monarchy from ever corresponding exactly to the familiar Western type. As W. R. Smith says, 'With us the king or his government is armed with the fullest authority to enforce law and justice, and the limitations of his power lie in the independence of the legislature and the judicial courts. The old Semitic king, on the contrary, was supreme judge, and his decrees were laws; but neither his sentences nor his decrees could take effect unless they were supported by forces over which he had very imperfect control. He simply threw his weight into the scale,—a weight which was partly due to the moral effect of his sentence, and partly to the material resources which he commanded, not so much as king as in the character of a great noble, and the head of a powerful circle of kinsfolk and clients. An energetic sovereign, who had gained wealth and prestige by successful wars, or inherited the resources accumulated by a line of kingly ancestors, might wield almost despotic power; and in a stable dynasty the tendency was towards the gradual establishment of absolute monarchy, especially if the royal house was able to maintain a standing army devoted to its interests' (RS, 1st ed. p. 63, 2nd ed. p. 62). The chief object in the introduction of the monarchy among the Hebrews was 'to have a strong reliable chieftain perpetually guaranteed' (McCurdy, HPM i. p. 56).

(a) Mode of succession.—In the case of Saul the circumstances were extraordinary, therefore the form of his appointment was not regarded as creating a precedent for later times. The growing tendency towards unity had led to the desire among the people, and they turned naturally to the most influential man among them for advice. It was therefore on the nomination of Samuel, supported by the personal valour of his nominee, that Saul was chosen and confirmed in his office at some kind of popular gathering. In the ordinary course of events one of Saul's sons would have succeeded his father. But the fittest among them had perished on the battle-field. Ishbosheth did indeed succeed, thanks to the help of his friends, in securing for a short time the throne of the house of Joseph, but was soon eclipsed by the personal prowess of the king of Judah. The religious influence of the prophets was against him, and treason came to the help of his rival. David became king over all Israel. In the accession of Solomon the principle of hereditary succession takes its natural course, for the king had the right as the father and head of his family to appoint as his successor whichever son he pleased. The heads of the religious and military parties in the state assisted David in carrying his wishes into effect. After this time the succession was regularly observed in Judah, for the Southern kingdom consisted practically of one tribe only, and so was free from intertribal jealousies and feuds. In the Northern kingdom it was very different. Dynasty succeeded dynasty, and in the last twenty years of their existence no fewer than seven kings sat on the throne of Israel. In the rare times of internal quiet, however, the principle of hereditary succession seems to have been recognized as in Judah.

(b) The power of the king and constitution of his household.—The rule of Saul was characterized by its simplicity. 'The son of Kish ruled in peace at Gibea in the house of his father, leading the very simple life of the last of the judges. On leaving the harem in the morning he seated himself before the gate of the palace. There, surrounded by some attendants, under the protection of a small Benjaminite guard, he gave audience to every comer, inquired as to the news, questioned travellers, received the oral reports of his officers, appeased quarrels, administered justice (2 S 15^{2}, cf. 1 S 22^{17}). Then, when the sun went down, he withdrew into the apartments of the women. At the beginning of each month he gave a feast at which his officers had their assigned places, while he himself presided, his back prudently placed to the wall for fear of assassins (1 S 20^{25}). Finally, when he went out, he was preceded by runners

(1 S 22[17]). Such alone were his privileges and his duties in time of peace' (Marcel Dieulafoy, Le Roi David, p. 72 f.). All this was changed with the ever-increasing prosperity of David. The king remained leader and father of his people only so long as they had no friendly intercourse with other nations. As soon as the Hebrew nation was recognized, and its friendship sought by other states, the Hebrew king began to imitate the luxury of his peers. A court was formed of the officials, whose common interests grouped them round the king and made access to him ever more and more difficult for the mass of the people. The officials of David's court were—(1) military; (2) household; (3) religious. The following are mentioned in his time—(1) The commander of 'the host' (2 S 8[16]); the commander of the king's bodyguard of Cherethites and Pelethites (2 S 20[23], cf. 8[18]). (2) The recorder or remembrancer (מַזְכִּיר 2 S 8[16]); the scribe or secretary (סֹפֵר 8[17]); the counsellor (יוֹעֵץ 2 S 15[12]); the king's friend (רֵעֶה 2 S 15[37] 16[16]); the keeper of the king's audience (2 S 23[23], cf. 1 S 22[14] LXX); the overseer of forced labour (2 S 20[24]). (3) The priests (2 S 8[17]). Prophets do not seem to have been attached to the court, but had free access to the king (cf. 2 S 7. 12).

Under Solomon the pomp and luxury of the court was greatly increased. New buildings and fortified cities (1 K 6. 7. 9) proclaimed the growing power of the monarch, and the separation of the court from the people is indicated by the tolerance of foreign religions and the personal nature of the treaties with foreign powers. Two new officials make their appearance — a chamberlain (עַל־הַבַּיִת 1 K 4[6]) and a superintendent of taxes (1 K 4[5], and see below under 'Revenue'). After Solomon there was little change in the constitution of the court (but cf. EUNUCH).

(c) Revenue.—Even in Saul's reign there seems to have been a regular system of taxation of families (1 S 17[25], cf. 8[17], and Nowack, Heb. Archæol. p. 313). In addition to this the king received gifts (1 S 10[27] 16[20]), and doubtless his share of the booty in war. This last is specially mentioned in the time of David (2 S 8[11] 12[30]). Solomon's revenues were derived (in addition to the above mentioned) from the tribute of subject peoples (1 K 4[21]); taxes on merchants (1 K 10[15]); his sea-trade with Hiram (1 K 10[11]); and a royal regulation of the horse-trade with Egypt (v.[11]). But the king taxed his own subjects much more rigorously than his predecessors. He divided the kingdom into twelve parts, each being represented by an officer, who was compelled to provide for the king's household for one month in the year (1 K 4). Judah is not mentioned in this division of the land, and was probably exempted from this form of taxation by favour of the king. Nowack, however, thinks there were originally thirteen divisions, and that the number was reduced to twelve by a later writer to agree with the number of the tribes (Heb. Archæol. i. 313 note). Later, it seems that the goods of a condemned person might be forfeit to the king (1 K 21). But this may be merely an act of despotism. When reduced to great straits, the king took possession of the treasures, not only of his own treasury but also of the temple, in order to keep off an invading power (2 K 18[15]).

(d) Administration of justice.—There seems to have been little development here during this period. The system mentioned above persisted, modified only by the personal authority of the king and the members of his court (see quotation from W. R. Smith, above). Until B.C. 621 there was no written law except the short religious code contained in the 'Book of the Covenant' (Ex 20–23); nor were there any special courts or officials for the administration of justice. The method for settling disputes was rather by arbitration than by law in the Western sense. At the same time, the king himself in his capital and its neighbourhood, and his officials in the chief towns, being the most important persons, were naturally appealed to for decisions, though there was no law necessitating appeal to them rather than to any other person. Even such acts in later times as the imprisonments of Jeremiah (Jer 37. 38) and the putting to death of Uriah (Jer 26), were acts of personal violence on the part of the king, and not due to the regular sentence of a court (cf. also the account of the charge against Naboth, and the way in which he was put to death (1 K 22[13ff.])). After the destruction of the Northern kingdom, an attempt was made in Judah (in 621) to regulate the legal as well as the religious procedure on the lines of the teaching of the prophets by the proclamation of the Book of Deuteronomy (cf. DEUTERONOMY). But the realization of this scheme was prevented by the untimely death of Josiah at the battle of Megiddo, nor was it fully adopted in Judæa until nearly two centuries later.

4. A remarkable feature in Jewish life is the persistence of the religious and semi-political self-government of their communities in the different empires in which they were dispersed. Everywhere we find them submitting their disputes to the judgment of their own officials rather than to those of the state in which they live; everywhere they claim and are granted special exemption from certain civil laws (as those regarding military conscription) on the ground of religious scruple. Many examples of their peculiar privileges in Palestine are found in the NT (cf. Ac 9[2] 18[12-16] 22[19] 26[11]). But in Alexandria this is even more striking. Thanks to the favour of Alexander the Great, they early established themselves in the position of a favoured people in the new city. That favour was continued to them by the Ptolemies, and they had in addition equal rights with others as citizens (ἰσοτιμία). Their own governor (ἐθνάρχης) is mentioned by Strabo (cf. Jos. Ant. XIV. vii. 2). Some of the Roman decrees conferring privileges upon them are preserved by Josephus (Ant. XIV. x., XVI. vi.). Philo tells us that on the death of a γενάρχης Augustus appointed a γερουσία for the conduct of Jewish affairs (in Flaccum, sec. 10). In Rome there was not the same political organization as in Alexandria, but the different synagogues were organized separately, each with its own gerousia and officials. (See further Schürer, HJP II. ii. 244 ff.).

5. After the fall of Jerusalem in B.C. 586, the Jews became subject to foreign governments, and have remained so since, except for the short interval when the Maccabæan princes ruled, or more exactly from B.C. 142 when Simon ceased to pay tribute, or 139 when the right of coining money proclaimed the independence of Judæa. The civil government of this time is, however, no longer distinctively Jewish, but a mere modification of Western forms to suit the religious laws of the people. These laws had come into force at the time when Ezra had brought back from Babylon many of the devoutest Jewish exiles. At a solemn assembly a new community had been formed, which was to realize the idea of the 'remnant' of Isaiah and his successors, a spiritual Judah, subject to the civil government of the suzerain power, but in all matters pertaining to religion following as far as possible the precepts of Deuteronomy and the new law book (P) compiled and edited about this time (cf. Neh 9. 10). Since then the Jews have ever remained subject to this double form of government. The conflict of the two led to their perpetual strife with their civil rulers, and to the final fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70. According to Jewish authorities, the chief representative of the religious governing power during this period was the 'Great Synagogue' (כְּנֶסֶת הַגְּדוֹלָה), which existed from Ezra to Simon the Just. Some such body may have existed, but much of the literature concerning it contains legendary material (cf. SYNAGOGUE, THE GREAT). At the time of Christ the Sanhedrin had taken its place (cf. SANHEDRIN). For the more strictly civil government of the time of Christ, see art. ROMAN EMPIRE. See also CHURCH GOVERNMENT and HELPS.

GOVERNOR.—This word occurs as the rendering of several Heb. and Gr. terms. In OT it is used most frequently for the Peḥah (פֶּחָה), a district ruler administering under a sovereign. The title is employed both for Persian satraps and for their subordinate magistrates. Thus it appears as a designation of Tattenai (Ezr $5^{3.6}$ 6^{6}), who seems to have been the satrap of a large province which extended from Posideium on the frontiers of Cilicia and Syria to Egypt, and which included Phœnicia, Palestine, and Cyprus (Herod. vi. 91). It is also applied to Zerubbabel, who was appointed under this satrap to the district of Judah (Ezr 6^{7}). The subordinate Peḥah, as well as his superior, was directly commissioned by the king (Ezr 5^{14}). The other Heb. words rendered 'governor' are of a less technical character, signifying · leadership, אַלּוּף Zec 9^{7} $12^{5.6}$, and נָגִיד 2 Ch 1^{2}; judicial and legislative functions, חוֹקֵק Jg 5^{9}; ruling authority, מֹשֵׁל Gn 45^{26}, שַׁלִּיט Gn 42^{6}, שַׂר 1 K 22^{26}; administrative oversight, פָּקִיד Jer 20^{1}; and social rank, נָשִׂיא 2 Ch 1^{2}.

In NT the word 'governor' most frequently occurs as a rendering of the Gr. ἡγεμών (Vulg. præses, Luth. Landpfleger), a term which is used in the plur. for rulers generally (e.g. Mk 13^{9}, 1 P 2^{14}), but which more often has a definite application to the Roman Procurators, referring in the Gospels to Pontius Pilate (e.g. Mt 27^{2}, Lk 20^{20}), who is designated Procurator by Tacitus—'Christus Tiberio imperante per procuratorem Pontium Pilatum supplicio adfectus erat' (Ann. xv. 44), and in Ac to Felix (Ac 23^{26}) and Festus (Ac 26^{30}). Judæa was not entirely incorporated in the province of Syria, but the Procurator was to a certain extent dependent on the Legate of Syria, the latter having a right to interfere when difficulties arose (Jos. Ant. XVIII. i. 1, iv. 2; Bell. Jud. II. viii. 1). Thus Judæa belonged to the third class of provinces in Strabo's classification (Geog. xvii. 3. 25), one containing only a few provinces regarded either as semi-barbarous or as exceptionally insubordinate, e.g. Egypt. Augustus preferred the title Præfectus (ἔπαρχος) for the governors of such provinces, but by the time of Claudius Procurator (ἐπίτροπος) was the recognized name. Josephus employs both ἐπίτροπος and ἔπαρχος, and also the word used in NT, ἡγεμών, for the governor of Judæa. That Procurator is the correct title of this official is suggested by the passage from Tacitus quoted above, and by the use of the word ἐπίτροπος in a decree of Claudius as rendered by Josephus (Ant. XX. i. 2). Technically, the Procurator was a financial officer attached either to a proconsul or to a proprætor for the purpose of collecting the Imperial revenues. But he was always entrusted with magisterial powers for the decision of questions touching the revenues. In the provinces of the third class he was the general administrator and the supreme judge, with sole power of life and death (Dion Cass. liii. 15), an appeal to Cæsar being allowed in the case of Roman citizens (see CÆSAR). Although it was not necessary that the Procurator should be a person of high station where he was only appointed to financial duties, he was required to be a knight where the charge of government was committed to him. Therefore the appointment of Felix, who was a freedman, must have struck the Jews as an insulting innovation. The headquarters of the Procurator of Judæa was Cæsarea, which was made a garrison town.

In 2 Co 11^{32} (AV and RV) the word governor appears as tr^{n} of ἐθνάρχης for the ethnarch (RVm) of Damascus. See ARETAS, ETHNARCH. The word rendered 'governor' in Gal 4^{2} AV (οἰκονόμος) is trd. 'steward' in RV, as it is elsewhere in NT, e.g. Lk 12^{42} 1 Co 4^{2}. It indicates a superior servant entrusted with the housekeeping of a family, the direction of the other domestics, and the care of children under age. The 'governor of the feast' (ἀρχιτρίκλινος, Jn 2^{8} AV, RV 'ruler of the feast') was a man appointed to see that the couches and tables were in order, to arrange the courses, to taste the food and wine, etc. (Heliodorus, Aeth. vii. 27). In early times, if not later, he was a different person from the 'toast maker' (συμποσιάρχης, Sir 32^{1}), who was one of the guests chosen by lot to direct the drinking (Grimm-Thayer). 'Governor' in Ja 3^{4} AV (a participle of εὐθύνω, straighten) means 'steersman' (RV).

GOZAN, גּוֹזָן, Γωζάν (B Γωζάρ 2 K 17^{6}, Χωζάρ 1 Ch 5^{26}).—The country on the river(s ?) of which the Israelites, deported from Samaria by the king of Assyria, had to settle, was identified correctly by Bochart (Phaleg, iii. 14) as the Gauzanitis of Ptolemy, v. 18 (Γαυζανῖτις). This region is described as situated between the Chaboras (see HABOR) and Saocoras. The latter river, flowing into the Euphrates from the Masius mountains, cannot be identified; it must have changed its course or have been dried up. At any rate, we can identify Gauzanitis as the eastern part of Osroëne of the classic writers west of Nisibis and the (later) country of Mygdonia (this name hardly =Gozan, but it is probably connected with the Mitanni of the Amarna tablets), almost in the centre of Northern Mesopotamia. This agrees too closely with the description in the Bible (2 K 17^{6} 18^{11} 19^{12}=Is 37^{12}, 1 Ch 5^{26}) to admit of any doubt. The modern name Kaushan seems to correspond, but not Zauzân (which means the mountains near the source of the Chaboras). Assyrian lists of provinces mentioning Guzana seem to show that the name referred originally to a city, the capital of the province of Guzan. Nisibis, being mentioned parallel to G. as Nasibina, did not belong to this province. See on the Assyrian passages Schrader, KAT^{2} 275; Delitzsch, Paradies, 184. On the question whether the biblical passages speak of several 'rivers of Gozan,' see HALAH. (The view of some scholars, which makes G. a river, was refuted even before the cuneiform texts were found). If the singular 'river' (Massoretic text) is to be kept, this 'river of G.' is the Habor. The plural (LXX) would point to the several brooks from the Masius which form the Habor, possibly also the Balîḥ. 2 K 2^{19}=Is 37^{12} seems to show that Gozan became an Assyrian province only in the 8th century. W. MAX MÜLLER.

GRACE.—The words most commonly rendered 'grace,' 'be gracious,' etc., in AV are חֵן (verb חָנַן) in OT, and χάρις with its cognate forms in NT. The former appears in such proper names as Hannah, Hanan, Hanun, Hanani, Hananeel ('El is gracious'), Hananiah ('J" hath been gracious'). Its force is 'to be favourable or kindly,' or 'to act in a favourable or kindly way.' Probably, however, חֶסֶד, LXX ἔλεος, corresponds more nearly with the distinctive idea of grace in its NT and general Christian use.* חֵן, for example, has no special connexion with redemptive grace, and the LXX use of χάρις, by which חֵן is usually rendered, must be to this extent distinguished from the NT use of the same word. On the other hand, ἔλεος in NT is rather pity than favour, and denotes God's relation to human misery rather than to human sin.

It is in the various applications of χάρις that the roots of the idea of grace and its specially Christian significance may in the first place be most usefully studied. Χάρις is that which bestows or occasions pleasure. It is applied to *beauty, graceful*ness, whether of person, act, or speech, cf. in LXX Ec 10^{12}, Sir 21^{16} 37^{21}, in NT Lk 4^{22}, Eph 4^{29}, Col 4^{6}. It thus denotes the favourable, friendly disposition or nature out of which the gracious act proceeds, or that which it creates in the recipient; it is the favour manifested, or the gratitude felt or acknowledged. It is loving-kindness, goodwill, in a wide acceptation, and is thus used of the kindness of a master towards his servants, and, by analogy, of the goodness of God to men; cf. Lk 1^{30}, Ac 7^{46}, 1 P $2^{19.\ 20}$. To be in favour with one is εὑρεῖν χάριν παρά τινι, ἔχειν χάριν πρός τινα, Lk 1^{30}, Ac 2^{47}, cf. Lk 2^{52}. An interesting instance of this general sense is at the beginning and end of the Apostolical Epistles, where the writers desire for their readers the grace of God or of Christ, to which grace or favour they recognize that all blessings are to be ascribed — Ro 1^{7} 16^{20}, 1 Co 1^{3} 16^{23}, 2 Co 1^{2} 13^{14}, Gal 1^{3} 6^{18}, Eph 1^{2} 6^{24}, Ph 1^{2} 4^{23}, Col 1^{2} 4^{18}, 1 Th 1^{1} 5^{28}, 2 Th 1^{2} 3^{18}, 1 Ti 1^{2} 6^{21}, 2 Ti 1^{2} 4^{22}, Tit 1^{4} 3^{15}, Philem $^{3.\ 25}$, He 13^{25}, 1 P 1^{2}, 2 P 1^{2} 3^{18}, 2 Jn ^{3}, also Rev 1^{4} 22^{21}.

The special use, however, of χάρις in NT is in reference to the mind of God as manifested towards sinners, His redemptive mercy, whereby He grants pardon to offences, and bids those who have gone astray return and accept His gift of salvation and everlasting life. It is χάρις τοῦ θεοῦ, Ro 5^{15}, 1 Co 15^{10}, 2 Co 6^{1} 8^{1}, and other passages; in Tit 2^{11} the phrase is expanded into ἡ χάρις τοῦ θεοῦ ἡ σωτήριος; in 2 Ti 2^{1} into ἡ χάρις ἡ ἐν Χριστῷ as manifested in and through Christ, whence, by a natural transference, it becomes ἡ χάρις τοῦ κυρίου ἡμῶν Χριστοῦ, as in the above-mentioned salutations, and finally establishes itself as a well-understood expression, able to stand alone without further explanation, as in the ἡ χάρις of Ro $5^{17.\ 20}$. It is in this connexion that the full meaning of χάρις is brought out as involving spontaneous favour. Its fundamental thought is that the benefit conferred is recognized by giver and receiver alike as not due; it is that to which the receiver has no right, which has not been earned, or perhaps deserved, but which the giver freely, out of pure goodness, bestows. This spontaneous character, along with the more or less direct reference to the pleasure or joy either designed or experienced,—which is indeed suggested by the connexion of the word with χαίρειν, 'to rejoice,'—is always implied, and, singularly enough, comes out more clearly in the scriptural than in the classical use of the term. It has been justly remarked that 'it depended upon Christianity to realize its full import, and to elevate it to its rightful sphere' (Cremer). Thus κατὰ χάριν is contrasted with κατὰ ὀφείλημα, Ro 4^{4}, while χάρις is contrasted with ἔργα, Ro 11^{6}, and with νόμος Jn 1^{17}, Ro 4^{16} $6^{14.\ 15}$, Gal $5^{3.\ 4}$.

From signifying the disposition and design to bring about the salvation of men, χάρις comes to be used of the power or influence by which this purpose is executed, Ac 18^{27}, 2 Co 4^{15} 6^{1}, 2 Th 1^{12}, and then further of the results, general and specific, of that action. Thus it stands for the spiritual state of those who have come under the power of divine grace, Ro 5^{2}, 2 Ti 2^{1}, 1 P 5^{12}, 2 P 3^{18}; and for the evidences or tokens of such experience, as when the alms contributed by the Christian Churches are so designated, 1 Co 16^{3}, 2 Co $8^{6.\ 19}$, or the sum of earthly blessings (πᾶσα χάρις, 2 Co 9^{8}), or the various powers and gifts manifested by Christians (in the striking phrase ποικίλη χάρις, 1 P 4^{10}), or the power and equipment for the exercise of the apostolic office, Ro 1^{5} $12^{3.\ 6}$ 15^{15}, 1 Co 3^{10}, Gal 2^{9}, Eph $3^{2.\ 7}$. At the same time χάρις does not appear to be employed in NT for the act or gift apart from that reference to the pleasure or benefit conveyed by it, which we have already noted. The word for gift in itself is δῶρον or δωρεά. Hence it has been pointed out that 'διδόναι χάριν in Scripture must not be confounded with the same expression in profane Greek, where it means to perform an act of kindness; in Scripture it signifies "to give grace," "to cause grace to be experienced"; see Eph 4^{7}, 1 P 5^{5}, Ja 4^{6}, Ro 12^{3}, 1 Co 1^{4}, 2 Co 6^{1} 8^{1} (cf. Ac 11^{23})'—Cremer. The gift which enables the recipient to be in his turn a source of pleasure or profit to others is more frequently χάρισμα; where χάρις and χάρισμα approximate in signification, it will usually be found that the former is more general,—as, e.g., when χάρις τοῦ θεοῦ is used by St. Paul in reference to his office, it applies to the whole of his ministry, rather than to specific equipments for it. Finally, the use of χάρις for 'thanks,' the correlative of favour,—the 'return favour,' as it were,—illustrates the process of growth and transference in the use of the word which we have so far traced.

The teaching of the Bible as to grace cannot, however, be exhausted by the analysis, however minute, of any one word or expression. Its fundamental implication of a kind and merciful disposition, manifesting itself in acts of unmerited goodness, especially towards the sinful and erring, brings grace as one of the divine attributes into close relation with others, and the revelation of it may, it is obvious, be even more frequent in act than in word, conveyed therefore rather by description than direct expression. Not in declarations merely, but in the whole series of the divine dealings with mankind, grace is ex ibited. The whole biblical history might be claimed as a record of its manifestation. It thus takes different forms, and includes a wide area of operation. It is allied to the goodness which God shows to all His creatures, and which the Psalms so frequently celebrate —33^{5} 119^{64} 145, etc.; to the compassion which has as its objects the needy and unfortunate, Ps 25^{6} 103^{8}, Lk 1^{72}, 2 Co 1^{3}; to the long-suffering which bears with the unthankful and the evil, Ex 34^{6}, Ro 9^{22}; to the patience which defers as long as possible the punishment of sin, Ps 145^{8}, Ro 2^{4}. It belongs therefore to the circle of divine attributes, the keynote of which is Love. In all the phases of what we have already seen to be its highly complex significance, — whether as mercy and favour in general, or as the manifestations of God's goodwill in the form of temporal or spiritual advantages, or as His disposition to pardon the sinner, or His redemptive scheme as a whole, or the influences by which souls are turned to Christ, kept, strengthened, and increased in faith and love, and impelled to the exercise of Christian virtues,— in all of these, grace implies that God overcomes, not by necessity or force, but by the freeness of His love, Ro $5^{20.21}$. This is the reason why grace is not only one of the perfections of God, but one of the distinctive features of the Christian revelation. Revelation is marked by progress. The God who is at first hidden from men, so that they seek Him, if haply they may feel after Him and find Him, is at length made known, but first as a jealous God (ὀργὴ θεοῦ), only afterwards as a gracious God. And the revelation is completed when 'the LORD, the LORD, a God full of compassion and gracious, slow to anger and plenteous in mercy and truth; keeping mercy for thousands, forgiving iniquity and transgression and sin, and that will by no means clear the guilty' (Ex $34^{6.7}$ RV), which is the loftiest OT conception of God, becomes in the NT 'the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ.' We proceed, therefore, to consider somewhat more minutely the elements which enter into the conception of grace and the forms which it assumes in OT and NT respectively.

On the distinctive meaning of חֶסֶד, cf. W. R. Smith, Prophets[1], 160 f., 460 f.
